INTRODUCTION.

Introduction.

THE Konkan is now held to include all the land which lies between the Western Gháts and the Indian Ocean, from the latitude of Daman on the north to that of Terekhol, on the Goa frontier, on the south. This tract is about 320 miles in length, with a varying breadth of thirty to sixty miles, and is divided into the British districts of Thána Kolába and Ratnágiri, and the Native States of Jawhár Janjira and Sávantvádi.¹ The Pant Sachiv of Bhor in Poona has also a group of villages below the Gháts.

The word Konkan is of Indian origin and of considerable antiquity, but its meaning as the name of a country is not obvious and has never been satisfactorily explained, although various interpretations of it have been given. The district known under the name appears to have had very different limits at different periods. The seven Konkans of Hindu mythology are mentioned in a Hindu history of Kashmir, and are said by Professor H. H. Wilson² to have included nearly the whole of the west coast of India. Grant Duff³ considered the Konkan to extend along the coast from the Tápti to Sadáshivgad, and inland as far as the open plains of the Dakhan, and he thus included in it part of both Gujarát and Kánara, and of the country above the Gháts. This latter he called Konkan Ghát-mátha as opposed to Tal-Konkan or the lowlands: and he inferred that the Musalmáns were the first who limited the name to the low country.⁴ Ferishta⁵ also speaks of the Konkan under the name of Tal-Ghát, and Kháfi Khán calls it Tal-Konkan. This inclusion of the hilly district above and near the edge of the Gháts is very reasonable: for any one who passes from west to east will see that the country immediately above and immediately below the Gháts is of exactly the same character, although so different in elevation, while it is a few miles further east that the great bare plains which characterise the Dakhan begin. This narrow district above the Gháts is made up of the Mávals, the Khorás, and the Murhás, but it should be stated that neither the name Konkan-Ghát-Mátha, nor the meaning of the words describing its divisions is now generally known.¹ As opposed to this extended interpretation of the Konkan, Bird states that according to Sanskrit writers the Konkan stretched only from Devgad to Sadāshivgad (that is a distance altogether of only about ninety miles), from the Tāpti to Devgad being Abhir, or the country of the shepherds: that the divisions of Abhir were Berbera or Marātha from the Tāpti to Bassein, Virāt from Bassein to Bānkot, and Kirāt from Bānkot to Devgad.² It is curious that the limits thus assigned to the provinces of Virāt, Kirāt, and Konkan should exactly coincide with those generally given for the districts of the Parbhus, Brāhmans, and Shenvis respectively.

Introduction.

Whatever the old signification of the word may have been, the name Konkan is now used in the sense first mentioned, and the modern division of the district is into North and South Konkan, meaning the parts north and south of Bombay.³ The boundary between the North and South Konkan is, however, sometimes considered to be the Sāvitrī river, which divides the Habshi's territory from Ratnāgiri, as, for some years after the English conquest, the district of the North Konkan included the sub-divisions as far south as the Sāvitrī.

Of this district it may be said generally that the parts near the coast are fertile, highly cultivated, and populous, and the inland parts rocky and rugged, not much favoured by nature nor improved by man. Compared with other parts of India the climate is moist, the rainfall being very heavy, and hot winds but little felt. Although enervating it is much more equable than that of the Dakhan: and the district, especially the southern part, may be called decidedly healthy. North of Bombay the coast is low and sandy, containing in many places great expanses of salt swamp, the rivers few and shallow, and the harbours insignificant. South of Bombay the coast is bold with a line of hills often bordering the sea, never receding more than two or three miles from it; there are many navigable rivers and commodious harbours, and in most parts deep water near the shore. At various places along the coast are small rocky islands, generally within a quarter of a mile of the mainland, and which were in earlier times, and especially under the Maráthás, fortified and highly valued. Such are Arnála, Kolába, Dánda-Rájápur, and Suvarndurg. At Málvan, besides one or two islands of this sort, there are a great number of smaller rocks and reefs, and the whole sea between that port and the Vengurla rocks (formerly called by the Portuguese Ilheos Queimados, and thence shown in old English maps under the name of 'The burnt rocks')¹ is made dangerous by rocks of all sorts and sizes. Passing inland, the North Konkan is less rugged, and contains far more arable land though a thinner population than the South Konkan, which is, speaking generally, a rocky plateau slightly elevated, and from want of soil exceedingly sterile. But it is intersected by many great rivers and arms of the sea, and the valleys through which these and their tributary streams flow, partly make up by their fertility for the barrenness of the surrounding plateaux. The North Konkan is still in most parts well wooded, and in the coast districts the palmyra and the date palm spring up spontaneously in every direction. Parts of the Southern Konkan are also well covered with trees, though, from the nature of the soil, many parts are bare. On this part of the coast neither palmyra nor date tree is seen, but their place is better supplied by great groves of cocoanut trees planted along all the sandy parts of the coast and the banks of the creeks. The villages throughout the Konkan are almost invariably shaded with trees, and wherever there is room enough the houses stand in their own compounds, while in many of the inland districts they are found in scattered hamlets, several of which go to make up a village.

"The Konkan in early times seems to have been a thinly inhabited forest, from which character it has even now but partially emerged."² The last remark is at the present day true of part of the North Konkan, the South possessing a population very thick compared with the area. It may be considered certain, however, that the history of a comparatively late period a district "where beasts were to be found in great numbers, and the great empire claimed." The population Elphinstone considers to have been always Marátha,³ but there is a great difference between the inhabitants of the northern and those of the southern Konkan. In the latter the population is purely Marátha, and the large tribes more or less aboriginal, several somewhat mixed castes, and, except for comparatively recent settlers, a total absence of pure Maráthás and Bráhmans. The whole tract is agricultural, the largest town having little over 14,000 inhabitants. Until the accession of the British Government the population had always a distinctly warlike character, and the South Konkan still supplies so great a number of recruits to the Bombay Army, that there are as many military pensioners in this district as in the whole of the rest of the Presidency. Besides this, all castes of the South Konkan are much more in the habit of seeking their living abroad than the natives of other parts, though they almost invariably return home to end their days. Both coast and interior are remarkable for the number of forts, so that it is little exaggeration to say that in some parts every rock and promontory, mountain and hill, were fortified. These forts are now all in ruins, but the beauty of the creeks and hills and valleys remains, and in many cases the forts themselves

Than in the panoply of war.”

Though the Konkan can scarcely be called historically famous, its long coast line and convenient harbours, together with its comparative nearness to the Arabian coast, made it known to the earliest travellers, while the natural strength of the country and the character of its inhabitants gave it in later days much greater importance than its wealth or extent would have justified. The Buddhists and after them the Bráhmans chose Sálsette for one of their greatest monastic establishments, and in other parts of the Konkan their cave temples are remarkable. The descendants of immigrant Pársis Jews Abyssinians and probably others are still found in considerable numbers. The Musalmáns had ^{three} famous marts on this coast, and when the Portuguese began to make settlements in India the coast of the North Konkan was one of their early acquisitions; and in the South Konkan factories of the English Dutch and French were established ^{early} in the seventeenth century. A little later the great founder of the Maráthá empire chose a Konkan hill-fort as his capital. And when, after two or three generations, the pure Maráthá dynasty lost its power, the Konkani Bráhmans better known as Konkanasths or Chitpávans inherited it and extended the Maráthá conquests over the greatest part of India. Thus, though the Konkan has never been more than a province of some inland kingdom, it has many famous associations. And if, as geographically it does, the island of Bombay be considered to belong to it, the Konkan may be said to possess also one of the greatest centres of modern commerce. But the history of Bombay does not come within the scope of this memoir, and it must be admitted that the Konkan generally has for the last hundred years lost the greater part of such importance as it formerly had, and, except for its nearness to Bombay, would be even less regarded than it is. The Thána district has, indeed, benefited by both the railways which end at Bombay, and roads run through almost every part of it. But it is only within the last few years that roads fit for wheeled vehicles have been commenced in any of the districts south of Bombay, and many parts of the south, as well as the whole of the Jawhár and Janjira states, are still without cart roads. The Gháts separate the Konkan like a wall from the great plains of the Dakhan, and in the whole length of these mountains there are but eight cart roads leading from the Dakhan to the coast, and of these the two principal have been to some extent superseded by the railways that run close to them. In fact, none of the influences which have spread wealth over the rest of the Presidency in the last few years have affected the Konkan, except as regards a comparatively small part of the northern half. The interest of the country must depend therefore on the beauty of its scenery, its past history, and the character of its inhabitants, and in these respects it need not fear comparison with the more favoured and celebrated provinces of India.

Note 1.—Owing to the Konkan, though geographically so distinct, having been from the earliest times divided, and its various parts attached first to one kingdom and then to another, no history of it either by a Native or European author is known to exist. This accounts for the great number of references to the works of historians and travellers which will be found in this short sketch.

Note 2.—In the Second Section (Antiquities and Traditions) great additions have been made to Mr. Nairne's narrative for which he is not responsible. These refer in some cases to discoveries made since Mr. Nairne left India.

SECTION I.

EARLY TRAVELLERS.

THE earliest certain mention of the country now called the Konkan is in the geography of Ptolemy about A.D. 150, and in the Greek work called "The Periplus of the Erythraean Sea," the authorship of which is uncertain, and the date variously calculated from A.D. 66 to A.D. 240. Ptolemy makes of this part of the coast two provinces, Larika (Sk. Lātaka or Lātadesh¹) which is identified with Gujarāt and part of the North Konkan, and Ariaka which includes the rest of the Konkan.² The author of the Periplus does not mention Larika, but applies the name of Barugaza or Broach to this province as well as to the port of Broach, and states that Ariaka included "the land of the pirates."³ This is the first mention of the pirates, who down to the present century, were the terror of the coast between Bombay and Goa. With reference to them Rennell about 1780 wrote: "Few countries with so straight a general outline are so much broken into bays and harbours. The multitude of shallow ports, an uninterrupted view along the shore, and an elevated coast favourable to distant vision, have always fitted this tract of country for piracy. The land and sea breezes blow alternately and divide the day, so that vessels sailing along the coast are obliged to keep within sight of land."⁴ The pirates of Suvarn-durg are also mentioned by Strabo.⁵ Vincent in collating the various descriptions of the coast assigns to Ariaka the limits from Goa to the Tāpti, and of course includes in this the land of the pirates, and he considers that as the province can thus be identified with tolerable certainty, it is of little use to try to ascertain the exact position of the different ports named, most of which were places of only local trade.⁶ The two identifications, however, which he makes without any doubt are Kalyān (Kalliēna) and the Vengular rocks, the first a port which was already decayed in the time of the Periplus, as Sandanes the king admitted no Egyptian vessels, and if any entered the harbour by accident or stress of weather he compelled them to go to Broach. The Vengurla rocks are mentioned as islands off the southern extremity of Ariaka and called Sesecrienai.⁷ The ports given both by Ptolemy and in the Periplus between Broach and these islands are Oopāra or Sopāra near Bassein where interesting Buddhist remains of about A.D. 50 were discovered in 1882,⁸ Semulla, Mandagora, Palaipotamai (Balapatna in Ptolemy), Melizigara, and Toparon of the Byzantians (Byzantium) in Ptolemy.¹ Besides these Ptolemy alone mentions the river Binda between Sopára and Semulla, Hippocura south of that, and the islands called Heptanesia.² These last are identified by Lassen with the islands of Bombay and Sálsette.³ Semulla he puts at Bassein, Balipatna about Cheul or Dánda Rájápur, and Manadagora a little further south. Melizigaris, called by Pliny Zizerus, he puts at Suvarndurg, Vincent at Jaygad. Ptolemy calls this place an island, Pliny a river and a port, and the author of the Periplus a place on the continent. A tolerable agreement can be found between these three apparently contradictory descriptions if it is remembered that the Arabic word Janjira, which may be evidently traced in the two names given, is still used not only for the rocky island off Dánda-Rájápur, but also for the similar rocks at Suvarndurg and Málvan, either of which places, with the towns on the mainland which they protect, might then be identified with Melizigara or Zizerus.⁴ Byzantium Lassen puts at Vijaydurg. And Nitrias, mentioned by Pliny as a chief station of the pirates, Rennell identifies with Nivti, between Málvan and Vengurla.⁵

The identification of all these places is an interesting study for those who are well acquainted with the district, and there are certain resemblances of names which will probably strike every reader; but the speculations made by different geographers are almost endless, and the means of ascertaining the real situation of the places mentioned are so small, owing to Ptolemy's mistake of making the coast from Broach to the Ganges run almost due east, and to no manuscript of the Periplus being known to exist, that it seems useless to go deep into the subject. Except Kalyán the places mentioned in the Periplus are all given as country ports frequented only by the natives.⁶ From Barugaza (Broach) and Ariaka to the coast of Africa were exported corn, rice, butter, oil of sesame, coarse and fine cotton goods, and cane-honey (sugar). And ships with these cargoes sometimes went on from the African to the Arabian ports.⁷ Whether this African trade was in the hands of Arabs or of the natives of India is doubtful, but all writers are agreed that the traffic from the west coast of India to the Red Sea was mainly in the hands of the Arabs.⁸ The trade of the ancient Egyptians with India is to be looked on as previous to history and a matter only of speculation.⁹ The Greeks from Egypt may occasionally have gone across the Indian Ocean, but in general they contented themselves with getting Indian goods from the

Arabs in the ports of the Red Sea.¹ Authorities differ as to whether the Romans ever traded with this coast at all.² As regards the ports of the Konkan in the earliest times it may be taken as proved that the larger ones were frequented by the Arabs and the smaller ones by the natives who carried on the coasting trade.³ The author of the Periplus also mentions that Muziris, which is generally identified with Mangalore, was a great place of resort for vessels from the Konkan.⁴

The conclusion is that, notwithstanding the pirates, this coast was not devoid of trade or shunned by foreigners in the earliest times of which we have any record, though it had no place of such importance as Cambay, Broach, or the ports of Malabár; and that the exports were not very different from what they now are, cotton cloth, muslin, indigo, chintz, spices, and sugar.⁵ It must also be mentioned that the metropolis to which Ariaka was subject was Tagara, a place formerly identified with Divgiri or Daulatabad, about which there is now a difference of opinion.⁶

After the author of the Periplus no authority can be mentioned until Cosmas, a Greek merchant of the sixth century, who described India, though it is very doubtful if he had visited it himself.⁷ He speaks of Calliana as a place of great trade, and states that the return cargoes from there to Ceylon consisted of native brass, sesamum, wood, and articles of clothing.⁸ He also speaks of a king of Calliana, and of there being a bishop's see and a Christian community at Kalyán subject to the Persian metropolitan. In these respects Kalyán was not different from the other considerable ports of India, most of which were frequented by Persian traders.⁹ The conjecture has been made, though the evidence is certainly weak, that the Buddhist priest Fa Hian at the end of the fourth century and Hiuen Tsiang in the seventh century both visited the Buddhist caves of Kanheri, and that the latter on his return embarked at Kalyán or Bānkot.¹⁰

After Cosmas there is a long break before any other European writer mentions this part of India, but the gap is supplied by several Arabian geographers, by whom the name is variously given as Kemkein, Komkam, Kankan, Koukan, and Konkan-Tana, which last compound is given by Ibn Batuta (1340), and is conjectured by Colonel Yule to have been the proper name of the province. The compound is reproduced by an Italian writer of the fourteenth century

Reinaud² gives an extract from an Arab writer named Beladori to the effect that in A.D. 636 the Khalif Omar sent an army to Tanna and he thinks that this was probably our Thána. But he acknowledges that the diacritical marks of the initial letter are wanting and he gives no other particulars. In the travels of the merchant Suleiman written in A.D. 851 the country of Komkam is given as part of the kingdom of the Balhára.³ But Alberuni, of whom Colonel Yule says that "in Indian matters he knew what he was talking about a great deal better than other old Arabic writers," says nothing of Balhára. He mentions a kingdom of Konkan with its capital at Tálah and gives the itinerary along the coast as Broach, Sindan 50 parasangs, Soubarah 6 parasangs, Tana 5 parasangs. Then the country of Lárán and in that Djymowr, Malyah, Kandjy; then the Dravira which Reinaud says is the Coromandel Coast. Alberuni also mentions the plains of the Konkan as containing the animal called Scharan, a quadruped with four extra legs standing up above its back.⁴

Rashid-ud-Din about A.D. 1300 mentions Konkan, of which the capital is Tana on the sea-shore. But further on he mentions Gujarát as a large country within which are Cambay, Somnát Kankan, Tana and several other cities and towns; and again 'Beyond Gujarát are Kankan and Tana, beyond them the country of Malabar.'⁵ The question as to the dependence of the Konkan on Gujarát will be considered in the next section. It is sufficient here to say that the above extracts prove that the Konkan was a separate province with a capital called Thána, which is mentioned as a town on the coast by the traveller Al Masudi who died in A.D. 956.⁶ By Al Idrisi in the twelfth century the following itinerary of the coast is given: "From Baruk (Broach) to Sindhábur⁷ along the coast four days. From hence to Bana (Thána) upon the coast four days. This is a pretty town upon a great gulf where vessels anchor and from whence they set sail."⁸ Gildemeister has no doubt that the ancient and modern places are the same, and thinks that Thána is the only port known to the Arabs between Broach and Goa of which the situation can be exactly ascertained.⁹ When it is considered that, at no very distant time, the sea must have filled the whole space between the hills on the east of the Thána creek and those on the west of it, and must have flowed also over a very wide expanse of country between Thána and Bassein, it seems that these descriptions may have been tolerably correct for the Thána of eight hundred years ago. The last of these early Arabian travellers is Ibn Batuta in the fourteenth century, who did not visit the Konkan, but mentions Thána as one of the ports from which great ships used to go to Aden.¹ But this last traveller was later in date than the famous Venetian Marco Polo (1290). His description of this part is unfortunately rather vague, nor does he mention the name Konkan. But he divides all this coast into the kingdom of Tanna and the kingdom of Lar. Of the latter his account is very indefinite, but Tanna he calls "a great kingdom with a language of its own and a king of its own, tributary to nobody; many ships and merchants frequent the place." He mentions leather, buckram, and cotton as the exports, and then he comes to the pirates, and their custom of giving up all the horses they take to the king, and keeping the rest of the plunder to themselves. With so much specified it is not difficult to assume Lar to be the Larika of Ptolemy, and to have included the northern part of the Konkan and part, at all events, of Gujarát. Colonel Yule adds that all the sea, west of this coast, was in early times called the sea of Lar.² The account of the martyrdom of the four friars at Thána, which is believed to have taken place on the Thursday before Palm Sunday 1322, is so curious that it cannot be omitted. It is given by the Friar Odoricus who himself visited Thána, and, though full of wonders anachronisms and absurdities, seems from some of the local details to be founded on fact. It is not clear whether the friars ever received the official beatification of Rome, but they appear as Beati in the Acta Sanctorum and are commemorated in one of the churches at Goa.

The account given by Odoricus is as follows: "I passed over (from Ormuz) in 28 days to Thána, where for the faith of Christ four of our minor friars had suffered a glorious martyrdom. The city is excellent in position, and hath great store of bread and wine, and aboundeth in trees. This was a great place in days of old, for it was the city of king Porus who waged so great a battle with Alexander. The people thereof are idolators, for they worship fire and serpents and trees also. The land is under the dominion of the Saracens, who have taken it by the force of arms, and they are now subject to the Emperor of Delhi. Here be found sundry kinds of beasts, and especially black lions in very great numbers, besides monkeys and baboons and bats as big as pigeons are here. There be also rats as big as are our dogs called schervi. In this country there are trees which give wine which they call loake, and which is very intoxicating. And here they do not bury the dead but carry them in great pomp to the fields, and cast them to the beasts and birds to be devoured. And they have here very fine oxen which have horns a good half pace in length, and have a hump on the back like a camel. And it was in this place called Tanna that the four minor friars suffered a glorious martyrdom for the sake of Christ."

They hired a ship at Ormuz to take them to Polumbum, but it took them to Thána instead. "Here there be fifteen houses of Christians, that is to say, of Nestorians, who are schismatics and heretics." The friars were apparently hidden in one of these Nestorian houses, and the Kadi accidentally heard of it, and sent for them, and Friar Thomas of Tolentino, Friar James of Padua, and Friar Demetrius a Georgian lay brother "good at the tongues" went, but Friar Peter of Sienna was left at home to take care of their things. There they began to dispute, and Friar Thomas confounded the Saracens as to Christ. Then the Kadi and the Saracens urged them to say what they thought of Mahomet. So, after trying to evade the question, Friar Thomas at last said, "Mahomet is the son of perdition, and hath his place in hell with the devil his father." Then the Saracens tied the friars up in the sun, that they might die a dreadful death by the intense heat. But after six hours they were cheerful and unscathed. So then they selected to burn them, and kindled a great fire "on the maidan, that is the Piazza of the city," and threw in Friar James first, and it blazed so high and wide that they could not see him, but they heard him invoking the Virgin. And when the fire was spent there he was unhurt. Then they made a much larger fire, and stripped him naked, and covered him and the wood with oil and threw him in again, while Thomas and Demetrius prayed fervently. But he again came out unhurt. Then the Malik (or podesta) tried to rescue them, and conveyed them "across a certain arm of the sea, that was a little distance from the city where there was a certain suburb," and there they were received into the house of an idolator. But the Kadi overpersuaded the Malik, and sent four men to kill the friars, and caused all the Christians to be imprisoned; and after talking in a friendly way to the friars, the four men cut off the heads of Thomas, James, and Demetrius. And the air was illuminated, and there was wonderful thunder and lightning, and the ship the friars had come in went to the bottom. And next day they found Friar Peter and tried to convert him, and on his refusing tortured him and then hung him up to a tree, and as he came down unhurt they clove him asunder and in the morning no trace of him could be found. Then a vision appeared to the Malik which disturbed him so much that he released the Christians, and "caused four mosques to be built in honour of the Friars, and put Saracen priests in each of them to abide continually." But the Emperor of Delhi sent for the Malik and put him to death, and the Kadi fled.

"Now in that country it is the custom never to bury the dead, but bodies are cast into the fields, and thus are speedily destroyed and consumed by the excessive heat; so the bodies of these friars lay for fourteen days in the sun and yet were found quite fresh and undecayed as if on the very day of their glorious martyrdom." So the Christians buried them. Afterwards Odoric came, and took their bones which worked various miracles.¹

It cannot escape notice that among all these later travellers no mention is made either of Kalyán, which had been so frequently mentioned in earlier times, or of Dábhól and Cheul, which are spoken of as great places very shortly afterwards. Ample time had certainly elapsed for Kalyán to have decayed, nor is it likely that two cities of any great pretensions should at the same time have flourished in such proximity as Kalyán and the modern Thána. The absence of any mention of Dábhól and Cheul is more difficult to explain; but until any account of their rise can be found it may perhaps be assumed that they emerged from obscurity only when the Musalmáns took possession of the Dakhan and required sea ports. It is also an allowable conjecture that Cheul did not rise to importance until the gradual drying up of the shallow waters around it Thána rendered less advantageous as a seaport.

The Arabs are said not only to have monopolised the early carrying trade between Arabia and Malabár, but also to have made many settlements on the Malabár and Konkan coasts.¹ Although some of these colonies in Kánara and Malabár are well known,² nothing certain can be adduced as to any in the Konkan. Still, in treating of the different races and castes of the district, reasons will be given for believing the very distinct class of Mahomedans known in Bombay as "Konkani Musalmáns" to be descended from the old Arab settlers. It is also stated, but the authority is not given, that the Abyssinians had planted colonies along the whole western coast of India from Cape Comorin upwards at a very early period of the Christian era, of which Rájpurí is one of the last remaining.³

The Muhammadan conquest is so distinct an era in all Indian history that it has seemed better to bring together all the descriptions of the country up to that period. In the same way the next section will contain all that can be made out as to its government and territorial divisions up to the Musalmán conquest; but this seems the best place in which to mention the immigration of two parties of foreigners from across the sea. The first of these were the ancestors of the interesting people called the Bene-Israel who are found scattered over the northern parts of the Kolúba Collectorate and are believed to have arrived in India from Yemen during the sixth century of the Christian era.⁴ Unfortunately no record ancient or recent of their history remains. Still the Jews of Cochin say that they found the Bene-Israel at Rájpurí when they first came to India, and their distinct position among the various native races taken with their partial adoption of Hindu usages points to a very ancient occupation. A further account of their present condition will be found in the last section.

The other immigrants who in India first found a home in the Konkan were the Pársis. They are believed to have arrived about the end of the eighth century. It is certain that after living for some years at Diu they first settled on the continent of India at Sanján, now an utterly insignificant village, but which is believed then to have extended nearly to the sea coast.¹ Here they were permitted to settle by the Rána, who is called Jáde, and whom Dr. Wilson believes to have been Jayadeva, a chief subordinate to the Rajput kings of Chámpáner or Pátan. In the next three hundred years they were dispersed through Hindustán; but the places mentioned as receiving them are all north of Sanján, which agrees with the present facts of their settlements, for it is about Dáhánu, twenty miles south of Sanján, that Pársis begin to be found in considerable numbers, and not merely as settlers for purposes of trade. Tárápur, ten miles south of Dáhánu, has also a large settlement of Pársis; but Kalyán is the only place south of that where their settlement is believed to be of earlier date than the British occupation of Bombay. Nārgol, at the mouth of the Sanján creek, is still one of their largest villages, but Sanján itself does not now contain a single Pársi resident.

ANTIQUITIES AND TRADITIONS.

In this section will be collected the little that is known of the history of the district previous to the Musalmáns coming to it at the beginning of the fourteenth century. And as the greater part of that little is to be found in cave temples and in inscriptions on copperplates and stones, the section will be in great part occupied by a description of these antiquarian remains. To this will be added some traditions bearing on the history of the district.

Antiquities.

The large number of cave temples in the Konkan, especially in Sálsette, give the district a very high interest from an antiquarian point of view. But until a connected history of all the cave temples of Western India is written it is impossible to come to any satisfactory conclusion about those of the Konkan. Here nothing more can be done than to mention all that have been hitherto found, with all that is known as to their age and purpose, and the general purport of the inscriptions which still exist in them.

In the small island of Sálsette in the neighbourhood of Bombay, which is about eighteen miles long with an average breadth of ten miles, there are five groups of caves; at Kanheri, Kondivte, Jogeshvari, Mandapeshvar, and Mágáthan.¹ In the island of Ghárápuri are the well-known caves of Elephanta. In the neighbouring island of Karanja are also some small caves. In the Thána district north of Sálsette there are small caves at Jambrug, Kondáne, and Chandansár. In the Kolába district are the caves of Pál near Mahád and the large series of Kuda. In the Ratnágiri district there are caves at Chiplun, Khed, Dábhól, Sangameshvar, Gavháne-Velgaum, and Váde-Pádel. By far the greater part of these are small and apparently of no significance, having neither sculpture nor inscriptions, and may properly be called hermit's cells, generally two or three together. The caves of Elephanta have been so often and so thoroughly described² that they need no further mention here, for they are in no respect so remarkable as those of Kanheri which until Elura and Ajanta became so easily accessible were among the chief objects of interest on this side of India. Of them Bishop Heber wrote: "They are in every way remarkable from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Buddh and his religion." Even to those who have visited Elura and Ajanta there are points of interest at Kanheri which the others want. "The excavations in Sálsette, especially those at Kanheri, are probably the most perfect specimens in India of a genuine Buddhist temple, college, and monastery. The great temple is not equal in beauty to that of Kârle in Poona but it exceeds that called Vishvakarma at Elura, and every other on this side of India."¹ "It is not only the numerous caves that give an idea of what the population of this barren rock must have been, but the tanks the terraces and the flights of steps which lead from one place to another."² The caves of Kanheri indeed are not a mere series of temples and halls without any trace of the existence of the worshippers who should have filled them, but the excavations include arrangements such as were required for a resident community. There are here in close proximity several vihârs or monasteries for associations of devotees, a great number of solitary cells or grihâs for hermits, with shâlâs or halls for lectures and meetings, and chaityas or temples with relic-shrines not out of proportion in number or size to the dwelling-places. Outside the caves are reservoirs for water, a separate one for each cell, and couches or benches for the monks to recline on, carved out of the rock like everything else, while flights of steps and paths worn in the rock lead like streets from one series of caves to another; for the excavations are not only at different elevations in the face of the same hill, but also in several different hills and ravines. Here and the effect is that of a town carved out of the solid rock, which, although "life and thought here no longer dwell," would, if the monks and worshippers returned, be in a day or two as complete as when first inhabited.

The excavations are 102 in number, besides a good many now fallen in or choked with rubbish. They are all distinctly Buddhist, and contain fifty-four inscriptions, which vary in date from the first to the ninth century.³ Only two of the inscriptions, however, contain dates, Shak 775 (A.D. 853) and Shak 779 (A.D. 877). They belong to the Silhâra kings of the Konkan who were tributaries of the Râshtrakutas of Mâlkhet.⁴ These inscriptions have been all more or less completely deciphered. Except the Pahlavi inscriptions in cave 66, two, in caves 10 and 78, in Sanskrit, and one in cave 70 in peculiar Prâkrit, the language of all is the Prâkrit ordinarily used in cave writings. The letters, except in an ornamental looking inscription in cave 84, are the ordinary cave characters. As regards their age, ten appear from the form of the letters to belong to the time of the Andhrabharitya or Shâtakarni king Vasishthi-putra (A.D. 133-162), twenty to the Gotamiputra II. period (A.D. 177-196), ten to the fifth and sixth centuries, one to the eighth, three to the ninth or tenth, and one to the eleventh. Three inscriptions in caves 10 and 78, bear dates and names of kings and three in caves 3, 36, and 81 give the names of kings but no dates. The dates of the rest have been calculated from the form of the letters. Though almost all are mutilated, enough is in most cases left to show the name of the giver, the place where he lived, and the character of the gift. Of the fifty-four inscriptions, twenty-eight give the names of donors, which especially in their terminations differ from the names now in use. In twenty-one the profession of the giver is mentioned; the majority were merchants or goldsmiths, some were recluses, and one was a minister or leading officer of the state. Except seven women, four of whom were nuns, all the givers were men. The places mentioned in the neighbourhood of the caves are the cities of Kalyán Sopára and Chemula, and the villages of Mangalsthán or Mágáthan, Sákapadra probably Sáki near Talsi, and Saphád. Of more distant places there are Násik, Pratisthán or Paithan near Ahmadnagar, Dhanakot or Dharnikot near the mouth of the Krishna, Gaud or Bengal, and Dáttámitri in Sindh. The gifts were caves, cisterns, pathways, images, and endowments in cash or land. Of the six inscriptions which give the names of kings, one in cave 36 gives the name of Madhariputra and one in cave 3 gives Yajñashri Shátakarni or Gotamiputra II. two Andhrabhritya rulers of about the first or second century after Christ. Of the two, Madhariputra is believed to be the older and Yajñashri Shátakarni to be one of his successors. Madhariputra's coins have been found near Kolhápúr and Professor Bhándárkar believes him to be the son and successor of Pudumáyi Vasishthiputra who is believed to have flourished about A.D. 130 and to be the Śri Pulimai whom Ptolemy (A.D. 150) places at Paithan near Ahmadnagar. Yajñashri Shátakarni or Gotamiputra II. appears in the Násik inscriptions and his coins have been found at Kolhápúr, at Dharnikot near the mouth of the Krishna the old capital of the Andhrabhrityas, and on the 9th April 1882 in a stupa or relic mound in Sopára near Bassein. Two of the other inscriptions in which mention is made of the names of kings are caves 10 and 78. These are among the latest inscriptions at Kanheri both belonging to the ninth century, and the names given are of Siláhára kings of the Konkan. They are interesting as giving the names of two kings in each of these dynasties as well as two dates twenty-four years apart in the contemporary rule of one sovereign in each family. Kapardi II. the Siláhára king, the son of Pulashakti, whose capital was probably Chemula, was reigning for the twenty-four years between 853 and 878, and apparently Amoghvarsh ruled at Málkhet during the same period. This Amoghvarsh is mentioned as the son and successor of Jagattung; Amoghvarsh I. was the son of Govind III. one of whose titles was Jagattung; and he must have ruled from 810 to 830. Amoghvarsh II. was the son of Indra himself who may have borne the title of Amoghvarsh and he succeeded Jagattung about 850.

The nearest caves to Kanheri, those of Mandapeshvar and Mágáthan, are Bráhmanical. This may be attributed either to the Bráhmans, after the overthrow of Buddhism in Western India, having taken a pride in attempting to rival the works of their predecessors,¹ or to the fact that in the early years of our era Bráhmans and Buddhists lived at peace with one another, and were equally favoured and protected by the reigning sovereigns.² In accordance with this view Colonel Sykes records of the Chálukya kings that, though mostly votaries of Shiv, they extended the most perfect toleration to other creeds.³ The caves at Mandapeshvar are rendered more curious by their having been occupied by the Portuguese, who called the place Mont Pezier, and erected a church and college on the hill in which the caves are, and set up an altar in the caves, so that they became, as it were, a crypt to the church above.

The caves of Kuda are purely Buddhist, and form a large series of twenty-six. Almost all of them are plain and, except in size, much alike. Five of them, one unfinished, are chaityas or temple caves containing the sacred relic-shrine or dághoba; the other twenty-one are dwelling caves or lenás as they are called in the inscriptions. These lenás generally consist of a veranda with a door and window opening into a cell or cells in which are rock-cut benches for the monks to sleep on. The doors are almost all grooved for wooden frames. The walls of almost all the caves were plastered with earth and rice chaff and on several of them are remains of painting. There are in all twenty-four inscriptions, six of them in one cave, the sixth, which is the only cave with sculpture. Five of these six inscriptions belong to the fifth or sixth century after Christ; all the rest are in letters of about the first century before Christ and record the names of the giver and the nature of the gift, whether a cave, a cistern, or both. Several of the figures are women and one of them is a Bráhman's wife. It is worthy of note that the name Shiv forms part of the name of several of the givers. The caves in the neighbourhood of Mahád are mere cells. One group of twenty-nine of about the first or second century after Christ are at Pále about two miles north-west of Mahád, and two groups of the same age at Kol, about a mile to the south. The Pále group has one inscription of about A.D. 130 and the second Kole group has three short inscriptions of about the same time. There is a third group of a few cells and cisterns in a hill to the north-east of Mahád, and one cell in a hill to the south near the road leading to Nágothna. In the hills above the old port of Cheal are ten caves of about A.D. 150, all plain and much ruined. It is probable that, besides those mentioned above, many other small caves exist in hills and other places not generally accessible, and one such may be mentioned in the hill-fort of Asheri.

The conclusion undoubtedly is that Sálsette and a part of the Konkan south of Bombay were strongholds of Buddhism. It is not so certain that this would involve any considerable degree of civilization. On the contrary it is known that the Buddhist leaders inclined to establish their great monasteries in places remote from cities, and chiefly remarkable, as Kánheri undoubtedly is, for beauty of situation. Here indeed we may believe that to many "the calm life of the hermit seemed a haven of peace where a life of self-denial and earnest meditation might lead to some solution of the strange enigmas of life."¹

It should be mentioned that when the Portuguese took possession of Sálsette they found the Kánheri caves inhabited by Jogis, about whom as well as about the caves themselves the early historians made many wonderful statements. Thus the cells exceeded 3000 in number, each with a cistern supplied by one conduit; the chief Jogi was 150 years old; and from the caves at Kanheri an underground passage some said to Cambay, some to Agra, in which a number of Portuguese explorers travelled for seven days without seeing any sign of an outlet, and so were obliged at last to turn back.² The elephant at Elephanta was the work of a king in whose time a shower of golden rain fell for three hours.³ Even to an English traveller of the sixteenth century it seemed scarcely incredible that the water there ran uphill in order to supply the wants of the monks.

Of considerably later date than that given to the Kanheri and other cave inscriptions are the inscribed stones and copperplates which have been found in the Konkan in considerable numbers, and which from the ninth century downwards afford some evidence as to the civilization and divisions of the country.

A copperplate found by Dr. Bird in 1839, in a relic mound at Kanheri in front of the great chapel cave No. 3 is dated in the 245th year of the Trikutakas, a dynasty of kings who, about the fourth or fifth century, appear to have held Central and South Gujarát and the North Konkan.⁴ From the form of the letters, which seem to belong to the fifth century, Dr. Burgess considers the era to be the Gupta commencing in A.D. 219 and thus makes the date of the plate A.D. 464.⁵ Two hoards of silver coins bearing the legend, "The illustrious Krishnarája the great lord meditating on the feet of his mother and father" were found in 1881-82, one in the island of Bombay the other at Mulgaon in Sálsette. This seems to show that the early Ráshtrakuta king Krishna (A.D. 375-400), whose coins have already been found in Báglán in Násik and Karhá in Sátára, also held possession of the North Konkan.⁶

About the middle of the sixth century kings of the Maurya and Nala dynasties appear to have been ruling in the Konkan. Kirtivarma (A.D. 550-567), the first Chálukya king who turned his arms against the Konkan, is described as the night of death to the Nalas and

Mauryas.¹ And an inscription of Kirtivarma's grandson Pulikeshi II. (A.D. 610-640) under whom the Konkan was conquered, describes his general Chanda-danda, as a great wave which drove before it the watery stores of the pools, that is the Mauryas. The Chálukya general with hundreds of ships attacked the Maurya capital Puri, the goddess of the fortunes of the western ocean.² A stone inscription from Váda in the north of the Thána district shows that a Mauryan king of the name of Suketuvarma was then ruling in the Konkan.³

During the reign of the great Naushervan (531-578), when the Persians were the rulers of the commerce of the eastern seas, the relations between Western India and Persia were extremely close.⁴ On the Arab overthrow of Yezdejad III. (638) the last of the Sassanians, several bands of Persians sought refuge on the Thána coast and were kindly received by Jádav Rána, apparently a Yádav chief of Sanjín.⁵ In the years immediately after their conquest of Persia the Arabs made several raids on the coasts of Western India; one of these in 637 from Bahrein and Oman in the Persian gulf plundered the Konkan coast near Thána.⁶

⁴ Yule (Cathay, I. 56) notices that about this time the lower Euphrates was called Hind or India, but this seems to have been an ancient practice. Rawlinson in J. R. G. S. XXVII. 186. As to the extent of the Persian trade at this time, see Reinaud's Mémoire Sur l'Inde, 124. In the fifth and sixth centuries, besides the Persian trade, there was an active Arab trade up the Persian gulf and the Euphrates to Hira on the right or west bank of the river, not far from the ruins of Babylon. There was also much traffic with Obollah near the mouth of the joint river not far from Basra. Reinaud's Abu-l-fida, cccxxxii. Obollah is also at this time (A.D. 400-600) noticed as the terminus of the Indian and Chinese vessels which were too large to pass up the river to Hira. (Ditto and Yule's Cathay, lxxvii. 55.) So close was its connection with India that the Talmud writers always speak of it as Hindike or Indian Obillah (Rawlinson in J. R. G. S. XXVII. 186). According to Masudi (915) Obollah was the only port under the Sassanian kings (Prairies d'Or, III. 164). McCrindle (Periplus, 103; compare Vincent, II. 377) identifies it with the Apologos of the Periplus (A.D. 247) which he holds took the place of Ptolemy's (A.D. 150) Teredon or Diridotus. Reinaud (Ind. Ant. VIII. 330) holds that Obollah is a corruption of the Greek Apologos, a custom house. But Vincent's view (II. 355) that Apologos is a Greek form of the original Obollah or Obolleghe seems more likely. In Vincent's opinion (Ditto, II. 356) Obollah was founded by the Parthians. At the time of the Arab conquest of Persia (637) Abillah is mentioned as the port of entry at the mouth of the Euphrates (J. R. A. S. XII. 208). In spite of the rivalry of the new Arab port of Basrah, Obollah continued a considerable centre of trade. It is mentioned by Tabari in the ninth century (Reinaud's Abu-l-fida, cccxxxii.); Masudi (913) notices it as a leading town (Prairies d'Or, I. 230-231); Idrisi (1135) as a very rich and flourishing city (Jaubert's Ed. I. 369); and it appears in the fourteenth century in Abu-l-fida (Reinaud's Abu-l-fida, 72). It was important enough to give the Persian gulf the name of the Gulf of Obollah (D'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale, III. 61). According to D'Herbelot when he wrote (about 1670) Obollah was still a strong well peopled town (Ditto). The importance of the town and the likeness of the names suggest that Obollah is the Abulamah from which came the Persian or Parthian Harpharan of Abulamah who records the gift of a cave in Kárlí inscription 20. This identification supports the close connection by sea between the Parthians and the west coast of India in the centuries before and after the Christian era.

No further notice¹ of the North Konkan has been traced till the rise of the Silāhāras, twenty of whom, so far as present information goes, ruled in the North Konkan from about A.D. 810 to A.D. 1260, a period of 450 years.

So far as at present known, the family tree of the Thāna Silāhāras was :

Who the Silāhāras were has not been ascertained. The name is variously spelt Silāhāra, Shailāhāra, Shrilāra, Shilāra, and Silāra; even the same inscription has more than one form, and one inscription has the three forms Silāra, Shilāra, and Shrilāra.² Lassen suggests that the Silāhāras are of Afghan origin, as Silār Kāfirs are still found in Afghanistan.³ But the southern ending Ayya of the names of almost all their ministers and the un-Sanskrit names of some of the chiefs favour the view that they were of southern or Dravidian origin.⁴

was probably more than a plundering raid. The Kaliph Umar (634-643), who had not been consulted, was displeased with the expedition and forbade any further attempt.

⁴ It seems probable that Silāhāra and Shailāhāra are Sanskritised forms of the common Marāṭhi surname Selar. The story of the origin of the name is that Jimutvāhan the mythical founder was the son of a spirit or Vidyādharma, who under a curse became a man. At this time Vishnu's eagle, Garuda, conquered the serpent king Vāsuki and forced Vāsuki to give him one of his serpent subjects for his daily food. After a time it came to the lot of the serpent Shankhachuda to be sacrificed. He was taken to a stone, shila, and left for the eagle to devour. Jimutvāhan resolved to save the victim, and placed himself on the rock instead of the serpent. When Garuda came, Jimutvāhan said he was the victim and Garuda devoured him except his head. Meantime Jimutvāhan's wife came, and finding her husband slain, reproach-

Section II. Antiquities.

The Silāhāras seem to have remained under the Rāshtrakutas till about the close of the tenth century A.D. 997, when Aparājita assumed independent power.¹ The Thāna Silāhāras seem to have held the greater part of the present districts of Thāna and Kolāba. Their capital seems to have been Puri,² and their places of note were Hamjaman probably Sanjān in Dāhānu, Thāna (Shrīsthānak), Sopāra (Shurpārak), Chaul (Chemuli), Lonād (Lavanatata), and Uran.³ As the Yādavs call themselves lords of the excellent city of Dvārāvātipura or Dwārka and the Kadambas call themselves lords of the excellent city of Banavāsipura or Banavāsi, so the Silāhāras call themselves lords of the excellent city of Tagarapura or Tagar. This title would furnish a clue to the origin of the Silāhāras if, unfortunately, the site of Tagar was not uncertain.⁴

ed Garūda, who restored him to life and at her request ceased to devour the serpents. For this act of self-sacrifice Jimutvāhan gained the name of the Rock-devoured Shilāhlāra. J. R. A. S. (Old Series), IV. 113. Tawney's Kathā Sarit Sāgara, I. 174-186. A stanza from this story forms the beginning of all Silāhāra copperplate inscriptions.

Besides the Silāhāra references, the only known Sanskrit notice of Tagar is in a Chālukya copperplate found near Haidarabad in the Dakhan and dated A.D. 612.¹ As has been already noticed, the references to Tagar in Ptolemy and in the Periplus point to a city considerably to the east of Paithan, and the phrase in the Periplus,² 'That many articles brought into Tagar from the parts along the coast were sent by wagons to Broach,' seems to show that Tagar was in communication with the Bay of Bengal, and was supported by the eastern trade, which in later times enriched Mālkhet, Kalyān, Bidar, Golkonda, and Haidarabad.

From numerous references and grants the Thāna Silāhāras seem to have been worshippers of Shiv.³

Of Kapardi, the first of the Thāna Silāhāras, nothing is known except that he claims descent from Jimutvāhan. Pulashakti his son and successor, in an undated inscription in Kanheri Cave 78, is mentioned as the governor of Mangalpuri in the Konkan, and as the humble servant of (the Rāshtrakuta king) Amoghvarsh. The third king, Pulashakti's son, Kapardi II. was called the Younger Laghu. Two inscriptions in Kanheri Caves 10 and 78, dated A.D. 853 and 877, seem to show that he was subordinate to the Rāshtrakutas. The son of Kapardi II. was the fourth king Vappuvanna, and his son was Jhanjha the fifth king. Jhanjha is mentioned by the Arab historian Masudi as ruling over Saimur (Cheul) in A.D. 916.⁴ He must have been a staunch Shaivite, as, according to a Silāhāra copperplate of A.D. 1094, he built twelve temples of Shambhu.⁵ According to an unpublished copperplate in the possession of Pandit Bhagvānlāl, Jhanjha had a daughter named Lasthiyavva, who was married to Bhillama the fourth of the Chāndor Yādavs.⁶

The next king was Jhanjha's brother Goggi, and after him came Goggi's son Vajjadadev. Of the eighth king, Vajjadadev's son ceremony in Mahārāshtra, the place where the ceremony is performed is alluded to by giving its bearing from the Godāvari. People in Khāndesh use the words 'Godāvārya uttara tīre' that is 'on the northern bank of the Godāvari,' while those to the south of the river, as far as the borders of the country, use the expression 'Godāvārya dakshine tīre' that is 'on the southern bank of the Godāvari.' If then Tagar was one of the earliest of the Aryan settlements, it must be situated on or near the banks of the Godāvari, as the ancient town of Paithan is; and its bearing from Paithan given by the Greek geographers agrees with this supposition, as the course of the Godāvari from that point is nearly easterly. Tagar must therefore be looked for to the east of Paithan. If the name has undergone corruption, it must, by the Prakrit law of dropping the initial mutes, be first changed to Taaraura, and thence to Tarur or Terur. Can it be the modern Dārur or Dhārur in the Nizām's dominions, twenty-five miles east of Grant Duff's Bhir and seventy miles south-east of Paithan?

Aparājīt or Birundakaram, a copperplate dated 997 (Shak 919) has lately been found at Bher, about ten miles north of Bhiwandi.¹ It appears from this plate that during Aparājīt's reign, his Rāshtrakuta overlord Karkarāja or Kakkala was overthrown and slain by the Chālukyan Tailapa, and that Aparājīt became independent some time between 972 and 997.²

In a copperplate of A.D. 1094, recording a grant by the fourteenth king Anantdev, Aparājīt is mentioned as having welcomed Gomma, confirmed to Aiyapdev the sovereignty which had been shaken, and afforded security to Bhillamāmmamanambudha?³ The next king was Aparājīt's son Vajjadadev. The next king Arikeshari, Vajjadadev's brother, in a copperplate grant dated A.D. 1097, is styled the lord of fourteen hundred Konkan villages. Mention is also made of the cities of Shrishthānak, Puri, and Hamyaman probably Sanjān.⁴ The eleventh king was Vajjadadev's son Chhittarājdev. In a copperplate dated Shak 948 (A.D. 1025) he is styled the ruler of the fourteen hundred Konkan villages, the chief of which were Puri and Hamyaman.⁵ The twelfth king was Nāgarjun, the younger brother of Chhittarājdev. After him came Nāgarjun's younger brother Mummuni or Māmvāni, who is mentioned in an inscription dated A.D. 1060 (Shak 982).⁶ The fourteenth king was Mummuni or Māmvāni's son Anantpāl or Anantdev, whose name occurs in two grants dated A.D. 1081 and 1096.⁷ In the 1096 grant Anantpāl is mentioned as ruling over the whole Konkan fourteen hundred

³ Ind. Ant. IX. 36. Of Gomma and Aiyapdev nothing is known; of the third name only Bhillam the son-in-law of Jhanjha can be made out.

villages, the chief of which was Puri and next to it Hanjamana probably Sanján, and as having cast into the ocean of the edge of his sword those wicked heaps of sin, who at a time of misfortune, caused by the rise to power of hostile relatives, devastated the whole Konkan, harassing gods and Bráhmans.¹

The names of six Siláhára kings later than Anantdev have been made out from land-grant stones. As these stones do not give a pedigree, the order and relationship of the kings cannot be determined.

The first of these kings is Aparáditya, who is mentioned in a stone dated A.D. 1138 (Shak 1060).² The next king is Haripáldev, who is mentioned in three stones dated A.D. 1149, 1150, and 1153 (Shak 1071, 1072, and 1075).³

The next king is Mallikárjun, of whom two grants are recorded, one from Chiplún in Ratnágiri dated 1156 (Shak 1078), the other from Bassein dated 1160 (Shak 1082). This Mallikárjun seems to be the Konkan king, who was defeated near Balsár by Ámbada the general records a grant by Anantdev in Shak 1003 (A.D. 1081), the chief minister being Rudrapai. The inscription mentions Ajapálaiya, son of Mátaiya of the Vyádika family, and the grant of some drammas to kháráśin mandli[?] (Pandit Bhagvánlál). The Khárepátan copperplates were found several years ago and give the names of all the thirteen Siláhára kings before Anantdev. Ind. Ant. IX. 33-46.

³ The 1149 stone is built into the plinth of the back veranda of the house of one Jairám Bháskar Sonár at Sopára. It records a gift. The name of the king is doubtful. It may be also read Kurpáldev. The 1150 stone was found near Agáshi in 1881. It is dated 1st Márgshirsh (December-January), in the Pramoda Samvatsara, Shak 1072 (A.D. 1150). Haripál's ministers were Vesupadval, Lakhsman prabhu, Padmashivról, and Váguji náyak. The grant is of the permanent income of Shrinevadi in charge of a Pattakil (Páttil) named Rája, to the family priest Brahmadevbhatt son of Divákarbhatt and grandson of Govardhanbhatt by prince A'havamalla enjoying the village of Vattárak (Vatár) in Shurpárak (Sopára). The witnesses to the grant are Risi Mhátara, head of Vattárak village, Náguji Mhátara, Anantnáyak, and Chángdev Mhátara. [Pandit Bhagvánlál.] Another inscription of Haripáldev has been found on a stone in Karanjon in Bassein. The inscription is of thirteen lines which are very hard to read. In the third and fourth lines can be read very doubtfully 'the illustrious Haripáldev, the chief of the Mahámandaleshvaras, adorned with all the royal titles.' The 1153 stone was found near Borivil station in 1882. The inscription is in nine lines, and bears date Shak 1075, Shrimukh Samvatsara and the name of king Haripál.

of the Gujarát king Kumárpál Solanki (A.D. 1143-1174).¹ Next comes Aparáditya II. of whom there are four land-grant stones, three of them dated, one in 1184 (Shak 1106) and two in 1187 (Shak 1109), and one undated.²

The next king is Keshidev, son of Aparárka (Aparáditya II. ?), two of whose land-grant stones have been found, one dated 1203 (Shak 1125) the other 1238 (Shak 1161).³

² The 1184 (Shak 1106) stone was found in February 1882 about a mile south-west of Lonád in Bhiwndi. Of the two Shak 1109 (A.D. 1187) stones, one found near Government House, Parel, records a grant by Aparáditya, the ruler of the Konkan, of 24 dramma coins after exempting other taxes, the fixed revenue of one cart in the village of Máhuli (probably the modern Máhul near Kurla) connected with Shatshashtí, which is in the possession of Anantpai prabhu, for performing the worship by five rites of (the god) Vaidyanáth, lord of Darbhávatí. The last line of the inscription shows that it was written by a Káyasth named Valig Pandit (Jour. B. B. R. A. S. XII. 335). The second Shak 1109 (A.D. 1187) stone is in the museum of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. It is dated Shak 1109 (A.D. 1187) Vishvávasu Samvatsara, on Sunday the sixth of the bright half of Chaitra (April-May). The grantor is the great minister Lakshmanáyaka son of Bháskarnáyaka, and something is said in the grant about the god Somnáth of Suráshtra (Ind. Ant. IX. 49). The fourth stone, which bears no date, was found near Kalambhon in Bassein in 1882. It gives the name of Aparáditya, and from the late form of the letters probably belongs to this king. A fifth stone has recently been found near Bassein. The date is doubtful; it looks like Shak 1107 (A.D. 1185), Pandit Bhagvánlál.

The next is Someshvar, two of whose land-grant stones have been found, one dated 1249 (Shak 1171) the other 1260 (Shak 1182).¹

Though, with few exceptions, the names of the Thána Siláháras are Sanskrit the names of almost all their ministers and of many of the grantees point to a Kánarese or a Telugu source. They appear to be southerners, and ayyas or high-caste Dravidian Hindus seem to have had considerable influence at their court.² Káyasths, probably the ancestors of the present Káyasth Prabhus, are also mentioned.

Though their grants are written in Sanskrit, sometimes pure sometimes faulty, from the last three lines of one of their stone inscriptions, the language of the country appears to have been a corrupt Prákrit, the mother of the modern Maráthi.³ The same remark applies to the names of towns. For, though inscriptions give such Sanskritised forms as Shri-Sthának, Shurpáarak, and Hanjaman or Hamyaman, the writings of contemporary Arab travellers show that the present names Thána, Sopára, and Sanján were then in use.⁴

On the condition of the Siláhára kingdom the inscriptions throw little light. The administration appears to have been carried on by the king assisted by a great councillor or great minister, a great minister for peace and war, two treasury lords, and sometimes a (chief) secretary. The subordinate machinery seems to have consisted of heads of districts ráshtas, heads of sub-divisions vishayas, heads of towns, and heads of villages.⁵ They had a king's high road rájpath, passing to the west of the village of Gomvani a little north of Bhándup, following nearly the same line as the present road from Bombay to Thána; and there was another king's high road near Uran. At their ports, among which Sopára, Thána, Chaul, and perhaps Nágothna are mentioned, a customs duty was levied. The dramma was the current coin.⁶ The Siláháras seem to have been

² Ind. Ant. IX. 46. This southern element is one reason for looking for Tagar in the Telugu-speaking districts. Ayya, the Kánarese for master, is the term in ordinary use in the Bombay Karnátak for Jangam or Lingáyát priests. The Sárvasat Bráhmans of North Kánara are at present passing through the stage, which the upper classes of the North Konkan seem to have passed through about 500 years ago, of discarding the southern ayya for the northern ráo. ³ Jour. B. B. R. A. S. XII. 334.

fond of building. The Muhammadans in the beginning of the thirteenth century and the Portuguese in the sixteenth century destroyed temples and stone-faced reservoirs by the score. The statements of travellers and the remains at Ambarnáth, Pelar, Átgaon, Párol, Wálukeshvar in Bombay, and Lonád prove that the masonry was of well-dressed close-fitting blocks of stone, and that the sculptures were carved with much skill and richness. Many of them seem to have been disfigured by indecency.¹ Some of the Siláháras seem to have encouraged learning. One of them Aparáditya II. (1187) was an author, and another Aparáditya I. (1138) is mentioned as sending a Konkan representative to a great meeting of learned men in Káshmir.

While its local rulers were the Siláháras, the overlords of the Konkan, to whom the Siláháras paid obeisance during the latter part of the eighth and the ninth centuries, were the Ráshtrakutas of Málkhet, sixty miles south-east of Sholápur.² Their power for a time included a great part of the present Gujarát where their headquarters were at Broach.³ The Arab merchant Sulaimán (A.D. 850) found the Konkan (Komkam) under the Balhára, the chief of Indian princes. The Balhára and his people were most friendly to Arabs. He was at war with the Gujar (Juzr) king, who, except in the matter of cavalry, was greatly his inferior.⁴ Sixty years later Masudi (916) makes the whole province of Lár, from Chaul (Saimur) to Cambay, subject to the Balhára, whose capital was Mankir (Máلكhet) the 'great centre' in the Kánarese-speaking country about 640 miles from the coast.⁵ He was overlord of the Konkan (Kemken) and of the whole province of Lár in which were Chaul (Saimur), Thána, and Supára, where the Láriya language was spoken. The Balhára was the most friendly to Musalmáns of all Indian kings. He was exposed to the attacks of the Gujar (Juzr) king who was rich in camels and horses. The name Balhára was the name of the founder of the dynasty, and all the princes took it on succeeding to the

are the same as the coins mentioned by Abu-l-fida as Khurásani dirhems, and by Masudi (Prairies d'Or, I. 382) and Sulaimán (Elliot and Dowson, I. 3) as Tātariya or Tahiriya dirhems. General Cunningham (Anc. Geog. 313) identifies these Tātariya dirhems with the Skythic or Indo-Sassanian coins of Kábul and North-West India of the centuries before and after Christ, and Mr. Thomas (Elliot and Dowson, I. 4) with the Musalmán dynasty of Tahirides who ruled in Khurásan in the ninth century.

throne.¹ When Masudi (916) was in the Konkan, the province of Lár was governed by Jhanja the fifth of the Siláhara rulers.²

For fifty years more (950) the Ráshtrakutas continued overlords of the Konkan, and of Lár as far north as Cambay.³ Soon after the beginning of the reign of Mulráj (943-997), the Chaulukya or Solanki ruler of North Gujarát, his dominions were invaded from the south by Báráp or Dváráp, the general of Tailap II. (973-997) the Dakhan Chálukya who afterwards (980) destroyed the power of the Ráshtrakutas. Báráp established himself in South Gujarát or Lát, and, according to Gujarát accounts, towards the close of Mulráj's reign, was attacked and defeated, though after his victory Mulráj withdrew north of the Narbada. In this war Báráp is said to have been helped by the chiefs of the islands, perhaps a reference to the Thána Siláháras.⁴ It appears from a copperplate lately (1881) found in Surat, that, after Mulráj's invasion, Báráp and four successors continued to rule Lát till 1050.⁵

¹ Prairies d'Or, I. 254, 383 & II. 85; Elliot and Dowson, I. 24, 25. Tod (Western India, 147, 160) held that Balhára meant the leaders of the Balla tribe, whose name appears in the ancient capital Valabhi (A.D. 480), probably the present village of Vallah about twenty miles west of Bhavnagar in Káthiáwár. Elliot (History, I. 354) has adopted Tod's suggestion, modifying it slightly so as to make Balhára stand for the Ballabhi or Ballabh, Rái. Reinaud (Mémoire Sur l'Inde, 145) explained Bálhara by Malvarai lord of Málwa, and Mr. Thomas has lately adopted the view that Balhára is Bara Rái or great king, and holds that his capital was Monghir in Behár (Numismata Orientalia, III.) The objection to these views is, as the following passages show, that the two Arab travellers who knew the country of the Balhárás, Sulaimán (850) and Masudi (915), agree in placing it in the Konkan and Dakhan. Sulaimán (Elliot and Dowson, I. 4) says the Balhára's territory begins at the Komkam or Konkan. Masudi says (Prairies d'Or, I. 177, 381), the capital of the Balhára is Mankir, the sea-board Saimur or Chaul, Sopára, and Thána, and again (I. 383) the Balhára's kingdom is called the Konkan (Kemker). Again the Balhára of Mankir ruled in Sindán, Sanján in north Thána, and the neighbourhood of Cambay in Gujarát (Ditto, I. 254 & III. 47. This Gujarát power of the Ráshtrakutas at the opening of the tenth century is proved by local inscriptions. Ind. Ant. VI. 145). Finally Lár, or the North Konkan coast, was under the Balhára, and Masudi in 916 (H. 304) visited Saimur or Chaul, one of the chief of the Balhára towns (Ditto, II. 85), which was then under a local prince named Jandja. This is the Siláhara Jhanja. (See above page 17.) Idrisi (1135) is the only authority who places the seat of Balhára power in Gujarát (Jaubert, I. 176; Elliot, I. 87, 88). The Anahilaváda sovereigns had before this (Rás Málá, 62) adopted the title of King of Kings Rája of Rájás, and Idrisi seems to have taken for granted that this title was Balhára, which Ibn Khurdádiba (912), who never was in India, had, by mistake, translated king of kings (Elliot, I. 13). The true origin of the title Balhára, that it was the name of the founder of the dynasty, is given by Masudi (Prairies d'Or, I. 162), and neither Sulaimán (850), Al Istakhir (951), nor Ibn Haukal (970), all of whom visited India, translates Balhára king of kings (see Elliot I. 4, 27, 34). The details of the Balhára kings given by Sulaimán, Masudi, Al Istakhir, and Ibn Haukal, show that their territory began from the Konkan and stretched across India, and that their capital was Mankir, inland in the Kánarese (Kiriah) speaking country. These details point to the Ráshtrakutas of Málkhet, who were overlords of the Konkan from about 750 to 970, and among the earliest of whom, as Professor Bhandárkar has shewn, Valabh the Beloved was a favourite personal name. At the same time the Ráshtrakutas seem to have no claim to the title Balhára.

Section II. Antiquities.

Between the overthrow of the power of Málkhet (A.D. 970) and the establishment of the overlordship of Gujarát (A.D. 1151, the Siláhára rulers of the North Konkan claim independence, and, during part at least of this time, Thána was the capital of the Konkan.¹ Between the death of Mulráj (997) and the succession of Bhimdev I. (1022-1072), the power of Gujarát did not increase. But Bhimdev took the title of Rájá of Rájás, and spent most of his reign in spreading his power northwards and in a great contest with Visaldev of Ajmir.² Neither Bhimráj nor his successor Karan (1072-1094) advanced his borders to the south. Nor does Sidhráj (1094-1143), the glory of the Gujarát Chálukyas, though he spread his arms over so much of the Dakhan as to fill with fear the chief of Kolhápúr, seem to have exercised control over the Konkan.³ Idrisi (1135), whose details of Anahilaváda (Nahrwára) seem to belong to Sidhráj's reign, calls him King of Kings.⁴ He shows how wealthy and prosperous Gujarát then was,⁵ but gives no information regarding the extent of Sidhráj's power. Idrisi's mention of Thána (Bana) seems to show that it was unconnected with Gujarát and this is borne out by the account of Kumár Pál's (1143-1174) invasion of the Konkan. Hearing that Mallikárjun (a Siláhára) king of the Konkan, the son of king Mahánand who was ruling in the seagirt city of Shatánand had adopted the title of Grandfather of Kings Rájapitámaha, Kumár Pál sent his general Ámbad against him.⁶ Ámbada advanced as far as the Káveri (Kalvini) near Navsári crossed the river, and in a battle fought with Mallikárjun on the south bank of the river, was defeated and forced to retire. A second expedition was more successful. The Káveri was bridged, Mallikárjun defeated and slain, his capital taken and plundered, and the authority of the Anahilaváda sovereign proclaimed. Ámbad returned laden with gold, jewels, vessels of precious metals, pearls, elephants, and coined money. He was received graciously and ennobled with Mallikárjun's title of Grandfather of Kings.⁷ The Konkan is included among the eighteen whose reign and the closing part of whose father's reign were occupied in foreign wars; (6) Trilochanpál (1050) the grantor, whose reign also was disturbed by wars. There are three copperplates, the middle plate inscribed on both sides and the outer plates on the inner sides. They are well preserved and held by a copper ring bearing upon it the royal seal, stamped with a figure of the god Shiv. The date is the fifteenth of the dark half of Paush (January-February) Shak 972 (A.D. 1050). The plate states that the king bathed at Agastitirth, the modern Bhagvādāndi twenty miles north-west of Surat, and granted the village of Erathána, modern Erthán, six miles north-east of Olpád in Surat. ¹ Rashid-ud-din in Elliot, I. 60. This independence of the Siláharas is doubtful. In an inscription dated 1034 Jayasimha the fourth western Chálukya (1018-1040) claims to have seized the seven Konkans. Bom. Arch. Sur. Rep. ⁴ Idrisi calls the ruler of Nahrwála Balhára. He says the title means King of Kings. He seems to have heard from Musalmán merchants that Sidhráj had the title of King of Kings, and concluded that this title was Balhára which Ibn Khurdádba (912) had translated king of kings, apparently without reason. Jaubert's Idrisi, I. 177; Elliot, I. 75, 93. ⁵ See Rás Málá, 188, 189, 192; Tod's Western India, 156.

districts, and the Siláháras are mentioned among the thirty-six tribes who were subject to Kumár Pál. But Gujarát power was shortlived, if the Siláhára ruler of Kolhápúr is right in his boast that in 1151 he replaced the dethroned kings of Thána.

During at least the latter part of the thirteenth century the North Konkan seems to have been ruled by viceroys of the Devgiri Yádavs, whose head-quarters were at Karnála and Bassein. Two grants dated 1273 and 1291, found near Thána, record the gift of two villages Anjer in Kalyán and Vávla in Sálsette (called Shatshasthi in the inscription), by two Konkan viceroys of Rámchandradev (1271-1309) the fifth Yádav ruler of Devgiri. Two stone inscriptions dated 1280 (S. 1202) and 1288 (S. 1210), recording gifts by Rámchandradev's officers have also recently (1882) been found near Bhiwndi and Bassein.¹

In the thirteenth century, while the Devgiri Yádavs held the inland parts of the district, it seems probable that the Anahilaváda kings kept a hold on certain places along the coast.² At the close of the thirteenth century Gujarát, according to Rashid-ud-din (1310), included Cambay Somnáth and Konkan-Thána. But his statements are confused,³ and, according to Marco Polo, in his time (1290) there was a prince of Thána who was tributary to no one. The people were idolators with a language of their own. The harbour was harassed by corsairs, with whom the chief of Thána had a covenant.⁴ There were other petty chiefs on the coast, náiks, rájás, or ráis, who were probably more or less dependent on the Anahilaváda kings.

The South Konkan branch of the Siláháras appears, from the single copperplate inscription which has been found of them in the Ratnágiri district, to have consisted of ten kings who ruled from Ind. Ant. IX. 35, 38). Mr. Wathen suggests, 'Like a Brahmadeva among kings' that is 'First among kings,' and Mr. Telang, while translating the phrase as 'The grandfather of the king' suggests the same meaning as Mr. Wathen. The Kumárpál Charitra, which gives a detailed account of this invasion, has the following passage in explanation of the term Rajapitamaha: 'One day while the Chalukya universal ruler (Kumár Pál) was sitting at ease, he heard a bard pronounce Rajapitamaha as the title of Mallikarjun king of the Konkan' (in the verse), 'Thus shines king Mallikarjun who bears the title Rajapitamaha, having conquered all great kings by the irresistible might of his arms and made them obedient to himself like grandsons.'

about A.D. 808 to 1008, at first under the Ráshtrakutas and then under the Chálukyas until eventually the Devgiri Yadavs became supreme over the whole Konkan.¹

Of the state of the country these inscriptions give us no information. At the same time it is safe to infer that land must have been of considerable value when grants of it were recorded by engravings on copper, and also that a community among which the art of engraving on metal existed, and was apparently not uncommon (for the inscriptions are not only numerous but lengthy), must have attained a considerable degree of civilization. It may also be remarked that all these grants refer to those parts of the Konkan which are still the most valuable, as well as the most naturally fertile, Sálsette and the villages on the coast and on the great creeks.

Finally a caution is necessary. It is as well to be guarded in believing the grandeur which these inscriptions record by remembering that "the princes in all parts of India who are commemorated by these grants are all represented as victorious warriors and surrounded by enemies over whom they have triumphed. Though not pretending to be more than sovereigns of some particular district, they are described as conquerors and sovereigns of the whole world²."

Before coming to the period of undeniable history it is worth while to give some early Konkan traditions. The following is the traditional account of the creation of the Konkan :

During the constant wars between the Bráhmans and the Kshatriyas, the Bráhmans had been so reduced that at length they could live only in caves and forests. To restore them to power the sixth avatár of Vishnu appeared under the form of the son of a Bráhman named Jamadagni. This avatár, who was afterwards known as Parashurám, from parashu an axe which was his usual weapon, standing on a projecting peak of the Sahyádris, which were then washed by the sea and were a great place of retreat for the persecuted Bráhmans, shot an arrow westward, and commanded the sea to retreat. The sea retreated and gave up a strip about thirty miles in breadth, which has since been known as the Konkan, and of which the persecuted Bráhmans immediately took possession. Parashurám then led them to battle and to victory, and the Kshatriyas in their turn were reduced to extremity.

The hill from which the avatár is said to have shot his arrow is named after him Parshurám, and overlooks the fertile and very beautiful valley in which Chiplún stands, with "a full-fed river winding slow" to the distant sea. The temple, though not outwardly remarkable, is one of the most famous in the Konkan and is constantly visited by pilgrims on their way from Dwárka to Cape Comorin. Those who believe in Parshurám as a historical character say that he was never in this part of India at all, and Dr. Stevenson states that, though this is the first place where the legends of Parshurám affect the names of places, yet they are frequently found further south.¹ The severe historical interpretation is that, "This legend of the creation of the Konkan and the subjection of a great part of its territory to the Bráhmans by Parshurám is nothing more nor less than a faint tradition of the first triumphs of Hinduism over other forms of superstition prevalent in the province."² And to this it must be added that the Sahyádrí Khand, in which the story of the creation of the Chitpávans at Chiplún is first mentioned, is by the best authorities believed to be not more than 300 years old. Yet those who like to hold by the legend may take it as in favour of their view that the district about Chiplún has certainly always been the great head-quarters of the Chitpávan caste. The cave temples as being beyond mere human power are believed by the common people to have been made by the Pándavs, but the first sovereign of the Konkan is said to have been Bhimdev. From some Marátha records, supposed to be a little later than the capture of Bassein in 1739, it is made out that at the end of the thirteenth century the Konkan was conquered by this Bhim Rájá, who is said to have been a son of Rámdev Rájá of Devgir, defeated by the Musalmáns in their first invasion of the Dakhan.³ Other accounts give him a different origin, and his caste is also in dispute between the Parbhus Rajputs and Shudrás. He dispossessed the Náik princes, and seized upon Chichni, Tárápur, Asheri, Kelva Máhim, Thal, Sálsette, and (Bombay) Máhim, which he made his capital. He divided the whole into fifteen maháls or groups containing 444 villages. His chiefs received subordinate governments in Kelva, Bassein, and other places. His son Pratáp Sháh built another capital at Marol in Sálsette which he called Pratáppuri. He was, however, defeated and deprived of his kingdom by his brother-in-law, a chief of Cheul, named Nágar Sháh, whom the Muhammadans in their turn defeated. Now, as to the origin of Bhim Rájá, Tod gives three Rájás of the Anahilaváda dynasty of this name between A.D. 1013 and 1250, and he connects this dynasty very closely with the Konkan and Kalyán.⁴ Sir W. Elliot gives a Rájá Bhimdev and his brother Haripáldev among the Yádav kings of Devgiri early in the fourteenth century.⁵ It is easy to find support in the inscriptions already given to the theory of one or other of these Bhimdevs having been the first conqueror of the Konkan, but it seems scarcely worth while to try to connect these legends with real history when there is nothing to enable us to advance beyond the region of conjecture. But the name of Pratáp Sháh's capital is still preserved as Pardápur or Parjápur, a deserted village near the centre of Sálsette. There are no ancient remains there, but the caves of Kondivte are in a hill very near, and within a mile or two is a fine pond called Pasrák taláv and belonging to the villages of Marol, Kondivti, and Mulgaon, on the edge of which are the ruins of a fine Portuguese church and monastic buildings.

Antiquities.

A tradition exists that the temple at Nirmal near Bassein was erected to commemorate the death there of the great Shankar-áchárya, the chief teacher of the Shaivite worship in the eighth or ninth century. But he is known to have died in Kashmir, and as there were twenty-seven of his spiritual descendants who assumed his name, and who are calculated to have lasted for about 650 years, it is probable that some one of these was the person in whose honour the original temple was built.¹ The present building dates only from the time of the Peshwás, having been built by one Náro Shankar, probably the same mentioned by Grant Duff.²

The hill and shrine of Tungár near Bassein are also mentioned in some of the Puráns,³ but on these little reliance can be placed. Its mention, however, may be taken as evidence that Tungár was formerly a place of some pretensions, and there are remains of apparently ancient temples and buildings in various parts of the forest round the base of the hill which may perhaps, when properly investigated, throw more light on the ancient history of this neighbourhood.

So also the hill of Máchál in the Southern Konkan where the river Muchkundi rises is said to have been the scene of the exploit of the Rishi Muchkunda when he destroyed with a glance of his eye the rash person who awakened him from his sleep. This hill is close to Vishálgad, one of the most ancient and famous Sahyádrí forts, but there is nothing in this legend having any bearing on the history of the district.

This section may be closed with a legend of a different sort. On the bare sheet rock of the Southern Konkan where scarcely a blade of grass will grow are to be found, in the rains, masses of a very beautiful little purple flower (Utricularia albocerulea) called by the common people 'Sitáchi Ásre' Sita's Tears. The story is that after Rám had recovered Sita from her captivity in Ceylon he reproached her with inconstancy. On his leaving her, or threatening to leave her, she appealed to his mercy with tears, which, falling on the bare rock, flowered forth then and for all time in this lovely form.

THE MUSALMANS.

It has been already mentioned that the date of the Musalmán conquest is that from which the reliable history of the Konkan may be said to begin, and that the possession of Bombay and Sálsette by the Gujarát kings, although previous to that, cannot be traced to any particular conquest. Elphinstone's view that these islands had long been detached possessions of the Gujarát kingdom is confirmed by the legend given in the last section, and Forbes considers that they fell to the Muhammadan conquerors of Gujarát at the end of the thirteenth century as an undisputed part of the Anahilaváda possessions.

Section III.

It was about the same time, namely A.D. 1294, that the first Musalmán army of the Dakhan arrived before Devgiri or Daulatabad, and they then found outside the walls a number of bags of salt which had just been brought from the Konkan,¹ and had probably come by the Nána Ghát. Salt is still the chief article carried from the Konkan to the Dakhan, the Nána Ghát being, it is said, the most ancient road from Devgiri to the coast, and having at the top the oldest inscription yet found on this side of India. The first direct mention of the extension of the Muhammadan power to this coast is in 1312, when Malik Káfur, who commanded the fourth great expedition into the Dakhan, laid waste the countries of Maháráshtra and Kánara from Dábhól and Cheul to Raichor and Modkal.² In 1318, after the reduction of Devgiri and the death of Harpáldev, son-in-law of the Rájá, the Emperor Mubárik I. ordered his garrisons to be extended³ as far as the sea, and occupied Máhim and Sálsette.⁴ It was soon after this that the Friar Odoricus wrote of this part: "Over all this land the Saracens rule, but the people of the country are idolators, worshipping fire, serpents, and trees."⁵ Until the Musalmán occupation the Devgir kingdom is said to have included the Konkan north of the Sávitri and Bijnagar the part south of it,⁶ the northern division being divided into the pránts or districts of Vasai (Bassein), Kalyán, Karnála, Chaul, and Rájápur, and the southern division into those of Dábhól, Rájápur, and Kudál.⁷ When in 1347 the first Báhmáni king established his independence in the Dakhan it was natural that he should divide his kingdom into governments. Of these he made four; the first, which included Gulbarga the capital, extended to the sea at Dábhól, and the second from Daulatabad to Chaul.¹ Previous to this, about 1341, the Jawhár dynasty had been recognized by the Emperor of Delhi. He conferred the title of Rájá on the son of Jayab Mukne, the founder of the family,² whose descendant is now one of the last of the Koli chiefs. His country contained twenty-two forts, and yielded nine lákhs of revenue.³ There is no doubt that at this time, as earlier, there were a number of petty Rájás, sometimes called poligárs, Kolis in the north and Maráthás in the south, and it does not appear that at this time the whole either of the coast or of the inland parts was conquered by the Musalmáns. These local chiefs obeyed the Hindu Rájás of Bijnagar or the Muhammadan Sultáns of Golkonda as circumstances might require.⁴

These are all the materials of history that can be found in the fourteenth century. In 1429 Malik-ul-Tujár led a larger force into the Konkan, which Ferishta says brought the whole country under subjection. Briggs, however, thinks this was rather a marauding expedition than a conquest, and several elephant and camel-loads of gold and silver were sent as booty to the Báhmáni king.⁵ Malik-ul-Tujár then seized on Máhim (Bombay) and Sálsette. This aroused the hostility of the Gujarát king Ahmad Sháh, who to recover the islands sent an army, part of which embarked in seventeen vessels, while the rest went by land. The united force invested Thána by sea and land. The Dakhan general made some sallies, but eventually abandoned the siege of Thána and returned to Máhim. Being reinforced he marched back to Thána, but was there defeated and his army dispersed in an action which lasted all day, and the Gujarát fleet returned home carrying with it some beautiful gold and silver embroidered muslins taken on the island of Máhim.⁶

Erskine says⁷ that Ahmad Sháh during his reign reduced under his power the lowlands to the south (of Gujarát) below the gháts, the Northern Konkan, and the island of Bombay, and in the Mirát-i-Ahmadi a list of the possessions of the Gujarát kings during the time the power and sovereignty of the monarchy continued to increase is given. These are made to include in the Konkan the districts of Bassein, Bombay, Daman, and Dánda-Rájápur, and the ports of Chaul, Dabhol, Beláwal (?), Bassein, Dánda, Panwelly, Akassi (Agási), Sorab (?), Kallian, Bhimry (Bhiwndi), Dánda-Rájápur, and Goba (Goa).⁸

This may be taken to refer generally to the fifteenth century, for the Gujarát monarchy was established in 1391 and Mahmúd Sháh Begada, who may be considered the last of its great sovereigns, died in 1511. It will be noticed that the places named are nearly all north of Bombay, and although this account is probably not altogether reliable in some of its details, it may safely be assumed that the Northern Konkan generally was at that time subject to Gujarát. Ludovico Varthema who travelled in India in 1503 has his ports on the West Coast so misplaced and confused that they are often hard to identify, but he went from Cambay to Cheul and says: "the land of Gujarát is interposed between these two cities,"¹ which is in accordance with the other authorities given above.

Returning to the Southern Konkan we find that in 1436 another army was sent by the Báhmání king Alá-ud-din II. into the Konkan, which was successful, and on this occasion the Rájás of Rairi (Ráygad) and Sonkehr (the position of which has not been ascertained) were made tributary. The daughter of the latter Rája was sent to the king, and became famous under the title of Parichera or Fairy-face. The narrative of Ferishta however makes it clear that the Konkan Rájás were not all reduced on this occasion. In 1453, therefore, a plan for the subjection of all the coast fortresses was decided on, and a large army under Malik-al-Tujár, having its head-quarters at Junnar, sent detachments into the Konkan, and after a time moved down in force. A number of Rájás were reduced, and at last one of the Shirké family by the promise of becoming Musalmán induced Malik-al-Tujár to march against Shankar Rái, Rája of Khelna (Vishálgad), with whom he represented himself to have an old feud. Shirké for two days led the army along a broad road, probably across the plain between Sangameshvar and Lánja. On the third day they entered the woods and ravines, and by the evening were so entangled in them that when Shankar Rái, who had from the first been in league with Shirké, fell on the Musalmáns, they made but little resistance, and upwards of 7000 were massacred, among who were 500 Syeds of Arabia and some Abyssinian officers.² The survivors escaped above the gháts. The place where this massacre took place has not been ascertained, but it was probably somewhere below and not very far from Vishálgad.³ The family of Shirké had, probably from very early time and up to 1768, their court at Bahirugal, a little north of Vishálgad, as Rájás of the surrounding country yielding at a later period a revenue of Rs. 75,000 a year.⁴ Grant Duff states that the Konkan Ghát-Máthá from the neighbourhood of Poona to the Várna belonged to this family.⁵

This great disaster was not avenged for sixteen years, a fact which shows how little hold the Musalmáns had on the Konkan. About this time Nikitin, a Russian traveller,⁶ speaks of Dábhól as the last seaport in Hindustán belonging to the Musalmáns. In the meantime the Rája of Vishálgad, who had a fleet of 300 vessels, harassed the commerce of the Musalmáns. In 1469 however the Prime Minister Mahmúd Khwája Gawán took a force into the Konkan large enough to overcome all opposition, and being joined by troops from Dábhól and Chaul set to work systematically to reduce the country. He soon found that his cavalry was useless in the Konkan, and sent them back, but advancing slowly and steadily through the jungles he gradually reduced a great part of the country. Vishálgad, however, after a siege of five months still held out, when the rains forced the Musalmán army to retreat above the Gháts. At the commencement of the fine season Vishálgad was again besieged, and shortly afterwards taken by treachery, and this Ferishta distinctly states was the first time the Musalmáns got possession of this famous fortress.¹ But the conquest of the Vishálgad district was still a work of time, and was not completed till after the second rains. The army then proceeded towards Goa, and the conquest of the Konkan was considered so important that on his return to the capital Mahmúd Khwája Gawán was received with the greatest distinction.² Though this conquest of the Konkan, or at all events of the southern part, must have been tolerably complete, it is not said to have been formed into a separate government, but from subsequent proceedings it would appear that the governor of Dábhól had very extensive authority.

In 1478 the four governments of the Dakhan were increased to eight, and in this division all that part of the Konkan which belonged to the Dakhan was put under the governor of Junnar,³ which although sufficiently distant, was yet nearer to the Konkan than any previous provincial capital. Soon after this, however, Bahádúr Khán Giláni, son of a governor of Goa, got possession of Dábhól and a great many places on the coast. In 1485 Malik Ahmad was appointed to the government of the two provinces of Daulatabad and Junnar and shortly afterwards he reduced a number of Ghát and Konkan forts, some of which had never before been subdued by the Musalmáns. Among these were Koári, Bharap or Sudhigad, Páli or Sarasgad, and Máhuli, and he laid siege to Dánda-Rájápur, but without success.⁴ While thus engaged, his father Nizám-ul-Mulk was put to death, and Mulk Ahmad thereupon threw off his dependence on Bidar and established the Nizám Sháhi dynasty of Ahmadnagar. In like manner Yusúf Adil Khán in 1489 founded the Adil Sháhi dynasty of Bijápur. In 1490 the new king of Ahmadnagar took Dánda-Rájápur, and thus secured peaceable possession of that part of the Northern Konkan which did not belong to Gujarát.⁵ But Bahádúr Giláni was still unsubdued, and in 1493 he burnt Máhim (Bombay) and seized many ships belonging to the king of Gujarát. The latter thereupon sent both a land and sea force to Máhim, but most of his ships were wrecked there in a great storm: the admiral and those of the sailors who escaped were either made prisoners or massacred by the enemy. The officer who commanded the army marched through the Northern Konkan, and hearing of the naval disaster on arriving near Máhim halted, and referred to Gujarát for orders. Eventually a large force, composed of troops of Bidar Ahmadnagar and Bijápur, went against Bahádur Khán who in a battle near Kholhápur was defeated and killed.¹ Mahmúd Sháh, king of Bidar, then went with a few of his nobles to Dábhól, called by the Musalmáns Mustáfabad, where they spent a short time sailing about the coast. Bahádur Khán's fleet was made over to the Gujarát admiral.²

About this time also the Gujarát kingdom was divided into five governments, one of which, including no doubt the whole of the North Konkan, had Thána as its capital. This arrangement, however, did not last long, as in 1561 a fresh division was made, in which no provincial capital is found nearer to the Konkan than Surat.³ The reason though not mentioned is obvious: Sálsette and all the best parts of the North Konkan had in the meantime fallen into the hands of the Portuguese as will be shown further on.

The power of the Bidar kings having now entirely declined, their part of the Konkan was divided between the kings of Ahmadnagar and Bijápur. The Sávitri appears from the first to have been the boundary, and accordingly Chaul and Dábhól fell to different masters.⁴ These ports were no doubt of greater importance than all the rest of the country, and as early as the fourteenth century they had been mentioned with Bidar, Gulburga, and other large towns as having had orphan schools established in them by Muhammad Sháh Báhmání I. It should be mentioned that Yusúf Adil Khán, the first king of Bijápur, believed to be the son of an Emperor of Constantinople, had first landed in India at Dábhól, and from there had been taken as a slave to Bidar. Mahmúd Khwája Gawán had also come by this route from Persia to Bidar, and a little earlier in the century the Báhmání king Ahmad Sháh Wali had sent two different deputations by way of Chaul to a celebrated saint in Persia, some of whose family came to India soon afterwards by the same route.⁵ It may be supposed therefore that by this time more was known of the Konkan than before, and greater interest felt in it than was usual in these Dakhan courts. At all events it was in the time of Yusúf Adil Khán that the first steps were taken to improve the district, for in 1502 the Subhedár of the province of Dábhól, which extended from the Sávitri to Devgad, including therefore the whole of the Ratnágiri district with the exception of the Málvan sub-division and a very little more, gave grants to the first of the khots for the occupation and reclamation of waste lands. It is stated that at this time the country was in an exceedingly unsettled and impoverished condition, and that encouragement was now given to the former landholders to occupy their land at a light rent. Thus many of these grants confirmed in their ratans the old Hindu proprietors desáís, deshpándes, and kulkarnís.¹ It may be here mentioned that the origin of the Hindu institution of desáís or deshpándes and deshmukhs is unknown, but it is certain that the Moghals found them useful in their new conquests. Their authority was therefore confirmed and in some cases extended by the Bijápur government. It may be added that although higher offices under the name of sardeshmukhs and sardesáís are known to have existed, Elphinstone could hear of only two families enjoying the sardeshmukhi, and of no sardesáís, except in the Konkan.²

The date of the establishment of the Abyssinians in Janjira cannot be clearly made out. There is one legend which shows them to have got possession about 1489. Another account puts them a great deal later. Two of them were, however, admirals of the Nizám Sháhi fleet in the time of Malik Ambar, and another had charge of Ráiri.³ The large number of Abyssinians and other foreigners employed in the armies of the Musalmán kings, not only as private soldiers but also in high command, is noticeable. In Damán there was a garrison of 3000 "Abyssinian Turks and other white men,"⁴ and they are mentioned on several other occasions. In fact, it is evident from the various alliances of Egyptians and Turks with the Rájás of Cochin Cambay &c. and by the whole history of the first voyages of the Portuguese that the Musalmán powers of Europe and Africa were then much more closely connected with the Musalmáns of this coast than at any later time.⁵ And this is not to be wondered at, seeing how entirely the followers of that creed had monopolised the trade of Asia.

A more definite account of the divisions of the country and of the importance of the various towns at the beginning of the sixteenth century is obtained from the early Portuguese historians, though there are still but few events recorded. The kingdom of Gujarát extended as far south as Nágothna; that of Ahmadnagar, the king of which the Portuguese always called Nizamalucco⁶ from Nágothua to Shrivardhan or Bánkot; and Bijápur included all south of Bánkot.⁷ Chaul and Dábhól⁸ are called cities and ranked with Surat and Goa: the other places mentioned are Dáhanu, Tárápur, Kelva-Máhim, Agáshi, Bassein, Bándra, Máhim, Nágothna, Shrivardhan, Jaytápur, and Khárepátan.⁹ Both Chaul and Dábhól were indeed great commercial marts, with a large trade with Persia and the Red

The inhabitants of both were much addicted to war and Dábhól had an army of 30,000 men. (Kerr, VII. 83.) It seems impossible to give any weight to these statements.⁹ DeBarros, II. 294.

Sea, by which route the whole of the Indian goods designed for Europe then passed. Of seventeen large ships on their way from the coast of India to the Red Sea, which were detained by Sir H. Middleton in 1612, two were from Dábhól and one from Chaul.¹ Dábhól is also spoken of by Nikitin as the great meeting place of all nations living on the coast of India,² which of course implies a large coasting trade. In the sixteenth century the Portuguese historians describe it as one of the most magnificent and populous maritime places of those parts, full of noble houses, fine buildings, superb temples, and old mosques, one of which with a vaulted roof standing on the hills above the town was destroyed in 1557.³ Barbosa also mentions its very beautiful mosques, and says that the town was not very large, but the houses though thatched were handsome, and that from December to March there was a great commerce between the ships of Malabár and Cambay, which met here and exchanged their commodities, while great caravans of bullocks loaded with goods came down from the interior.⁴ They went back with wheat and rice grown in the Konkan.⁵ Up the river were many pretty towns plentifully supplied and owning much cultivated land and flocks. A route is given from Bijápúr to Dábhól by the Kumbhárli pass, and on account of the traffic along this road Chiplún is said to have been a great village and very populous, stored with all manner of provisions.⁶ The importation of horses from Mecca Aden and Ormuz is also mentioned. When Dábhól was first attacked by the Portuguese there were 6000 troops in garrison, but the defences were slight. It is said in 1547 to have had two forts and some redoubts which defended the entrance of the harbour, but these being destroyed the Portuguese in the following year attacked the upper town which was some distance from the sea.⁷

Chaul is spoken of in the same terms as Dábhól both as to size and trade, its weavers of silk and traffic in horses being particularly and frequently mentioned.⁸ Indeed, from the time of Marco Polo the acquisition of horses from the ports of the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf is always spoken of as of the highest importance to the kings of the Dakhan, and in every treaty with the Portuguese stipulations were made as to the importation of horses for the cavalry of the native armies.⁹ Later on, notwithstanding the prosperity of the Portuguese town (Lower-Chaul), the traffic of the old city is said to have been very great, and the list of imports from Mecca includes many European commodities; while among the exports are found articles such as indigo and opium which must have come from a great distance inland.¹ And as to the silk Pyrard at the beginning of the seventeenth century says that sufficient was made there to supply Goa and all India, and that it was better than the China silk and much prized at Goa. It was all made in the Musalmán city, where were also made very fine boxes and other small carved articles.² Linschotten also mentions the silk, and says that the raw material was brought from China; he also speaks of the lacquer work of Chaul.³ Feroz Sháh Báhmání is said to have despatched vessels every year from Goa and Chaul to procure manufactures and productions from all parts of the world, and to bring to his court persons celebrated for their talents.⁴ De la Valle, who gives a detailed description of Chaul in 1623, mentions the groves and gardens of palm and other fruit trees which shaded the broad roads and adorned the Musalmán as well as the Portuguese city of Chaul. A long shady street connected the two towns, and in the shops all sorts of necessities could be bought, and also fine silks and articles of luxury.⁵

In Ogilby's English Atlas published about 1670, there is an engraving of Dábhól, made apparently from a description of the place, for the natural features of this engraving are certainly very little like the reality. It shows wall all round the sea and river sides, and two or three large round buildings just inside the wall, which may be meant either for part of the fortifications or for mosques.

With regard to the other ports, Bassein was apparently the most important place after Chaul and Dábhól; it had a garrison of 3000 infantry and 500 cavalry in 1529, but afterwards in 1533, when the Musalmáns were to some extent prepared for the Portuguese, there were no less than 12,000 troops there. But more is said of the fertility and importance of the surrounding country than of the greatness of the town, the district which is called "one delicious garden" being the most productive in provisions and timber of all those belonging to Cambay. Many ships used to load there with timber and carry it to Mecca where the Turks used it for their fleets, and it was to exclude these as well as to strengthen themselves that the Portuguese took the place.⁶ Pyrard says that all the timber required at Goa for building houses and ships came from Bassein, and also a very good building stone like granite, of which all the churches and palaces at Goa were built.² Agáshi is spoken of as a large and rich place, but poor in buildings, with a trade in timber. It was defended when first attacked by 5000 infantry and 4000 cavalry; and, as showing the equality on which these places stood with Portugal in the art of ship-building, it must be mentioned that in 1540 an expedition went from Bassein against Agáshi with the sole object of getting possession of a great ship, which was just built there, and was then ready for launching. The ship was taken and afterwards made several voyages to Portugal.⁷ One of the Surat ships stopped by Sir H. Middleton on its voyage to the Red Sea in 1612 was 153 feet long 42 beam 31 deep, and said to be of 1500 tons burden.⁸ One of the Dábhól ships stopped at the same time was of 1200 tons. Similarly Faria y Souza explicitly states that the Portuguese found their enemies in India much better supplied with guns and powder than they were themselves.¹

Of Thána an Italian traveller of the fourteenth century, quoted by Colonel Yule, had written that there were the remains of an immense city to be seen, and that there were still 5000 velvet weavers there.² It is described in much the same way when the Portuguese arrived, as a decaying town and not so much resorted to by merchants as formerly, but it was full of people who lived by the silk trade, and there were more than a thousand silk looms there. From the description it would seem that Sálsette was to some extent independent of Gujarát, as the 'Xeque' sent an embassy offering a tribute.³ This may, however, have been only the provincial governor. There were two forts commanding the narrow part of the creek between Bassein and Thána built by the Musalmáns, but afterwards taken by the Portuguese.⁴ About the same time Cæsar Frederick called Thána a place "very populous with Portugals Moors and Gentiles."⁵ There can be little doubt that the gradual silting of the creek reduced its value as a port, while at the same time the increased size of the ships built made it necessary to find harbours with deeper water than Thána could ever have had, and so both causes contributed to its decay.

About the middle of the century Kalyán is described as having a fine fort with a garrison of 1500 men; the Portuguese burnt the suburbs, and took from them a large booty. The river of Khárepátan is frequently mentioned as attracting a great number of Musalmán ships, and as a resort of pirates.⁶ The Sangameshvar river is also mentioned as having on its banks a town of much commerce and merchandise, and afterwards as being a great stronghold of pirates. Pepper and iron were among its exports. A river twelve leagues south of Sangameshvar is mentioned under the name of Dobetala as having on its banks several small places with very pretty gardens and orchards of betel.⁷ This may probably refer to the river on which Sátavali stands, where there are old paved roads and other Musalmán remains, and which would have been the nearest port to Vishálgad. Malundi, a little north of Málvan, is also stated to have been a place of trade at this time, with a high road leading to the Gháts.⁸ Besides these, Barbosa states that there were many other small ports in which vessels from Malabár took inferior rice and vegetables, showing that at this time the Southern Konkan was an exporting district.

Of the inland parts of the Konkan under the Musalmáns very little can be known, but we may certainly apply to this district a remark of Elphinstone's⁹ regarding the Musalmán power: "Many mountain and forest tribes throughout India were unsubdued, though they could scarcely be called independent: they were left out of the pale of society, which they sometimes disturbed by their depredations."

The course of the Portuguese conquests will be given in detail in Section IV. but it seems better to give in this section the remainder of what is known about the Musalmán rule down to the time of Shíváji. The whole of the coast belonging to the kingdom of Gujarát fell to the Portuguese before the middle of the sixteenth century, and thus Kalyán was the only part of the district of any value to which the Moghals succeeded on the fall of the Gujarát sovereignty. The Nizám Sháhi kings of Ahmadnagar were always favourable to the Portuguese, the only exceptions being a misunderstanding in 1557 regarding the rock of Korlai opposite Chaul, their joining the alliance against the Portuguese in 1570, and the hostilities which ended in the capture of Korlai in 1594. Thus the cities of Upper and Lower Chaul, respectively Musalmán and Christian, flourished as long as the Ahmadnagar kingdom lasted, and for some time afterwards. But the Bijápur kings were always more or less at war with the Portuguese, and their coast was subjected to perpetual ravages, yet it remained entirely in the hands of the Musalmáns until the Maráthás took it. In the decline of the Nizám Sháhi kingdom Malik Ambar, the Abyssinian minister of Ahmadnagar, managed the revenues in the most enlightened spirit, and extended to the Konkan all the advantages of a good government. He abolished revenue farming and committed the management of the districts to Bráhmaṇ agents under Muhammadan superintendence.¹ He also carried out a survey on very excellent principles, and this in the Konkan extended from the Vaitarna to the Sávitri, except in the Habshi's territories.² His jurisdiction is said by Ferishta to have extended to within eight kos of Chaul,³ and from this it may perhaps be assumed that that city and creek were under a separate governor. But in 1636, only ten years after Malik Ambar's death, the whole of the Konkan dominions of the Ahmadnagar kingdom were ceded to Bijápur. The cession is said by Kháfi Khán to have been made by the Emperor of Delhi in exchange for districts belonging to Bijápur in the neighbourhood of Aurangabad, and the part of the Konkan given up is described as "jungles and hills full of trees."⁴ Sháhji Bhonsla had before this begun to overrun the Northern Konkan, and had taken a number of forts. An account of one of the expeditions made against him by a Musalmán force reads very like the history of the pursuit of Tátia Topi by our troops in 1858. The Imperial general Khán Zamán was ordered to co-operate with the Bijápur general Randaula against Sháhji. After investing Junnar the armies went towards Poona and Sháhji fled into the Konkan by the pass of Kumbha. Finding no support there he returned by the same pass. The Imperial force then went down the Kumbha pass into the Konkan, while the Bijápur general was closing Sháhji in on the other side.

Sháhji then went off to Máhuli, and from thence to Muranjan¹ where Khán Zamán followed him. Sháhji sent a part of his baggage and abandoned the rest, and the Imperial army overtook a number of his followers and put them to the sword. Sháhji again got off to Máhuli hoping to get away by Trimbak and Tringalwari, but found it best to stay at Máhuli and stand a siege with the best of his followers, disbanding the rest. His son was with him in the fort. Khán Zamán came up very soon and opened his trenches and a few days afterwards Randaula joined him. Sháhji soon began to treat, and after much fencing when the final attack was near, came out, met Randaula halfway down the hill and surrendered.² It is not stated how long the chase or the siege lasted, but this sort of warfare might have gone on for years. When the Emperor of Delhi had made peace with Bijápur there was no longer any excuse for Sháhji's resistance, and he entered into the service of Bijápur.³ Before this the forts of Kolába, Suvarndurg, Anjanvel, Jaygad, Ratnágiri, and Vijaydurg had been built, but they were all apparently of little importance till enlarged and strengthened by Shiváji.⁴

The Bijápur state was now for a few years the paramount power in the Konkan, and in 1648 before the assaults of the Maráthás had weakened it its government was thus provided for. The forts of Dáhol, Anjanvel, Ratnágiri, and Rajápur, with the districts dependent on them, were held direct from the crown.⁵ In Sir Henry Middleton's time the governor of Dáhol was a Persian and a great merchant owning many slaves. In 1612 Sir Henry Middleton stayed there with his ships for twelve days, got as much provisions as he wanted, and an eighteen-inch cable ninety-six fathoms long of Indian make for £8, but he obtained little trade owing to the duplicity of the governor.⁶ The remainder of the Southern Konkan was farmed out to the hereditary Deshmukhs, of whom the Sárvants of Kudál were the chief. As mentioned the Dáhol subhedári was very extensive, and it is stated that its capital was for some time at Prabánváli.⁵ This place, now almost entirely deserted and with no ruins to tell of its former importance, lies at the foot of the great Ghát fortress of Vishálgad, and it is allowable to conjecture that the government of the subhedári was fixed in that secure but retired position in consequence of the ruin brought on Dáhol by the frequent attacks of the Portuguese, who in these later days never mention any Musalmán officer of high rank as commanding at Dáhol.⁷ About 1540 the governor of the Konkan under Bijápur, Asad Khán, is said to have had his head-quarters at Sangameshvar⁸ and to have made

⁸ There is some confusion about the place mentioned as Sangucar. Faria speaks of it as on the Vizadurg river, and from DeBarros' description it would seem to be further south and nearer the sea than Sangameshvar. But Hamilton, whose travels were published in 1727, says: "There is an excellent harbour for shipping eight leagues south of Dábul called Sanguseer." This evidently refers to Jaygad at the overtures to the Portuguese with a view to getting their assistance if he made himself independent. The Portuguese, however, refused to help him.¹ In 1583 and again in 1585 the Portuguese in conjunction with Bijápúr troops attacked the Naik of Sangameshvar, who had seven or eight villages and 600 sepoy, and lived by piracy and pillage. His lands were given to another naik.²

The remainder of the Konkan was divided into two subhedáris: the first, Kalyán, extended from the Vaitarna to Nágothna under a Musalmán officer; the rest down to the Sávitri was committed to the management of the Habshi of Janjira, whose own estate was in the middle of this district. His charge included the great forts of Tala, Ghosála, and Ráiri (afterwards Ráygad).³ Thus the government was administered until Shiváji's invasion of the Konkan. The Northern Konkan was to so great an extent in the hands of the Portuguese that not much besides the inland and wild parts of it were left to the Moghals, and of this a great part, as already mentioned, was held by the tributary state of Jawhár. Although the Moghals in 1572 succeeded to the territories of Gujarát in the Northern Konkan, yet they did not much interfere with the Portuguese, and a treaty was soon made between the two powers.⁴ In 1582 they invaded the Daman and Tárápúr thánadáris, and attacked Dáhánu, where the captain and fifty men defended themselves in a tower.⁵ At Máhim the captain and villagers fortified the church of the Dominican Fathers to resist them. Peace however was soon made. This moderation may have been attributable to the influence of a Portuguese lady of rank in the seraglio of Akbar, who is said to have obtained favourable concessions for her countrymen.⁶

In 1612 the Moghals besieged Daman Bassein and Chaul, and desolated the surrounding country, and peace was purchased only by concessions and presents,⁷ although the Portuguese of the Máhim and Tárápúr districts are said to have defended themselves valiantly.⁸ Bassein is spoken of by a Muhammadan historian of that time as a Moghal port, though in the hands of the Portuguese.⁹ The Emperor Sháh Jahán was however as favourable to the Portuguese as Akbar had been¹⁰ and no further hostilities by the Moghals against them appear to have taken place till near the end of the century under Aurungzeb, when great cruelties were committed.

mouth of the Sangameshvar river, and even by Orme Sangameshvar is put for Jaygad. This and Hamilton's remark that "being inhabited by Raparees, it is not frequented," sufficiently identifies Jaygad with the piratical station of Musalmán and Portuguese times. Pinkerton, VIII. There is also some doubt about this Asad Khan, as in the frequent mention of the well-known soldier of that name in Musalmán history he is never said to have been governor of the Konkan, and his constant loyalty is particularly noticed. Even then peace was soon made, and on more favourable terms than the Portuguese were then justified by their strength in demanding.¹ The Musalmáns had however by this time so little influence left in the Konkan that their future proceedings must be looked for in the account of the Maráthás.

The remains of Musalmán buildings in the Konkan are but few and unimportant. Dábhól was so frequently burnt by the Portuguese, and Chaul so thoroughly destroyed by Shiváji, that there is little more than enough to show that they were once great places. At both there are a number of tombs scattered about, but none of great pretensions. At Dábhól there is a fine mosque with dome and minarets standing close to the water's edge, and now almost buried in cocoaunt trees. It is of considerable size, and its situation is striking, but it would not be thought very much of in Gujarát or any other district rich in Musalmán remains.² The site of the Musalmán city of Chaul is even more covered by cocoanut gardens than Dábhól. The most striking ruin is a hamám khána or bath, containing one large central chamber and two smaller ones, all octagonal, and each lighted by a circular opening in the cupola which covers it. There is also a mosque of some pretensions. At Kalyán, formerly called Islámabad, there is a large Musalmán population and several mosques in use. There is however nothing either old or remarkable except one mosque, which would be very fine if it had a dome in proportion to its other parts. This stands on the edge of a noble pond, round which there are many tombs and other undistinguishable remains, as well as one considerable building said to be the tomb of a governor named Mohartaba Khán, on which is the date H. 1108. This is probably the person called by the Portuguese Mortaba Khán, Nawáb of Bhiwndi, who ravaged their territories at various times about 1690.³ The absence of other buildings is due to the ravages to which this district was subjected in the early days of Shiváji. Fryer, who travelled in India from 1673 to 1676, speaks of the remains of the Musalmán city of Kalyán, then only recently destroyed, as noble and striking, and goes so far as to call them "the most glorious ruins the Mahommadans in the Deccan ever had occasion to deplore."⁴ At Khárepátan there are the foundations of a large Musalmán town in a fine situation and a great number of tombs, but no building remains standing.⁵ At Rájpuri near Janjira, now a wretched looking village, there are the tombs of four of the Nawábs situated in a pretty glen and close to the creek. There are, of course, tombs and mosques of an ordinary description in many places, but none architecturally remarkable. The tomb of a saint at Bhiwndi, said to have been previously a diwán of Bijápur, and that of a princess at Lánja, said to have been the daughter of one of the Bijápur kings, may be mentioned.

² It is said to have been built by a princess of Bijápur in 1659-60, but the real date was probably much earlier. See Ind. Ant. II. 280. ³ O Chronista, II. 52.

Section III.
The

When the forts are examined it will be found that from the much greater importance their successors attached to these than the Musalmáns did, the older work is generally hidden by the more modern. At Vizaydurg however the most massive of the buildings within and on the fort walls are evidently Musalmán. At Avchitgad the crenated battlements of the outer wall seem to prove the same origin. The island fort of Árnála near the mouth of the Vaitarna appears to be entirely Musalmán, with domes, Saracenic arches, octagonal recesses, and other features never seen in Marátha forts, though there are also marks inside of its Hindu occupation. But there is scarcely any mention to be found of any of the Konkan forts in the records of the Musalmán time.

One more Musalmán relic must be mentioned, the picturesque bridge at Nágothna. This is said to have been built about 1582 by one Káji Aláuddin of Chaul,¹ and as this date is between the siege of Chaul during the alliance of the Musalmán kings against the Portuguese and the activity of the Nizám Sháhi troops at the same place twenty years later,² it may without improbability be assumed that the bridge was built to facilitate the march of the troops from Ahmadnagar to Chaul, as from Nágothna there was a ghát by Koári considerably nearer to Poona than the Borghát.³ The chief peculiarity of the bridge is its narrowness, the space between the parapets being only nine feet nine inches.

Villages with Musalmán names are often met with, of the origin of which nothing can be heard. Two small districts close to Dábhól retain the names they received from the Musalmáns, though everywhere else the ancient Hindu names of pránts and tarafs have been preserved. These are Haveli Jafarabad containing thirty-seven villages, and Haveli Ahmadabad containing twenty-one, and the probability is that when Dábhól was first taken by the Musalmáns these villages were assigned for the support of the governor and his establishment.

SECTION IV.

THE PORTUGUESE IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

Section IV.

The Portuguese,

THE proceedings of the Muslmáns, so far as they can be traced, have been brought down to the middle of the seventeenth century. It is now necessary to turn back to the first appearance on the coast of the Portuguese who here as over the whole of the east played so grand a part through the whole of the sixteenth century. It is impossible to understand the position which they held on this coast without considering the objects which they pursued as to the whole of Asia and the enmities which they thereby excited. For many centuries the Egyptians had held the monopoly of the Indian trade, and the Venetians were closely connected with them as the chief carriers of Indian goods from Alexandria to Europe.¹ But the Portuguese immediately after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope and their first visit to Calicut in 1498, resolved to become the commercial masters of the East, and for that purpose they not only claimed the monopoly among European nations of trading by the Cape of Good Hope, but also undertook the wonderful enterprise of conquering the whole coast of Asia, from the Red Sea round the Persian Gulf, along all the shores of India, and away to the Straits China and Japan.² This of course brought them into immediate collision with the Egyptians in the Red Sea, and with the whole body of Musalmán traders spread along the shores of the Eastern seas, who soon saw the necessity of opposing the Europeans by every artifice and every force,³ for the Musalmáns of those days had no more idea than the Christians of commerce being the right of all nations equally. Thus the Egyptians, who were the first enemies of the Portuguese, were entirely supported by the local traders; and the Venetians, seeing how seriously the defeat of the Egyptians would affect their prosperity, joined in the vain attempt to confine the Indian trade within its old bounds.⁴ The Portuguese had gradually made their way up the coast from Calicut, and had had many more or less casual encounters with the Musalmán fleets.

Their first voyage north of Goa appears to have been in 1503 under Vincent Sodre, who sailed along the coast as far as Cambay.⁵ This was just before their first voyage from India to the Red Sea, and no places in the Konkan are mentioned in the account of this voyage, nor anything of importance on this part of the coast until in 1507 Lorenzo d'Almeida destroyed seven vessels of the

Moors in the port of Chaul because they entered without returning his salute. He then went to Dábhól, and found the Calicut fleet there, and having called a council of war and resolved not to attack it he went on to a river four leagues from Dábhól, and took all the vessels in the harbour, and burnt them, except two richly laden ships from Ormuz, which he took with him to Cochin. His father however expressed great anger against him for not having attacked the Calicut fleet, and it is said that the remembrance of this in the following year cost him his life in the famous sea fight at Chaul, for he refused to fly or surrender though there was no possibility of otherwise saving his life.¹ At that time he had conveyed some merchantmen to Chaul, where the governor under the king of Ahmadnagar received them kindly, and permitted them to trade. But while lying in the harbour² they were suddenly attacked by the combined fleets of Egypt and Gujarát.³ The Portuguese were outnumbered, and lost the flagship with their commander, and one hundred and forty others killed and one hundred and twenty-four wounded. They put the Musalmán loss at six hundred and Ferishta at four hundred, and this was naturally claimed by the Musalmáns as a victory,⁴ but the Portuguese were soon afterwards amply avenged by the fleet of the elder Almeida, who destroyed the Egyptian fleet and the Gujarát sea power at Diu. The account of the sea fight at Chaul is thus given by the Gujarát historians: "The infidel Europeans, who had of late years usurped the dominion of the ocean, endeavoured at this time to occupy for themselves some part of the coast of Gujarát, on which they wished to settle." Amir Husan, the admiral of the Turkish Emperor Bajazet II., arrived off the coast of Gujarát with a fleet of twelve sail carrying fifteen hundred men, and Mahmúd Sháh (Begada) anxious to aid in the expulsion of the foreigners sailed in person with his fleet to Daman and Máhim (Bombay). The Amir al Umra Malik Aiaz Sultáni sailed also from the port of Diu, and having united his squadron with that of the Turkish admiral attacked the Portuguese fleet then lying off the harbour of Chaul. The Portuguese fled with the loss of "three thousand or four thousand infidels."⁵

A war carried on against so many enemies, in so many seas, and along so vast an extent of coast, necessarily lasted for very many years; and when the Turks had conquered Egypt they considered the expulsion of the Portuguese from the Persian gulf and from India as not less important than the Mameluke rulers had done.⁶ Therefore in 1538 Sulimán the Magnificent sent to this coast a fleet of seventy large vessels, on board of which were many Venetian galley-slaves and 7000 Janisaries.⁷ This force besieged the Portuguese in Diu, but was beaten off after the garrison had defended itself most heroically. A similar expedition and siege took place in 1546,¹ and that was apparently the last great attempt on the part of the former possessors of the Indian trade to expel the Portuguese. But as late as 1586 the Turks with ships built at Suez took two merchantmen of Chaul, and a fleet was accordingly sent against them, but was defeated by them at the entrance of the Red Sea.

It is not likely that the Portuguese in the beginning of the sixteenth century with all their great schemes would have troubled themselves about the Konkan, if there had not been in its ports and marts of too great importance to be left in the hands of their enemies. But Chaul and Dábhól could not be so left, while the Portuguese could not spare men enough to establish themselves in these ports in the same way as they had determined to do at Goa. The state of the Musalmán kingdoms, which divided the Konkan among them, was however at this time eminently favourable to the designs of the Portuguese. The Northern Konkan as far south as Nágothna had always belonged to Gujarát² but the Southern Konkan had only just been divided (as narrated in the last section) between the dynasties of Bijápur and Ahmadnagar. The rivalry which existed between these two³ was probably the cause of the Portuguese first obtaining a footing in the Konkan. The Ahmadnagar king, who had possession of the coast from Nágothna to Bánkot, admitted them into Chaul, and at a very early date accepted the protection of their fleets for the vessels which frequented his ports, and for that protection paid them a tribute, and allowed them to establish a factory at Chaul.⁴ This was between 1512 and 1521.⁵ And by the latter year the Portuguese had obtained permission to build a small fort there, and had command of the whole river.⁶ The captaincy of the fortress was already an important appointment in 1524, when Vasco da Gama took charge of the Viceroyalty there, as the first port touched at.⁷

The good understanding between the Portuguese and the Ahmadnagar kingdom (or to speak more correctly the governors of Chaul) was scarcely broken during the sixteenth century. On the other hand the Bijápur king was too powerful on the coast to accept the protection or acknowledge the supremacy of the Portuguese fleet, and the consequence was that as early as 1608 his great port of Dábhól was destroyed by the fleet of Francisco d'Almeida, consisting of nineteen vessels and 1600 men, half of whom were natives.⁸ On several subsequent occasions the destruction was repeated;⁹ for Dábhól was so great a place of resort for ships from Malabár and Arabia that it very soon recovered its importance.¹⁰ The king of Gujarát also for some time felt no necessity for the Portuguese alliance, and as there was no great port in his part of the Konkan the Portuguese after punishing him at Diu did not trouble themselves much about him. But in 1521 his Admiral defeated the Portuguese off Chaul, and sank one of their vessels, and remained for twenty days off the port greatly harassing them.¹ In 1527 another Gujarát fleet was sent to Chaul, but a great number of its ships were destroyed by the allied forces of the Portuguese and Ahmadnagar.² In 1528 there was a decisive battle off Bándra, in which the Portuguese took seventy-three ships out of the eighty which composed the Cambay fleet.³

These attacks led to frequent marauding expeditions of the Portuguese along the coast of the North Konkan, in one of which in 1529 they burnt Nágothna Bassein and Agáshi. At this time also Thána Bándra and Karanja paid tribute to the Portuguese, these towns having sent a peaceable embassy instead of resisting as the others did.⁴ The Portuguese possession of Sálsette appears to date from about this time,⁵ though Faria puts it at the same time as Bassein,² but it seems unlikely that they had any more than a very precarious hold on any of these parts for many years after this, and it is expressly stated as regards the country round Bassein that the natives were masters of these villages in time of war.⁶ The war between Gujarát and the Portuguese was continued in 1530, and the Portuguese suffered another repulse at Chaul.⁷ In 1533 an expedition consisting of eighty vessels with 1800 Portuguese and 2000 Kánarese attacked Bassein, and stayed there ten days, destroying the fortifications: after which the fleet proceeded northwards and burnt all the places as far as Tárápur.⁸ In the next year Bassein was ceded by the king of Gujarát; and he then, as Ahmadnagar had done before, put his ships entirely under the protection of the Portuguese, and agreed that none should sail from his ports without taking out Portuguese passes and paying port dues at Bassein. This⁹ last stipulation was relaxed soon afterwards on the king ceding Diu as the price of the Portuguese alliance against the Moghals, but their passes had still to be taken and dues paid to them.¹⁰ They were never however on such good terms with the Gujarát as with the Ahmadnagar kings, and there were frequent expeditions into their dominions, while in 1539 Bassein was besieged for some time by a Gujarát force.¹¹

The Bijápur dominions in the Southern Konkan had during this time suffered from the marauding expeditions of the Portuguese quite as much as the Northern Konkan. In 1547 John de Castro made treaties both with Ahmadnagar and Bijnagar, that is Vijayanagar, offensive and defensive, against Bijápur. The Portuguese were bound to defend the coast of the Ahmadnagar kingdom against pirates, in return for which they were to receive as payment sailors provisions and timber for their ships. The treaty with Bijnagar contained also many stipulations as to trade. Both stipulated against the ports of this coast being open to or any help being given to fleets or ships of the Turks.¹ Immediately after these treaties were concluded followed the Portuguese expedition of 1547-8, which seems to have exceeded all previous ones in cruelty and severity, for every place between Goa and Shrivardhan is said to have been burnt by the Portuguese, and the same thing was repeated in 1555 and 1557, Dábhól being always the first place to suffer. By 1548 however the Bijápur power had suffered so much as to find it necessary to cede ports to the Portuguese, and to accept the protection of their fleet; but for many years after the peace then made there were frequent hostilities in which the Southern Konkan suffered severely. In 1555 an expedition was sent from Goa which defeated the Bijápur troops at Áchra and on the Kárlí river, both near Málván.² Ferishta records a Musalmán success in 1571, which the Portuguese historians do not mention. A Portuguese force landed at Dábhól to destroy it in the usual manner but the Governor laid an ambush and killed 150 of the attacking party. It is evident however that by 1560 the Portuguese were entirely masters of this coast, and once established they never drew back. The Musalmán writers quite acknowledge the importance of the position of which they were thus deprived, and complain that nothing but an insignificant coasting trade was left to them.³ The cruelties, which even the Portuguese historians admit, are of course put in a much stronger light by their victims.

It is easy to see that it was no part of the Portuguese plan to invade the inland parts of the country; in fact, the mere occupation of the ports would have caused too great a drain on the population of Portugal if Albuquerque had not provided his soldiers with wives from the women of Goa, baptised for the purpose, and given them grants of land in the Goa district.⁴ He thus speedily raised up a race of half-caste Portuguese, who as Christians were entirely identified in interest with the Europeans. Such parts of the interior however as were productive and could be defended were not neglected by the Portuguese.⁵ It does not appear indeed that they possessed any territory between Bombay and Goa except the new town of Chaul, now called Revdanda; and in 1540, when they took the fortresses of Saksá and Karnála, they speedily restored them to Ahmadnagar for an additional tribute.¹ They had however a factory at Dábhól, though it is very seldom mentioned, and it was apparently not established till after 1570.² In the Northern Konkan they seem from the first to have held the productive villages between Bassein and Agáshi, and this small district they then and afterwards called Casaba.³ About 1556 they acquired the inland forts of Asheri and Manor⁴ as giving them the command of a rich and productive district.⁵ The fort of Asheri was considered almost impregnable, and was given up by the Abyssinian captain commanding the district on payment of Rs. 6500. A garrison of sixty soldiers was put in it and a church erected. This fort was always greatly valued by the Portuguese, and was described in 1818, after the Maráthás had had it for eighty years, as accessible only at one point, and of such natural strength that with a handful of men to defend it it may justly be considered impregnable. The latter part of the ascent is an almost perpendicular staircase (with a precipice of several hundred feet immediately below it) hewn out of the solid rock forty feet high, at the top of which is an iron door horizontally fixed, and from which the ascent is nearly as steep and of equal height to a second gateway.⁶ Soon after the capture of Asheri and Manor, Daman, which the Portuguese had long coveted, was ceded to them, and with it apparently a good deal of the coast between Daman and Bassein. The Tárápur pargana is mentioned as the best and most prosperous of all the districts within the jurisdiction of Daman. In 1559 a body of Abyssinians made an attack on Sanján and Tárápur; at the latter place there was then only a stockaded fort (tranqueira) and forty men, but the Abyssinians after ravaging some villages were beaten off.⁷ In 1569 there was an expedition against the Kolis which seems to have penetrated quite up to the foot of the Gháts, and a stockaded fort permanently held by the Portuguese is spoken of at Sáyrán on the Vaitarna river. The Koli country was again ravaged in 1583, and on both occasions the Portuguese suffered considerable loss from the difficulty of the country and the activity of their enemy, whom the want of activity of so small a nation in Gujarát and the Dakhan "to timidity or disinclination," while a comparison between their exploits and settlements in a hundred years and those of the English in the first hundred years after their coming to India can certainly not be unfavourable to the Portuguese. An historian of the first class may be properly, and the writer hopes conclusively, quoted against Colonel Taylor. Dr. Robertson says of the Portuguese conquests: "By the enterprising valour, military skill, and political sagacity of the officers who had supreme command in India, and who have a title to be ranked with persons most eminent for virtues or abilities in any age or nation, greater things were perhaps achieved than were ever accomplished in so short a time." Historical Disquisition, 150.

they described as jumping along from tree to tree like monkeys. The chief towns of the Kolis mentioned at this time are called Darila, possibly Darje Tavar and Vazen (perhaps Vásind). Tavar appears to have been to the north of Daman, but the other two in the Konkan, and Darila is described as a considerable town of great stone and tiled houses.¹

In 1570 the kings of Bijápur and Ahmadnagar entered into an alliance against the Portuguese; and while the Bijápur troops in great force invaded the district around Goa, those of Ahmadnagar besieged Chaul, which was defended by Don Francisco de Mascarenhas, afterwards the first Viceroy under Philip II. of Spain.² This was one of the severest trials the Portuguese ever had to undergo, and the result covered them with glory. They estimated the troops of Ahmadnagar which invaded their territories at 42,000 cavalry and 120,000 infantry, a force which it is needless to say would have eaten up the Konkan ten times over. After the Musalmáns had several times unsuccessfully assaulted the fort a battle was fought outside, in which the Musalmáns were defeated, and soon after they made peace and retired.³ All that the Muhammadan historian Ferishta says of this expedition is that the king Mortaza Nizám Sháh marched against the fort of Revdanda belonging to the Portuguese, but was obliged to raise the siege after a blockade of some months, as the enemy obtained provisions by sea, owing to the treachery of the Nizám Sháhi officers who were bribed by presents, particularly of wine.⁴ While this was going on the Portuguese were able to make an attack from Bassein on Kalyán, which then belonged to Ahmadnagar. The suburbs were burnt and a considerable booty taken. Their fleet also destroyed Dáhol.⁵ On the other hand 4000 Ahmadnagar cavalry marched along the Konkan north of Chaul to cut off reinforcements and supplies from Bassein, and the Portuguese were besieged in Karanja, where they had a small fort and forty men: they were however relieved from Sálsette.⁶ The terms of the peace were altogether favourable to the Portuguese.

From the descriptions given of Chaul at the time of the two sieges⁷ it appears that the main part of the fortifications were built between 1570 and 1592, and an inscription states that those along the beach were made in 1577.⁸ It was later than this the extensive fortifications at Bassein were begun, though there had been a fort there since 1536.⁹ In 1597 the new works having got on very slowly, Ayres de Silva de Mello was sent to superintend them.¹⁰

In 1592 there was again war with Ahmadnagar, as the king had determined to expel the Portuguese from the Chaul creek. It is not clear whether the rock of Korlai, which commands the entrance of the creek, and which was called by the Portuguese and other Europeans Il Morro, had ever been in the possession of the Portuguese before this.¹ It was always looked upon by them as a position of the greatest value, and in 1557 they had determined to get possession of it somehow, but the king of Ahmadnagar on their asking for it temporised with them while he began to fortify it himself. The Portuguese had a cross at the extreme point which was miraculously preserved from the attempts the Musalmáns made to destroy it, while their fleet bombarded the rock, and prevented the Musalmáns from working at the fortifications. In the end an arrangement was come to, that no fort should be built on the rock by either people.² Nevertheless in 1592 when war broke out the Musalmáns were in possession of a fort there which is described as a wonder of strength and completeness, and Ferishta implies that it had only lately been built. They greatly harassed the Portuguese at Revdanda, having a considerable force outside the fort as well as within, and the latter after many skirmishes, being reinforced from Bassein and Sálsette, determined to beat up the enemy's camp, but without any idea of taking Korlai. On the night of September 4, 1594, fifteen hundred Portuguese crossed the river and attacked the Musalmán camp. The Musalmáns, though not altogether unprepared, fled to the fort, and the Portuguese following were able to enter with them through the first gateway being blocked by a wounded elephant. The resistance though brave was disorganised, and after about two hours the Portuguese got possession of the whole of the works, with a loss of only twenty-one killed and fifty wounded, the Musalmáns being said to have lost 10,000 men. The fort was destroyed, as the Portuguese could not afford men to garrison it, but they retained the battery commanding the entrance to the creek, and afterwards rebuilt the fort on the original plan.³

After this the Portuguese had full possession of the creek and the kingdoms both of Bijápur and Ahmadnagar were now too near extinction to give them serious trouble. Yet in 1609 the Musalmán governor in Chaul sent out a fleet of thirty prowes to cruise against the Portuguese, and the latter could get no redress from the Ahmadnagar government.⁴ This last event may be taken as illustrating the view of the Portuguese historians, that as the period up to 1560 was the infancy of their power in India, and from 1560 to 1600 its manhood, so from 1600 its decline began.⁵ And as their rise had been rapid and their success marvellous, so their decline began early and was unchecked. After the beginning of the seventeenth century no more is heard of aggression or acquisition on their part, and they appear to have owed the retention of the territory they had to the forbearance or the dissensions of their neighbours. The few events in which they took part after this will be mentioned in the history of their struggles with the Dutch in the next section and in the account of the Maráthás. But it is necessary now to give some description of the way in which the Portuguese managed their possessions in the Konkan and of the causes which led to their decline and resulted in their losing this part of the coast.

PORTUGUESE.Section V.

In describing the system of government of the Portuguese in the Konkan it is, as may be expected, not possible to make a very accurate distinction between what would now be called the different departments. Although trade was the nominal object of the Portuguese settlements in India, the nature of their schemes, as already described, made it inevitable that at first the persons of the greatest influence should be the military governors. The trade being a royal monopoly, Albuquerque established custom-houses in every port, and later there were in every city factors (veadores) and treasurers.¹ At the same time magistrates (ouvidores) were appointed by Albuquerque, but only apparently at Goa Chaul and Bassein, and these decided all civil and criminal cases. They were subordinate however to the captains of the fortresses, "who often abused their powers and made the ouvidores decide as they liked. History is full of the arbitrary acts of these tyrants in their fortresses, who were nearly all Fidalgos of the highest class."² In case of disagreement between the ouvidor and the captain, the veador was called in, and the majority decided. The appeal from the judgments of this bench was in 1587 to the Supreme Court or Relação at Goa,³ but later to the desembargadores or district judges, of whom there were six or eight, one being at Bassein.⁴ These besides the appeals decided original civil and criminal cases of importance. The desembargador at Bassein in Gemelli's time was a gownsmen (probably a doctor of laws), and Gemelli as a doctor of laws himself was asked to remain at Bassein as advocate for the various religious societies there, because the native pleaders in the courts were so ignorant.⁵ The judicial establishment at Bassein in 1552 was one ouvidor, one officer of police (meirinho), one king's solicitor, two administrators of intestates, one sea-bailiff, and ten peons. At Chaul the establishment was smaller, but there was a jailor and presumably a jail,⁶ neither of which are mentioned at Bassein at this time, although in 1674 Dellon, who had tried both, said that the jail at Bassein was larger than that at Daman and then contained a good number of prisoners of the Inquisition.⁷

Very little is told of the arrangements for the collection of the revenue, but the lands of Sálsette and of the North Konkan generally were at a very early period parcelled out among the Portuguese settlers at a very small quit-rent, amounting it is said to not more than four to ten per cent of the ordinary rental.¹ Villages were also sometimes given to soldiers and others for their lives.² These large landholders were called fazendars, a name which still survives in Bombay and the neighbourhood, and their descendants lived on and managed their own estates, levying from the cultivators a fixed proportion of the produce in the manner usual under the Native Governments.³ In the same way Bassein was said to owe a great part of its prosperity to the noblemen who lived there on the rents of their villages.⁴ In Sálsette there were under the readors, presumably for those lands not granted to the Portuguese, managers of the cultivation, called mhátarás⁵ or elders, whose duties were similar to those of pátels under the Native Governments.³ From an account supplied by the Government of Goa to that of Bombay in 1821 it appears that in 1688 the total revenue of the province of Bassein was about Rs. 1,30,000, and of this sum the quit-rents amounted to about half. The tobacco tax was farmed for Rs. 47,000. Twenty-one villages had to keep for the defence of the country one Arab horse each, and one village a country horse, and these obligations were commutable by a yearly payment of Rs. 132 and Rs. 88 respectively. Alienations of land and revenue to the Jesuits of different colleges and churches are mentioned.⁶ It is expressly stated that the island of Sálsette was in a high state of prosperity under the Portuguese.³ And the Factor of Bassein in 1728 wrote that the greater part of the establishments both in Goa and the Bassein district were supported by the Sálsette villages.⁷ Yet it must be remembered that the grants of land on low quit-rents were confined to either Portuguese of European birth or to converts of high rank who adopted the names and style of living of their conquerors. The list of cesses at that time in addition to what would now be considered a heavy assessment on the land⁸ would of itself raise doubts as to the prosperity of the island having extended to the lower classes. But an acute observer of the seventeenth century allows of no doubt on this point,⁹ for he speaks of the native inhabitants as "poor wretched Gentiles Moors and Christians, worse than vassals to the lords of the villages." And in the articles of the cession of Bombay to the English¹⁰ it is implied that their condition was that of slaves, for it was stipulated that "the Curumbies, Bandaries, or other inhabitants of the villages belonging to the Portuguese shall not be admitted into Bombay, and all such persons resorting there shall be immediately delivered up to their respective masters." There is in fact nothing whatever either in their own histories or in the accounts of travellers to show that the Portuguese ever took any trouble to protect or raise the condition of their native subjects as Shiváji did in the seventeenth century. With this fact may be mentioned their great establishments of domestic slaves brought in Portuguese ships from the African settlements and distributed at very low prices all over their Asiatic possessions.¹ In the treaty of peace after the fall of Bassein the negroes are specially mentioned in the stipulation for the release of prisoners.² To this institution of domestic slavery may no doubt be ascribed the strain of negro blood frequently perceptible in the Goanese.

The military establishments in the Konkan must be next mentioned. After the Viceroy and the great dignitaries of the Church there was no greater officer than the General of the North who resided at Bassein,³ and after him came the captains of Bassein, Daman, Chaul, and Salsette. All these appointments were held for short terms of years. Bassein Daman and Chaul are said to have been the only fortresses (fortaleza) between Cambay and Goa, except one at Dábhól which was not in the possession of the Portuguese.⁴ No fort is mentioned in Sálsette in 1634 except the small one at Vesáva (Madh). The Bassein district then extended from the Vaitarna to Karanja, and in this there were besides the captain of Bassein, fourteen captains of forts and tranqueiras, that is stockaded posts. The district of Daman extended from the Vaitarna to Párner and included the thánádáris of Sanján, Dáhánu, Tárápur, and Máhim. All along this part of the coast were many towers and fortified houses for protection against the pirates, as is apparent from the ruins still standing, and there were also the important inland forts of Asheri and Manor. But it does not appear that there was then anything so large or strong as the now ruined forts of Dáhánu and Tárápur must have been, and the garrisons were small and included but few Portuguese.⁵ Bassein and Chaul were the two great places of arms, and were apparently considered sufficient for the protection of the whole coast. But in 1728 the Factor of Bassein made a detailed report⁶ on the defences of the North Konkan, drawing particular attention to the insecure condition of the forts, and especially to the want of protection in Sálsette against the Maráthás. There was no fort at Thána but only the three small towers commanding the creek, and containing three or four men each. Bassein had ninety pieces of artillery, the largest being twenty-four pounders, Chaul fifty-eight, and a fortified camp outside the walls nineteen more. The rock of Korlai opposite Chaul, which had been considered so great an acquisition, had thirty cannon, but many of them unserviceable. Asheri was in very bad condition, Manor not worthy to be called a fort. Thus though the military power and spirit of the Portuguese had in 1634 greatly degenerated from the days when Bassein was ready at any moment to send out an expedition against the king of Gujarát, or help to any of the smaller posts that might be attacked, yet in 1728 affairs were infinitely worse all over the district, and Sálsette notwithstanding its great value was quite indefensible. The recommendation to protect it by making a great place of arms at Thána was followed, but with too little vigour, for the fatal year 1739 arrived before the fort was finished.¹

It has been already stated that Albuquerque gave his soldiers wives from the native women whom he caused to be baptised, and land on which they might settle and support families. This was probably the origin of the division of the military forces in India into soldados and cazados, the latter word meaning simply 'Married.' Many of the soldados were convicts sent from Portugal for a term of years, and kept in the forts : others were boys enlisted in Lisbon and on their arrival allotted to Fidalgos as pages, but obliged after reaching manhood to do seven years' service in the army. But all the single men not ecclesiastics in India were liable to military duty and were called soldados, otherwise men of the sword to distinguish them from churchmen. The cazados wore the cloak which the soldados were not allowed to do, and were not generally sent away from their homes for service.² They were in fact a sort of first class reserve and were held in considerable estimation, and the quarters of the cazados within or without the walls are always mentioned in the description of forts. Native soldiers in the Portuguese service are mentioned under the name of Piaes as early as 1534,³ but it is evident that their system made them much less dependent on sepoys as time went on than they would have been under a system more like ours.

While the military spirit of the Portuguese steadily declined after the end of the sixteenth century the ecclesiastical power went on ever increasing. Goa was created an episcopal see in 1534,⁴ and by this time numbers of priests had come out from Portugal and established themselves in various places, the Franciscans being the first to arrive, and the Dominicans soon following. The time when the work of conversion was seriously begun is a point of dispute,⁵ some writers believing that from the first the propagation of Christianity had been as great an object with the Portuguese monarchs as the extension of their dominions, others and even some Catholics acknowledging that there was no great zeal until the establishment of the Inquisition. But the account given of the state of public morals at Goa when Xavier arrived in 1544¹ is sufficient to prove that so far from any missionary spirit existing there was then scarcely any practice of Christianity at all. Two years later the King, after regretting that the worship of idols was allowed even in Goa, mentioned among other objectionable practices that of the Portuguese buying slaves cheap and selling them to Musalmáns and other heathens.² Xavier, however, though he spent but a very small part of his time at Goa, or any place north of it, was able to change the whole aspect of affairs in respect of Christian observances: he established a Jesuit seminary at Bassein in 1548, and in 1552 sent missionaries there as well as to Thána and Chaul. But he refused to establish a college at Chaul because there were still so many forts and stations without a single missionary. The visits of so great a man are sufficient to distinguish any district, and it is recorded that he was at Bassein at least three times, first at the end of 1544, again in 1548 when the great Viceroy John de Castro was there, and lastly in 1552. He also visited Chaul on more than one occasion, and Khárepátan once.³ After his death he was made patron saint of both Bassein and Chaul.⁴

In 1560 Goa was made an archbishopric, and Inquisitors were sent out from Europe, and from this time the work of the Church was carried on with great vigour. The power of the ecclesiastics in the State was well shown soon afterwards, when the tooth of Buddha having come into the possession of the Portuguese during their wars in Pegu they were offered an enormous sum if they would return it. This the Viceroy was anxious to do, but the Archbishop opposing the ransom as an encouragement of idolatry, not only carried his point, but also persuaded the Viceroy to join in a great auto-da-fé, in the course of which the Archbishop publicly pounded up the tooth in a mortar. Not long after this the Franciscan Fathers took possession of the caves of Kánheri and Mandapeshvar,⁵ expelled the jogis who occupied them, and did their best to destroy the sculptures, as at Elphanta, on account of the superstitious feelings of the natives with respect to them.⁶ Over the caves at Mandapeshvar were built a church and the Royal College of Sálsette for the education of the children of the converts, and this received from the King all the endowments which the caves had enjoyed.⁷

received charge of Mandapeshvar, Málim, Bombay, Karanja, Mount Calvary, and Agáshi, in each of which places there was an official called "O Pay dos Christãos" paid by the State.¹ Gradually all power fell into the hands of the ecclesiastics, and the Church was said to have a larger revenue in India than the King himself.² One writer says³ that "Few men can enjoy very peaceable lives who have any fair possessions near the convents of the Jesuits: a pleasant seat and a fruitful plantation can hardly escape their gaining", and another that at the end of the seventeenth century the General of the North at Bassein had both an uneasy and precarious government because of the superintendence of the Church.⁴ Goa was said to equal any city in the world in the number and grandeur of its religious processions.⁵ The Jesuit college there conferred degrees, and while one Englishman at the end of the seventeenth century says that at Bándra their college "was not inferior as to the building nor much unlike those of our universities," and that the Fathers "lived sumptuously, the greater part of the island Sálsette being theirs,"⁶ another about the same time reports the income of the chief church there to be of the value of a pound of gold a day. In 1598 a Father who had come from Europe to visit all the houses and colleges of the Society in India, was received at Bándra with great rejoicing, and entertained with a sham sea fight at the mouth of the river. The Father left four Panjábi converts to be educated at Bándra whom he had fallen in with at Chaul, and then visited the house at Thána, and all the churches in Sálsette (not named), founding the church of St. Cecilia at Ponçar (probably Poisar). He then went on to Bassein where he established a seminary called the College of the Purification, in which noble children, natives of those parts, might be brought up as missionaries. From Bassein he went on direct to Daman, from which the inference seems to be that there were no Jesuit houses between these two places.⁷

When Bombay was made over to the English, the Bándra College claimed much land and various rights in the island,⁸ and these not being acknowledged, the Fathers in 1667 received and assisted a dismissed English officer, who attempted to raise a force for the capture of Bombay.⁹ In 1720 and 1722 there were again disagreements and skirmishes between the English in Bombay and the Portuguese at Bándra, where the Fathers had some great guns mounted.⁴ At Thána in Fryer's time (1673-75) there were seven churches and colleges; at Bassein six churches, four colleges, and two convents.⁶ There was in 1623 no Bishop down the coast nearer than Cochin, all being subject directly to the Archbishop of Goa,¹⁰ but in the account of the district given in 1634 Thána is mentioned as having a cathedral church.¹¹ The Inquisition at Goa had jurisdiction over all countries east of the Cape of Good Hope: it extended its operations all over the Portuguese possessions, and had commissaries at Daman, at Bassein, and doubtless at other large towns.¹ The Grand Inquisitor was appointed by the King and confirmed by the Pope, and had authority over all persons clerical and lay, except the Archbishop, his grand vicar, and the Viceroy : but even these the Inquisition might arrest after advising the Court of Lisbon and receiving orders from the great Council of the Inquisition there.² Thus Dellon³ seems justified in saying that people had much more respect for the great Inquisitor than for the Archbishop or the Viceroy. Pyrard says that the Inquisition in Goa was much more severe than in Portugal, and its administration of justice the most cruel and pitiless in the world. "Sometimes the converts are accused of putting crucifixes under the cushions on which they sit or kneel, sometimes of whipping their images or of not eating pork, or in some other way respecting their old faith, while they outwardly conformed as Christians".⁴ The auto-da-fé at Goa usually took place only once in two or three years, and as this was the only gaol delivery for spiritual offenders that there was, it followed that if any one was arrested soon after an auto-da-fé he had to undergo a long imprisonment, as Dellon had.

Now as to the work of converting the natives, DeCoutto at the end of the sixteenth century speaks of this whole coast "as a great fishing ground for the Fathers of the company," and estimates their converts at 60,000.⁵ As to the extent to which this was assisted by the State it must be noticed that its action was very different under different Viceroys, some of the greatest of whom expressly tolerated and protected the religions of the natives.⁶ Thus Albuquerque endeavoured to conciliate the goodwill of the natives, and to live in friendship with all the Indian princes, most of whom were better pleased to have the Portuguese as governed by him for neighbours than the Moors. So also Nuno da Cunha prohibited the priests from persecuting the Hindus for not being Catholics, and he administered justice to all persons, whether Portuguese Hindus or Moors. But others (and the policy of these eventually prevailed) went as far as they possibly could in destroying the temples of the heathen and even slaughtering the worshippers. In 1546 the King wrote to the Viceroy John de Castro,⁷ complaining that idols were worshipped, not only in other places subject to Portugal but even in Goa itself. He therefore commanded that search should be made and all idols broken to pieces. Any one who should venture to make them was to be severely punished, as well as all who should publicly or ³ Dellon was a French doctor and when living at Daman was arrested by orders of the Inquisition and taken to Goa. privately celebrate any games of a heathen sort, or should help or conceal Bráhmans, "those pestilent enemies of the Christian name." And since it was intolerable that images of Christ or his saints should be made by heathen hands, any person making or selling such was to be fined and to receive two hundred lashes. The Musalmán mosques in the Portuguese territories were to pay tribute to the Church to the amount of Rs. 3000 a year. Converts were to have various privileges, and to be exempt from forced labour on board ship, to which other Indians were liable. His biographer is careful to state that John de Castro did not carry out these orders, not from any want of zeal in the service of God, but because the continual wars in which he was engaged prevented him,¹ but those who prefer it may be allowed to suppose that this great Viceroy thought with Albuquerque and Nuno da Cunha rather than with the clerical party and his royal master. Four or five years later the King communicated to the Pope his intention of founding many colleges for the Society of Jesus, so that the East might be filled with apostolical labourers: and in the meantime ordered all the seminaries established in the Indies for the education of youth to be made over to the society, and all the charges of the missionaries in all their voyages to be defrayed by the Viceroy and the captains of the fortresses.² And in 1555 the then Viceroy, who was near enough to see that his orders were obeyed, prohibited private as well as public temples throughout the territories of Bassein, and also feasts, ceremonies, preaching by Bráhmans, ablutions, and burnings. Houses were to be searched for idols, and if any were found or forbidden practices discovered, the offender was to be sent to the galleys, and all his property forfeited, half to the informer and half to the church. In 1581 new converts were encouraged by a proclamation excusing them from payment of tithes and first-fruits for fifteen years, and at the same time the issue of licenses for the performance of heathen rites and festivals, by which it may be assumed the previous orders had been evaded, was prohibited throughout the Portuguese dominions.

In 1591 the desembargadores and other lawyers were forbidden in the interests of God and the King to have anything to do with Bráhmans or other Hindus in the way of business, even through third persons. The officer offending was to be suspended, and the Hindu compromised to be condemned to the galleys for life.³ In 1594 an order arrived from the Pope and the King to convert the natives by force. This was in fact a general commission to murder and plunder, and the pagodas and temples hitherto respected were now despoiled of their accumulated riches.⁴ In 1600 the "Visitor of the Jesuits already mentioned rejoiced specially over the children of heathen parents snatched from them by the church as roses from among the thorns."⁵ any public practice of their religion," while all the monasteries throughout India were subsidised by the State.¹ Linschotten says that the people of India had liberty of religion, but with these rather large exceptions, that they were not allowed to burn their dead nor to perform marriage ceremonies or other diabolical superstitions (over which the Bishop had supervision,) for fear that scandal might be caused to the converts; so also Musalmáns and Jews might not publicly exercise their religion in the towns under pain of death, but outside the towns might do so.² Dellon says that although the King allowed liberty of conscience, yet the Holy Office interpreted this to mean that heathens might live in their religion but would be punished if caught in the exercise of it.³ Finally after all these Christian writers, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, the Musalmán historian Kháfí Khán may be quoted, who after praising the Portuguese system of government, called it an act of great tyranny that if one of their subjects should die leaving young children only they were considered wards of the State and brought up as Christians, whether they were Syeds or Bráhmans.⁴ And in a recently published work by a Hindu⁵ it is stated that the Portuguese utterly disregarded difference of caste, and exacted the same service from Bráhmans as from Kolis. Several Prabhus were employed in high positions under the Portuguese Government, and even these could only perform their religious duties secretly and by night, while some were forcibly converted to Christianity, whose descendants are still to be found in Sálsette and Bassein.

The jealous and rigorous system of the Portuguese in matters of religion may be pretty well understood from the above extracts. Yet there is one more fact to be noticed which shows in an even stronger light the pressure under which their native subjects lived. It has been already mentioned that the Dominicans sent missionaries to India before the Jesuits did, and it must be noticed that between these two orders there was always a great jealousy, and that while the Jesuits were particularly given to the work of conversion, the work of the Inquisition was chiefly done by the Dominicans. "In India and China the Inquisition and the Jesuits could the less easily agree because their action was entirely different. The Jesuits thought it expedient to pursue a policy of extreme concession, surrendering the distinctive truths of Christianity and keeping out of sight the discipline and ritual of their own church, if they could thereby win over the heathen to their side rather than lead them to Christ. The Inquisitors on the other hand pretended perfect orthodoxy, assumed an air of intense anxiety to preserve the integrity of the Romish faith, and so far as the power of Portugal extended and they could avail themselves of military force, they had the power of life and death in their hands, and could impress the natives with dread, and overawe their own clergy too. Hence it came to pass that not only the Jesuits but the bishops and the priests regarded them with dread and jealousy and appealed to Rome against their violence." In 1673 Clement X. ordered that all Vicars Apostolic and their missionaries in the East were to be altogether free from the jurisdiction of the Inquisition of Goa in those regions which were not under the temporal government of the king of Portugal.¹ But this of course did not touch their power in the Konkan, and it is pretty certain that between the Jesuits who armed with all the power of the State sought to convert the heathen, and the Inquisitors who so carefully guarded the faith of the new converts, the native subjects of the Portuguese must have had a hard time of it. The absence of high-caste Hindus in the Bassein district at the time of its conquest by the Maráthás is ascribed to these severities.² And it is even said that the expulsion of the Portuguese from the Konkan was chiefly due to the tyranny of the Jesuits and the Inquisition.³ It is also a significant fact that the Inquisition in India was abolished by the king of Portugal in 1775, that is just at the time that it was decided to make a great effort for the recovery of the Portuguese power on this coast. But in 1779 the Inquisition was re-established.

The trade in this country was at first, as has already been stated, a royal monopoly. The Portuguese had gradually obliged all trading vessels to take out their passes; but as early as 1570 the Malabár pirates, who Gemelli says⁴ were composed of Moors Gentiles Jews and Christians, began to give trouble,⁵ and a little later the Arabs followed their example, so that after this there were always two fleets sent out from Goa, called the fleet of the North and the fleet of the South,⁶ occupied nominally in protecting the Portuguese ships and possessions from the pirates. In 1598 six small vessels were built and fitted out at Thána and had great success against the pirates.⁷ But the Musalmán historians, and even some European writers,⁸ put the case of the Portuguese and of the so-called pirates in a very different light. They describe the Malabár and Arab mariners as honest traders who only wished to carry on in peace the traffic which their fathers had enjoyed for centuries, but who were constantly harried and plundered by the Portuguese unless they consented to pay them tribute. The free-traders, as they were called, who were generally discharged or deserted Portuguese soldiers,⁹ deprived the natives of even that part of the coasting trade which the Government of Goa had left them, and it is acknowledged by all that these free-traders, like the Interlopers who gave the English East India Company so much trouble,¹⁰ were little, if at all, better than pirates. "They infested every creek on the coast in the double capacity of pirates and merchants," and caused a perpetual petty but sanguinary war. "They seldom scrupled to defraud those who traded with them if they felt themselves strong enough to do it with impunity, and frequently they procured their cargoes entirely by plunder. By such acts of piracy they brought disgrace upon their country and became a principal cause of the downfall of the Portuguese empire in India.¹ The army and other departments of the Government service were deserted for this illicit trade, while Portuguese sailors after coming to India despised any places but those of captain or officer, so that the merchantmen were chiefly manned by Arab and Abyssinian sailors, who were cheap and docile.² Both on account of these inconveniences and for the sake of the profits of the Government monopoly the Portuguese Governors did all they could to put down this private trade, but with little effect. The universal practice of illicit trading, in which all the servants of Government from the Viceroy down to the private soldier indulged,³ was of course another hindrance to the King's Government getting the fair profits of the trade. Linschotten says that even before the end of the sixteenth century all the officials from the Viceroy downwards thought of nothing but enriching themselves, and he ascribes this in great measure to the fact that all appointments were held for three years only.⁴ The result of all this was that in 1586 the monopoly of the trade was made over by Government to the Portuguese East India Company. But the private trade was never stopped.⁵

Up to 1565 the chief trade of the Portuguese was with the kingdom of Bijnagar or Vijayanagar. They took horses, velvets, and satins there and brought back linens and muslins, which were sent to Europe by way of Ormuz as well as round the Cape.⁶ John de Castro made a treaty with Bijnagar in 1547 for mutual defence against Bijápúr, and in this there were many stipulations as to trade. Besides the articles given above coral and silk from China and Ormuz are mentioned in this treaty as being taken to Bijnagar, and saltpetre and iron as coming from there. The fall of Bijnagar therefore is mentioned as a calamity to the Portuguese, but it is not stated why no effort was made to save the kingdom.

The exports of Chaul were indigo, opium, cotton, silk of every sort, with great store of iron and corn; and the imports came from Mecca and China as well as from Europe.⁷ Ships laden with fine stuffs used to come to Goa from Sindh.⁸ But with the seventeenth century the European rivals of the Portuguese began to trouble them as well as the Malabár and Arab pirates. In 1615 the chief points in the treaty made between the Emperor Jahángir and the Portuguese expressed their mutual enmity to the English and Dutch and the necessity of destroying the Malabár pirates.⁹ The entry of other Europeans into the Indian seas was looked on as so much of a calamity that De la Valle¹ calls it one of the signs of the decay of the Portuguese that English and Dutch ships frequent the ports of Dábhól Chaul and Bassein without hindrance and without acknowledging the Portuguese supremacy, though the latter still prevented native vessels from sailing in these seas without their permission.² So late as 1624 no one could go to Europe by way of Persia and Turkey without obtaining leave from the authorities of Goa.¹

The Dutch found it easier to conquer the Portuguese on the Malabár coast than to make new settlements for themselves, and they were everywhere assisted by the hatred which the natives now had for the Portuguese. The Dutch blockaded Goa from 1639 to 1642, and in the last-mentioned year took some ships trying to enter the port.³ A cessation of arms for ten years had been concluded in Europe between the Portuguese and Dutch in 1641, and this extended to Asia in the following year, but in 1649 the war was again going on. The Dutch had built a fortified factory at Vengurla previous to 1641.⁴ But it does not appear that they ever cared much about establishing themselves in the Konkan, as at that time they refused an invitation from the king of Bijápur to winter their ships in Dábhól, Ortzery (A'chra?), or other of his harbours.⁵ They were however for many years the strongest of the European powers in the East, and in 1660 their fleet was again blockading the harbour of Goa, but could not get close enough to take it.⁶ In 1661 when Bombay was ceded to England the object was said to be that King Charles might be "better able to assist and protect the subjects of the King of Portugal in those parts from the power and invasion of the States of the United Provinces."⁶ But it does not appear that any thing was ever done to carry this into effect, probably because when the English troops came to take possession, a dispute arose as to whether Sálsette was or was not included in the cession.⁷ This so-called claim of the English may have influenced them as long as the Portuguese were in possession, for as early as 1686 the conquest of Salsette was proposed on a sufficient force coming from England, and the same course was suggested from home, and apparently only abandoned from doubts as to the complications that might ensue.¹ It must be evident that after the European trade with India had been turned into the route of the Cape of Good Hope the Malabár ports were of far greater value than those of the Konkan or Gujarát, which had their day when the line of traffic was by the Persian gulf and the Red Sea. The capture of Ormuz by the English in 1622 and of Cochin by the Dutch in 1663 deprived the Portuguese of commercial superiority and prestige on both routes, and in 1664 when peace was concluded the claim of the Portuguese to the monopoly of the trade was finally abandoned.² The Dutch gradually succumbed to the English, and never made any other settlement in the Konkan than Vengurla, though they are said in the eighteenth century to have greatly wished to establish a factory at Bassein.³

Her guards who had conducted her eighty leagues were 4000 cavalry with long coats of mail, the shoulders whereof were embroidered with serpents' heads like the ancient Romans, they had bright polished helmets, were armed with bows and arrows, wore long beards, and were mounted on very fine Persian horses. On each side of every man of quality who attended her was a footman holding the bridle: the queen and all her ladies were carried in close litters concealed from public view, and they were preceded by several camels covered with rich furniture, on one whereof was mounted a kettle drummer, who performed with great dexterity. The Commodore and the Director of the Dutch East India Company met her two leagues from the town, in which while she stayed she dictated to her Secretaries in several different languages. There was a magnificent tent erected for her on the sea-shore, the passage from whence to the shallop which was to carry her on board the yacht was covered with calico." Nieuhoff in Knox, II. 452. Vengurla is described as a large village on the sea-shore where most ships for Persia are obliged to touch for wood and water. This is to be understood of Dutch ships.

One cause of the decline of the Portuguese power remains to be mentioned, the indifference of the kings of Portugal, and the small value they set on their Eastern possessions. This was due partly to their thinking so much more of their Brazilian colonies and partly to the Indian settlements being so expensive. Their disregard of this country was particularly great during the subjection of Portugal to Spain,⁴ when the Court of Madrid ordered that to meet the expenses of Government all employments and offices in India should be sold publicly to the highest bidder. On the restoration of the national dynasty of Portugal in 1640 more interest began to be shown in the Indian colonies,⁵ but the Dutch were by this time too strong to be opposed, and the English after the civil war soon became so. By the end of the century India was again neglected, and so remained till the catastrophe of 1739.

This sketch of the Portuguese Government of the Konkan has rather exceeded the proper limits, but the subject is an interesting one, and no connected account of it can be got from books readily obtainable. It only remains to add that the Portuguese during the period of their supremacy and for many years afterwards lived in India with considerable magnificence. Fryer speaks of the "stately aldeas and dwellings on both sides of the Thána creek, and the delicate country mansions of the Fidalgos who all over the island live like petty monarchs." The mansion of John de Mello, three miles from Thána, was "curiously built with a terraced descent and walks and gardens extending half a mile down to a stately banqueting house over the water with stone steps for landing." And a mile further stood "Grebondel, a large neat built town of Martin Alfonso's, with his house fort and church of as stately architecture as India can afford, he being the richest Don on this side Goa." The Fidalgos at Bassein had "stately dwellings graced with covered balconies and large windows two stories high with panes of oyster shell or latticed."¹ Gemelli speaks of the pleasure-houses of the Portuguese gentry near Bassein in the same way.² Of these lordly mansions there is now nothing to be seen but a few ruined walls, though foundations may here and there be traced of sufficient extent to prove the truth of these accounts.

The chief remains of the Portuguese are at Bassein and lower Chaul, now known by its old Hindu name of Revdanda. These are large walled towns, but the fortifications generally have little appearance of strength. At Bassein the line of the streets can be traced, and many lofty buildings, principally churches, remain. These are "of considerable size but mean architecture, though they are striking from the lofty proportions usual in Roman Catholic places of worship, and from the singularity of Christian and European ruins in India."³ There is now a high road through the middle of the city which prevents it from being utterly desolate; on the north side there is a large space without any ruins, owing no doubt to the plague which towards the end of the seventeenth century is said to have unpeopled one-third of the city on that side.² The ruins of Revdanda are similar but on a smaller scale, and from the space within the walls being entirely occupied by cocoanut gardens they can be seen less favourably than the Bassein ruins. The main walls are nearly entire, those on the north side being far the strongest, and having been protected, in its whole length apparently, by an outwork which has now mostly fallen into the sea. The present main entrance facing nearly south and with the citadel just inside it is probably the original entrance.⁴

All over Sálsette and in the neighbourhood of Bassein are parish churches still in use; but though some of these, for instance those of Thána and Remedi near Bassein (originally Nossa Senhora dos Remedios),⁵ are large and respectable, and appear to be in the same state as when first built, there is nothing very striking in any of them. Deserted churches and convents more or less ruined are found at many places, especially in Sálsette. The ruins at Marol have been already mentioned.⁶ At Mándvi on the Vaitarna there is a picturesque ruin of a conventual building, and at Yerangal, ten miles north of Bándra, a large church stands in a very pretty little bay close to the sea but distant from anything like a town. This is dedicated to St. Bonaventura, and is still used on the feast of the Epiphany. The outline of the church at Kelva-Máhim is now barely traceable, but the buildings there were certainly of considerable size. These convents were very frequently either themselves fortified as that at Yerangal or built close to a fort: thus the College at Bándra had "seven guns mounted in front of it and a good store of small arms,"¹ and took toll from all vessels going up the creek.² The greatest in extent of these ecclesiastical ruins is at Mandapeshvar or Mont Pezier already described, and this part of Sálsette must have been a favourite one, as within a mile of this there were the two large churches of Mágáthan and Poisar standing within a stone's throw of each other, and within four miles on the other side is Ghodbandar. The buildings at this delightful place included a fort, a monastery, and a large church. The latter, dedicated to St. John,³ is the present bungalow, but many of its features make it appear to have been originally a Musalmán rather than a Christian building.

There are two forts which show that the Portuguese were scarcely inferior in the art of fort-building to the Maráthás. One of these is Thána, the size and strength of which can still be seen after all the alterations it has undergone, and which seems to owe nothing to the Maráthás. The other is the fort of Korlai opposite to Chaul, which is perhaps the most interesting of any Portuguese building remaining in the Konkan. The plan, however, which is very striking and unlike anything else in the district, is Musalmán,⁴ the Portuguese having destroyed the first fortress and afterwards rebuilt it on the same plan. It stands on a very narrow ridge which stretches far across the mouth of the river, and which is completely surrounded by a strong wall. Inside this are two walls crossing the ridge at the top, and as each was strongly protected by towers and bastions there were virtually three fortresses. On the north side the hill slopes gently down to the water's edge, and this slope, being enclosed like the rest of the hill by the fortified wall, formed a broad way, which also was crossed by walls and bastions and ended at the bottom in a wide level space. Here apparently were the quarters of the garrison and a strong battery commanding the entrance of the river. On the most prominent point of this stood a large cross, and the bastions and gateways all over the fort were dedicated to saints whose names are engraved on them.

There were numbers of other forts all along the coast, of which Tárápur and Dáhánu appear to have been the chief. Others may be traced which were little more than fortified outposts. At the time of the expulsion of the Portuguese, Bándra and Vesáva (probably Madh) were the most important forts in Sálsette after Thána.⁵ Scarcely anything remains of the fortifications at Bándra, and Vesáva appears to have been so rebuilt and enlarged by the Maráthás that it is difficult to trace the Portuguese work. Finally there are a number of round watch-towers on promontories and rocky islands, the use of which is said to have been to give notice of the approach of Arab pirates. The most southerly of these which is on a small rocky island with four palmyra trees towering above it, is visible from Malabár Hill on a clear day.

THE state of the powers who ruled the Konkan in the middle of the seventeenth century may be thus described. The Portuguese had lost their prestige, and could scarcely hope ever to regain it. The Bijápur kings had seen and profited by the fall of their ancient rivals of Ahmádnagar, but had now begun to feel the power of the Emperors of Delhi. In the north the Jawhár state and in the south the Maráthás of Sávantvádi had become stronger through the weakness of the greater powers, and there were no doubt other and less important Hindu chiefs who still exercised local authority. It was under these circumstances that the founder of the Marátha empire arose. Under him the Konkan attained its greatest importance and we have in his time more historical mention of the province than at any other, for, though not a Konkani himself, he soon found that the wild and strong country just above and below the Gháts was the best field for his operations.

In Section III. mention has been made of the raids of Sháhji Bhonsla in the Konkan and of Shiváji his famous son. It was in 1648, when he was little more than twenty, that Shiváji extended his operations to the Konkan.¹ He at first avoided those parts which were in the possession of the Moghals, but as the whole of the Konkan south of Kalyán was at this time subject to Bijápur there was abundant room for his energy. And he began operations in that part which having until a few years before belonged to Ahmádnagar and having then for some years been overrun by his father² was probably held less firmly than the rest of the Bijápur possessions. At the very beginning he appears to have surprised Ráiri, which was afterwards his capital under the name of Ráygad, and after plundering other towns he got possession of Kalyán, and immediately began to arrange for the revenue management of the province as if he meant to keep it. The first forts in the Konkan which he built were Bírvádí and Lingána, both near Ráygad. He seems to have kept possession of what he had gained by playing off the Moghals against Bijápur, and he lived for four or five years in comparative quiet, spending much of his time at Mahád. In 1656 he built the fort of Pratápgad and thus by gaining command of the pass leading from the Dakhan to Mahád he secured to himself the means of safely retreating to the Konkan whenever he might find the Dakhan too hot to hold him. In 1658 he got permission from Aurangzeb to take possession of the whole Konkan, and the first use he made of this was to occupy some of the neglected strongholds of the coast, and to invade the Sidi's districts.¹ But now as afterwards the conquest of the Sidi was too great a task for his power. The Sávants were of the Bhonsla family as Shiváji was, and were anciently known as the Sardesáis of Kudál, under which title they entered into engagements and treaties with the Bombay Government as late as 1838.¹ At this time they made a temporary alliance with Shiváji, but soon afterwards returned to their fealty to Bijápur.²

In 1660, after the murder of Afzul Khán, Shiváji carried the war into the oldest of the Bijápur possessions by plundering Rájápur and burning Dábhól; and the three powers of the Southern Konkan—Bijápur, the Sidi, and the Sávants—then united against the invader. Early in the following year, 1661, Shiváji again plundered Rájápur and captured Dánda-Rájápur, though neither now or at any subsequent period did he succeed against Janjira. He was however to a great extent successful during this campaign and the Sávants having submitted to him,³ that part of the Konkan south of Sálshi Mahál (that is the whole of the present Málvan sub-division and a part of the Vádi districts) was left under their exclusive management, and the revenue system there remained unchanged.³ At this time Shiváji caused a survey to be made of the coast, and having fixed on Málvan as the best protection for his vessels and the likeliest place for a stronghold, he built forts there, rebuilt and strengthened Suvarndurg, Ratnágiri, Jaygad, Anjanvel, Vijaydurg, and Kolába, and prepared vessels at all these places. But in the meantime the Moghals had taken Kalyán, and Shiváji did not then find it convenient to oppose them or to attempt to retake it. His position in the Southern Konkan was now however very strong, and he removed his capital to Ráiri, henceforward to be called Ráygad, and for some years after this bestowed much labour both on the fortifications and the public buildings of that mountain, which Grant Duff calls the Gibraltar of the East.⁴

In 1663 little was done in the Konkan till late in the year, when Shiváji collected a force near Kalyán and another near Dánda-Rájápur.⁶ Four thousand horse from Kalyán marched secretly to Surat, and after plundering it brought the booty to Ráygad.⁷ In the following year, 1664, the Bijápur troops made a strong attempt to recover the southern part of the Konkan, but Shiváji came upon them suddenly, and completely defeated them. He burnt Vengurla which he believed to be hostile to him, and then collecting a fleet at Málvan made a plundering expedition as far as Barcelor. This was remarkable as the only maritime expedition in which

Shivaji himself took part, and perhaps the adverse winds which delayed him on his return, as they usually do all voyagers up the coast during the latter part of the cold weather, had something to do with his not repeating the experience. Immediately after his return to Ráygad a most formidable Moghal force attacked his possessions in the Dakhan, and Shivaji, having resolved to yield, left Ráygad and went up the Gháts. There he gave up all the forts and territory he had taken from the Moghals, but some were returned to him, and his possession of the South Konkan was not interfered with. He did not return to Ráygad till December 1666, having in the interval been to and escaped from Delhi.¹ During his absence, Annaji Dattu, who was deshpándya of Sangameshvar, had charge of the Dábhól subha, Moro Pingla the Peshwa of Rájपुरi and Ráygad, and A'baji Soudev of the Kalyán province.² On his return Shivaji immediately recommenced hostilities against the Moghals, who were once more and very speedily driven out of the greater part of the province of Kalyán, the forts being occupied and repaired by Shivaji's troops. In 1668 he attempted to complete his power in the Southern Konkan by the conquest of Goa and Janjira, but was unsuccessful in both attempts.¹ Soon afterwards he visited Málvan, and built the Sarjekot fort commanding a river two miles north of Málvan, which was then navigable for some distance.³

The Moghals had continued to hold the ports of Máhuli and Karnála, two of the most famous in the Konkan; but in 1670 when after nearly three years' truce open hostilities again broke out, these two forts were besieged, and the latter taken without much trouble. At Máhuli however Moro Pant was at first repulsed with a loss, it is said, of a thousand men, but after a second repulse and a siege of two months the place surrendered, and the whole province of Kalyán was taken before the rains.⁴ During this time proceedings were going on in the Konkan with a view to the capture of Janjira. The historian Kháfi Khán was then in that district and has given a long account of what took place, but it need only here be said that Shivaji was himself present in this year, and that Fateh Khán the Sidi who was in the Bijápur interest, abandoned Dánda-Rájápur and took refuge in Janjira, and was willing to surrender even that. But three of the other Sidis prevented this, and having deposed Fateh Khán put themselves and the state under the protection of the Moghals. Khán Jahán the Imperial general sent ships to assist them, and during this year and the next there were frequent naval fights between these and Shivaji's fleet, in which the Moghals and Abyssinians were often victorious.⁵ At the end of 1670 Shivaji sent a large fleet up the coast, of which the Portuguese captured twelve vessels and took them into Bassein. The Marátha fleet, however, took a large Portuguese ship and brought her in triumph to Dábhól.⁶ The Sidis were now as anxious to take Dánda-Rájápur as Shivaji was to get

Janjira, and on one occasion, apparently the Holi of 1672, took advantage of Shiváji's absence to land and destroy the fortifications. At the same time the Sidi took several forts in the neighbourhood, one of which held out for a week, after which it surrendered on the promise of quarter. But when seven hundred people had come out the Sidi put the men to death, made slaves of the children and pretty women, and released only the old and ugly. For these services he was well rewarded by the Emperor.¹ While this was going on Shiváji twice brought troops down from Ráygad to retaliate, and sent a force under Moro Pandit to burn the Moghal ships at Surat, but in this he did not succeed.² He however took possession of various places (in the Bassein and Dahánu sub-divisions apparently) which had hitherto belonged to Koli Rájás. He made an attempt on the fort at Ghodbandar, then with the rest of Sálsette belonging to the Portuguese, but was repulsed.³ In November 1672 he marched from Ráygad with ten thousand men, levied a large contribution from the Dakhan, and returned to Ráygad without interruption.⁴

In 1673 the Sidi's fleet blockaded the Karanja river, and built a small fort to command its mouth.⁵ In October the troops from the Sidi's and the Moghal's ships landed in the Nágothna river, laid the villages waste with great cruelty, and carried away many of the inhabitants as slaves, but troops arrived unexpectedly from Ráygad and inflicted a defeat on the Sidi.⁶ Shiváji in April 1674 returned to Ráygad, and in June was crowned there with great pomp.⁷ After the rains Moro Pandit came down to Kalyán with 10,000 men, and sent to Bassein to demand chauth from the Portuguese. At the same time a fleet from Muskat appeared before Bassein and landed 600 Arabs, who plundered villages and churches and behaved with great cruelty, the garrison of Bassein not attempting to molest them. At the end of the year Shiváji with reinforcements having joined Moro Pant, the whole army marched up the Gháts towards Junnar, but after ravaging the country they returned to Ráygad in February 1675.⁸

The siege of Janjira was continued as it had been every year since 1661,⁹ and an expedition at the same time went against Phonda on the Goa frontier, and on his way there Shiváji visited Rájápur, where he kept great quantities of warlike stores. After the rains of 1675 a large Moghal fleet came from Surat to Bombay and proceeded down the coast as far as Vengurla, which they burnt. By this time Shiváji's fleet, now increased to fifty-seven sail, was considered fit to meet the Moghal's, and it put to sea from Vijaydurg and Rájápur, but did not fall in with the enemy. A Moghal force at the same time came down to Kalyán, and threatened the districts south of Bombay, but soon after returned above the Gháts. On this Shiváji's troops returned to Kalyán, and began to build a fort near Sárván on the Vaitarna river, within the territory of the Portuguese, who of course resented the encroachment, but ineffectually.¹ From the end of 1675 to July 1676 Shiváji was at Sátára or Ráygad,² and this is stated to have been the longest rest of his life. He then made a rapid excursion to the Dakhan and returned with his plunder to Ráygad in September, but immediately afterwards set off with a still larger force on his expedition to the Karnáta. From this he did not return to the Konkan till April 1678,³ and in the meantime Annáji Datta, the Pant Sachiv, was left in charge of the Konkan from Kalyán to Phonda,⁴ and he, besides appointing officers to every district, is said to have made a survey and assessment of the land on fair and equitable principles.⁵

The usual operations on the coast were continued notwithstanding Shiváji's absence. Moro Pant took 10,000 men against Janjira in August, and in October Sidi Sambhal set out on a cruise of retaliation. He burnt Jaytápur at the mouth of the Rájápur river in December 1676, but Rájápur itself was too well defended to be attacked, and in the meantime Moro Pant's attack on Janjira had been beaten off. In the following season, 1677-78, the Sidi's fleet plundered on the coast as usual, and finding little other pillage carried off numbers of the inhabitants as slaves. In revenge for this Shiváji on his return to the Konkan sent down ships and men in July 1678 to Panvel in order to burn the Musalmán fleets then in Bombay harbour, but not being able to get boats to cross they went up to Kalyán with the intention of passing by Thána into Bombay. This alarmed all parties, and the Portuguese Governor of the Bassein district anchored forty armed boats off Thána, which prevented any attempt being made there. The Maráthás thus baffled burnt some Portuguese villages, but were soon recalled to Ráygad. This complication was followed by a rupture between Shiváji's subhedár of Chaul and the Bombay Government, for the subhedár seized thirty Bombay boats in the Panvel and Nágothna rivers, most of which were retaken by some Europeans from Bombay. Shiváji however did not find it convenient to support his officer. While this had been going on, an attack on a larger scale than usual had been in progress at Janjira, but with the usual want of success.⁶

Early in 1679 Sambháji deserted his father's cause and leaving Ráygad joined Sultán Mauzim, Aurungzeb's son, at Aurangabad.⁷ In return Shiváji ravaged the Musalmán territories up to near Surat. He also in the middle of the rains took possession of Khánderi or Kennery, which until now had been uninhabited, and fortified it, on which both the English and the Portuguese claimed the island.¹ On October 15 Daulat Khán, Shiváji's Musalmán admiral, brought his fleet to engage the English vessels which were watching Khánderi. The Revenge a sixteen-gun frigate, beat them off singlehanded, and they sailed off to the Nágothna river. Boats and troops however managed to get over to Khánderi a few at a time, notwithstanding the watch kept by the English vessels, and 5000 of Shiváji's troops came down to Kalyán to be ready to take advantage of any opening. The Sidi was now in open alliance with the English, as he had been in reality though in rather an arrogant way for several years: but after working with them for some time in the blockade of Khánderi he in January 1680 suddenly and secretly took possession of the neighbouring island of Underi or Hennery and began to fortify it, a proceeding which was scarcely more agreeable to his allies than to his enemies. Two engagements between the Sidi and Daulat Khán's ships followed, in the last of which the Maráthás lost 500 men, and were so much damaged that they sailed away to Rájápur to refit. The Sidi then sailed up the Panvel river, and burnt and pillaged without mercy. The English however now made a treaty with Shiváji, and being heartily tired of the Sidi's alliance, agreed to exclude him from Bombay harbour for the future.² This, as far as this district is concerned, may be considered the last event of Shiváji's life. After returning from an expedition into the Dakhan he died at Ráygad on April 5, 1680.³ It cannot of course be supposed that the general condition of the Konkan during the reign of Shiváji was prosperous according to our present understanding of the word. Fryer⁴ speaks of both Kalyán and Chaul as utterly ruined in 1672, the Moghals having been expelled from both at the time of his visit. Dáhol had been burnt so often since 1508 that but little could have been left in Shiváji's time, and it is then described as much ruined by the wars and decrease in trade.⁵ A curious proof of its desolation is that, a few years after this, this once great city was granted to the Shirké family.⁶ There would thus remain of the old marts of the Konkan only Bassein in the north, and this, as has been shown was gradually declining, and Rájápur in the south, which Baldaens⁷ calls one of the cities of note of the Bijápur kingdom, and which alone of the older towns had prospered under Shiváji. On the other hand Mahád had no doubt increased and flourished from its neighbourhood to Ráygad, and Ráygad itself was of course a small centre of prosperity. At the same time it is clear from what has gone before, that the great ravages of war had fallen on the district between Kalyán and Ráygad. The coast of the Northern Konkan had felt them but little; but on the other hand the Portuguese could no longer pretend to be a match for the Arab pirates.

In the Southern Konkan, except on the coast where alone Shiváji was much opposed, there was perhaps not much to complain of. His revenue system was a great improvement on any that had been previously known in the Konkan, the cultivators were protected, and all classes of the population, except perhaps the outcastes, had the opportunity of entering and rising in the military service. The Hetkaris¹ (Maráthás from Málvan) had very early been among Shiváji's favourite troops, and the Maráthás all along the Gháts, or Mávalis as they were then called, have always been inclined to military service. Besides this, the establishment of the Gadkaris,² or sepoys holding land round the forts on condition of serving in them when necessary, must have provided for a considerable proportion of the population in a district where forts were so numerous. And the mere re-building of the great forts on the coast must have given subsistence at least to great numbers and for many years. Shiváji's system of government and revenue administration is described at length by Grant Duff,³ and must have been more systematic than any thing that the Konkan had known previously. The Musalmán historian Kháfi Khán, who, as already mentioned, spent some time in the Konkan, abuses Shiváji as an infidel and a rebel, and is particularly proud of a chronogram which he made on the date of his death, "Káfir bajahannam raft," that is "the infidel goes to hell." But he says in favour that he always strove to maintain the honour of the people in his territories: he persevered in rebellion, in plundering caravans, and in troubling mankind, but entirely abstained from other disgraceful acts, and was particularly careful as to the honour of the women who fell into his hands, and would not allow any dishonour to be done to mosques or to the Korán. In short this historian dignifies him with the title of a wise man.⁴ It is necessary to remember the cruelties and hardships which the Portuguese in the name of religion and civilization had inflicted on the inhabitants of the Konkan, and the atrocities of the Musalmáns during their wars with Shiváji, and in particular the death which Aurungzeb himself inflicted on Shiváji's son and successor. In view of these things we certainly cannot say that Shiváji, barbarian as he was in many respects and without pretence to culture of any sort, was the inferior of those of his contemporaries either Christian or Musalmán, with whom he was brought in contact on this coast. And altogether it is possible to believe that notwithstanding "the clamour of continual war," the greater part of the Konkan in his time enjoyed more prosperity than at most periods of its history.

The great forts, both on the coast of the Southern Konkan and inland, are so entirely associated with Shiváji that this seems the most fitting place to describe them. There is scarcely an instance of one of these standing on level and open ground: they are all built on some natural post of advantage. If on the coast, on a cliff or a spit of land more than half surrounded by the sea; if in the low country, on some steep hill commanding a river or a pass; if on the Gháts, on some projecting spur or rock, or above a great natural scarp. The construction of all is on the same principle, the whole top of the hill or the end of the promontory is surrounded by a wall relieved by numerous bastions. If there is any slope or place likely to invite approach, an outwork is projected and connected with the main fort by a passage between a double wall. There is seldom more than one entrance to the fort, and this is generally the strongest part and the most noticeable. The outer gateway is thrown forward and protected by a bastion on each side and often by a tower above; entering this a narrow passage winding between two high walls leads to the inner gate, which is in the face of the main wall, and defended by bastions which command the approach. This arrangement in a time when guns could not compete with stone walls rendered the approach to the gates very hazardous. Inside the main wall there was generally an inner fortress or citadel, and surrounding this were the various buildings required for the accommodation of the troops, and also magazines tanks and wells. In many of the greater forts living houses for the commandant or massive round towers were built upon the wall of the main works on the least accessible side. The larger forts had generally a town or petha clustered about the base of the hill on which the fort stood. Finally may be mentioned, as one of the invariable features of Shiváji's forts, a small shrine with an image of Hanumán the monkey god, standing just inside the main gate.

This general plan was of course subject to many modifications, due to the greater or less size of the site and also to the consideration of the fort being required only as a place of arms or also as the residence of a chief. The greatest forts answered both purposes, and perhaps Vijaydurg is the most perfect example of a great coast fortress, which was also as much of a palace as the Marátha chiefs allowed themselves. This stands on a spit of land projecting into the broad estuary of a noble river, and communication with the continent was cut off by a ditch which extended across the spit. The outer walls are washed by the sea round the greatest part of their extent, and wherever that is not the case out-works are thrown forward down to the shore. The citadel is of great size, and the walls both of it and of the main works are immensely massive and lofty, and thus looking up from the landing place a triple line of most formidable defences is seen. On one side a great round tower and other buildings rise from the highest part of the main wall, and from these the view is lovely and varied. In front the open sea, on one side the broad estuary, and on the other one of those little coves of white sand bounded by black rocky promontories which are so common through the Southern Konkan. Behind the river stretches away to the blue line of the distant Gháts.

"Broad, massive, high, and stretching far,
And held impregnable in war"

Shivaji.

The island forts or Janjiras deserve separate notice. Suvarndurg (the fort of gold) is perhaps the most striking, as the walls remarkable for their loftiness seem to rise straight out of the sea, and are now so well covered with trees and shrubs as to be very picturesque. But the forts of Málvan are in other respects more interesting. They consist of a fort on the mainland and two fortified islands about a quarter of a mile from the shore lying in a bay which is so studded with rocks and reefs that at low water it looks as if nothing larger than a rowing boat could enter. The largest of these islands, Sindhudurg (the ocean fort), is of considerable extent, but being no more than a sand-bank and the walls neither massive nor very lofty, it is not so striking as Suvarndurg. The fort seems to have been very full of buildings, and though there is no record of Shiváji ever having spent any long time there, it is impossible to resist the belief that he meant it, partly at least, as a place of refuge in case he should ever be too hard pressed to be safe on the mainland.¹ He is said to have worked at the walls of this fort himself, and what is called a print of his hand and foot in the stone is shown and revered. He himself is enshrined in a temple as a deity or an avatár according to the taste of the worshipper, and the idol which represents him has a silver mask for common use and a gold one for festivals, both bearing the semblance of an ordinary Marátha face. The second island is called Padmagad, and is said to have contained Shiváji's ship-building establishments. This is now the most pleasing point in the scene, being half reef and half sand-bank and adorned with ruins and cocoanut trees just sufficient to make it picturesque.

The only entrance to the bay at Málvan is by a narrow channel through the rocks, and the passage from the land to the island is equally intricate. From the landing place the approach to the fort is even narrower than usual, and altogether the choice of this place in preference to the many good bays and harbours all about seems to prove that a convenient naval station was not the chief object. But it would seem that Shiváji's idea of a good harbour was a place that could not easily be got into, for Kolába, which Grant Duff says was his naval head-quarters previous to his fixing on Málvan, is nearly as much hemmed in by rocks and reefs as the latter, and much more so than any other port south of Bombay. And when it is considered that he might have chosen Vijaydurg with its noble river, easy entrance and safe anchorage, or Jaygad being similar in position and but little inferior in advantages, or Devgad with a narrow but safe channel opening into a large and perfectly land-locked harbour with deeper water than any of Shiváji's ships could ever have required, the preference shown to Málvan and Kolába seems only to be explained as above.

Of the inland fortresses it seems unnecessary to give any particular description, since though many of these, as Ráygad and Vishálgad, are both grand and celebrated, they do not differ much from hill-forts in the Dakhan and other parts of the country.

ON the death of Shiváji there was for some months every prospect of a war between the adherents of his two sons. Rajarám, the younger, was at Ráygad, and the army there and in the neighbourhood was greatly strengthened in his interest. Sambháji was at Panhála, and the conspiracy against him at first seemed formidable and Phond Sávant took the opportunity of recovering the territory south of the Karlai river. But by the end of June the opposition had lost all its strength, and Sambháji escorted by 5000 horse entered Ráygad in July. He there punished with great rigour those who had led the opposition against him, and Annáji Dattu, the late governor of the Konkan, was one of the first who was imprisoned, and soon afterwards put to death.¹ His place was taken by the notorious Kalusha, who having at first put additional cesses and exactions on the mild and equal assessment which Annáji Dattu had imposed, eventually displaced the regular revenue officers and farmed out the districts.² The struggle between Sambháji and the Sidi for the possession of the islands of Underi and Khánderi was renewed but without any decided result, and the fleets did little more than threaten one another.¹ The English were equally anxious to get rid of both parties, but were not able. In May 1681 Sultán Akbar, the fourth son of Aurangzeb, having been in rebellion against his father, fled with 400 Rajputs to Sambháji, and arrived at Páli³ near Nágothna on July 1st, where he remained and was treated with great respect till Sambháji came down in September, and they returned together to Ráygad.⁴ Sambháji gave him a house three kos from Ráygad and a fixed allowance but after a time began to treat him with less respect.⁵ This alliance increased Aurangzeb's hostility to the Maráthás, and his ships were again ordered to ravage the coast. In July 4000 of Sambháji's troops had come from Ráygad to Nágothna, and from there made an attack on Underi, but were beaten off, and the Sidi retaliated as usual on the inhabitants of the opposite coast. In particular the town of Apta was burnt as it had been in 1673.⁴ In January 1682 Sultán Akbar accompanied Sambhaji to the siege of Janjira, which was carried on this year on an unusual scale, the fortifications first being levelled by cannonading, and the arduous work of filling up the channel between the mainland and the island then entered on.¹ The siege was continued till August, and then abandoned after a storming party had been repulsed with a loss of 200 men²; but Sambhaji had been called away in February by a raid of the Moghals in the Kalyán district, 20,000 horse and 15,000 foot having come down the Gháts from Junnar. These he successfully opposed with a large army, and he also this year built the fort of Belápur³ to protect that neighbourhood from the irruptions of the Sidis. But the latter who again kept their ships during the rains in Bombay harbour, made raids into the Marátha territory even as far as Mahád, and Sambhaji's fleet at Nágothna and Khánderi could do little. In October the fleets of Sambhaji and the Sidi were engaged in Bombay harbour, and the Maráthás, who on this occasion were also commanded by a Sidi, were defeated after a fight of four hours, on which Sambhaji plundered a few Portuguese villages in disgust and prepared to fortify Elephanta.⁴

In the beginning of 1683 the Company's ship President on her voyage up the coast was attacked off the Sangameshvar river by some Arab vessels which were afterwards found to be in Sambhaji's pay. The President lost eleven men killed and thirty-five wounded. The Moghals this year again ravaged the country about Kalyán and the war between Sambhaji and the Portuguese was carried on with great vigour on both sides. Sambhaji in June brought 30,000 men to besiege Chaul, but was repulsed. He however succeeded in taking Karanja where the Portuguese had some vessels and he destroyed some places on the coast north of Bassein.⁵ The Viceroy invaded the Marátha territories, but had to retreat with loss, and the Portuguese were fallen so low as to be obliged to make overtures for peace, which however were not successful. At this time Sultán Akbar went to the Dutch factory at Vengurla with the intention of leaving the country, but was prevailed on to return.⁶

The Northern Konkan again suffered in 1684, when Bahádur Khán Raunmast entered the Konkan by the pass of Mhajah (Mándha?), and shortly afterwards Aurangzeb sent his son Sultán Mauzim (afterwards the Emperor Bahádur Sháh) with a larger army, said by Orme to have numbered 40,000 cavalry, to subdue the fortresses on the coast. Sultán Mauzim was accompanied by his son Muizuddin, and came down the Ambadári Ghát, and finding the province of Kalyán already ravaged, passed on to the neighbourhood of Ráygad, and is said to have plundered and burnt the villages from there to Vengurla.⁷ This town he sacked as a punishment for its former protection of Sultán Akbar, but the Dutch successfully defended themselves in their fortified factory.¹ This was one of the greatest military expeditions ever made in the Southern Konkan, and was on too large a scale for Sambhaji to resist: so after putting garrisons into the forts he retired to Vishalgad with Sultán Akbar and watched his opportunity. The country no doubt suffered very severely. The Moghals however made no attempt on the hill-forts, and by the time they got near Goa they had, although unopposed, lost almost the whole of their horses and cattle, and even the men began to suffer from scarcity. The Maráthás then came down on them and harassed their retreat. "The enemy swarmed around on every side and cut off the supplies. On one side was the sea and on two other sides mountains full of poisonous trees and serpents. The enemy cut down the grass which caused great distress to man and beast. They had no food but cocoanuts and the grain called kudu, which acted like poison upon them."² Numbers of vessels containing supplies for the Moghals were sent off from Surat, but most of them were taken by the Marátha cruisers, and at last Sultán Mauzim was obliged to retreat with the remainder of his force up the Amba Ghát. In the meantime Sháhábuddin Khán had brought a force nearly as far as Ráygad, and defeated Sambhaji in an unimportant action at Nizámpur,³ after which he returned to the Dakhan.⁴ The country being thus abandoned, Sambhaji took possession of it without opposition and returned to Ráygad. After the rains the Portuguese re-took Karanja and also the hills of Santa Cruz and Asheri.⁵ Sultán Akbar and Sambhaji came to Kalyán, and after ravaging the Portuguese territory invested Bassein,⁶ but were called away by a reported invasion of the Musalmáns. The chances of war on land appear thus to have fallen pretty equally, but Sambhaji's ships at Rájápur were at this time more than a match for the Goa fleet.⁷

For the next three or four years nothing of importance is recorded in the Konkan, the war between the Maráthás and Aurangzeb being carried on chiefly in the Dakhan. The Bijápur kingdom had ceased to exist, and though the Moghals had succeeded to its possession yet they had no reason for valuing the Southern Konkan so highly as the Adil Sháhi dynasty had done. Sambhaji spent his time between Panhála Vishalgad and Sangameshvar, and being given up to sensual pleasures was at last abandoned by Sultán Akbar, who in October 1688 found at Rájápur a ship commanded by an Englishman, and sailed in her to Persia about the middle of 1689.⁸ A small party of Moghal cavalry set off from Kolhápur and having got close to Sangameshvar before the alarm was given, succeeded in capturing Sambhaji. Kháfi Khán says that he had two or three thousand horse with him, and was told of the approach of the hostile force, which consisted of two thousand horse and a thousand foot, but would not believe it.¹ Only two or three hundred of them surprised Sambhaji, and Kalusha with a party of Maráthás tried to save him, and was himself wounded, while Sambhaji hid himself in a temple. When found he was immediately carried off to the Emperor's camp above the Gháts, and there put to death a few days afterwards.²

During the reign of Sambhaji his family had lived at Ráygad, and his half-brother Rájárám had been detained there in easy captivity. The chief Marátha leaders met at Ráygad as soon as Sambhaji's death was announced, and came to a decision which showed great wisdom. As the Moghals were then in force above the Gháts, and as the Marátha state had in the last few years lost most of its power, they agreed to act on the defensive and to trust to the forts, which they put in preparation for attack. Rájárám went about the country as occasion required, and his family were sent to Vishálgad, but Sambhaji's widow and child remained at Ráygad. Immediately after the rains of 1689 the Moghal force came down into the Konkan and took Ráygad after several months' siege. Sháhu, then a child, was taken prisoner with his mother,³ and there is no record of his ever having returned to the Konkan. And from this time Ráygad lost its importance, because the degeneracy of the descendants of Shivaji prevented their making use of the forts in the same way as he and Sambhaji had done.

Aurangzeb now gave the Sidi a sanad for some of the territories which he had held previous to the rise of Shivaji, and armed with this authority he took the districts of Suvarndurg and Anjanvel and in 1699 the forts of Rájpurí and Ráygad.⁴ The Maráthás still retained command of many of the forts, and kept up their fleet, and so harassed the Sidi and retained some power on the coast. The Moghals did not interfere much with them in the Southern Konkan, and the most southern districts were practically independent. The province of Súlsli was divided among three different claimants, two-fifths of the revenue going to the Sávant, three-tenths to the Pant of Bávda, and three-tenths to Angria, while a payment had also to be made to the Killedár of Málvan. About 1700 Phond Sávant built the fort of Bharatgad, only three or four miles from Málvan, and immediately afterwards the Pant of Bávda built Bhagvantgad on the other side of the river.⁵ In 1698 Mánkoji Angria succeeded to the command of the Marátha fleet, and with it of the coast. The principal place of arms was Kolába, and there were depôts also at Suvarndurg and Vijaydurg⁶ and by this time the Maráthás were the strongest naval power on the coast and attacked the vessels of all nations. The only expedition which in the latter years of his life Aurangzeb appears to have sent to the Southern Konkan was against Vishálgad in 1700-1. The Amba Ghát was blockaded in order to prevent supplies getting in by that route, and to keep the road open for the Vanjáris of the royal army. The villages were burnt, the cattle carried off, and the people generally so harried that no sign of cultivation or the name or trace of a Marátha was to be found. The siege works were pushed on till a mine was carried near the gate. For raising the earth-works camel saddles and baskets innumerable were used full of earth and rubbish and litter heads of men and feet of quadrupeds, and these were advanced so far that the garrison were intimidated.¹ Negotiations for surrender went on for a long time and at length in June 1701 after a six months' siege Parashráam the commandant hoisted the imperial flag over the fortress. He and his family went off the same night, and the rest of the garrison were allowed to leave the fort next day. Its name was then changed to Sakhkharalana.²

The only events recorded during this time in the Northern Konkan, where the Moghals still retained their power, come under the general description of rapine and anarchy. About 1690 a multitude of outlaws with 4000 soldiers, all under the command of a ruffian named Kákáji, went about plundering and burning villages, and even burnt the church of Remedi close to Bassein.³ In 1692 the Sidi attacked Bassein and threatened Sálsette, and for two or three years his troops ravaged the country.⁴ About this period he is stated to have been in alliance with the chief of the Jesuits at Báandra for the extermination of the English.⁵ Then in 1694 Aurangzeb declared war against the Portuguese. In that year and the following he treated their subjects with great cruelty, and numbers were obliged to take refuge in the forts of Daman and Bassein:⁶ but fortunately for the Portuguese Aurangzeb was persuaded to make peace with them with a view to obtaining cannon for the reduction of the Marátha forts. About the same time the Muskat Arabs made a descent on Sálsette, burnt many villages and churches, killed the priests, and carried off about 1400 captives into slavery.⁷ The Portuguese in 1695 succeeded in burning three of the Marátha ships in the Rájápur river, the largest said to carry thirty-two guns and more than 300 men: the Portuguese lost six men killed and thirty-four wounded,⁸ and the triumphant tone they adopted on this occasion shows how little they were now accustomed to victory.

It was just at this time, 1697, when the whole coast was so given up to piracy that the notorious English pirate Captain Kidd appeared in these seas to add to the general terror. On one occasion he escaped from a Dutch and English squadron and got to Rájápur, and off that port plundered a Bombay vessel. His ship was the

It cannot be doubted that in the twenty-seven years which elapsed between the death of Shiváji and that of Aurangzeb the condition of the Konkan had greatly altered for the worse. Both the military and the revenue system of Shiváji fell much into decay under Sambháji, who, Kháfi Khán says, so oppressed the rayats that they fled from his country to that of the Feringis.² Although Rájárám tried to return to the old ways yet the success of the Sidi and A'ngria and the generally unsettled state of the country prevented any great measure of reform. The frequent ravaging expeditions of the Moghals and the Sidi in the Northern Konkan, with the fewer but more regular campaigns in the south, must have caused great misery. The Portuguese were utterly unable to protect their possessions. The districts owned by the Sidi were less exposed to external aggression than any other part, yet his was a government that never paid much attention to the wants or the miseries of its native subjects, and his system of revenue exactions was, if more certain, scarcely less oppressive than that of Kalusha. The divisions of authority in the Málvan district already mentioned must have kept the people in a perpetual fever of civil war. Trade of course could not have flourished under these circumstances, and almost the only mention of it that can be found at this time is that on exports from Bombay duties of five per cent were levied by the East India Company, eight per cent by the Portuguese at Thána, and arbitrary exactions by the Moghals at Kalyán.³

The civil war amongst the Maráthás which followed almost immediately on the death of Aurangzeb and the release of Sháhu from captivity were not likely to improve the condition of any part of the country, and from this time the Konkan chiefly suffered from the divisions among the Maráthás themselves. Sháhu advanced as far as Ránga, south of the Phonda Ghát, and laid siege to the fort, and Tárábái, widow of Rájárám, fled to Málvan. Sháhu did not however descend into the Konkan, and Tárábái in 1710, having collected a force and being supported by the Sávants, again went up the Gháts and established herself at Kolhápur. In the discords that thus arose between Shiváji's descendants Kánhoji Ángria became the greatest power in the Konkan, having possession of the coast from Sávantvádi to Bombay, and extending his authority into the province of Kalyán.⁴ Orme says that Kánhoji held Suvarndurg against Sháhu and that the latter built the Harnai forts in order to reduce him to obedience, but Kánhoji took them.⁵ This must probably have happened between 1707 and 1713. The Maráthás in 1707 equipped a fleet of sixty vessels under a leader independent of Ángria to cruise between Bombay and Goa, partly to make what they could by piracy themselves and partly to oppose the Arab pirates, who were now thoroughly organised and had ships carrying from thirty to fifty guns.¹ Between 1712 and 1720 four actions are recorded between the Portuguese and the Arabs, the first of which was at the mouth of the Rájpurí river. In the last three the Portuguese are said to have been successful, but these successes are spoken of in terms which show the strength and position of the pirates.²

In 1713 Kánhoji Angria went over to Sháhu and the concessions then granted were such as to make him practically independent. He received all the great forts on the coast from Khánderi to Vijaydurg, and many inland, including Avchitgad Rájapur and Khárepátan. Báláji Vishvanáth, a Chitpáwan of the family of Bhat and town of Shrivardhan a little north of Bánkot, was the chief agent in the negotiations which led to this arrangement, and this was the first important service of this great man, who was soon afterwards appointed Peshwa, and whose successors so soon eclipsed the Marátha dynasty. The first consequence of the new alliance was the taking from the Sidi of some places which he had held for many years. This he naturally resented, but Angria and Báláji Vishvanáth invaded his territory and compelled him to submit.

In 1720 the rights of the Maráthás were acknowledged by the Emperor of Delhi, and the Konkan was included in what was called the Svaráj or Home-rule, over which from this time forward the Musalmáns retained no authority whatever. The various provinces were then assigned to the different great officers of state, and the Chitnis thus got charge of a great part of the Konkan, Angria retaining the part already granted to him and being very formidable to all his neighbours.³ Details of the history of his family and of their relations with other powers will be found in the next section.

During the war between the Sátára and Kolhápúr branches of the Maráthás no important operations are recorded in the Konkan, and it appears that the rich district of Málvan was left for Rájáram A'ngria and the Sávants to fight for among themselves. In 1731 the treaty of partition between Sátára and Kolhápúr was concluded and in this Kolhápúr received the whole of the Konkan south of Vijaydurg, while the fort of Ratnágiri was given to Sháhu in exchange for Kopál.⁴ Vijaydurg itself of course remained with the Angriás, but by this time Kánhoji was dead, and his successors by their dissensions among themselves relieved the other powers of a formidable enemy. The Maráthás therefore under Báláji Vishvanáth, having now made peace with the Kolhápúr party were able to make a real attack on the Sidi, for the bombardment of Janjira was a periodical performance which scarcely deserved the name of serious warfare. The Sidi had retained the districts of Mahád, Ráygad, Dábhól, and Anjanvel. The Pratinidhi in 1733 with the connivance of a notorious pirate called Shaikhji, who was well in the Sidi's confidence, took a force into the districts of the latter which ravaged the country but did little else, and the Sidi's troops gained the fort of Govalkot while the Pratinidhi was close by at Chiplún.¹ The Bombay Government in December of this year entered into their first formal alliance with the Sidi, but this was directed chiefly against Angria and does not seem to have included the defence of the Sidi's territory against the Marátha state.² From this time however there was no interruption of the good understanding between the Bombay Government and the Sidis, and the alliance was at this time chiefly valued by the English because it enabled them to obtain supplies of beef, which they could not obtain from the Hindu governments in their more immediate neighbourhood.³ It was stipulated that, on A'ngria being conquered, Khánderi should go to the English and all the rest of the forts to the Sidi except Kolába, which was to be entirely demolished and never rebuilt except with the consent of both governments. It is remarkable that this treaty was signed by seven of the Sidis and without any reference to their being one head of the government.* A writer of that time accordingly speaks of the Janjira government as a republic, and there is no doubt that up almost to the present time (1894) the gáá has been looked upon as to some extent elective. Immediately after this the reigning Sidi died, and the dissensions among his sons enabled the Peshwa Bájiráv to interfere. In 1735 he took Ráygad, which had been lost to the Maráthas since 1690, as well as the forts of Tala and Ghosála, and eventually those of Avchitgad and Birvádi were also ceded and a provision made for Sidi Rahman whom the Maráthas had supported.

Thus the rule both of the Sidi and of Angria being broken, and the Moghals got rid of, the Marátha state had again become the chief power in the Konkan. The time had arrived when they might hope to make a successful attack on the Portuguese and by driving them out of their old possessions unite the whole province under Native rule. No particular pretext for attacking the Portuguese was necessary, for war was the natural state of these powers on the coast and peace the exception, and it was not likely that the "Government of the Konkani Bráhmans," as it was called since the Peshwás had become virtually the rulers of the state, should much longer endure the presence of foreigners in their native district. It appeared also in the result that, except in two or three places, the Portuguese were not in a position to offer much defence,⁵ although, trusting rather to their old prestige than to their present strength, they did not scruple to give the Maráthas provocation. In 1737 they again allied themselves with Sambháji A'ngria and attempted to take Kolába from Mánáji, whom the Peshwa was sent to support.⁶ The intolerance as to religious matters from which the native subjects of Portugal suffered has already been described, and it is said that the Hindu inhabitants of Sálsette complained of "the intemperate zeal with which it was attempted to convert them to the Roman Catholic faith, and to subject them to the terrors of the Inquisition."¹ The Maráthás therefore invaded Sálsette in April 1737, and having taken Ghodbandar and put the garrison to the sword speedily got command of the Bassein river, and so prevented any succour being sent from Bassein. The fortifications of Thána were incomplete as has already been mentioned, and the Governor of Sálsette retired to Karanja with unnecessary haste.² Thána was however defended, and not taken till two assaults had been repulsed, the capitulation being assisted by the Maráthás seizing the families of the defenders and threatening to slaughter them.³ The English sent men and ammunition to assist in the defence of Bándra, but finding it untenable they induced the Portuguese to destroy the fortifications and abandon the place.⁴ The great church of St. Anne with the Jesuits' college, standing on the site of the present slaughter-houses, was then destroyed, and also the church of Our Lady of the Mount now generally known as Mount Mary, which was rebuilt in 1761, the great crosses of the two older buildings alone remaining. There being no other places of much strength in the island, Sálsette was thus practically lost to the Portuguese. The Peshwa thought it necessary to send a very large force to the Konkan, but being at the time much pressed in the north of India was soon obliged to withdraw a great part of it. Encouraged by this the Portuguese in 1738 made some gallant efforts, and at Asheri defeated the Maráthá army and were preparing to attempt the recovery of Thána, but it was too late.

In January 1739 Chimnáji Appa assumed command in the Northern Konkan, and took Khatalvada, Dáhánu, Kelva, Shirgaon, and Tárápur. At all these places there were forts, that of Tárápur being the most considerable, and the defence there was very obstinate. There still seemed a chance for the Portuguese, for the Peshwa alarmed at the approach of Nadir Sháh recalled Chimnáji Appa and his force from the Konkan to help to resist the invaders in the north of India. But by this time Vesáva and Dhárávi, the last forts in Sálsette, had surrendered, and the siege of Bassein had commenced and Chimnáji Appa was hero enough to disregard the order of recall.⁵ The commandant of Bassein offered to pay tribute to the Maráthás and to humble himself as the Sidi had done, but this was of no avail. The city was invested on February 17, and the capitulation took place on May 16. During the interval the Portuguese showed all the heroism that was possible to a besieged force, and repulsed the attacks which were made with constantly increasing obstinacy. Had they been supported by a fleet they might have held out till the rains should necessitate the retreat of the Maráthá army, but Mánáji Angria blockaded the sea approach and their provisions were exhausted. They made frequent and urgent appeals to the Bombay Government to assist them, which, unfortunately for our national fame, were disregarded,⁶ and two different treaties were entered into during the month of April ceding territory near Goa, but were not apparently ratified.¹ They are believed to have lost 800 men during the siege and the Maráthás acknowledge to 5000.²

With the surrender of the Capital of the North not only the glory of the Portuguese departed, but also every vestige of their power in the Northern Konkan, for the greater part of the European fazendars abandoned their estates and left the country.³ Nor were they long allowed to keep their isolated position at Chaul though no operations were conducted against it in 1740. But in that year the Portuguese fleet was destroyed by Angria,⁴ and in January 1741 Chaul was attacked and taken (under the direction of Chimnaji Appa⁵) by Khandoji Mánkar, who in the next year in consideration of his services received the village of Kharoli in the Thal district in inám.⁶ After the rains, while on their march from Chaul to Goa, the wretched remains of the Portuguese armies were attacked by Khem Sávant and numbers of them perished.

It does not appear that this destruction of the Portuguese power in India was much regarded by the Portuguese in Europe. In 1744 the King in giving orders to a new Viceroy said scarcely anything about recovering the lost territories except that opportunities were to be watched, but gave minute and particular orders as to commerce, and suggested that the artisans of Thána should be induced to settle in Goa.⁷ On two subsequent occasions however the Portuguese made some show of vigour. In 1756 the Maráthás under the influence of Sadáshivráv Bháu had resolved to take Goa. To anticipate them in this the Portuguese Viceroy attacked the Marátha districts near Goa but was defeated and killed.⁸ His attack had however the effect of putting an end to the hostilities of the Maráthás. In 1774 the Portuguese Government provoked by the capture of one of their forty-gun ships by the Maráthás determined in revenge to take not only their old province of the North but also Gheria and Suvarndurg, and for this purpose large reinforcements were sent from Europe. The only result was that the Bombay Government in order to forestall them took Thána.

From what has been said in the earlier parts of this work it might reasonably have been expected that the Maráthás, who have never had much reputation for clemency, would have treated the Christians with rigour after the conquest, and that the faith of the great majority of these Christians would not have been steady enough to stand against adversity. The facts however are equally creditable to the Maráthás and to the Christians. The Governor of Bassein indeed in the articles of capitulation got no better terms for the converts than the privilege of three churches within the city, one in the district and one in the island of Sálsette,¹ and the Maráthás are said to have destroyed some of the churches as soon as they invaded Sálsette. The Portuguese monks and other white priests abandoned the district with the fazendárs, as if knowing that they had little to expect from the affection of their flocks when the secular power would no longer help them. But their place was taken by 'Canarins' or black priests from Malabár under a Vicar General, who was also a Canarin, and twenty years after the conquest when Anquetil du Perron travelled through the district the Christian congregations were all flourishing and in no way molested in the exercise of their religion. A good many of their churches and convents were more or less in ruins, and of course Hindu temples had sprung up where none were allowed before, but at Thána the church fêtes and ceremonies were celebrated with the same pomp as at Goa, fifteen native priests being assembled at a function in which Du Perron assisted in the choir: and at Agáshi he found the roads full of people "going to church with as much liberty as in a Christian state."² It is clear from this that if the Maráthás were ever inclined to avenge the cruelties of the Jesuits and the Inquisition, they desisted as soon as the European leaders had been got rid of, and allowed their subjects full liberty of conscience.

The Marátha state had now possession of the whole Konkan, except that part held by the Sidi and Angria, and these powers were, as shown above, so weakened as to be formidable only at sea. The state of Jawhár must also be excepted, for it is said to have had command of all the country between the Gháts and the Bassein boundary from the latitude of Bassein to that of Daman. Still it is evident that this large tract was left to Jawhár simply because it was always considered almost valueless, the total revenue being only 3½ lakhs,³ and eventually the Maráthás got possession of nearly the whole without any particular opposition. The possessions of the Shirké family must also be mentioned, as they continued to hold territory yielding a revenue of Rs. 75,000 a year down to 1768, when the Peshwa put an end to the small state.⁴ The ináms were however continued to them, and their representatives now live in a very reduced condition at Kutra, immediately below their old Ghát capital Bahirugad, and are known by the surname of Ráje Shirké. It is now necessary to return to the Angriás as their downfall in 1756 is the next event of importance in the history of the Konkan.

THE A'NGRIA'S.

THE family of Angria is by caste Marátha, and its splendour may be considered almost to have begun and ended with Kánhoji, although his father Tukáji had early distinguished himself in Shiváji's fleet.¹ It has been already stated that Kánhoji's power rapidly increased during the unsettled days of Sambháji and Sháhu, and in 1713 he was recognised as virtually independent, and was in fact master of all the coast with the forts on it from Bombay to Vijaydurg besides a good deal of the inland country. He made Vijaydurg his capital and in doing so showed himself a sailor of a different sort from Shiváji. It may probably also be owing to the same uncompromising spirit that he was from the first on terms of enmity, more or less pronounced, with the Bombay Government. As early as 1717 the English had already made an attempt on Vijaydurg, but were not successful.² In 1719 a force from Bombay attempted to take Khanderi from Angria, but failed.³ The then Viceroy at Goa is vaguely said to have chastised Angria,⁴ but in November 1720 the Portuguese found it advisable to unite with the English against him, and they burnt sixteen of his vessels which were lying in the Vijaydurg river, but could do nothing against the fort. In 1722 the same allies attacked Kolába with three British ships of the line and a Portuguese army but failed, and in 1724 the Dutch attacked Vijaydurg with a fleet of seven ships of the line, two bomb ketches and some land forces, but they succeeded no better than the others. Kánhoji was naturally encouraged by these failures, and in 1727 he took the Darby, a richly-laden English ship besides many Dutch and French ships at different times, and our East India Company are said at this time to have been put to an annual expense of £50,000 in keeping up an armed squadron to protect their trade against the pirates, of whom Kánhoji was the acknowledged chief. In 1728 however he died and his possessions were soon all in confusion. His eldest legitimate son Sakhoji retained possession of Kolába until his death soon afterwards, when his illegitimate brothers Mánáji and Yesáji were put in charge by Sambháji, the second legitimate son, who lived at Suvarndurg. Mánáji and Yesáji having quarrelled, Mánáji with the assistance of the Portuguese took Kolába and put Yesáji's eyes out. Sambháji then attacked him, but Mánáji got assistance from the Peshwa, to whom he yielded the forts of Kutla (probably Kothigad) and Rájínáchi, and repulsed Sambháji.¹ The war between these two continued for a good many years with various alternations of alliances, but the Bombay Government appear always to have opposed the whole family. In 1730 they made an offensive and defensive alliance with Phond Sávant against the Ángriás generally, and in 1733 a similar one with the Sidi,² but these appear to have had no particular result. The next hostilities we hear of were in December 1738 when Commodore Bagwel with four grabs was cruising in search of Sambháji's fleet, and on the 22nd came upon nine of his grabs and thirteen gallivats issuing from the Vijaydurg river. They stood up the coast, but the Commodore immediately bore down on them, and they took refuge in the Rájápur river, displaying all their flags. They ran up the river further than the English vessels could follow them, and the Commodore could only give them a few broadsides, which however did much damage and killed their Admiral.³ After this it was Mánáji's turn to be troublesome, and he took Karanja and Elephanta, but soon afterwards Sambháji attacked him and took Chaul, Álibág, Ságargad, and Thal. Báláji Bájiráv was sent from the Dakhan to help to defend Kolába, and distinguished himself in an attack on an outpost, and with his assistance Mánáji held his own.⁴ In the meanwhile the English drove Sambháji's fleet down as far as Suvarndurg, where they cannonaded his camp and refused to allow him to retire to the fort. He however managed to effect his escape. In 1740 Sambháji took possession of Bharatgad, Bhagvantgad, and the greater part of the Vádi possessions in the Sálshi province, and these were not recovered till 1748.⁵ About this time Sambháji died and was succeeded by his half-brother Tuláji. He like the rest, whether rendering or refusing obedience to the Peshwás, never failed to plunder the ships of all those who were not too strong for him. The Sávant and the Kolhápur captains did the same, and these both now and later went among the English by the general name of Málvans,⁶ as at an earlier period other pirates were called Sunguiceers from Sangameshvar their principal station.⁷

Matters went on in this way till 1755, when the Portuguese having entirely lost their power, and the Maráthás being on unusually good terms both with the English and the Sidi, the two powers determined to reduce Tuláji Ángria by a joint expedition. The Maráthás were to keep Vijaydurg and the English to receive Bánkot with the sovereignty of the Mahád river and a few villages on its banks.⁸ Orme has given a long and interesting account⁹ of the operations that followed, and his description of the equipment and manœuvres of the pirates is also too apt to the purpose of this history to allow of much curtailment. Facts related by other authorities and in particular by Ives, who was surgeon on board

"The piracies which Ángria exercised upon ships of all nations indifferently, who did not purchase his passes, rendered him every day more and more powerful. The land and sea breezes on this coast, as well as on that of Coromandel, blow alternately in the twenty-four hours, and divide the day, so that vessels sailing along the coast are obliged to keep in sight of land, since the land winds do not reach more than forty miles out to sea. There was not a creek, bay, harbour, or mouth of a river along the coast of his dominions in which he had not erected fortifications and marine receptacles to serve both as a station of discovery and as a place of refuge to his vessels; hence it was as difficult to avoid the encounter of them as to take them. His fleet consisted of grabs and gallivats, vessels peculiar to the Malabár coast. The grabs have rarely more than two masts, although some have three; those of three are about 300 tons burthen, but the others are not more than 150. They are built to draw very little water, being very broad in proportion to their length, narrowing however from the middle to the end, where instead of bows they have a prow, projecting like that of a Mediterranean galley, and covered with a strong deck, level with the main deck of the vessel, from which however it is separated by a bulk-head which terminates the forecastle. As this construction subjects the grab to pitch violently when sailing against a head sea, the deck of the prow is not enclosed with sides as the rest of the vessel is, but remains bare, that the water which dashes upon it may pass off without interruption. On the main deck under the forecastle are mounted two pieces of cannon of nine or twelve pounds, which point forwards through the portholes cut in the bulk-head, and fire over the prow; the cannon of the broadside are from six to nine pounds. The gallivats are large row-boats built like the grab but of smaller dimensions, the largest rarely exceeding seventy tons: they have two masts, of which the mizen is very slight; the main mast bears only one sail, which is triangular and very large, the peak of it when hoisted being much higher than the mast itself. In general the gallivats are covered with a spar deck, made for lightness of split bamboos, and these carry only petteraroes, which are fixed on swivels in the gunnel of the vessel: but those of the largest size have a fixed deck on which they mount six or eight pieces of cannon from two to four pounds. They have forty or fifty stout oars, and may be rowed four miles an hour. Eight or ten grabs, and forty or fifty gallivats, crowded with men, generally composed Ángria's principal fleet destined to attack ships of force or burthen. The vessel no sooner came in sight of the port or bay where the fleet was lying, than they slipped their cables and put out to sea. If the wind blew, their construction enabled them to sail almost as fast as the wind; and if it was calm, the gallivats rowing towed the grabs. When within cannon shot of the chase they generally assembled in her stern, and the grabs attacked her at a distance with their prow guns, firing first only at the masts, and taking aim when the three masts of the vessel just opened all together to their view, by which means the shot would probably strike one or other of the three. As soon as the chase was dismasted, they came nearer and battered her on all sides until she struck; and if the defence was obstinate, they sent a number of gallivats with two or three hundred men in each, who boarded sword in hand from all quarters in the same instant.

"The Maráthás who were in possession of the main land opposite to Bombay, had several times made proposals to the English Government in the island, to attack this common enemy with their united forces, but it was not before the beginning of 1755 that both parties happened to be ready at the same time to undertake such an expedition. The Presidency then made a treaty with Rámáji Pant, Báláji Peshwa's general in these parts, and agreed to assist the Maráthás with their marine force in reducing Suvarndurg, Bánkot, and some others of Angria's forts, which lie near to Chaul, a harbour and fortified city belonging to the Maráthás. Accordingly Commodore James, the commander-in-chief of the Company's marine force in India, sailed on the 22nd of March in the Protector of forty-four guns, with a ketch of sixteen guns and two bomb vessels; but such was the exaggerated opinion of Angria's strongholds, that the Presidency instructed him not to expose the Company's vessels to any risk by attacking them, but only to blockade the harbours whilst the Marátha army carried on their operations by land. Three days after the Marátha fleet, consisting of seven grabs and sixty gallivats, came out of Chaul, having on board 10,000 land forces, and the fleets united proceeded to Comara-bay, where they anchored in order to permit the Maráthás to get their meal on shore, since they are prohibited by their religion from eating or washing at sea. Departing from hence they anchored again about fifteen miles to the north of Suvarndurg when Rámáji Pant with the troops disembarked in order to proceed the rest of the way by land. Commodore James now receiving intelligence that the enemy's fleet lay at anchor in the harbour of Suvarndurg represented to the Admiral of the Marátha fleet, that by proceeding immediately thither they might come upon them in the night, and so effectually blockade them in the harbour that few or none would be able to escape. The Marátha seemed highly to approve the proposal, but had not authority enough over his officers to make any of them stir before the morning, when the enemy discovering them under sail, immediately slipped their cables and put to sea. The Commodore then flung out the signal for a general chase; but as little regard was paid to this as to his former intention; for although the vessels of the Maráthás had hitherto sailed better than the English, such was their terror of Angria's fleet, that they all kept behind, and suffered the Protector to proceed alone almost out of their sight. The enemy on the other hand exerted themselves with uncommon industry, flinging overboard all their lumber to lighten their vessels, not only crowding all the sails they could bend, but also hanging up their garments, and even their turbans, to catch every breath of air. The Protector, however, came within gun-shot of some of the sternmost, but the evening approaching, Commodore James gave over the chase, and returned to Suvarndurg which he had passed several miles. Here he found Rámáji Pant with the army besieging, as they said, the three forts on the main land; but they were firing only from one gun, a four-pounder, at the distance of two miles, and even at this distance the troops did not think themselves safe without digging pits, in which they sheltered themselves covered up to the chin from the enemy's fire. The Commodore, judging from these operations that they would never take the forts, determined to exceed the instructions which he had received from the Presidency, rather than expose the English arms to the disgrace they would suffer, if an expedition in which they were believed by Angria to have taken so great a share, should miscarry. The next day, the 2nd of April, he began to cannonade and bombard the fort of Suvarndurg situated on the island;¹ but finding that the walls on the western side which he attacked, were mostly cut out of the solid rock, he changed his station to the north-east between the island and the main; where whilst one of his broadsides plied the north-east bastions of this fort the other fired on Fort Goa, the largest of those upon the main land. The bastions of Suvarndurg however, were so high, that the Protector could only point her upper tier at them, but being anchored within a hundred yards, the musketry in the round tops drove the enemy from their guns, and by noon the parapet of the north-east bastions was in ruins, when a shell from one of the bomb vessels set fire to a thatched house, which the garrison, dreading the Protector's musketry, were afraid to extinguish; the blaze spreading fiercely at this dry season of the year, all the buildings of the fort were soon in flames, and amongst them a magazine of powder blew up. On this disaster the inhabitants, men women and children with the greatest part of the garrison, in all near 1000 persons, ran out of the fort, and embarking in seven or eight large boats, attempted to make their escape to Fort Goa, where the enemy after suffering a severe cannonade, hung out a flag as a signal of surrender; but whilst the Maráthás were marching to take possession of it, the governor, perceiving that the Commodore had not yet taken possession of Suvarndurg, got into a boat with some of his most honest men, and crossed over to the island, hoping to be able to maintain the fort until he should receive assistance from Dábhól which is in sight of it. Upon this the Protector renewed her fire upon Suvarndurg, and the Commodore finding that the governor wanted to protract the defence until night, when it was not to be doubted that some boats from Dábhól would endeavour to throw succours into the place, he landed half his seamen under cover of the fire of the ships, who with great intrepidity ran up to the gate, and cutting down the sallyport with their axes, forced their way into it; on which the garrison surrendered: the other two forts on the main land had by this time hung out flags of truce, and the Maráthás took possession of them.¹ This was all the work of one day, in which the spirited resolution of Commodore James destroyed the timorous prejudices which had for twenty years been entertained of the impracticability of reducing any of Ángria's fortified harbours. On the 8th of April the fleet and army proceeded to Bánkot which surrendered on the first summons, and the Maráthás consented that the Company should keep it. Rámáji Pant was so elated by these successes, that he offered Commodore James 2,00,000 rupees if he would immediately proceed against Dáhol and some other of the enemy's forts a little to the southward of that place; and certainly this was the time to attack them, during the consternation into which the enemy were thrown by the losses they had just sustained. But the monsoon was approaching, and the Commodore having already exceeded his orders, would not venture to comply with the Maráthá's request without permission from Bombay. But the Presidency, notwithstanding the unexpected successes of their arms, was so solicitous for the fate of one of their bomb ketches, a heavy flat-bottomed boat incapable of keeping the sea in tempestuous weather, that they ordered him to bring back the fleet into harbour without delay. Accordingly on the 11th he delivered the forts of Suvarndurg to the Maráthás, striking the English flag, which for the honour of their arms he had hitherto caused to be hoisted in them, and on the 15th sailed away with his ships to Bombay: the Maráthá fleet at the same time returned to Chaul.

"The Maráthás had in the meantime sent a force from Poona and taken some other forts in the Suvarndurg district and threatened Ratnágiri.² Bánkot was not given up till after the rains, when the name of the fort was changed from Himmatgad to Fort Victoria, and eventually the sovereignty of the river and ten villages on it were ceded. This was, excepting Bombay, the first territory the English possessed on the west side of India, and besides being valued for the bullocks that could be obtained there, it soon afterwards was found most useful as a recruiting³ ground for our native regiments. It was probably also valued as a harbour, for the anchorage was then much better than it has since become, and the river was navigable for large vessels.⁴ A treaty regulating the trade of the river was concluded in the following year.⁵ After the rains the Maráthás under Rámáji Pant again commenced operations in the Konkan, and early in the year 1756 they took Anjanvel and Dáhol after a siege, and reported the prospect of the immediate capture of Govalkot.³ They then continued their operations, and before the expedition against Vijaydurg started had reduced all the coast forts north of that without any particular loss, except at Rájápur, where 300 men were killed by an accidental explosion of gunpowder.⁶

"After the rains it was determined to attack Gheria, but it was so long since any Englishman had seen this place, that trusting to the report of the natives, they believed it to be at least as strong as Gibraltar, and like Gibraltar situated on a mountain inaccessible from the sea. For this reason it was resolved to send vessels to reconnoitre it, which service Commodore James, in the Protector with two other ships, performed. He found the enemy's fleet at anchor in the harbour, notwithstanding which he approached within cannon shot of the fort, and having attentively considered it, returned at the end of December to Bombay, and described the place such as it really was, very strong indeed, but far from being inaccessible or impregnable.¹ Upon his representation it was resolved to prosecute the expedition with vigour. The Marátha army under the command of Rámáji Pant marched from Chaul, and the twenty-gun ship, and the sloöp of Mr. Watson's squadron, were sent forward to blockade the harbour where they were soon after joined by Commodore James in the Protector and another ship which was of 20 guns belonging to the Company. On the 11th of February the Admiral with the rest of the ships arrived. The whole united fleet now consisted of four ships of the line, of 70, 64, 60, and 50 guns, one of 44, three of 20, a grab of 12, and five bomb-ketches, fourteen vessels in all. Besides the seamen, they had on board a battalion of 800 Europeans with 1000 sepoy under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clive. Ives says that the Marátha army consisted of 5000 or 6000 horse and as many foot. Their fleet was three or four grabs and forty or fifty gallivats, and was lying in the Rájápur creek (about four miles north of Gheria), the small fort of which they had taken before the English fleet arrived.² On its appearance Angria was so terrified that he left his town to be defended by his brother and went and put himself into the hands of the Maráthás who having crossed the river at some distance from the sea, were already encamped to the eastward of the peta. Here he endeavoured to prevail on Rámáji Pant to accept of a ransom for his fort, offering a large sum of money if he would divert the storm that was ready to break upon him. But the Marátha availing himself of his fear, kept him a prisoner, and extorted from him an order directing his brother to deliver the fortress to the Maráthás, intending if he could get possession of it in this clandestine manner to exclude his allies the English from any share of the plunder. The Admiral receiving intelligence of these proceedings, sent a summons to the fort on the morning after his arrival, and receiving no answer, ordered the ships to weigh in the afternoon as soon as the sea wind set in. They proceeded in two divisions, parallel to each other, the larger covering the bomb-ketches and smaller vessels from the fire of the fort. As soon as they had passed the point of the promontory, they stood into the river, and anchoring along the north side of the fortifications, began, at the distance of fifty yards, to batter them with 150 pieces of cannon; the bomb-ketches at the same time plied their mortars, and within ten minutes after the firing began, a shell fell into one of Angria's grabs, which set her on fire; the rest being fastened together with her, soon shared the same fate, and in less than an hour this fleet, which had for fifty years been the terror of the Malabár coast, was utterly destroyed. In the meantime the cannonade and bombardment continued furiously, and silenced the enemy's fire. But the governor did not surrender when the night set in. Intelligence being received from a deserter that he intended to give up the place the next day to the Maráthás, Colonel Clive landed with the troops; and in order to prevent the Maráthás from carrying their scheme into execution, took up his ground between them and the fort.

"Ives states with regard to the occurrences of this day that the Admiral summoned the fort to surrender on the day he arrived (the 11th) but received only a defiance. Next morning he sent another message, which was not replied to. The engagement began about two o'clock by the fort firing on the Kingfisher. The firing went on over half an hour before the Restoration grab, which had belonged to the East India Company and had been taken by Angria caught fire. From the grabs the fire was communicated to a large ship lying on the shore, and from that to the arsenal, storehouse, suburbs and city, and even to several parts of the fort, particularly a square tower, where it continued burning all night with such violence that the stone walls appeared like red-hot iron. About 6-30 the fire of the fort was entirely silenced, but the bomb vessels continued throwing in shells till daylight. Clive landed about 9 P.M.¹

"Early in the morning the Admiral summoned the place again, declaring that he would renew the attack and give no quarter if it was not delivered up to him in an hour: in answer to which the governor desired a cessation of hostilities until the next morning, alleging that he only waited for orders from Angria to comply with the summons. The cannonade was therefore renewed at four in the afternoon; and in less than half an hour the garrison, unable to stand the shock any longer, called out to the advanced guard of the troops on shore that they were ready to surrender, upon which Lieutenant-Colonel Clive immediately marched up and took possession of the fort. It was found that notwithstanding the cannonade had destroyed most of the artificial works upon which they fired, the rock remained a natural and almost impregnable bulwark; so that if the enemy had been endowed with courage sufficient to have maintained the place to extremity, it could only have been taken by regular approaches on the land side. There were found in it 200 pieces of cannon, six brass mortars, and a great quantity of ammunition and military and naval stores of all kinds: the money and effects of other kinds amounted to 120,000 pounds sterling. All this booty was divided amongst the captors, without any reserve either for the nation or the Company. Besides the vessels which were set on fire during the attack, there were two ships, one of them of forty guns, upon the stocks, both of which the captors destroyed.

"Ives describes the cannonade on the second day as longer than Orme says. A magazine in the fort was blown up by it about 2 P.M. and the signal of surrender shown at 4. But the governor not being willing to admit the troops that night fire was again renewed, and full submission made at 5-15. Clive had been making his approaches all this time and had greatly annoyed the enemy with his cannon. The colonel and the whole army marched into the fort on the 14th at sunrise, and found in it ten English and three Dutch prisoners. Our loss in killed and wounded amounted to about twenty.

"Whilst the fleet were employed in taking on board the plunder, the Maráthás sent detachments to summon several other forts, which surrendered without making any resistance. Thus in less than a month they got possession of all the territories wrested from them by Angria's predecessors, and which they had for seventy years despaired of ever being able to recover. In the beginning of April the fleet returned to Bombay, where Mr. Watson repaired his squadron."

Orme in this says nothing of the charges of treachery and bad faith which have so often been made against the British leaders at Gheria.¹ It is not necessary here to go into the question, but the following seems a fair statement of the case: "The allies (Maráthás and English) seem to have been quite as desirous of outwitting each other as of overcoming the enemy. Both parties meditated an exclusive appropriation of the booty which was anticipated and both took much pains to attain their object. The English were successful. The place fell into their hands, and their Marátha friends were disappointed of the expected prize."² This capture of Vijaydurg is one of the few events that have taken place in the Konkan which is thought worthy of mention by all the historians of British India, and it may be mentioned that after Admiral Watson's death in the following year the East India Company erected a monument to him in Westminster Abbey, and that a pillar commemorative of the capture of Suvarndurg is still standing at Shooter's Hill near London.

Tuláji Angria's family were taken in the fort and he himself sent as a prisoner to a fort near Ráygad and kept in confinement till his death.³ The tombs of Tuláji and his six wives, one of whom became a sati, are shown outside the fort at Vijaydurg. His two sons escaped after twelve or fourteen years' captivity and were protected in Bombay.

The Bombay Government were now exceedingly anxious to keep Vijaydurg and give back Bánkot, but the Maráthás could not be induced to consent to this, as the possession of this fort had been the Peshwa's chief object in making the treaty and the expedition with the English.¹

As the other branch of the Ángria family which retained the Kolába principality for nearly a hundred years longer never took any prominent part in the affairs of the coast, it is as well to mention here the little that need be said about them. Mánáji was in alliance with the Maráthás till his death in 1759, when he was succeeded by his son Rághoji, who lived and reigned till 1793. He did not forget the piratical instincts of the family, but Forbes who passed through his territories in 1771 on his way from Dásgaon to Bombay heard from some Europeans who were in his service that he was generally beloved by his people and less oppressive than most Marátha princes. He resided in the island of Kolába (as his successors continued to do), where were the palace treasury and other public buildings, but the stables gardens and larger edifices for which the fort could afford no accommodation were at Álibág.² Rághoji was succeeded by his son Mánáji, who was first rejected and then acknowledged by the Peshwa and finally deposed by Daulatráv Sindia in 1799 in favour of another member of the family. But the grandson of the last Mánáji eventually succeeded, and died just before the conquest of the Peshwa's territories by the English.³ By this time the state had been reduced by gradual encroachments to a very small compass, and the whole revenue did not exceed three lákhs of rupees. The Rája was however considered independent but received investiture from the Peshwa.⁴ In 1840 on the death of the last of the Ángriás of the direct and legitimate line the state lapsed to the British Government. Since that the buildings in the fort of Kolába have gone to ruin.

The fort of Ságargad, four miles from Álibág, which is said to have been built by Kánoji Ángria, must have dominated the whole of the Álibág sub-division, except so much as was protected by the Chaul forts. It is very extensive and might certainly have held a large number of troops, but the fortifications cannot be called strong, and the unsubstantial walls and gateways differ much from those of Shiváji's fortresses. The appearance of the fort however from some points is remarkably fine. The outer walls surround the top of the hill, which in many places has a good natural scarp. At the south end the hill stretches out in a narrow tongue, and at the end of this is a tapering pinnacle of rock detached from the hill by a narrow chasm to a considerable depth. It may be assumed that there was no fort here in the sixteenth century as the hill is never mentioned by Portuguese writers.

THE chief events in the history of the Konkan between 1739 and 1760 have been related in the last section as referring mostly to the Angríás. A little more must be said to show the general condition of the country during that period, and then the regular course of its history subsequently to 1760 will be taken up.

From the time that the Maráthás by expelling the Portuguese became the paramount power in the North and a great part of the the South Konkan, a period of comparative peacefulness, and therefore of prosperity, began. The English Government at Bombay now first appear on the scene with sufficient influence to interfere with effect among the coast powers. The first treaty they entered into with the Maráthás was concluded at Bassein in 1739 immediately after the capture of that place. It was chiefly occupied with the commercial relations of the two governments, the admission of the Maráthás to the Máhim river (Bándra creek), and the granting of passes by each government to trading vessels. One stipulation shows in a strong light the insecurity of the seas outside Bombay, and the little command the Maráthás had over it, namely that their fishing boats carrying provisions or goods from Máhim to Vesáva should be protected by two fighting gallivats of the English.

The Maráthás however seem to have made as good arrangements as were practicable for the defence of their new possessions and the protection of their subjects. In 1760 the fort of Bassein was in good repair and the gate on the south-east had been closed. The fort at Dáhanu had just been repaired in order to protect the inhabitants against the pirates. The fort at Tárápur was also repaired and a new fort was being built at Kelva.¹ As to their treatment of their subjects other than Hindus mention has been already made of their tolerance towards the Christians of Sálsette and Bassein. Towards the Musalmáns of the North Konkan their conduct was equally praiseworthy. The Portuguese had allowed no kázis in their territory, but Báláji Bájiráv re-established the office, bestowing it apparently on Musalmáns who had done service to the Maráthás, and endowing it with ináms. He made the kázi of Trombay the head of all those in the North Konkan, the kázis of Kalyán Bhiwndi and other places being his náibs. Similarly, though probably dating from earlier times, the kázi of Thal was the head of those in the present Kolába district. The condition of Sálsette in 1760 is said to have been such that it was full of villages almost all Christian and returned to the cultivators of its soil more than twenty-four lákhs of rupees a year.¹ This must have been an exaggeration, but it is likely that the toleration in religion shown to the inhabitants of whatever creed made them endure without much complaining the additional taxes which the Maráthás imposed immediately after the conquest.

The state of the district between Bombay and Gheria may be gathered from the last section, and all that can be said about the district of Málvan is that it was, as ever, distracted by the strifes of the A'ngriás, the Sávant, and the Kolhápúr Maráthás, but until the downfall of the A'ngriás their influence over it appears to have been the strongest.

In 1760 the Maráthás thought it time to recommence operations against Janjira, and Rámáji Pant Phadnavis, the Sar Subhedár of the Konkan, besieged the island assisted by a corps of Portuguese. The English took part with the Sidi and hoisted the British flag at Janjira² and thus the Maráthás had a good cause of quarrel with the Bombay Government. But the disastrous battle of Páñipat in 1761, the death of the Peshwa Báláji Bájráv, and the succession of a minor, with the internal dissensions which followed, restrained for a time the aggressive spirit of the Maráthás. Raghunáthráv, during the youth of the Peshwa Mádhavráv, aspired to rule the Maráthá state, and was anxious to keep on good terms with the English, who now desired to possess territory. As most convenient to Bombay their first designs were on Sálsette and Bassein,³ but Raghunáthráv was not yet prepared to yield places so valuable and so lately conquered, and therefore the articles of agreement now concluded with him contained no territorial concession except a very doubtful one of the island of Underi or Hennery.⁴ The whole tone of the agreement, however, shows that the English were now in a much stronger position than they had ever been before, and the independence of the Sidi was so far secured that the Maráthás undertook to restore his territories and not again molest them. By 1766 the Peshwa Mádhavráv had established his own power and so far retrieved the position of the state that the wish of the English to become possessed of Sálsette or even of the islands in Bombay harbour received no attention. Thus matters continued till 1771, when with the death of Mádhavráv began those misfortunes which ended in the destruction of the Maráthá state in 1818.

Grant Duff looks on Mádhavráv as superior in character and abilities to any of his predecessors, and though he was only twenty-seven when he died, "he is deservedly celebrated for his firm support of the weak against the oppressive, of the poor against the rich, and, as far as the constitution of society permitted, for his equity to all. He made no innovations; he improved the system established, endeavoured to amend defects without altering forms, and restricted a corruption which he could not eradicate."¹ So also Elphinstone says of him that "he was the first who introduced order into the internal administration, and showed a sincere desire to protect his subjects from military violence, and to establish something like a regular dispensation of justice."² It will be useful therefore here to consider the Marátha system of government as it existed at this time for the Konkan, for it is certain that in the troubles which henceforward more or less encompassed the state under such degenerate descendants of the first Peshwás as Raghunáthráv and his son Bájiráv, the limits of authority were but little attended to and the good of the country was entirely neglected; yet while Nána Phadnavis' power was untrammelled, the revenue management of some of the districts at least was regular and systematic.³

There was from the first a Sar Subhedár of the Konkan, four or five other provinces being ruled by an officer of the same rank and title. His residence was at Bassein,⁴ the new town of which was after its occupation by the Maráthás called Bájipur. Under the Sar Subhedár were the mámlatdárs, whose districts were much larger than those of the present officers of the same name, and generally yielded about five lákhs of rupees. The amount of revenue expected was fixed by the government at the beginning of the year, and the mámlatdár was allowed to levy a moderate extra percentage for himself. He was encouraged in Mádhavráv's time, but apparently not obliged, to live in his districts.⁵ There was generally no one in authority between the mámlatdár and the pátils of the villages; and as criminal and civil justice and police were also administered by the Sar Subhedár the mámlatdárs and the pátils, it is evident that the latter class must in many cases have had great power. Under this system a few powerful officials ruled large districts in which they were not necessarily resident, holding office only from year to year and with power to pay themselves by percentages: and although this may have worked well enough under the strict and intelligent supervision of Mádhavráv, yet under such rulers as his immediate predecessors and successors it must have been oppressive in the highest degree. And judging by what we are told of the Marátha government of Sálsette it was so,⁶ for it is not likely that the administration would be more severe on the people there than in the older possessions which were valued less highly. The ablest of the mhátrás who have already been mentioned as village headmen under the Portuguese were made pátils by Khandoji Mánkar the first subhedár of Sálsette,⁶ and this officer began by raising the assessment of all lands ten per cent above what it had been under the Portuguese, and by establishing a house-tax, a tobacco-tax, and a shop-tax or mohtarfa. Many additional taxes were afterwards imposed,¹ and wherever there seemed room for getting in a fresh one it was levied, even although it might apply only to two or three villages. Sálsette was divided into seven districts, each under a haváldár and kárkuns, and it would appear from this also that there were no regular civil officers between the subhedár and the pátíls. The island, however, notwithstanding these heavy taxations is said to have been prosperous till the death of Báláji Bájiráv in 1761. Returns of the year 1768 show that the district of Kalyán, which extended from the Pen river to the Vaitarna and from the Gháts about thirty miles towards the sea and contained 742 villages, besides the towns of Kalyán and Bhiwndi, had a revenue of $4\frac{1}{2}$ lákhs from the land and $2\frac{1}{2}$ from customs.² This was undoubtedly a very large amount for such a district considering the circumstances of the times. On the other hand Forbes' description of the districts he passed through in 1771 between Álibág and Dásgaon does not give one the idea of the country being much worse off as to cultivation and population than it is now.³

The first event in the Konkan after the accession of Náráyanráv in 1771 was the reduction of Ráygad, the haváldár of which had been for some months in rebellion. About the same time a British envoy was sent to reside at Poona, with the chief object of obtaining the cession of Sálsette Bassein and the islands of Bombay harbour,⁴ which the Court of Directors had now for several years looked on as a matter of the highest importance, declaring in 1769⁵ that Sálsette Bassein and their dependencies and the Maráthás' proportion of the Surat provinces were all that they sought for on the west side of India. Sálsette was wanted because its produce almost supplied Bombay, and with Karanja and Bassein quite sufficed for the wants of the English. Bassein was necessary for the provision of timber for the Company's dockyard.⁶ Some of the inhabitants of the island are said to have treated with the Bombay Government for its delivery a little later than this.⁷ After the death of Náráyanráv the ambition and unpopularity of Raghunáthráv made the alliance of the English very necessary to him, notwithstanding which he at the end of 1774 positively refused to surrender the coveted territory. But just at this time it was rumoured that a Portuguese armament was on the way from Europe to recover Sálsette, and the Bombay Government being determined that no European nation should again settle themselves so close to Bombay resolved to take the island by force. Thána had just been reinforced by 500 Maráthás: but on December 12 a force of 600 European and 1200 Native troops were sent up the creek from Bombay. The batteries were opened on the twentieth; on the twenty-seventh an attempt was made to fill up the ditch, but was repulsed with the loss of 100 Europeans. On the following evening, however, the fort was carried by assault with trifling loss on our side and the greater part of the garrison was put to the sword. Commodore Watson who commanded the naval force had previously been mortally wounded.¹ More than a hundred cannon were found on the walls, but most of them had been damaged or dismantled during the siege.²

In the meantime a small force under Colonel Keating had been sent against Vesáva, and two attempts at escalade were repulsed. But on the fourth day when our batteries opened the fort surrendered. Colonel Keating then took another detachment against Karanja, the fort on the top of which was small, badly constructed, and mounted only fourteen guns. This was soon evacuated, and Elephanta and Hog Island were then surrendered without resistance.³ Thus by New Year's Day of 1775 Sálsette and its dependencies, including Bassein, were in the possession of our Government, and as if to show that Sálsette was not to be given up, the fortifications of Thána were immediately improved by the construction of a glacis and esplanade.⁴ Three months later Raghunáthráv, now hard-pushed by what was called the ministerial party of the Marátha state, ceded Sálsette and other possessions to the English⁵ by a treaty signed at Surat, and from this arose what is known in history as the First Marátha War. Bassein was, however, restored to the Maráthás⁵ and Dásgaon and Kumla, two of the villages belonging to the English on the Bánkot river which had been taken by the Maráthás in February 1775, were retained by them till 1784, it may be presumed by arrangement.⁶

No mention is made anywhere of a declaration of war against the Maráthás but in the same month (December 1774) in which Thána was taken there was a rather serious sea fight off Gheria. The Revenge of twenty-eight guns and the Bombay grab of twenty-four fell in there with the whole Marátha fleet consisting of the Admiral's ship of forty-four guns, three of twenty-four to thirty-two each, five ketches of twelve to fourteen each, and ten gallivats of six to ten each. The four largest bore down on the English ships, but after a warm engagement the Admiral's ship took fire and blew up, and the rest of the fleet fled and got under shelter of Gheria fort. The two English ships saved thirty-four men out of 420 on board the Admiral's ship and sent them into Gheria.⁷

In 1776 the internal dissensions of the Marátha state enabled an impostor to obtain some power, and circumstances made him choose the Konkan as the field of his exploits. He was known as Sadáshiv Chinnáji professing to be the son of Chiunnáji Appa and to have escaped from the field of Pánipat, and he had been for some time in confinement at Ratnágiri in charge of the Subhedár Rámchandra Paránjpe. This man released him and he soon got a large force together, and by the end of the rains had taken twenty of the Konkan forts and had a following of 20,000 men. He marched through the Konkan and soon had possession of most of it, and in October went up the Borghát. There however he was attacked, and being driven down again tried to get protection at Bombay, as the Government had to some extent countenanced him, but not getting admittance he went on to Kolába. Rághoji Angria there took him prisoner and sent him to Poona, where he was soon afterwards put to death. A force was then sent into the Konkan under Bháuráv Phanse and speedily reduced it to obedience. Raghunáthráv, now an exile, and ready to ally himself with any one, had left Surat with the ostensible purpose of joining the pretended Sadáshiv Bháu, but had been compelled to seek shelter at Tárápúr, from whence he came in November to Bombay in one of the Company's vessels.¹ There was at this time owing to the treaty of Purandhar peace between the English and Maráthás, but in January 1777 it was reported from Goa that the Marátha fleet had left Gheria with the design of attacking the Revenge and the Bombay grab, so the two vessels sailed off to look for them. After searching in vain about Gheria the Marátha fleet was found on February 16 at the entrance of a port of theirs called Cole Arbour, three frigates, five ketches and ten gallivats. The two ships went within gunshot of them, but they declined action.²

To the year 1777 also belongs the account of a curious intrigue carried on by an adventurer named St. Lubin in the name of the French Government. It is not clear how far he was authorised by that Government, but it appears certain that his enterprise was made with their knowledge. He arrived on the coast in a French merchant ship in March or April 1777, the port of landing being called "Collaby, a place at the entrance into the river of Chaul." The cargo consisting of artillery, firearms, copper, and cloth, was landed at Chaul, and an escort of twenty-five Arab sepoys, an elephant, twenty camels, and some horse was sent from Poona, with a palanquin, to conduct St. Lubin thither. On his arrival he was well received by Nána Phadnavis, and he presented credentials from the King of France, which the French authorities in India, as well as the English, declared to be forgeries. Nána Phadnavis, however, favoured him, probably with no other object than to annoy the English, whose jealousy of French influence in India was notorious. In January 1778 the Bombay Government were informed that an agreement had been signed at Poona between the ministers and St. Lubin by which Revdanda or Chaul was to be made over to the French, so as to serve them as a port for the disembarkation of troops, and this information is said to have strengthened our Government in their resolution to support Rághoba. But negotiations were still going on with the ministers, and St. Lubin was at last dismissed from Poona in July or August 1778, having before this unsuccessfully applied to the Portuguese authorities to allow French troops to march through their possessions. By this time it had apparently become plain to the Marátha government that they would gain nothing by further negotiations with him.¹ But the question of the cession of Chaul and Revdanda to the French was again under discussion in 1786:² so that the French, who were at this time pressing us so hard in the south of India, would seem to have entertained the idea of opposing us near Bombay also.

By the autumn of 1778 Raghunáthráv was again in the ascendant, and on the pretext that the ministerial party had not observed the treaty of Purandhar a new engagement was entered into by our Government with him under which he was to be recognised as Peshwa, and the province of Bassein and the island of Khándéri were to be ceded to Bombay.³ This led two years later to the only serious campaign in the Konkan in which our troops were ever engaged. The advanced party of the force intended to conduct Raghunáthráv to Poona, took possession of the Borghát, and the main body of the troops left Bombay on November 23, and after taking the fort at Belápur and leaving in it a garrison of sixty men disembarked at Panvel where they remained for several days. After a further unnecessary delay the force went up the Ghát on December 23.⁴ The unfortunate events that followed, including the disgraceful convention of Vadgaon do not belong to the history of the Konkan, but while the army was above the gháts all supplies had to be sent from below, and to keep the road open between Panvel and Khopavli (Campolee) a company of Europeans, three of sepoys, and two guns were sent out under the command of Colonel Egerton. Raghunáthráv had also a force at Kalva opposite to Thána, but the enemy had about the district five thousand horse which had come down the Kására Ghát. It appears on the whole that communications between Panvel and Khopavli were not generally kept open, and that the two parties in the Konkan were pretty equally matched.⁵

Negotiations occupied the whole of 1779, and in October of that year the ministerial party at Poona were so assured of their position that Nána Phadnavis⁶ told General Goddard that the surrender of Sálsette and of Raghunáthráv were essential preliminaries to the making of any treaty. Active operations being then begun various posts between Sálsette and the Gháts were occupied by our troops early in 1780,¹ chiefly to prevent the Maráthás from cutting off supplies from Bombay; for Sálsette which had formerly been so flourishing and prosperous was now pining in decay, so that a few years afterwards it is described as "not cultivating a sufficient quantity of grain to maintain the town and garrison of Thána."² This may no doubt be attributed to our Government having held to the Marátha system introduced after the death of Báláji Bájiráo of farming the lands to the highest bidder. The main part of the army was employed in Gujarát, and it was not till May that Colonel Hartley was sent into the Konkan.³ A small detachment had possession of Kalyán, and was besieged by a large Marátha army, which was to make the attack on May 25, but Colonel Hartley fortunately arrived on the twenty-fourth, and beating up the Marátha camp in the night drove them out of that part of the Konkan. Two battalions were left at Kalyán for the rains, and on August 3 an attempt was made to surprise the fortress of Malangad (Bhau Malan) which was not successful.⁴ Our force, however, occupied the lower works of the fort, and was there surrounded by 3000 Maráthás until relieved by Colonel Hartley on October 1. The next day the Maráthás again took up a threatening position, but Hartley attacked them with such spirit that they shortly afterwards retreated up the Gháts. The rigours of this war are shown by the fact of three emissaries of the Poona government having been blown from guns at Thána in October.⁵

The whole army was now ordered down from Gujarát to the Konkan, the Europeans coming by sea; but General Goddard with the rest of the troops marched from Surat to Bassein. He took twenty-eight days doing this, from the roads being still so deep and the rivers full, and arrived before Bassein on November 13. The fortress at this time is described as a regular polygon without outworks of any description,⁶ but it was strong enough to require the siege to be carried on by regular approaches. The first battery of six guns and six mortars was 900 yards distant from the fort and was opened on November 28. On December 9, a battery of nine heavy guns at a distance of 500 yards was opened, and at the same time another battery of twenty mortars. On the tenth, when a breach was nearly effected, a conditional offer of surrender was made but refused, and next morning the garrison surrendered at discretion. The loss on the British side was but small.⁸ In the meantime the Marátha chiefs had made great efforts to send down troops, and Hartley had been constantly engaged in the neighbourhood of Kalyán and the Borghát and had a large number of sick and wounded. He however on December 8 moved to Titvála in the direction of Bassein to prevent the Marátha force cutting him off from Goddard;¹ and having taken up a strong position in the hills east of Bassein, afterwards known as Hartley's Trap,² was for the next three or four days exposed to the constant attacks of the Maráthás, whom he always repulsed with heavy loss though suffering but little himself. In one of these attacks Rámchandra Ganesh was killed, and Haripant Phádke succeeded to the command of the Maráthá army. Immediately on the surrender of Bassein Goddard hastened to join Hartley, and on the thirteenth the army was united.

The next operation was the reduction of the small island-fort of Arnála, ten miles north of Bassein, and it was not until preparations were made for bombarding it from Agáshi on the mainland that the commandant on January 18, 1781, surrendered.³ It was now determined to threaten Poona rather than secure the Konkan, and the army marched across to the Gháts, and having met with little opposition forced the Borghát on February 8 and occupied Khandála, General Goddard with the head-quarters remaining at Khopavli. Some negotiations followed, after which 12,000 men under Parashráam Bháu Patvardhan were sent into the Konkan, and getting between Goddard's force and Bombay, they, on the night of March 15, attacked a detachment of two regiments with a convoy of stores which had reached Chauk on their way from Panvel. The English force suffered severely, but with the assistance of a reinforcement from Khopavli the whole convoy was brought into the head-quarters camp on the seventeenth. Soon after this Holkar arrived to reinforce Parashráam Bháu, and the Maráthá force now amounting to 25,000 cavalry attacked a large detachment which had been sent to Panvel with unloaded bullocks to bring up stores. The convoy got back from Panvel after a three days' march in which the constant attacks of the Maráthás caused a loss of 106 killed and wounded. The army was now ready to return for the rains to Kalyán and Bombay, but the Maráthás had in the meantime assembled all along that part of the Gháts in great force, and immediately on Goddard leaving the Borghát open, Haripant Phádke followed, and took a considerable quantity of baggage and ammunition, and though the Maráthás dared not molest the army when in camp, yet on the 20th 21st and 23rd of April during the march they so harassed our troops that Goddard's loss before reaching Panvel was 466 killed and wounded, including eighteen European officers. A great part of the army was from here sent down the coast, and the rest after remaining some weeks encamped at Panvel, were sent to Kalyán for the rains.⁴

During the progress of these events Residents had been appointed at Belápur, Kalyán, and Karanja, and from their reports some idea of the state of the country may be gained. The chief object of the Residents was of course to collect the revenues, and in February

1781 (before the operations of that year about Kalyán and the Gháts had begun) it is reported that "Badlápúr and Dámod, which were considerable towns, and every village hut and stack on the high road between Khopavli and Kalyán had been burnt, and the inhabitants for the most part fled." The non-return of seventy-five carts and forty-four oxen which had been taken from Ágáshi by the army, would, it was said, cause great distress to the district of Bassein.¹

No further operations took place in the Konkan after the rains, and in March 1782 the treaty of Salbye was concluded² by which all the recent conquests including Bassein were restored to the Maráthás, though the restoration was not absolutely made for upwards of a year,³ and the cession of Sálsette, Elephanta, Karanja, and Hog Island to the English finally confirmed. No further change of any importance was made in the governing powers of the Konkan for the next thirty-five years, but it may here be mentioned that in 1782 the Maráthás, who had gradually taken from the Jawhár Rájá the greater part of his territories, confirmed him in the possession of the small remainder, which he holds to this day.⁴ In 1783-84, a dispute which the Maráthá state had with the Pant Pratinidhi of Vishálgad about the districts near Ratnágiri held by them jointly was settled by a treaty. These districts included a considerable part of the Sangameshvar Ratnágiri and Rájápúr sub-divisions, the Peshwa's subhedúr at Ratnágiri being the chief authority of that government. The river and port of Sangameshvar are mentioned in this treaty as if they were of importance, and among other stipulations is one that the khots and the páttils who used to be kept two months in Vishálgad fort for the settlement of their accounts, must not in future be detained more than four days.⁵

It is now time to return to the affairs of the coast, where piracy still flourished not less than before the fall of Angria. In 1765 the piracies on the coast south of Vijaydurg induced the Bombay Government to send a force which took Málvan from the Kolhápúr authorities and Ráiri from the Sávant's.⁶ The name of the island-fort at Málvan was changed from Sindhudurg to Fort Augustus, but in the beginning of the following year the place was restored on payment of Rs. 3,60,000.⁷ A promise to pay a further sum was made, and permission given for the establishment of a factory at Málvan, which does not appear to have been made use of. Ráiri was not returned till October 1766, because our Government and the Sávant's could not agree as to the price of it.⁸ Eventually Rs. 80,000 were paid, and the village and the district of Vengurla was made over and mortgaged for thirteen years.⁹ The mortgagee however was not permitted to realize the revenues, and the agreement to abstain from piracy was not observed either by the Kolhápúr state or the Sávant¹. The Bombay Government therefore at the end of the thirteen years refused to restore Vengurla, on which the Sávant¹ in 1780 took it, plundering both public and private property. The Peshwa had in the meantime established a fleet at Vijaydurg under a Marátha named Anandráo Dhulap, whose family remained in power until 1812, and whose descendants still have a small property in the neighbourhood, and though entirely impoverished are considered fit to marry with the families of the Gáikwár and other princes. The Peshwa also had another fleet under the Sar Subhedár of Bassein² and after 1775 his officers paid no respect even to English ships, which they took if they could, and only restored if the capture was quickly and clearly proved against them. On account of these various piratical fleets the coasting vessels could not at this time ply without being convoyed by the Company's vessels. Sixty or eighty of them generally sailed from Bombay to Surat under a convoy of one or two ships. In 1774 five or six Portuguese merchantmen sailed from Goa to Surat convoyed by a sixty-four gun ship, but were attacked by the Maráthás, the frigate put to flight, and the rest taken into Gheria.⁴ In 1780 a ship carrying despatches from the Court of Directors was taken off the coast and carried to Vijaydurg, and the officer sent as a prisoner to Rasálgad, one of the Konkan forts visible from Mahábaleshvar. A more serious affair took place in 1783 after peace had been concluded between the Bombay Government and the Maráthás. The Ranger, a ship of the Bombay Marine, sailed from Bombay on April 5 with several military officers on board: on the eighth when near Gheria she was attacked by Dhulap, and after a fight of five hours was captured and taken into Gheria, where Dhulap denied all knowledge of the peace. Two officers were killed and three besides the commander of the vessel wounded, and no communication was received at Bombay from the survivors till May 23, when a letter of May 5 arrived. The prisoners were released on the twenty-seventh, and arrived in Bombay in the Ranger on the twenty-ninth, she being too much disabled to proceed on her voyage. The bad faith of the Poona government was shown by Dhulap having displayed in the presence of some of the officers the ornaments sent to him from Poona in honour of the achievement.³

The Ángriás who still held Kolába were dependent on the Peshwa, and the Sidis retained their old independence, but were allies of the English. In 1784, however, the latter were parties to an agreement by which the rightful heir to the throne who had been dispossessed by another of his family gave up all his rights in the Janjira territories to the Peshwa in exchange for an estate in Gujarát, and he thus became Nawáb of Sachin, and the alliance between Bombay and Janjira was dissolved. But the usurper was

In 1777 the Málvan district was overrun by the Kolhápúr troops after an insurrection by the chief of Vishálgad and others, and in 1782 there was another expedition in which the chiefs of Vádi were for a time subdued. In 1786 however disturbances again took place, and the Rája of Kolhápúr himself took a large army into the Konkan. He stormed Bharatgad, the fort which commands the beautiful and very fertile valley of Masura, Nivti a well-known fort on the coast between Málvan and Vengurla, and Vishálgad which commands the most level part of the Southern Konkan.² On account, however, of the Sávant's getting assistance from Goa he evacuated Nivti and Vengurla, but appointed mámlatílúrs and other officials to the rest of the newly-conquered territory. Khem Sávant, instead of going on fighting as was usual to him, negotiated with Sindia, and eventually the district was restored to Vádi in 1793. Málvan was however retained by Kolhápúr³ and for a few years this part of the Konkan enjoyed peace. In 1792 while these events were in progress the Bombay Government had prepared an armament against Kolhápúr, but this was not despatched, as a treaty was made by which the English were allowed to have a factory at the island of Málvan (Sindhudurg) and to hoist their flag there till all claims were paid.⁴

A few facts worth recording come into this period and are here mentioned without particular arrangement. In May 1790 a force left Bombay to co-operate with the army which had just invaded Tippoo Sultan's territory. It was disembarked at Sangameshvar, and after halting there five days marched up the A'mba Ghát, the steepness of which is proved by the march up taking only an hour and a half.

Although there was artillery with it, a second detachment went by the same route in the following November. The entrance to the river at Jaygad was at this time defended by forts on each side. A wall of communication ran up the side of the hill on the south shore from a battery of eleven embrasures on a level with the water, which like the other fortifications was in very bad repair.⁵ The factory at Fort Victoria was found useful during this war as the Resident purchased and received from Poona between eleven and twelve thousand bullocks,⁶ and sent them down the coast for the use of the army.⁷ At this time Thána is described as a straggling town with several Portuguese churches and a number of Christian inhabitants. It was garrisoned by a battalion of sepoys and a company of European artillery. The fort is described as small, well built and, although not a complete, yet a strong fortification and always kept in the highest order.¹

In 1790 the Konkan, in common with other parts of Western India, was visited by a great scarcity amounting almost to famine,² but in this respect this district with its generally very heavy rainfall and its easy water communication suffers much less than the dry plains of the Dakhan. Between 1771 and 1790 a survey and assessment in cash of a great part of the Kalyán district was made by Sadáshiv Keshav, Sar Subhedár of the Konkan, and an assessment in grain of part of the Kolába district by a subhedár of Rájpuri in 1784-85.³ But the general survey and assessment of the Konkan proposed by Nána Phadnavis never went further.

There is nothing more to record of the Konkan either of a warlike or peaceable character until the accession of Bájiráv, whose eventful reign, including the fall of the Marátha state, requires a section to itself.

IN 1796 Nána Phadnavis, unable to secure his own power or to prevent the accession of Bájrav, fled to the Konkan, and put garrisons in Pratápgad and Ráygad. He himself stayed at Mahád till October, by which time he had collected an army of 10,000 men.¹ These efforts were so far successful that, under the treaty of Mahád concluded in the same month when Bájrav was enthroned as Peshwa, Nána Phadnavis returned to Poona as minister.² But from this time the chiefs and jághírdárs were utterly uncontrolled and assumed independence, while the Dakhan was overrun with banditti. This state of affairs culminated in October 1802 with the victory of Yashvantrav Holkar over Sindia and the flight of Bájrav from Poona.³ He first went to Sinhgad, but after staying there only three days he hastily retreated to Ráygad, and having released Mahádevrav Ráste, who had been confined there since April of the previous year, he went down to Mahád.⁴ He had with him 6000 or 8000 men, and at his request an English vessel was sent down to Bánkot to take him up to Bombay. He wished to send his family and the families of his attendants to Suvarndurg, but the commandant refused to receive them. Grain for the subsistence of his force had to be sent from Bassein and Bombay, this being the year of the great famine. The Sar Subhedár of the Konkan, Khanderav Ráste, joined him at Mahád from Bassein. About November 22 Holkar with his army came down the Pár Ghát, on which the Peshwa fled to Suvarndurg, while some of his followers took refuge in the English factory at Fort Victoria. Suvarndurg, however, was found to be in a defenceless condition, and the Peshwa therefore embarked in one of his own vessels escorted by two belonging to the Bombay Government. He put into Chaul and stayed there some days, and on again embarking was so harassed by contrary winds that on December 15 he put into Manori in Sálsette, from whence he went on to Bassein, arriving there with about thirty followers on the seventeenth. In the meantime Holkar with 5000 troops had taken with very little resistance Ráygad and Savarndurg and in the latter the Peshwa's family.⁵ Colonel Close who had been awaiting the Peshwa's arrival in Bombay with Mountstuart Elphinstone⁶ then his assistant, went to him at Bassein immediately on his arrival, and there on December 31 was concluded the treaty of Bassein.¹ A field detachment which had been sent to Ghodbandar in the expectation that the Peshwa might find it convenient to take refuge in British territory, was then sent to Bassein, where the Peshwa remained till April 27, 1803.² Entrance into the Bassein island being then as now obtainable only by the bridges at Sopára and Gokhivade "a considerable stockade of palmyra trees" was erected to defend the Sopára bridge.³ Affairs at Poona being at last settled, Bájiráv left Bassein escorted by a British force of 2200 men, including the 78th Regiment, part of the 84th, and some artillery. He stayed at Kalyán for a week and from there marched up the Borghát.⁴

Neither the treaty of Bassein nor either of those concluded in the following year made any difference in the position of the Konkan powers, but the Peshwa had now become to a considerable extent dependent on the British Government, and being supported by them he was able from this time to take vengeance on the chiefs, whose armies were much reduced.⁵ A Marátha force was sent against Suvarndurg on account of the Killedár Hari Ballál Kelkar having thrown off his allegiance, and after an unsuccessful investment a small British force returning from the Malabár coast was ordered to take the island and the ports on the mainland.⁶ The Peshwa's force was encamped at Kelshi, eight miles north of Suvarndurg, and the garrison of the island was said to be 800 men, Arabs and Maráthás, but it was eventually surrendered without resistance, and 200 Native Infantry put in until the orders of the Peshwa should be received. It would appear from all these last events that the fort had not been kept in a proper state of repair, and although both Nána Phadnavis and the Peshwa had followed the old Marátha custom of retiring into the Konkan when too hard pressed above the Gháts, yet neither their habits nor their mode of government led them either to maintain the forts when in prosperity or to turn them to good account in adversity. These strongholds were often made useful as prisons, of which instances have already been given, but neither now nor at the final fall of the Peshwa's power were they found of much use from a military point of view.

The famine of 1802-3, which was so devastating in some parts, appears to have been very partial in the Konkan, as one of the chief causes was absent, the ravages of Holkar. The influx of starving people from the Dakhan is mentioned as causing much of the scarcity in the Northern Konkan and Kolába. In the latter district many deaths are said to have occurred, and the same is stated of the Khed petha, the most rugged of the whole Konkan and the most easily affected by famine. The Málvan district is said also to have suffered severely, and here the ravages of war no doubt assisted the famine. But on the whole it is doubtful if any villages were deserted or depopulated.¹

On the death of Khem Sávant in 1803 the district of Málvan again fell into its usual distracted condition, and in 1806 the Rája of Kolhápúr before the end of the monsoon descended into the Konkan and took Bharatgad and Nivti, but as he soon returned above the Gháts the Vádi troops quickly retorted by overrunning the district and burning the suburbs of Málvan. The cruelties committed on this occasion were something uncommon even in that district, and the Kolhápúr Rája then returned and carried on the war in the Vádi districts, while an advanced party raised the siege of Bharatgad just begun by the Vádi troops. Nivti and Ráiri however had fallen to the Sávants. In 1808 the Kolhápúr troops had to retreat, and in the next year Phond Sávant had to fly before Mán-singhráv Pátankar who followed him as far as Rájápúr and levied a heavy contribution on that town though generally quite beyond the range of Vádi politics. In 1810 the Dakhan troops had again to leave the Konkan, and Ráiri and Nivti were retaken by the Vádi chiefs.² The piracies of both these powers had continued unchecked,³ and their serious import to this Presidency may be judged of by the fact that the Duke of Wellington only two days after the battle of Assaye wrote (with his own hand as was usual to him) a short despatch on the subject to the Bombay Government.⁴ The pirates appear to have been equally bold on the seas north of Bombay, for in 1803 an officer going to Cambay had a guard of sepoys with him who kept their muskets loaded and were constantly on the look-out for pirates.⁵ The remedy adopted was the blockade of the ports belonging to Kolhápúr and Vádi, but this of course could not continue for ever, and in 1812, when the settlement between the Peshwa and Kolhápúr was made, the harbour and forts of Málvan were ceded to the English by Kolhápúr, and the fort of Vengurla with some land adjoining by the Sávants.⁶ Nivti was left to the latter but a guard of British troops was stationed there to see that no piratical vessels made use of the port. From this time till the cession of the whole Konkan, the Bombay Government kept a civil and military establishment both at Málvan and Vengurla. The cession brought to an end the troubles of this district from the Kolhápúr state, but the Sávants by their internal quarrels kept the country in confusion for several years longer.⁷ The claims of the different governments on the district were complicated and extraordinary, the revenue being divided among the Peshwa, the Rája of Kolhápúr, the Sávants, and the Pant of Bávda, with separate payments for the forts at Málvan. In January 1813 the Sávants again took Bharatgad from the Kolhápúr authorities, and it was not restored till a British detachment was sent from Kolhápúr in March. This force afterwards went on to Ráiri, but returned above the Gháts before the monsoon.¹ In 1815 the districts belonging to Vádi in two tarafs north of Málvan were occupied by a force from Málvan,² but this was only to prevent aggression on the part of the Sávants.

Before coming to the events which led immediately to the overthrow of the Peshwa it is necessary to say something about the management of his districts in the last years of the Maráthá government. Long previously to this all the districts had been let out on farm, but Bájiráv allowed every aggravation of this evil, for leases of districts were often summarily annulled on a higher offer being made, and thus the element of uncertainty was added to the other inducements the farmer had to extortion. And if a farmer failed in his payments, not only his own property but that of his securities was confiscated, and very frequently he himself sent to a hill-fort. To the farmers was committed the superintendence of both civil and criminal justice in their districts, which enabled them to increase their exactions by fines. And, as the complaints of the people were never listened to by those in authority at Poona, the farmers would seem to have had no inducement towards leniency, and it may be thought strange that they ever failed to make their contracts pay.³

Bráhmans and other influential people got their lands at lower rates than the common cultivators, and were also exempt from many of the cesses, and this gave rise to what was called the Pándharpesha tenure.⁴ As an instance of summary repression of crime it may be mentioned that the pátíl of Chaúk in 1810 caught two Bhils (more probably Khátkaris) and hung them up by the heels in the sun naked till they died. This is said to have had a good effect on the Bhils.⁵

Among the minor results of the loose system of government that prevailed, may be mentioned the frequent changes in the stations of mámlatdárs, of which the following is an instance. Nasrápúr was originally the head-quarters of the district about Karjat, but on a Devrukhi Bráhman getting the farm of the district he removed his office to Dahivali close to Karjat, where there was a large settlement of Devrukhis. But about 1811 a Chitpávan became farmer or mámlatdár, and a Devrukhi village not been agreeable to him he removed his head-quarters to Kadva. Places may often be found in tolerable proximity, which have at one time or other been the head-quarters of a district, and this may probably often be accounted for by reasons similar to the above.

But notwithstanding the badness of the government the districts below the Gháts were so much better off than those of the Dakhan that they derived considerable advantage from the contrast. There was so little cultivation in the Dakhan owing to the constant movements of Pendhâris and armies, and the population of Poona was so large that the Konkan tâlukâs below the Ghâts where the peace was but little disturbed became the chief granaries of the Marátha government. The Nasrápur division in particular benefited by this state of things, and the average price of rice received by the cultivator in the later days of Marátha rule is said to have been as much as two rupees a man.¹

Chatursing, brother of the Rája of Sâtára, had for several years carried on predatory operations against the Peshwa's government, but he was taken prisoner in 1812 by Trimbakji Dengla, who seduced him to a conference, and was confined until his death in 1818 in the fort of Kángori, where two European officers were also imprisoned in 1817. After Chatursing's imprisonment an impostor carried on the rebellion in his name, and the Rámoshis under him were very active in taking forts and plundering the country. Troops were constantly out after them, but they were never suppressed as long as the Peshwa's government lasted, and the districts of Suvarndurg and Anjanvel are said to have suffered particularly from their raids.² In the beginning of 1817 three or four distinct bodies of Pendâris descended into the Konkan intending to sweep the whole coast as far as Surat. One band completely sacked some large villages near Suvarndurg; another body plundered Mahád in February, but did not venture to attack Dásgaon which was defended by a body of invalids.³ At the same time a body of six or seven hundred was at Panwel, and either this or another force of them advanced as far as Bhiwndi, but were prevented by the rivers from entering the rich coast districts of Bassein and Máhim. They however marched by Asheri to Tárápur and from there up to the Portuguese frontier, the inhabitants of course fleeing before them, and at Bordi, a rich coast village, only a few of the latter had come back in the following year.⁴

Bájiráv three or four years before his deposition had built a palace at Guhágar,⁵ six miles south of Dábhól, both as a hot-weather retreat and to enable him to perform his religious rites on the sea-shore. Every one who has been to this delightful place will acknowledge Bájiráv's good taste in fixing on the "Bay of the Bráhmans" as it was called by the Portuguese and early navigators.⁶ He visited it for some years in succession,⁷ his route being down the Kumbhárli Ghát and through Chiplún, where the building now used as the kacheri was erected for his accommodation. The greater part of the palace at Guhágar was pulled down shortly after our Government took the Konkan, and the materials used for Government buildings at Ratnágiri.⁸

Trimbakji Dengla, when given up by the Peshwa to our Government, was for his many enormities confined in the fort at Thána. The story of his escape thence in September 1816 is told by Bishop Heber with a tinge of romance which certainly makes it more agreeable reading than the official report of the circumstance would be: "Trimbakji was kept in confinement at Thána near Bombay; and while there a common-looking Marátha groom with a good character in his hand came to offer his services to the commanding officer. He was accepted, and had to keep his horse under the window of Trimbakji's prison. Nothing remarkable was observed in his conduct except a more than usual attention to his horse, and a habit while currying and cleaning him of singing verses of Maráthi songs all apparently relating to his trade. At length Trimbakji disappeared, and the groom followed him; on which it was recollected that his singing had been made up of verses like the following:

'Behind the bush the bowmen hide
The horse beneath the tree,
Where shall I find a knight will ride
The jungle paths with me?
There are five and fifty coursers there,
And four and fifty men;
When the fifty-fifth shall mount his steed
The Deccan thrives again.'"

The treaty of Poona in June 1817 which was concluded after several months of resistance to the British demands, gave our Government possession of the whole of the North Konkan, described as "the districts of Bailapoor, Autgong, and Culleann, and all the territories to the north of those districts as far as Gujarát lying between the Gháts and the sea."² It was intended also to procure the cession of the Southern Konkan to complete our command of the coast and because it was believed to be "a fertile country full of strong military positions," but being the native country of the Peshwa and of almost all the principal Bráhmaṇ families³ connected with the Poona government so much opposition was made that the cession could not be insisted upon.⁴ The delivery of Ráygaḍ as well as Sinhgad and Purandhar had in the previous month been demanded as an earnest of the Peshwa's intention to act fairly by us,⁵ and Mr. Elphinstone in a despatch of May 9 wrote that in the event of war there was little doubt that Bájiráv would fly to Ráygaḍ where he might establish himself during the rains without the possibility of military operations being undertaken against him.¹ As however on this occasion the Peshwa yielded at the last moment he lost his last chance of saving himself by the old Marátha safeguard of retreating to the Konkan forts. It is possible that his experiences of Ráygad and Suvarndurg in 1802-3 rendered him less ready to shut himself up in the Konkan than Mr. Elphinstone anticipated. It was said that he had entrusted the principal forts to some of his chief officers, Revdanda being made over to Angria's diwán, and it was believed that the forts were in a better state of defence than proved to be the case.²

Ráygad was restored to the Peshwa in August,³ but after the rains the Bhils and Rámoshis were enlisted by him, and employed in shutting up the passes through the Gháts.² They also invaded the Kalyán district, and numbers of the inhabitants took refuge in the forts of Bassein and Máhuli.⁴ Early in November these marauders held the Borghát. The Bombay troops kept open communications between Khopali and Panwel, but a despatch from General Smith near Poona to the Commander-in-Chief in Bombay had to be sent round by Bánkot.⁵ When the Peshwa moved northwards in December, preparations were made to prevent him from going down into the North Konkan,⁶ and in point of fact he was on one occasion close to the Nánaghát.⁴ The fort of Kotligad in the North Konkan was at this time taken for the Peshwa by a Sardár named Bápuráv Lámibia, but on December 30 was retaken by Captain Brooks without loss.⁷ No other operations were necessary north of Bombay, but small forces were prepared for the reduction of the forts in the Southern Konkan. Hostilities were begun by the capture, at the end of November, of Suvarndurg, which made little resistance. In January 1818 a force under Colonel Prother, consisting of 380 Europeans 800 Native Infantry and a battering train, took Karnála, and within a month afterwards the forts of Avchitgad, Songad, Páli which was bombarded for two hours, and Bharap, the last a strong place the fall of which hastened the surrender of the Pant Sachiv to the British authority.⁸ It was cannonaded for twenty-four hours before surrendering, and an immense store of provisions found in it.⁹ About the same time Mandangad, where there were two forts with a triple stockade in the space between,¹⁰ was taken by escalade by a small force from Suvarndurg under Colonel Kennedy,¹¹ and here a seaman was killed and nine or ten sepoys wounded.⁹ These operations were in many cases very difficult from the necessity of dragging guns up to the top of the hills on which the forts stood. The acquisition of these was considered especially necessary, because the families of our sepoys belonging to this district had been so persecuted by the Peshwa's officers that in January 1818 proclamation was made offering pardon to all sepoys who might on that account have

The Peshwa had now fled so far to the north that fears were no longer entertained of his descending into the Konkan, and Colonel Prother's force was therefore called up into the Dakhan.² There he reduced many forts, including Ráj máchi and Kuári which commanded the two most direct routes from Bombay to Poona.³ In the meantime a detachment under Major Kennett took the fort of Nawapura by escalade. Captain Barrow defeated at the Kasur Ghát (which had for many years been much used by troops passing between the Dakhan and Gujarát) a body of Arab Musalmáns and Kolis commanded by Bápúráv Lámbia, which had plundered and burnt villages in that part of the Konkan. Colonel Kennedy's force reduced Rám gad and Pálgad in the Khed district and paid the killedár Rs. 5000 for the possession of Rasalgad, a place of strength in the same neighbourhood, after which the force occupied Khed.⁴ In April Colonel Prother's force returned to the Konkan with the chief object of taking Ráy gad where the Peshwa's wife was. He was reinforced by six companies of the 67th Regiment, and a detachment of the 89th which up to this time had been at Málvan.⁵ The force first destroyed a stockaded post near Indápur, and there slaughtered a number of the enemy, and after taking the forts of Tala and Ghosála reached Mahád on April 24. On the morning of that day a detachment of the force carried a stockade at the foot of Ráy gad and occupied the petha and thus cut off the escape of the Peshwa's family for which two elephants and a number of camels and horses were found prepared. A passport was sent to the Peshwa's wife, which however did not reach her, as the Arabs fired on the flag of truce. On the twenty-sixth the whole force besieged the fort, and after ten days the garrison began to treat for the surrender, being chiefly impelled to this by a shell from our batteries having set the palace on fire and done a great deal of damage. The negotiations were carried on till May 10, when the fort was surrendered and five lákhs of rupees taken in it. The garrison consisted of 100 Arabs and about 800 other troops. Nearly all the buildings had been destroyed, but there were "marks of grandeur where streets of length with apparently once beautiful and regular buildings had been." The temples and tomb of Shiváji could with difficulty be made out, but most of the destruction had been caused before this siege. The work of Colonel Prother's force, which from first to last had suffered very few casualties, was concluded by the capture of the forts of Lingána, Kángori, Chandangad, and Mahipatgad.⁶ The European troops then returned to Bombay, the Native Infantry were cantoned for the rains at Páli, and a new battalion, composed of those who had deserted from our regiments and had been allowed to return, was formed at Kuári.⁵

In the meantime a force from Málvan under Colonel Imlach had taken the forts belonging to the Peshwa in the Sálshi district. Siddhagad was at first unsuccessfully attacked, but with the help of a detachment of the 89th Regiment, which put into Málvan on account of adverse winds, a second attack was successful.¹ Bhagvantgad made some resistance, and its capture was followed by the occupation of Achra. Devgad was taken and an attempt made on Vijaydurg, but so heavy a fire was opened on our vessels that they were forced to cut their cables and return to Devgad. There a number of the enemy held some stockades on the opposite side of the river and commanded the harbour, but a party attacked and defeated them with considerable loss.

The force under Colonel Kennedy having got possession of all the forts in the Suvarndurg district took Anjanvel on May 17, and from there went on to Govalkot, where it was found that a large body of Rámoshis had been plundering through the district and had taken possession of Chiplún. They however professed peaceable intentions and evacuated the town. The force then took the forts of Bairamgarh and Bháwanganr, and an order was obtained from the Deshmukh of Ratnágiri at Sátára for the surrender of the forts in that taluka, namely Ratnágiri, Purangad, Jaygad, and Sátavli. These were not in our possession till the beginning of June,² and in that month the conquest of the Southern Konkan was completed by the unconditional surrender of the district and fort of Vijaydurg,³ which were held by two brothers of the Dhulap family, one of whom was subhedár of the district and the other killedár of the fort and Admiral of the Peshwa's fleet. The Dhulaps are said not to have been in the fort at the time of our force appearing before it, but two Musalmán brothers fired a few shots from the walls till they were both killed on the spot by the bursting of one of the guns, after which no further resistance was made.⁴ The Admiral's vessel of 430 tons burden, 156 feet long and 33 feet beam, was taken in the river, and the dock, 355 feet long and 257 feet in the broadest part, remains to this day. There was also a small building-yard and a mast-house.⁵

While the South Konkan forts had thus been falling into our hands one by one, Captain T. Dickenson, of the Engineers, had been examining those in the North Konkan ceded to us in the previous year. The chief of these was of course Bassein, but that fortress formerly so much coveted was now found to be "an acquisition of no military importance." Its circumference was upwards of a mile and a half, but it had "fundamental weaknesses in the too great distance between the main defences and the absence of any ditch or parapet of greater pretensions than a breastwork, while the ramparts were in many places overgrown with jungle, and there was scarcely a public building habitable." Arnála was the next in importance of the coast forts, and Tárápur the next, both from its better state of repair and its central position, being about 500 feet in length and breadth, with walls about ten feet thick and, including the parapet, thirty feet high. There were eight other forts on the coast between the Vaitarna and the Daman frontier, and these were generally in rather better condition than those inland, but of little use from their small size, being chiefly kept up as a security against pirates and to command creeks. Of inland forts there were sixteen, mostly insulated and in the middle of the jungle, and there were four which might be called Ghát forts. The gateways of all were said to be the best part, but "it is hardly possible to conceive a more neglected state than the forts generally are in. It would seem that for the last twenty years not the labour of a single person or the expenditure of a rupee has been sanctioned by the Peshwa's government either upon the works themselves or the interior buildings. Even the water in many places has been allowed to become unfit for use." Asheri Malangad and Máhuli Captain Dickenson considered impregnable, but owing to their isolated position useless under our Government, and of the whole he said that "the most insignificant is adequate against a siege by a native enemy; but the best in their present state untenable perhaps for any length of time against Europeans."¹ In the end it was decided that the coast forts should not then be destroyed, as the inhabitants might have a feeling of insecurity without them, and they mostly remain untouched except by natural decay to the present time. Of the inland forts the interior parts were destroyed as far as possible, but the outer works being left, the hills have scarcely lost in picturesqueness. Bassein Arnála and Tárápur, and the Ghát fortresses of Gorakgad Kotligad and Siddhagad held small detachments of soldiers for a short time,² but all have now for many years past been abandoned to solitude.

Thus the operations in the Konkan were brought to an end, and the whole of the districts which had been the Peshwa's came under the British Government. There were still parties of marauders wandering about, and in September 1818 a body of 500 Arabs Maráthás and Patháns were attacked at Poládpur by Lieutenant Crosby, who had been left at Mahád with seventy-five sepoy and 140 horse, and were defeated with considerable loss.³

Two prisoners of importance were kept in the Konkan during the rains of 1818, Chinnáji Appa the Peshwa's brother, who was allowed to remain at Bassein till the season should admit of his proceeding to Benáres,⁴ and Trimbakji Dengla who more than any one else might be called the cause of the Peshwa's destruction. He was again confined in Thána fort, from which he had escaped in 1816, and after the rains was sent to a prison more distant from the scene of his exploits.⁵

THE ENGLISH ESTABLISHMENTS IN THE KONKAN
PREVIOUS TO 1818.Section XI.
The English,

WE have now reached the period when the successive Native governments had given place to the English throughout the whole Konkan. Before proceeding with the history of the Konkan under British rule it is necessary to go back and describe the early settlements made for purposes of trade, and the measures taken for the management of the small possessions of our Government in this part of the Presidency previous to 1818.

As early as 1611 the English East India Company had directed their attention to Dábhól with a view to the establishment of a factory, but they were opposed by the Portuguese.¹ Sir Henry Middleton with three ships went there in February 1612, and stayed some little time, receiving great civility from the Sidi governor, and procuring some trade.² But the Company's settlement at Surat was for some years sufficient for their requirements. In 1618 further attempts were made to trade at Dábhól,³ and in 1624 and for two or three years afterwards difficulties both with the Dutch and the Moghals caused a proposal that the factory and establishment should be removed there from Surat, as the inhabitants had made most friendly offers of accommodation and protection.⁴ This was not carried out, but ten years later a phirman for a factory at Dábhól was asked for and refused, and no further attempt seems to have been made.⁵ In 1638-9 the first Freetraders or Interlopers, the association of Sir William Courten, established a factory at Rájápur in the Southern Konkan, and when, owing to the great power of the Dutch, in the following year the English East India Company desired a place which would be secure from them and capable of fortification, Rájápur was recommended as the best after Bombay. In 1649-50 the Musalmán governor offered the trade of this town to the President at Surat because of the bad character of the Interlopers, who had incurred heavy debts there. The offer was accepted as at Rájápur pepper and cardamoms could be obtained without exposure to the opposition of the Dutch,⁶ and it is also said that the finest bateldás and muslins were at that time produced about there.⁷ But just about this time Courten's association was incorporated with the East India Company, so that the factory at Rájápur was continued on the same footing as before. In 1660 several factories were abandoned but Rájápur was retained.¹ It appears however to have been given up after its plunder by Shiváji in 1664² and not re-established till 1674, though for some years previously there had been proposals for replacing it; for Shiváji, and Sambháji after him, though they oppressed the factors and hampered their trade, always professed to be very anxious to have a factory there.³ But it did not succeed, and in 1676-77 its withdrawal was resolved on owing to the continual extortions of the Maráthás. Shiváji would not however let the factors go and the establishment was not withdrawn till 1681. The list of factories in 1702-3 includes none in the Konkan,⁴ but according to Milburn⁵ that at Rájápur was again established between 1698 and 1708. It could however have been continued but a short time. A French factory had also been established there in 1670.⁶

Hamilton states that the English had a factory at Dábhól, but the writer found no confirmation of the statement, except that Grose in 1750 mentions it as one of the places at which the English have forts factories or settlements: Knox, II. 488; Pinkerton, VIII. 350.⁶ Bruce, I. 357, 568, 444; Macpherson, II. 5. ⁷ Hamilton in Pinkerton, VIII. 352.

Rájápur, which has not often been mentioned in the earlier parts of this history, is by far the best preserved and oldest-looking town in the Konkan. It is built, like so many of the other towns, at the highest navigable point of a considerable river, and as the hills rise almost immediately from the water the whole town is built on a slope, except that part close to the river. The streets are steep and narrow, and the bazárs are covered over as well as paved. The old English factory, a massive stone building with an enclosure leading down to the water, is now used as the kacheri and the walls of another building of European construction, and equally large, are probably the remains of the French factory. Rájápur is the only Konkan port to which Arab buggalows still come direct, and to it only two or three in the year. The rest of the great trade which used to pass to the Konkan ports from Arabia, the Persian gulf, and the Red Sea is now all swallowed up in Bombay.⁷

It does not seem that our East India Company had ever any other factory in the Konkan previous to their acquisition of Bánkot or Fort Victoria in 1756 (see Section VIII). But in 1668 when the Sidi made overtures to the English at Bombay to assist him, the Factors there suggested to the Supreme Council at Surat the many advantages which Janjira possessed over Bombay.⁸ No notice was taken of the suggestion, but as the history of Janjira does not come within the scope of this memoir it may here be mentioned that, after Bombay and Goa, there is no bay or inlet on the coast of the Konkan of such striking natural beauty as Janjira, while the two rocky islets in the bay are in their present condition much more picturesque than any European power would have been likely to leave them.

⁷ Rájápur is also made interesting by two well-known objects of Hindu pilgrimage, a temple over an intermittent spring, popularly called Ganga, which rises at the end of the cold weather and lasts for two or three weeks, and the temple of Dhopeshtar (properly Dhutápáreshvar 'the cleanser from sin') situated in a romantic ravine, to which a very pleasant paved road has been made within the last few years. The rise of Ganga is looked for with anxiety by the inhabitants, as its non-appearance is considered a bad omen.

Of the French as connected with the Konkan besides their factory at Rájápur and the intrigue of St. Lubin, given in Section IX, the only thing that can be mentioned is that in June 1696 there was an indecisive engagement off the Vengurla rocks between seven Dutch and five French ships. The Dutch retired to Goa and the French to Surat.

The successes of the Dutch against the Portuguese have already been described. After the decline of the Portuguese the Dutch still had their fortified factory at Vengurla, but do not appear ever to have come into collision with the English in the Konkan. There was always however great jealousy between the two nations, and in the treaty concluded with the Marátha state in October 1756 the first article provided that the Dutch should be excluded from the Marátha dominions, and another article forbade their admission to Dánda-Rájápur.¹ In 1767 they are said to have wished to have a factory at Bassein, and still later the jealousy between them and the English at Surat and elsewhere was very strong.²

As has been already stated the acquisition of Bánkot and its dependent villages in 1756 gave our Government its first territorial possessions on this coast, and from that time different arrangements, though of course at first on a very small scale, became necessary. The fort and factory however were what were chiefly considered. No provision for the administration of criminal justice was made except as regarded the most trifling offences, but the Residents were in the habit of sending offenders for examination and trial before the Courts in Bombay,³ and in 1797 the then Resident was superseded for having gone beyond his powers in punishing a deshmukh for 'contumacy.'⁴ The pay of the civil officers and the number of the sepoys were increased or reduced rather with reference to the finances of the Presidency than on any other consideration, and in 1772 there were but 120 sepoys with a proper proportion of officers. In 1780 the armament of the fort was two twelve-pounders, five nine-pounders, twelve six-pounders, and four four-pounders. In 1781 the financial embarrassments of the Presidency caused the whole expenses of Bánkot, including the troops, to be reduced to Rs. 2000 a month.⁴ The Chiefs constantly complained of their small profits, but Dr. Hové in 1789 wrote⁵ that the Chiefs of this factory commonly retired after a few years with immense sums, and that the post was calculated as good as the councilship at Bombay. In 1802 however the pay of the Chief was raised to Rs. 600, and private trade forbidden to him.

neighbouring islands but Goa also,¹ appears to have been in 1818, after forty years of our government, little, if any, better than those districts just taken from the Maráthás. In 1787 Dr. Hové for the space of twelve miles saw no village nor marks of present culture: remains of large buildings testified to its former prosperity, but all was now "pining in decay. Here and there are remains of wells and marks of former culture, but no person now thinks culture an honourable employment." An intelligent writer in 1794 mentioned with approval a proposal that had been made a few years before to establish a colony of Chinese in the island.² In 1804 Lord Valentia found that little had been done to increase the produce of the island, the greater part being useless jungle, and even wood being only procurable at a very high price, owing chiefly to want of arrangement.³ In 1811 the Secretary to the Bombay Government wrote of "the present half-populated and half-cultivated state of Sálsette."⁴ And in 1824 Bishop Heber speaks of Sálsette as "strangely unimproved neglected and uncivilised, having no towns except Thána and Ghodbandar, very little cultivation except the tara palm and cocconut, which grow almost spontaneously amid the jungle, and displaying in the cottages of its peasantry a degree of poverty and rudeness which I have seen nowhere in India except among the Bhils."⁵ A striking description of the wildness of the inhabitants is also given in Hamilton's Gazetteer.

It must be remembered however that Lord Valentia's visit was immediately after the famine of 1802-3, and that 1824 also succeeded two years of drought. But the records of Government show that not much had been done up to 1808 to restore the island from the condition into which it had fallen during the occupation of the Maráthás. For fourteen years after we took it no change was made in the system of revenue and collections. Lands were still farmed out to the highest bidder, and the English Chief of Sálsette was paid by the cesses called sar deshmukhi and sarpáteli imposed by the Maráthás. The grain assessment had yielded under the Portuguese 10,077 mudás of rice, under the Maráthás it fell to 7465, and under our Government in 1794-95 to 6075. In 1798 the jamábandi was fixed at two-thirds of the Portuguese assessment, and most of the cesses imposed by the Maráthás were abolished. But the tax on grazing lands and on wood-cutting, the mohtarpha or tax on trades, and that on fisheries were retained, and the result was that the village of Bándra paid altogether over Rs. 12,000 in revenue, and was said to be "most lightly assessed."⁶ The fact is that our Governors, who in those days were always more or less in financial difficulties, had not foresight enough to see the virtue of really light assessments, and thought they were doing wonders when they relieved the people of a few of the extraordinary number of taxes imposed by the Maráthás. But the relief was insufficient, and the effect very small.

In 1801 a permanent settlement was offered to the then holders of land in Sálsette, with a decennial settlement of commutation rates, but it was accepted by only four individuals,¹ although sanads had been prepared and printed at an expense of several thousand rupees.² In 1807 the grain assessment had risen to 8320 mudás, but apparently with less land under cultivation. At the end of the previous century large estates had been granted to a few British subjects in Sálsette with a view to the improvement of the country, and several of the present (so-called) khots of Sálsette derive their rights from these original grantees. Between 1798 and 1803 the Sion causeway was built,³ which was undoubtedly the greatest possible benefit to Sálsette, and in the last-mentioned year the customs duties which had been hitherto levied on all goods passing between the two islands were abolished.⁴ Thus it will be seen that the Bombay Government of those times were not so much indifferent to the welfare of the territory they had gained as ignorant of the greatness of the abuses which the Maráthás had allowed, and slow in removing them.

But where their financial position was not affected, they showed more consideration, for provision for the administration of criminal justice was made very soon after the acquisition of territory. In Sálsette and Karanja the Residents had from the first been empowered to investigate all offences and misdemeanors not capital with the assistance of two native assessors, while capital cases were sent to Bombay for trial by the Mayor's Court. In 1799 a Judge and Magistrate was appointed for the islands vested with civil criminal and police jurisdiction.⁵ In civil suits an appeal was reserved to the Governor in Council sitting as the Sadar Adálat, while the more serious criminal cases were committed to the Court of Session, which consisted of the Junior Member of Council and two civilians nominated for the occasion. Quarterly sessions were held at the stations of the Magistrates, and capital sentences required the confirmation of the Governor in Council. Provision was even made for the trial of suits against Government, and the jurisdiction of the Judge and Magistrate of Sálsette was in 1803 extended to Bántot and its dependencies, and the Court required to sit in that district for 20 days in each year.⁶ In 1807 the junior member of Council became sole Session Judge of Sálsette.⁷ The arrangement however only lasted till 1810, and after that the Provincial Court of Circuit and Appeal at Surat received jurisdiction over Sálsette.⁸ By the same Act separate Magistrates were appointed for Karanja, as inconvenience was felt from the island being dependent on the periodical visits of the Sálsette Magistrates, and from there being no communication with the other stations for three months in each year. These arrangements continued till the cession and conquest of the rest of the Konkan in 1817-18, and the history of the district since that era may now be continued.

SECTION XII.

BRITISH RULE.

IN 1818 the whole Konkan, with very little more exception than at the present time, was under the British Government. The state of Sálsette has been described in Section XI, and it is also of importance to show the condition of the rest of the Konkan at the time of its acquisition. No one who knows the Konkan now will suppose that it can have been very flourishing under the Maráthás, and it is in fact easy to prove that bad as was the condition of Sálsette that of the rest of the district was far worse.

The system of farming out offices to the highest bidder was in the later years of the Peshwa's government rendered still more odious by the insecurity of the possession of these farms : for so-called leases were often summarily annulled on a higher offer being made. At the same time the taxation was exceedingly oppressive : in the Northern Konkan a list of thirty-six different taxes is given, cesses being levied even on cattle, vegetables, and poultry. The poverty of the people in general and the number of deserted villages were sufficient evidence of the evils of this system. "The Kolis, Bhils, Kátkaris, Thákurs, and other almost savage tribes who inhabit the jungles" were in the habit of plundering the villages at every opportunity, and were said to be in the most degraded state of human nature.¹ In the neighbourhood of the forts (which it must be remembered were scattered all over the districts) "the country was for miles round with scarcely an inhabitant, almost without an implement of any kind, or an artificer of the humblest description."² Only one exception is mentioned to the generally wretched state of the country, the island and sub-division of Bassein, where sugarcane and plantains were as now produced in abundance. "From Bassein to Dántivra every inch of the ground is highly cultivated, and the comparative and well-known wealth of the inhabitants is ascribable to the fertility and highly cultivated state of the island."³ There was also an excellent road from Dántivra to the Damanganga, but here the coast villages seem to have been freely plundered by the Pendhárís.²

though even there very few of the villages consisted of "more than a rude cluster of thatched mud huts," and it was stated as their misfortune that there were no village walls for defence, so that the Thags and Rámoshis were frequent visitors.¹ "A man wearing a decent turban or ever so coarse a dress attracts one's attention as being above the lower orders."² The sub-divisions of Suvarndurg and Anjanvel were said to be the most prosperous of all in the Southern Konkan, and the revenue there soon after the establishment of our Government was "easily and punctually collected."¹ It seems probable that the khots, while themselves forming a body of men less poverty-stricken than the ordinary ryots, protected the latter to some extent from the rapacity of the Peshwa's officers.³ The produce of the whole district was reported as very small: still the natural remark was made that "on viewing the face of the country, which to a cursory observer presents little less than bare hills, rocks, ravines, jungle, and mountains, the surprise is rather that there is so much, than that there is no more." The population was put down at 640,000, and as this included some part of the present Kolába district, while the present population of Ratnágiri alone is put down as over a million, the difference will be seen to be very great.

This being the general state of the country it must be stated that at least three causes concurred to depress rather than to improve the condition of the people during the first years of British rule. In the first place the Konkan suffered in a very excessive degree from the return of the military men now thrown out of employ, as, besides numbers who had served in the cavalry and infantry, most of the forts in the Dakhan as well as along the Gháts and in the Konkan had been in a great measure garrisoned by Konkanis.² Secondly the great demand for grain, especially rice, in the Dakhan and particularly at Poona which resulted from the absence of cultivation above the Gháts and the presence of a great Court and army at Poona, suddenly ceased, for the Court and army disappeared together, and the immediate increase of cultivation in the Dakhan made it independent of the supply of Konkan grain, so that it soon became an exporting instead of an importing country.⁴ Thirdly the ruin of the Chitpávan dynasty which had always kept the great offices of the State to a great extent in the hands of members of that caste and had favoured other natives of the Ratnágiri district, could not have been otherwise than a most serious loss to so poor a country as the Southern Konkan. The measures taken for the improvement of the district were to a great extent counterbalanced by these inevitable causes of distress.

Before entering on the general settlement of the country it was necessary to define the rights of those Marátha states which under the supremacy of the Peshwa had held a great part of the coast of the Southern Konkan. Málvan, the sea-port of the Kolhápúr territories, had been ceded since 1812, so that the arrangements now made with that state did not affect the Konkan. But to gain the forts of Nivti and Ráiri in consequence of the injuries committed on the inhabitants of our villages by the Sávantvádi state, a force under Sir William Grant Keir, consisting of a wing of the 89th Regiment, 2½ battalions of Native infantry, and three troops of Native cavalry and artillery, entered the Konkan in January 1819. The heavy stores and ordnance were sent by sea. Nivti which had a garrison of 300 men, was invested and surrendered on February 4 without resistance, and the force proceeded by sea to Ráiri, the defences of which were found to be formidable. On the thirteenth at day-break fire was opened on the fort by four battery guns and four eight-inch mortars, which in an hour dismantled the whole of the guns in the outworks, and then directed their fire against the general defences till 3 p.m., when the storming party of 330 men of the 89th Regiment in two columns assaulted the fort, and gained the outworks with a loss of eight killed and twenty-seven wounded, the latter including two officers. The enemy retained possession of the inner works that night, but most of them escaped before morning, and the remainder then surrendered.¹ A treaty was concluded by which the whole of the coast villages from Málvan to the Portuguese frontier were ceded and about twenty inland villages composing the districts of Pát and Ajgaum. These last however were restored in the following year and the coast villages alone retained.²

It was not found necessary to deprive the Kolába state of any part of its territories, which by gradual encroachments of the Poona government had been much curtailed, but a treaty defining the conditions of its dependence on the British Government was concluded in 1822. Finally, the Pant Sachiv of Bhor, who had rights over many villages in the Konkan, was settled with on the principle of exchange of villages and revenue.³

For several years after this and up to 1830 the Kolis and other forest and hill tribes in the North Konkan gave constant trouble by their depredations both above and below the Gháts, and made it necessary to send out small detachments for the protection of the country.⁴ Notwithstanding this the generally peaceable character of the Konkan may be gathered from the fact that as early as 1820 there were not more than three battalions scattered over its whole extent, the Northern Konkan and down to Bánkot being included in the Poona Division of the Army and the Southern Konkan remaining a separate command, only because of its distance from Poona and Bombay.⁵ Thána had of course been maintained as a military station ever since our Government got possession of Sálsette, and at the beginning of this century there was also a military establishment at Vesáva,¹ fifteen miles north of Bombay.² Vesáva had been spoken of by Gemelli³ as one of the three forts of Sálsette and the harbour is mentioned by Hamilton as deep enough to receive ships of the greatest burden.⁴ A small force was kept at Bhiwandi for some time and also at Panwel. There have now for many years been no troops in the district, except a wing of a Native Infantry Regiment at Thána.

In the Southern Konkan small detachments were kept for some years at Bánkot Málvan and Vengurla, which had all been for some time in our occupation, and also at Harnai. It was thought necessary, however, to make one regular military station, and Dápoli was fixed upon. About 1840 the regular troops were removed, and the veteran battalion alone kept there, and after 1857 this also was abolished, and the Southern Konkan left without any military force whatever.

Thána had from the first been the civil station of Sálsette, and became naturally the capital of the North Konkan. On July 11, 1825, Bishop Heber consecrated the church which had just been finished, and which he describes as "extremely elegant and convenient, and the effect very pleasing."⁵ It was necessary also after we took the country in 1818 to fix on a place for civil headquarters in the Southern Konkan. Bánkot Málvan and Vengurla were out of the question as being at the extremities of the district. Officers sent to report on the matter considered that Jaygad Vijaydurg and Ratnágiri were the three most suitable spots,⁶ and eventually the choice fell on the last-named, which has since been the head-quarters of the district. About 1830, however, the North and South Konkan were joined into one collectorate, but this arrangement did not last long.

The first Collector of the North Konkan, Mr. Marriott, lost no time in recommending the abolition of a great number of the taxes, and within a year or two a rough survey was made of the whole collectorate.⁷ But even in 1833 Sir John Malcolm wrote of "the hitherto unproductive island of Sálsette," and only looked forward to its improvement by "respectable and opulent natives of Bombay" settling in it.⁸ Yet for several years after he had left India our Government levied duties at the rate of twenty-five per cent on all goods imported from the east into Sálsette and the other parts of the district which had belonged to the Portuguese. This was a Marátha impost, and our rulers apparently thought it so harmless as to retain it when many other taxes were abolished.¹ The ruggedness of both Konkans and the intersection of the country by large tidal rivers prevented the improvement of the greater part of it by road-making, so that it is only within the remembrance of the present generation that anything has been done to open out the inland parts of the district. But before the end of 1830 a great military road had been constructed from Panwel to Poona, and the Borghát opened for wheeled vehicles, which the Poona Government had on political grounds refused to let our Government repair as long as it was in their power.² This new road was said by Sir John Malcolm "to break down the wall between the Konkan and the Deccan." About the same time the road from Thána to Násik (afterwards part of the Ágra road) was made, and the opening of the Talghát, though it was not available for wheeled vehicles, had the greatest effect on trade, for up to that time Berár cotton used to reach Bombay by the circuitous route of Surat. The Kumbhárli Ghát was also made at this time, although not then passable for carts, and the road across Mahábaleshvar from Sátára to Mahád was completed at the joint expense of the Rája of Sátára and our Government.³

Thus something was done to improve the inland parts of the province, and the coast villages have from the beginning of our rule flourished and increased. The Konkani Bráhmans had not lost their old aptitude for government, nor the Konkani Maráthás their inclination towards military employ : so that, though a great part of the district had not, up to a few years ago, made much progress, and a small portion was and still is inhabited by some very uncivilised tribes, yet as a whole the Konkan probably felt the blessings of peace and strong government as much as most other parts.

In 1836-38 a new assessment was made all over the Thána district, chiefly by Mr. J. M. Davies. It was found that owing to the fall in the price of grain in the Konkan Sadáshiv Keshav's assessments of 1788 which had then represented one-third of the produce were now equivalent to one-half, and a reduction of rates had to be made accordingly. Up to this time and for several years after the cultivation of the hill lands, which is now so largely carried on, was of very trifling extent, and scarcely any restrictions were placed on the destruction of trees which from their abundance were thought of little value.¹ In the Southern Konkan owing to the peculiarity of the tenures the survey was delayed almost up to the present time.

The two political events of chief consequence in the Konkan between 1820 and 1850 were the lapse of the state of Kolába in 1840 on the death of the last of the A'ngriás of the direct and legitimate line,⁴ and the insurrection and military operations in the Vádi district in 1844-45. The sub-divisions of the Kolába state with those of Pen, Rájपुरi, Mahád, and Thal, which had hitherto been the charge of the First Assistant Collector of Thána, were formed into a sub-collectorate and recently into an independent collectorate. The Sávantvádi disturbances scarcely extended to the Málvan sub-division although its villages are much mixed up with those of the Vádi state, but one of the insurgent leaders attempted to raise the people of Málvan against our Government.¹ The Konkan was only affected by the mutinies of 1857 by a wing of the Native Infantry Regiment which mutinied at Kolhápúr being at Ratnágiri and the fears entertained that the mutineers would march down. A steamer was sent to take away the ladies and children from Ratnágiri, but no disturbance took place. The ruffian, afterwards known as Nána Sáheb, was the son of a poor Bráhmaṇ of Vengaoṇ a village of Karjat, and was adopted at the age of four by the Peshwa Bájiráv. Nána with his parents and brothers then went to live with his adoptive father in Bengal, and the Konkan had no more to do with him. The gifted French naturalist Victor Jacquemont in October 1832 contracted the illness of which he died two months later by his botanical exploration in "the pestilential jungles of Sálsette."

Since 1850 the condition of the Northern Konkan has been entirely changed by the railways that pass through it, and the roads which now render most parts accessible. Sálsette in particular now (1883) presents a very different appearance from that described forty years ago. The hills are still covered with jungle, but are therefore more valuable than if scanty crops were grown on them, and much even of the better land is every year left uncultivated, but only because the grass gives a valuable return without the trouble and expense of tillage. The great numbers of carts which during the whole fine season pass along the roads and the flourishing appearance of the villages prove that Sálsette has now to a great extent at least recovered the prosperity it had 200 years ago. The rest of the Northern Konkan is in various stages of progress, part having improved nearly as rapidly as Sálsette and two or three sub-divisions being still, owing to want of population, not much better than the whole was described as being in 1818. Of the Southern Konkan the two northern sub-divisions, that is those nearest Bombay, are but little behind Sálsette, but the greater part of it is, and by the nature of its position must remain much isolated, while its greater poverty prevents the rapid extension of its communications, so that up to about 1860 it was probably but little different from what it was in 1818. But a cart-road now runs through the whole length of it, and steam navigation has of course been in its favour. The district still manages to attract to itself money earned in other parts of India, while those of the natives who take service elsewhere generally return to end their days in the place where they were born. During the years of the great public works in Bombay thousands of labourers used to go up there for the working season and return home for the rains, and though this practice declined with the decline of speculation in Bombay, greater numbers than ever find their subsistence in the factories of Bombay.

Looking at the future prospects of the Konkan it must be said that the Northern Konkan at present suffers in its inland parts from a want of population and capital, but the whole of it may in time be as flourishing as the coast villages are now. The Southern Konkan is overpopulated, and nothing can make any but a small part of it fertile, nor does it seem likely that it will be ever distinguished by manufactures, or that mineral wealth will be developed. But it holds a race of men who in the last century conquered nearly the whole of India, and who show no signs of degeneration, and no one can for a moment suppose that the progress of education and science will leave the country of the most intelligent and industrious of Indian races unknown and unimproved.

P. 207, line 20, at the end add The Karhād charter was issued in 880 Śaka, i. e. 18 years after the Wardhā grant. It contains two stanzas more about Kṛishṇa III. than the latter ; and these must in consequence be regarded as alluding to events which occurred between Śaka 862 and 880. As stated therein, to consolidate his power Kṛishṇa deprived some of his feudatories of their principalities, and granted them to others who were meritorious ; some were separated from each other and others joined together. "With the idea of conquering the south, he uprooted the Chola race, placed the territory ruled over by it under his own dependents, made the kings of the Chera, Pāṇḍya, and other countries along with Siṃhala or Ceylon his tributaries, and erected a triumphal column at Re(ā)mes'vara." In an inscription at Ātakūr in the Maisur territory, dated 872 Śaka, Kṛishṇarāja is represented to have fought with the Chola prince Rājāditya and killed him. In this last act he was assisted by Būtuga, his Gaṅga feudatory mentioned above, and Būtuga was rewarded for his services by being granted additional territory.² In a village in the Chingleput district of the Madras Presidency, which must have formed a part of the ancient kingdom of the Pallavas, there are two inscriptions dated in the seventeenth and nineteenth years of the reign of Kannaradeva, i. e. Kṛishṇadeva, in which he is spoken of as the conqueror of Kachchi or Kāñchīpura the capital of the Pallavas and Tañjai identified with Tanjor (Tañjāvūr or Tañjāpura) which was the capital of the Chola princes. Another inscription at Vellore is dated in the twenty-sixth year of his reign ; and there are two more containing his name in South Arcot³ which was probably included in the Chola kingdom. These facts bear out the statement in the Karhād grant of his having uprooted the Chola race and held the country by placing it under his dependents, and another in this and the Wardhā grant that the Pallavas were destroyed by him. This latter event, however, took place before Śaka 862 the date of the Wardhā grant, while the conquest of the Chola prince came on later. By the Karhād charter which was issued on Wednesday the 13th of the dark half of Phālguna when 880 years had elapsed since the time of the Śaka king, the cyclic year being Kālayukta, Kṛishṇa granted,—while encamped at Melpātī with his victorious army for the purpose of apportioning the southern provinces among his dependents, taking charge of all the possessions of Areśvara, and constructing temples to be dedicated to certain gods,—the village of Kaṅkim in the district of Karahātaka to the great Śaiva ascetic Gaganasīva who was the pupil of Īśānasīva and was conversant with the Śivasiddhāntas or sacred books of the Śaiva sect, for the benefit of the whole group of ascetics. It would appear from this that Śaivism flourished about the district of Karhād at this period.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE DEKKAN.

INTRODUCTORY.

Introductory.

INDIA has no written history. Nothing was known till within recent times of the political condition of the country, the dynasties that ruled over the different provinces which composed it, and the great religious and social revolutions that it went through. The historical curiosity of the people was satisfied by legends. What we find of a historical nature in the literature of the country before the arrival of the Mahomedans comes to very little.

I. We have a chronicle of Kaśmir called the Rājatarāṅgiṇī, in which, however, there is a good deal which is not supported by contemporary evidence. Now and then, a bountiful prince or minister found a poet to sing his glories; and the works thus composed, contain a good deal of historical information, though, of course, an undue praise of the patron and his ancestors is to be expected. But a few such works only have hitherto been discovered; and the oldest of them gives an account of a prince who lived in the first half of the seventh century. The literature of the Jainas of the Śvetāmbara sect contains accounts mostly of the later princes of Gujarāt and other noted personages. There are also similar accounts of the princes of Rājaputāna. In the beginning or at the end of some Sanskrit works the names of the princes under whose patronage or in whose reign they were composed, are given; and sometimes we find a long genealogy of the family to which the particular prince belonged, with some short observation with reference to each of his ancestors. Lastly, the Purāṇas contain genealogies of the most powerful royal families which ascend to a higher antiquity than the works noticed hitherto.

II. But the information to be gathered from all these sources is extremely meagre; and there are many provinces on the history of which they do not throw any light. And the facts mentioned in them cannot be systematically arranged, or even chronologically connected, except with the assistance of other sources of information to which we shall now proceed. The invasion of Alexander the Introductory. Great brought the Greeks in contact with the Hindus; and his successors in Syria kept up an intercourse with the Indian emperors for a long time. The notices of Indian persons and events contained in the writings of the Greeks, when compared with the statements occurring in the Purâṇas, admit, in some cases, of an easy identification; and from the known dates of the corresponding Greek persons or events, we are able to determine those of the Indian persons or events. In this manner the date of the foundation of the Maurya dynasty by Chandragupta has been determined to be about 322 B.C., and a good many other dates in Indian history have been ascertained. The writings of Chinese authors also throw a great deal of light on some periods of Indian history. Buddhism was introduced into China in the first century of the Christian era; and from time to time men from that country came to India as pilgrims; and some Indian Buddhists also must have found their way to China. The Chinese pilgrims wrote accounts of what they saw and did in India, and these works, which have come down to us, are very valuable for the elucidation of Indian history. The Chinese possessed a perfect system of chronology, and the dates of the pilgrimages are useful for the purposes of the Indian antiquarian. Valuable accounts of India written by the Arabic visitors to the country in the Middle Ages have also become available.

III. Another very important source, and fuller than any hitherto noticed, consists of inscriptions. Some of these are cut on stones or rocks, and others engraved on copperplates. These last are in all cases charters conveying grants of land made mostly by princes or chiefs to religious persons or to temples and monasteries. A great many of these are dated in one of the current eras. It is usual in these charters to give the pedigree of the grantor. The names of his ancestors together with some of their famous deeds are mentioned. As the authors who composed the grants cannot be expected to be impartial in their account of the reigning monarch, much of what they say about him cannot be accepted as historically true. And even in the case of his ancestors, the vague praise that we often find, must be regarded simply as meaningless. But when they are represented to have done a specific deed, such as the conquest of Harshavardhana by Pulakesi II. of the early Châlukya dynasty, it must be accepted as historical; and when we have other sources available, we find the account confirmed, as Hwhan Thsang does that of Pulakesi's exploit. Even in the case of the reigning monarch, the specific deeds such as wars with neighbouring princes, which are mentioned, may be accepted as historical; though, however, legitimate doubts may be entertained as regards the reported results. Introductory.

The stone-inscriptions are intended to commemorate the dedication of a temple or monastery or any part thereof, and of works of public utility such as tanks and wells, and sometimes grants of land also. A good many of these benefactions are by private individuals; but not seldom the name of the king, in whose reign the dedication was made, is given together with the year of his reign, as well as the date in the current era. When it is a royal benefaction that is commemorated, we have a longer account of the reigning prince, and sometimes of his ancestors.

The great pioneer in the deciphering and interpretation of inscriptions was James Prinsep; but no great progress was made after him, in this branch of antiquarian work, till the establishment of the "Indian Antiquary" and the institution of the Archæological Survey. These gave a strong impetus to it, and many scholars entered into the field with zeal. Twenty years ago, it would have been impossible to write the following pages.

IV. I must not omit to mention old coins as a valuable source of information as to the names of the successive monarchs of a dynasty, and sometimes their dates. A study of these too has led to very important results.

The materials for the history of the development of Indian thought and of changes in the social condition are the whole literature itself. But this is an independent inquiry with which we are not here directly concerned; and the conclusions arrived at are applicable to the whole Hindu race, and not to any particular province. I have consulted general literature only in discussing points concerning the Âryan settlement of the Dekkan. The materials used in the preparation of the other sections, which fall under each of the four classes noticed above, are as follows :

Since the political history of the Dekkan before the advent of Mahomedans was entirely unknown before, and the difficulty of ascertaining facts is very great, my object has been to collect as many of them as possible. The absence of proportion in the space allotted to important and unimportant events due to this circumstance, will, it is hoped, be excused. This does not pretend to be a literary production, but merely a congeries of facts.

SECTION I.

ETYMOLOGY OF THE WORD "DEKKAN" AND ITS DENOTATION.

THE word "Dakkhan" represents the vernacular pronunciation of the Sanskrit word Dakshiṇa, meaning "southern," used to designate the portion of the Indian Peninsula lying to the south of the Narmadâ. The name more usually met with in Sanskrit works and elsewhere is Dakshiṇâpatha or "the Southern Region." That this name was in ordinary use in ancient times is shown by the fact that the author of the Periplus calls that portion of the country Dakhinabades.¹ In the vernacular or Prâkrit speech of the time, the Sanskrit Dakshiṇâpatha must have become Dakkhiṇâbadha or Dakkhiṇâvadha by the usual rules, and the Greek writer must have derived his name from this popular pronunciation. The shorter form of the name also must have been in use, since in the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era, Fah-Hian,² the Chinese traveller, was told at Benares that there was a country to the south called Ta-Thsin, which word corresponds to the Sanskrit Dakshiṇa.

Dakshiṇâpatha or Dakshiṇa was the name of the whole peninsula to the south of the Narmadâ. Among the countries enumerated in the Mârkaṇḍeya,³ Vâyu,⁴ and *Mâtsya*⁵ Purâṇas as comprised in Dakshiṇâpatha are those of the Cholas, Pâṇḍyas, and Keralas, which were situated in the extreme south of the peninsula, and correspond to the modern provinces of Tanjor, Madura, and Malabâr. In the Mahâbhârata, however, Sahadeva, the youngest of the Pâṇḍu princes, is represented in his career of conquest to have gone to Dakshiṇâpatha after having conquered the king of the Pâṇḍyas.⁶ This would show that the country of the Pâṇḍyas was not included in Dakshiṇâpatha. Again, the rivers Godâvarî and others springing from the Sahyâdri are spoken of in the Vâyu Purâṇa as rivers of Dakshiṇâpatha⁷, while the Narmadâ and the Tâpî are not so styled; whence it would seem that the valleys of those rivers were not included in Dakshiṇâpatha. The word thus appears not to have been always used in the same sense. In modern times it is the name of the country between the Narmadâ on the north and a variable line along the course of the Kṛishṇâ to the south, exclusive of the provinces lying to the extreme east. It is thus almost identical with the country called Mahârâshtra or the region in which the Marâthî language is spoken, the narrow strip of land between the Western Ghâts and the sea being excluded. A still narrower definition is that which excludes from this tract the valleys of the Narmadâ and the Tâpî; and to this extent we have seen that there is authority for it in the Vâyu Purâṇa. Thus the word Dekkan expresses the country watered by the upper Godâvarî and that lying between that river and the Kṛishṇâ. The name Mahârâshtra also seems at one time to have been restricted to this tract. For that country is, in the Purâṇas¹ and other works, distinguished on the one hand from Aparânta or Northern Konkan, and from the regions on either side of the Narmadâ and the Tâpî inhabited by the Pulindas and S'abaras, as well as from Vidarbha on the other. In a comparatively modern work entitled Ratnakosâ,² Mahârâshtra, Vaidarbha, Tâpî-tata-deśa and Narmadâ-tata-deśa (i. e., the countries on either side of those rivers), and the Konkan are spoken of as distinct from each other. The Dekkan or Mahârâshtra in this the narrowest sense of the word forms the subject of the present notice.

SECTION II.

SETTLEMENT OF THE ÂRYAS IN THE DEKKAN.

It is now a recognised fact that the Âryas who came to India were at first confined to eastern Afghanistan and the Panjâb. Thence they emigrated to the east and for a time the easternmost province occupied by them was Bramhâvarta or their holy land, lying between the rivers Sarasvatî the modern Sarasuti, and Drishadvatî,¹ a stream in the vicinity, that is, the country about Thanesar. There the system of castes and orders and the sacrificial religion seem to have been fully developed. Thence they spread to the east and the south, and gradually occupied the whole country between the Himâlaya and the Vindhya. This last mountain range must for a long time have formed the southern boundary of their settlements. For the name Âryâvarta or the region occupied by the Âryas, as explained by Manu² and even by Patañjali,³ the author of the Mahâbhâshya on Pânini's grammar, signified exclusively the part of the country situated between those mountain ranges. The Vindhya, which by its height seemed to obstruct the passage of the sun, was impassable to them. The name Pâriyâtra was given to the more northern and western portion of the range from which the rivers Chambal and Betvâ take their rise, probably because it was situated on the boundary of their Yâtrâ or range of communication. After a while, however, the sage Agastya, in poetical language, bade the mountain not to grow high, that is, crossed it and established an Âsrama or hermitage to the south and thus led the way to other settlements. The first or oldest Âryan province in the southern country must have been the Vidarbhas or the Berârs. For in the Râmâyana when Sugrîva the monkey-king sends his followers to the different quarters in search of Râma's wife Sitâ and Râvana her ravisher, he directs them to go among other southern countries to Vidarbhas, Richikas, and Mahishakas, and also to Daṇḍakâranya (the forest of Daṇḍakâ) and the river Godâvarî.⁴ This shows that while the country about the Godâvarî, that is, the Dekkan or Mahârâshtra in the narrowest sense of the terms, was a forest, Vidarbha was an inhabited country. In the Mahâbhârata also Agastya is represented to have given a girl that he produced by his miraculous powers to the king of Vidarbha, and after she had grown to be a woman demanded her of the king in marriage.⁵ In the Râmâyana, Râma is represented to have lived for a long time in Daṇḍakâranya, at a place called Pañchavaṭî situated on the banks of the Godāvarī about two yojanas from the hermitage of Agastya.¹ That this Dandakāranya was the modern Mahārāshtra is shown by the fact stated above, that it was watered by the river Godāvarī, and by several others. According to the Hindu ritual it is necessary when beginning any religious ceremony to pronounce the name of the country in which it is performed. The Brāhmins in Mahārāshtra do not utter the name Mahārāshtra but Dandakāranya with the word deśa or "country" attached to it. In the introduction to Hemādri's Vratakhanda, a work written more than six hundred years ago, Devagiri, the modern Daulatābād, is spoken of as situated in a district on the confines of Dandakāranya. Nāsik claims to be the Pañchavaṭī where Rāma lived. But the poet could hardly be expected to have brought his hero from the Vindhya to such a remote westerly place as Nāsik. The river Godāvarī must, from the description occurring in the Rāmāyana as well as in Bhavabhūti's Uttara Rāmacharita, have been wide at Rāma's Pañchavaṭī. It could hardly have been so at Nāsik, which is very near its source. On the other hand, "the region about the northern part of the Sahyādri through which flowed the river Godāvarī and in which Govardhana was situated" is in the Purāṇas represented as "the most charming on earth; and there, to please Rāma, the sage Bhāradvāja caused heavenly trees and herbs to spring up for his wife's enjoyment, and thus a lovely garden came into existence."² In the Mārkaṇḍeya, Govardhana is spoken of as a town; but the Vāyu and the Mātsya seem to mean it to be a mountain. This Govardhana must, from the given position, be the same as the village of that name near Nāsik; and thus the three Purāṇas must be understood as supporting the identification of Pañchavaṭī with Nāsik.

But though Mahārāshtra was the last country occupied by the Indian Āryas, their subjugation of it was no less thorough than that of all the northern countries. Here, as there, they drove some of the aborigines to the fastnesses of mountains and jungles, and incorporated the rest into their own society. The present Marāṭhī language is as much an offshoot of the Sanskrit as the other languages of Northern India. The ancient representatives of these dialects—the Mahārāshtrī, the Sauraseni, and the Māgadhī, as well as an earlier form of speech, the Pāli—show extensive corruptions of Sanskrit sounds, reducible however to a few general laws. These cannot be accounted for by the natural operation of the causes which bring about the decay of a language spoken throughout its history by the same race. For, this operation is slow and must be in continuance for a very long time in order to produce the wide-going phonetic changes which we observe in those Prākṛit dialects, as they are called. This long-continued process must at the same time give rise to a great many changes in other respects. Such, however, we do not find in those dialects, and they do not in those respects show a very wide departure from the Sanskrit. The extensive corruptions of Sanskrit sounds, therefore, must be accounted for by the supposition that the language had to be spoken by races whose original tongue it was not. Those alien races could not properly pronounce the Sanskrit words used by the conquering Āryas; and thus the Prākṛit forms of Sanskrit words represent their pronunciation of them. A few sounds unknown to Sanskrit as well as some words not traceable to that language are also found in the Prākṛits, and these point to the same conclusion. It thus appears that the Indian Āryas in their progress through the country came in contact with alien races, which were incorporated with their society and learnt their language, at the same time that they preserved some of their original words and phonetic peculiarities.¹ This was the state of things in the north down to the Marāthā country. But farther south and on the eastern coast, though they penetrated there and communicated their own civilization to the aboriginal races inhabiting those parts, they were not able to incorporate them thoroughly into their own society and to root out their languages and their peculiar civilization. On the contrary, the Āryas had to learn the languages of those races and to adopt a portion at least of their civilization. Thus the Kanarese, the Telugu, the Tamil, and the other languages now spoken in Southern India are not derived from the Sanskrit but belong altogether to a different stock, and hence it is also that southern art is so different from the northern. The reason why the result of the Āryan irruption was so different in Southern India from what it was in the north appears to be that when the Āryas penetrated to the south there existed already well-organized communities and kingdoms. In the passage in the Rāmāyaṇa, referred to above, the monkey-soldiers are directed to go to the countries of the Andhras (Telugu people), the Pāṇdyas, the Cholas, and the Keralas, in the south; and are told that they will there see the gate of the city of the Pāṇdyas adorned with gold and jewels. And these races, their country, and their kings are alluded to in other Sanskrit works, as will be noticed hereafter. In the north, however, at the time of the Āryan invasion, the condition of the country must have been similar to that of Daṇḍakāranya, which is represented in the Rāmāyaṇa as a forest infested by Rākshasas or wild tribes who disturbed the religious rites of the Brāhmaṇ sages. And throughout the older portion of Sanskrit literature, which is to be referred to the times when the Āryas were gradually progressing from the Panjāb, the wild tribes they met with are spoken of under the name of Dasyus, Rākshasas, and others.

² Mārkaṇḍeya, Chap. 57 Verses 34-35; Vāyu, Chap. 45 Verses 112-114; and Mātsya, Chap. 112 Verses 37-39. The passage, however, is corrupt. The three Purāṇas evidently derive their reading from the same original, but the text has been greatly corrupted. The most ancient version of it seems to be that in the Vāyu.

The Āryas

Northern India in the time of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa.

WE will now endeavour to determine approximately the period when the Āryas settled in Daṇḍakāraṇya, and trace the relations between the civilized Āryan community of the north and the southern country at different periods of Sanskrit literature and at well known dates in Indian history. In the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, which is anterior to the whole of the so-called classical Sanskrit literature, the sage Viśvāmitra is represented to have condemned by a curse the progeny of fifty of his sons to "live on the borders" of the Āryan settlements, and these, it is said, "were the Andhras, Puṇḍras, Śābaras, Pulindas, and Mūtibas, and the descendants of Viśvāmitra formed a large portion of the Dasyus."¹ Of these the first four are spoken of as people living in the south, the Puṇḍras in the Rāmāyana, and the other three in the Purāṇas.² From the later literature, the Pulindas and Śābaras appear to have been wild tribes living about the Vindhya.³ Ptolemy places the former along the Narmadā. The Andhras, who in these days are identified with the Telugu people, lived about the mouth of the Godāvarī or perhaps farther to the north. If these were the positions of the tribes in the time of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, the Indian Āryas must at that time have been acquainted with the whole country to the north of the Vindhya and a portion to the south-east of that range.

Also in Pāṇini's time.

Pāṇini in his Sūtras or grammatical rules shows an extensive knowledge of the geography of India. Of the places and rivers mentioned by him a good many exist in the Panjāb and Afghanistan; but the names of countries situated in the eastern portion of Northern India also occur in the Sūtras. The countries farthest to the south mentioned by him are Kachchha (IV. 2, 133), Avantī (IV. 1, 176), Kosala (IV. 1, 171), Karās'a (IV. 1, 178)⁴

⁴ This name does not occur in the Sūtra, but is the second in the list or Gaṇa beginning with Bharga. As regards the words occurring in these Gaṇas, I have on a previous occasion expressed my opinion that though it is not safe to attribute a whole Gaṇa to Pāṇini (and in several cases we have clear indications that some of the words were inserted in later times), still the first three words might without mistake be taken to be his. This was objected to by Professor Weber. But as my reasons were, as I thought, obvious, I did not think it necessary to defend my view. I may, however, here state that since Pāṇini refers to these Gaṇas in his Sūtras by using the first word in the list with ādi, equivalent to "and others," added to it, and since he uses the plural of the noun so formed, and the plural of a noun cannot be used unless three individuals at least of the class are meant, it is proper that we should understand him to be thinking of the first and two words at least more. This observation is meant to be applicable generally. In the present case, however, the expression Bhargādī forms a part of the compound, and the plural is not actually used, though it is clearly implied.

and Kalinga (IV. 1, 178).¹ The first is the same as the modern country of that name, Avantî is the district about Ujjayinî, and Kalinga corresponds to the modern Northern Circars. Kosala, Karîṣa, and Avantî are mentioned in the Purāṇas as countries situated on the back of the Vindhya.² In the Ratnâvalî, a dramatic play, Kosala is also placed near that mountain range. Supposing that the non-occurrence of the name of any country farther south in Pāṇini's work is due to his not having known it, a circumstance which, looking to the many names of places in the north that he gives, appears very probable, the conclusion follows that in his time the Āryas were confined to the north of the Vindhya, but did proceed or communicate with the northernmost portion of the eastern coast, not by crossing that range, but avoiding it by taking an easterly course.

Kātyāyana, however, the object of whose aphorisms called Vārtikas is to explain and supplement Pāṇini, shows an acquaintance with southern nations. Pāṇini gives rules for the formation of derivatives for the names of tribes of warriors which are at the same time the names of the countries inhabited by them, in the sense of "one sprung from an individual belonging to that tribe," and also, it must be understood, in the sense of "king of the country." Thus a man sprung from an individual of the tribe of the Pañchālas, or the king of the country Pañchālas, is to be called Pañchāla; a descendant of a Sālva, or the king of the country of the Sālvas, is to be called Sālveya, &c. Kātyāyana notices here an omission; the name Pāṇḍya is not explained by Pāṇini. Kātyāyana therefore adds, "one sprung from an individual of the tribe of the Pāṇḍus or the king of their country, should be called a Pāṇḍya."³ Similarly, Pāṇini tells us that in either of these senses no termination should be appended to the word Kambojas, which was the name of a non-Āryan people in the north-west, nor should any of its vowels be changed; but that the word Kamboja itself means "one sprung from an individual of the Kamboja tribe, or the king of the country of the Kambojas."⁴ Kātyāyana says that in this rule, the expression "and others" should be added to the word Kambojas; for the rule applies also to the names "Cholas and others," that is, persons sprung from an individual of the Chola and other tribes, and the kings of the Chola and other countries should be called by the names "Chola and others." Similarly, Pāṇini tells us that the countries Kumudvat, Naḍvat, and Vetasvat are so called because they contain Kumudas or water-lilies,

Nāḍas or reeds, and Vetās or canes, respectively.¹ Kātyāyana adds, "Mahishmat is so called because it contains Mahishas or buffaloes."

Now Mahishmat appears to be the same southern country which in the Purāṇas is associated with Mahārāshtra and is called Mahishakas. Māhishmatī on the banks of the Narmadā was probably its capital. Here we may, I think, argue, as Professor Goldstucker has done in many similar cases, that had Pāṇini known the Pāṇḍyas, Cholas, and Mahishmat, he would not have omitted the names from his rules, considering how careful a grammarian he was. Very likely, then, he did not know them, and this supposition is strengthened by the fact alluded to above that the name of no other southern country occurs in his Sūtras. Thus then the Āryas of the north were not familiar with the southern countries and tribes in the time of Pāṇini, but were so in the time of Kātyāyana. The latter author also mentions a town of the name of Nāsikya,² which is very likely the same as our modern Nāsik.

relations between Patañjali.

Between
and Pāṇini.

Patañjali shows an intimate acquaintance with the south. As a grammarian he thinks it his duty to notice the lingual usages in the south, and tells us that in Dakṣiṇāpāṭha the word Sarasī is used to denote large lakes.³ He mentions Māhishmatī,⁴ Vaidarbha,⁵ Kāñchīpura⁶ the modern Conjeveram, and Kerala⁷ or Malabār. Patañjali's date, B.C. 150, may now be relied upon. That author notices variant readings of Kātyāyana's Vārtikas as found in the texts used by the schools of the Bhāradvājiyas, Saunāgas, and others. Some of these might be considered as emendations of the Vārtikas, though Patañjali's introduction of them by the verb paṭhanti, "they read," is an indication that he regarded them as different readings. A sufficiently long time therefore must have elapsed between Kātyāyana and Patañjali to give rise to these variants or emendations. I am therefore inclined to accept the popular tradition which refers Kātyāyana to the time of the Nandas who preceded the Mauryas, and to assign to him the first half of the fourth century before Christ. In this manner the interval between Kātyāyana and Patañjali was about two hundred years. Now, Professor Goldstucker has shown from an examination of the Vārtikas that certain grammatical forms are not noticed by Pāṇini but are taught by Kātyāyana, and concludes that they did not exist in the language in Pāṇini's time. I have followed up the argument in my lectures "On the Sanskrit and Prākṛit languages,"⁸ and given from the Vārtikas several ordinary instances of such forms. From these one of two conclusions only is possible, viz., either that Pāṇini was a very careless and ignorant grammarian, or that the forms did not exist in the language in his time. The first is of course inadmissible; wherefore the second must be accepted. I have also shown from a passage in the introduction to Patañjali's Mahābhāṣya, that verbal forms such as those of the perfect which are taught by Pāṇini as found in the Bhāṣhā or current language, not the Chhāndasa or obsolete language, had gone out of use in the time of Kātyāyana and Patañjali, and participles had come to be used instead.¹ Professor Goldstucker has also given a list of words used by Pāṇini in his Sūtras in a sense which became obsolete in the time of Kātyāyana, and shown what portion of Sanskrit literature did not probably exist in Pāṇini's time but was known to Kātyāyana, and in one case comes to the not unjustifiable conclusion that the time that elapsed between Pāṇini and Kātyāyana was so great that certain literary works which either did not exist in Pāṇini's time or were not old to him came to be considered by Kātyāyana to be as old as those which were old to Pāṇini. No less an interval of time than about three centuries can account for all these circumstances. Pāṇini, therefore, must have flourished in the beginning of the seventh century before the Christian era, if not earlier still; and against this conclusion I believe no argument has been or can be brought, except a vague prejudice. And now to our point, the Indian Āryas had thus no knowledge of Southern India previous to the seventh century before Christ; they had gone as far as the Northern Circars by the eastern route, but no farther; and the countries directly to the south of the Vindhya they were not familiar with. About that time, however, they must have begun to penetrate still further, since they had already settled in or had communication with the countries on the northern skirts of the Vindhya and Kalinga, and first settled in Vidarbha or Berār, approaching it still, it would appear, by the eastern route; but in the course of some time more they crossed the Vindhya and settled in Daṇḍakāranya along the banks of the Godāvarī, that is, in Mahārāshtra or the Dekkan. Before B.C. 350 they had become familiar with the whole country down to Tanjor and Madura.

The Āryas

A chronological conclusion based on the occurrence of certain words or names in the great epics is not likely to be so safe. Though a Mahābhārata existed before Pāṇini and Āśvalāyana, it is highly questionable whether our present text is the same as that which existed in their times. On the contrary, the probability is that the work has been added to from time to time; and the text itself has undergone such corruption that no one can be positively certain that a particular word was not foisted into it in comparatively modern times. The text of the Rāmāyana also has become corrupt, though additions do not seem to have been made to it. Still the Bengali rescension of the poem like the Bengali rescensions of more recent works does contain additions. The text prevalent in this part of the country and in the south is more reliable; and though innumerable differences of reading exist in the different manuscripts even on this side, still there is hardly any material difference. Dekkan alluded

the date of the Rāmāyana is uncertain; the present Hindu belief based on the Purāṇas is that Rāma's incarnation is older than Krishna's, and consequently the Rāmāyana older than the Mahābhārata; but it is not a little curious that while there is an allusion to Vāsudeva and Arjuna and to Yudhishtira in Pāṇini, and Patañjali frequently brings in Mahābhārata characters in his illustrations and examples, there is not one allusion to Rāma or his brothers or their father Daśaratha in the works of those grammarians. Even a much later author, Amarasimha the lexicographer, in his list of the synonyms of Vishṇu, gives a good many names derived from the Krishna's incarnation; but the name of Rāma, the son of Daśaratha, does not occur, though Rāma or Balabhadra, the brother of Krishna, is mentioned. Still, whatever chronological value may be attached to the circumstance, the occurrence of the names of places in the Dekkan contained in those epics I have already to some extent noticed. Sahadeva is represented to have subdued the Pāṇdyas, Draviḍas, Uḍras, Keralas, and Andhras,¹ and also to have visited Kishkindhā, which was probably situated somewhere near Hampi, the site of the Pampā lake or river, where Rāma met Sugrīva the monkey chief, though the country Kaishkindha is placed by the Purāṇas among those near the Vindhya. He went also to S'ārparaka, the modern Supārā near Bassein, Daṇḍaka, the same as Daṇḍakāranya but not mentioned as a forest, Karahātaka the modern Karhāḍa on the confluence of the Krishna and the Koinā, and to others. The countries mentioned in the passage in the Rāmāyana, alluded to above, as lying to the south are Utkala, probably the modern Ganjam, Kalinga, Daśārṇa, Avantī, Vidarbha, and others. The district near Bhilsā must have been called Daśārṇa in ancient times; for its capital was Vidiśā, which was situated, as stated by Kālidāsa in the Meghadūta, on the Vetravati or Betvā, and is thus to be identified with the modern Bhilsā. All these are thus in the vicinity of the Vindhya or nearly in the same line with it farther east. But between these and the southernmost countries of the Cholas, Pāṇdyas, and Keralas, the Rāmāyana mentions no other place or country but Daṇḍakāranya. This condition of the country, as observed before, is to be considered as previous to the Āryan settlements in the Dekkan, while that represented by the Mahābhārata in the place indicated seems subsequent; and herein we may see a reason for believing that the Rāmāyana is the older of the two epics. The name Mahārāshṭra does not occur in either of them.

In the middle of the third century before Christ, Aśoka, the great king of the Maurya dynasty reigning at Pātaliputra in Magadha, speaks in the fifth Edict of his rock-inscriptions, which are found at Gīrnār in Kāthiāvād on the west, Dhauli in Katak and Jaugad in Ganjam on the eastern coast, at Khalsi in the Himālaya, Shahbaz-garhi in Afghanistan, and Mansehra on the northern frontier of the Panjab, of his having sent ministers of religion to the Râstikas and the Petenikas and to the Aparântas.¹ The last which we know best is Northern Konkan, the capital of which was Sûrparaka. Petenikas is not unlikely the same as Paithanakas, i.e., the people or country about Paithana on the Godâvari. The vernacular pronunciation of the name of the city, which in Sanskrit is Pratissthâna, was in those days, as it now is, Pethana or Paithana, for both the author of the Periplus and Ptolemy call it Paithana or Baithana. The Râstikas, or, according to the Mansehra version, Ratrakas, corresponding to the Sanskrit Râshtrikas, were very likely the people of Mahârâshtra, for a tribe of the name of Ratthas has from the remotest times held political supremacy in the Dekkan. One branch of it assumed the name of Râshtrakûtas and governed the country before the Châlukyas acquired power. It re-established itself after about three centuries, but had to yield to the Châlukyas again after some time. In later times, chieftains of the name of Ratthas governed Sugandhavarti or Saundatti in the Belgaum districts. In the thirteenth Edict in which the countries where Asoka's moral edicts were respected are enumerated, the Petenikas are associated with Bhojas instead of Râstikas. Bhojas, we know, ruled over the country of Vidarbha or Berâr² and also in other parts of the Dekkan. In the inscriptions in the caves at Kudâ,³ the name "Mahâbhoja" or Great Bhoja occurs several times, and once in an inscription at Bedsâ. Just as the Bhojas called themselves Mahâbhojas, the Râshtrikas, Ratthis, Ratthis, or Ratthas called themselves Mahârattthis or Mahârattthas, as will be shown below, and thus the country in which they lived came to be called Mahâratttha, the Sanskrit of which is Mahârâshtra. In the second and the thirteenth edicts, the countries of the Cholas, Pândyas, Ketalaputras (Chera or Kerala), and the Andhras and Pulindas are mentioned. Thus about a hundred years before Patânjali, the whole of the southern peninsula up to Cape Comorin was in direct communication with the north, and the Dekkan or Mahârâshtra had regular kingdoms governed by Ratthas and Bhojas.

countries and ninety-nine thousand villages. Hwan Thsang, the Chinese traveller, calls the country ruled over by the Châlukyas in the second quarter of the seventh century, Moholocha, which has been properly identified with Mahârâshtra. The occurrence of the name of Mahârâshtra in the Purânas has already been noticed.

POLITICAL HISTORY OF THE DEKKAN OR MAHÂRÂSHTRA—ANALYSIS OF THE HISTORICAL INSCRIPTIONS IN THE CAVE-TEMPLES OF WESTERN INDIA.

Section IV.

Extent of the dominions of
and Asoka.

No clue to the political history of Mahârâshtra in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era is now available. The Purânas contain lists of kings and dynasties whose chronology has been to some extent determined by their known connection with the successors of Alexander the Great; but clear traces of their occupation of the south have not yet been found. Chandragupta, who founded the Maurya dynasty in about B.C. 320, ruled over Northern India as far as Kâthiâvâd, and his grandson Asoka, who reigned from B.C. 263 to B.C. 229, retained possession of the province.¹ The rock-inscriptions of the latter, which were evidently planted in the countries which owned his sway, show that his empire extended to Kalinga or the Northern Circars in the east and Kâthiâvâd in the west. But stray edicts have been discovered farther south; a fragment of the eighth being found at Supârâ and three minor ones on the northern frontier of Mysor. In the second rock-edict he speaks of his own dominions as "the conquered countries" and mentions Chola, Pândya, Ketalaputta, and Saliyaputta down to Tambapanni or Ceylon as outlying provinces. These therefore did not own his sway. But in the fifth edict he mentions the Râstikas, Petenikas and Aparântas and a few more provinces as those for the benefit of which he appointed religious ministers. If these were as much a part of his dominions as the many others which are not named, there is no reason why they should be named. Again he includes most of these in the thirteenth edict among countries which received his moral teaching, along with Chola, Pândya and others, and the territories ruled over by Antiochus and four other Greek princes. It would thus appear that though the countries of the Râstikas, Bhojas, Petenikas, and Aparântas were not outlying provinces like those of the Cholas, the Pândyas, and Ketalaputtas, they enjoyed a sort of semi-independence; and only owned allegiance to him as suzerain. The appearance of fragments of his inscriptions at Supârâ and on the confines of Mysor is to be accounted for by this fact, or by the supposition that his dominions extended up to Supârâ on the western coast and along a strip in the centre of the peninsula to Mysor, leaving the western countries of the Râstikas, the Bhojas, and Petenikas, and the southern coast in a state of semi-independence. And there is some positive evidence to that effect. Vidarbha, the country of the Bhojas, must have existed as a separate kingdom about that time. For in the dramatic play of Mâlavikâgnimitra, the political events narrated in which may be accepted as historical, Agnimitra the son of Pushyamitra, the first king of the Śuṅga dynasty, who reigned in the second and third quarters of the second century before Christ, is represented to have reigned at Vidiśā, which I have before identified with Bhilsā, probably as his father's viceroy. He had made proposals of marriage with Mālavikā to her brother Mādhavasena, the cousin of Yajñasena, king of Vidarbha. Between these cousins there was a quarrel as regards the succession to the throne. When Mādhavasena was secretly on his way to Vidiśā, the general of Yajñasena, posted on the frontier of the kingdom, captured him. His counsellor Sumati and Mālavikā escaped, but Mādhavasena was kept in custody. Thereupon Agnimitra demanded of Yajñasena the surrender of Mādhavasena. Yajñasena promised to give him up on condition that his wife's brother, who was the counsellor of the last Maurya king and had been imprisoned by Agnimitra or his father Pushyamitra, should be released. This enraged Agnimitra, who thereupon sent an army against Yajñasena and vanquished him. Mādhavasena was released, and the country of Vidarbha was divided between the two cousins, each ruling over each side of the river Varadā.

Paithan also must have been the capital of a kingdom about the time. In the inscriptions in the caves at Pitalkhorā near Chālis-gāmv, which from the forms of the characters in which they are engraved must be referred to the second century before Christ, the religious benefactions of merchants from Pratishthāna are recorded, as well as those of the physician to the king and of his son and daughter.¹ The king referred to must be the ruler of Pratishthāna or Paithan. No more particular information is available. On the history of the early centuries of the Christian era and the first century previous, however, the inscriptions in the cave-temples on the top of the Sahyādri throw a good deal of light. I will here bring together the information deducible from them, noticing the inscriptions in the chronological order clearly determined by the forms of the characters.

An inscription² in a small cave at Nāsik mentions that the cave was scooped out by the lieutenant at Nāsik of king Krishṇa of the Sātavāhana race. In a cave at Nānāghāt there is another, which is much mutilated and the purport of which consequently is not quite clear. In that same cave figures of persons are carved on the front wall, and the following names are inscribed over them: 1, Rāyā Simuka Sātavāhana, i. e., king Simuka Sātavāhana; 2, Devī Nāyanikāyē, rāñño cha Siri Sātakanino, i. e., of queen Nāyanikā and king Śrī Sātakanī; 3, Kumāro Bhāyā, i. e., prince Bhāyā; 4, Mahārathānanakayiro, i. e., the heroic Marāthā leader or the hero of the Marāthā tribe; 5, Kumāro Haku Siri, i. e., prince Haku Śrī; 6, Kumāro Sātavāhana, i. e., prince Sātavāhana. Of these the second Kārli has been mentioned along with his queen must have been the reigning prince, the first was an earlier king of the same dynasty, the fourth was a local Marâthâ warrior, and the rest were young princes of the Sâtavâhana dynasty.

In another Nâsik cave there are four inscriptions. In the first we are told that the cave was caused to be constructed on mount Triraśmi in Govardhana or the Nâsik District by the benevolent Ushavadâta, the son-in-law of king Kshaharâta Nahapâna and son of Dînika. Ushavadâta gave away three hundred thousand cows; constructed flights of steps on the river Bârâsâyâ; assigned sixteen villages to gods and Brâhman; fed a hundred thousand Brâhman every year; got eight Brâhman at Prabhâsa or Somanâth Paṭṭan married at his own expense; constructed quadrangles, houses, and halting places at Bharukachohha or Bharoch, Daśapura in Mâlva, Govardhana, and S'orpâraga, the modern Supârâ near Bassein; made gardens and sank wells and tanks; placed ferry boats over the Ibâ, Pârâdâ, Damanâ, Tâpî, Karabenâ, and Dâhanukâ, which were rivers along the coast between Thâna and Surat; constructed rest-houses and endowed places for the distribution of water to travellers on both sides of these rivers; and founded certain benefactions in the village of Nânaingola, for the Charanas and Parishads (Vedic schools of Brâhman) in Piṇḍitakâvada, Govardhana, Suvarṇamukha, S'orpâraga, and Râmatîrtha. One year in the rainy season he marched at the command of his lord to the relief of the chief of a tribe of Kshatriyas called Uttamabhadras, who had been attacked and besieged by the Mâlayas. At the sound of his martial music the Mâlayas fled away, and they were made the subjects of the Uttamabhadras. Thence he went to Poshkarâni and there performed ablutions and gave three thousand cows and a village.¹

In the second inscription Ushavadâta is spoken of as having, in the year 42, dedicated the cave monastery for the use of the Buddhist mendicant priests coming to it from the four quarters. He deposited with a guild of weavers residing in Govardhana a sum of two thousand Kârshâpanas at an annual interest of one hundred Kârshâpanas. Out of this interest he directed that a garment should annually be given to each of the twenty priests residing during the rains in his cave monastery. With another guild he deposited one thousand Kârshâpanas, the interest on which was seventy-five Kârshâpanas. Out of this other things (Kusana) were to be provided for the priests. The carrying out of these directions was secured by their being declared in the corporation of the town of Govardhana and inscribed on the door of the monastery. In the years 41 and 40 he gave away a large sum of money² for gods and Brâhman. The third inscription, which is a short one, mentions that the apartment on which it is engraved was the religious benefaction of Ushavadâta's wife Dakhamitrâ.³ The fourth is greatly mutilated but sufficient remains to show that that also records some gifts of Ushavadâta's.⁴ In the cave-temple of Kârli there is another inscription of the son in which Ushavadâta is represented to have granted the village of Karjika for the support of the mendicant priests in the cave monastery of Valûraka, as the hill or the country about it seems to have been called at the time.¹ There also is given an account of his charities similar to that in the first of his Nâsik inscriptions. In an inscription at Junnar, Ayama, the minister of the lord Nahapâna the great Kshatrâpa, is mentioned as having caused a tank to be dug and a hall to be constructed.² The minister appears to have been a Brâhman, since he is spoken of as belonging to the Vatsa Gotra.

Next in order come the inscriptions in which certain kings of the names of Gotamîputra Sâtakarṇi and Puḷumâyi are mentioned. In the longest of the four occurring in the cave-temple at one extremity of the hill at Nâsik, we are told that in the nineteenth year of the reign of king Puḷumâyi, the son of Vâsi-shṭhî, the cave was caused to be constructed and dedicated for the use of Buddhist mendicants of the Bhadrâyanîya sect by Gotamî, the mother of king Sâtakarṇi Gotamîputra. She is there called "the mother of the great king and the grandmother of the great king." Gotamîputra is spoken of as king of kings and ruler of Asîka, Asmaka, Mûlaka,³ Surâshṭra, Kukura, Aparânta, Anûpa, Vidarbha and Akarâvanti.⁴ He was the lord of the mountains Vindhyâvat, Pâriyâtra, Sahya, Kṛishṇagiri, Malaya, Mahendra, Sreshṭhagiri, and Chakora. His orders were obeyed by a large circle of kings, and his feet were adored by them. His beasts of burden drank the waters of the three seas. He protected all who sought an asylum with him, and regarded the happiness and misery of his subjects as his own. He paid equal attention to the three objects of human pursuit, viz., duty, worldly prosperity, and the satisfaction of desires, appointing certain times and places for each. He was the abode of learning, the support of good men, the home of glory, the source of good manners, the only person of skill, the only archer, the only hero, the only protector of Brâhmanas. He conferred upon Brâhmanas the means of increasing their race, and stemmed the progress of the confusion of castes. His exploits rivalled those of Râma, Keśava, Arjuna, and Bhîmasena, and his prowess was equal to that of Nabhâga, Nahusha, Janamejaya, Sagara, Yayâti, Râma, and Ambarîsha. He was descended from a long line of kings. He vanquished the host of his enemies in innumerable battles, quelled the boast and pride of Kshatriyas, destroyed the Sâkas, Yavanas, and Pahlavas, left no trace or remnant of the race of Khagârâta, and re-established the glory of the Sâtavâhana family. In the last line of the inscription mention is made of the grant of a village for the support of the establishment in the cave-temple.¹

Pulumāyi.

In a later inscription engraved in smaller characters below this, Vāsishthiputra Śrī Pulumavi, the lord of Navanara, issues orders to his lieutenant in Govardhana, Sarvākshadalana. He calls his attention to the fact that the village granted by the "lord of Dhana-kata"² (Gotamīputra) in accordance with the above, was not liked by the Bhadrāyanīyas, and therefore assigns another to them by this charter.

On the wall to the left of the verandah of the cave is another inscription. It purports to be an order or notice issued from the camp of the victorious army of Govardhana, by Gotamīputra Śātakarṇi, lord of Dhanakataka, to Vishnupālita, his lieutenant in Govardhana, informing him that the king has granted a field measuring 200 Nivartanas, which was up to that time in the possession of one Ushabhadāta, for the benefit of recluses. The charter here engraved is represented to have been originally issued in the year 18, that is, in the year preceding that in which the cave-temple was completed and dedicated. Below this is inscribed another charter issued in the form of an order to Śramaka, the governor of Govardhana, by the queen of Gotamīputra Śātakarṇi, who is also called the royal mother. She therein speaks of a field granted before, probably the one conveyed by the above charter, and says that it measures one hundred Nivartanas, and she assigns another hundred by this charter out of a field belonging to the crown which was her patrimony. It appears that two hundred Nivartanas were granted by the first charter, but probably it turned out that the field measured one hundred only; hence she now makes it up by granting another hundred out of another field. The date of this grant is 24, i. e., it was made six years after the first.³

But what the Śramaṇas or Buddhist priests of Dhanakata, which was situated hundreds of miles away on the lower Krishna, could have to do with the matter of the granting of a village near Nāsik to the Bhadrāyanīya mendicants of the place it is impossible to conceive. The expression must, I think, be taken as धनकटसामिनेहि for the Sanskrit धनकटस्वामिभिः or धनकटसामिनेहि corresponding to महासामिनेहि in the first part of No. 25, the Sanskrit of which is महास्वामिकैः. The form सामिनेहि must have come into use on the analogy of such forms as अत्तेनेहि for आत्माभिः and राजानेहि for राजभिः.

He was therefore grandson and son respectively of the wife of Gotamīputra, and the son and his mother Vāsishthī contained in the second inscription. Śātakarṇi issued the charter eighteenth year of Puḷumāyi's reign in the year 18, which must be the only one found at N. inscriptions, since dates referring to his reign. The years given in the is dated in the reign of Puḷumāyi, since even the large inscription to the Śātavāhan nineteenth year of his reign. These kings belonged to the Śātavāhana dynasty.

But he won as regards this point on this statement alone, and calls it a my article in the 'All find my other reasons also stated in the remarks at the end of statement has a very transactions of the Oriental Congress of 1874. And even this to represent Gotamī: high corroborative value. For, if the object of the writer was that her son and gras "special claim" to honour, that is better served by supposing belonging to a dynasty were great kings at one and the same time. Every queen and there is nothing in power is the mother of a king and grandmother of a king; different times. If special in the fact if the son and the grandson bore the title at saying she was the son was dead, no object is gained as regards this point by grandmother of a king, mother of that son that is not gained by saying she was the when the cave-temple great king. And if it was a fact that Gotamīputra was dead to find the exploits was dedicated and Puḷumāyi alone was reigning, we should expect word in praise of him the latter also celebrated in the inscription, but there is not a must have died nine. If Puḷumāyi became king only after Gotamīputra, the latter is not what one acquainted years before the dedication of the temple, and it certainly would expect that a dated with the manner and motive of Hindu inscription-writers extolled in the inscription who had been dead for nineteen years should be highly honoured and the reigning king altogether passed over in silence.

Thānā, a grant is recorded in the eighth year of the reign of Maḍharīputra Śakasena.¹ In is given as Gotamīputa Śirī Yājña Sātākani (Gotamīputra Śrī Yājña Sātākarni).² In one of these the year that is given is not legible, but appears to be the sixteenth of his reign. There is one inscription at Sātākani which is dated in the seventh year of that king.³ Pandit Bhagvānlāl has brought to light the name of another prince. Therefore according to him an inscription on the Nānāghāt in which is the dedication of a cistern of water in the thirteenth year of Maḍharīputa Chatarapana Sātākani.

A large number of coins of copper and lead were discovered a few years ago, buried in what appears to have once been a Buddhist stūpa at Kolhāpur. Another hoard had been found some time previous in about the same locality. The legends on those coins are in characters the forms of which greatly resemble those in the cave inscriptions above noticed. They are as follows⁴:

Raño Vasiṭhiputasa Vilivāyakurasa.

Raño Gotamīputasa Vilivāyakurasa.

Raño Maḍharīputasa Sevalakurasa.

Here we have the same names as before; but the words Vilivāyakurasa and Sevalakurasa have not yet been interpreted by any student of Indian antiquities. On a former occasion I put forward a conjecture that they were the names of the viceroys of those kingdoms appointed to govern the country about Kolhāpur.⁵ For, coins of two of these princes and of a few others belonging to the same dynasty are found near Dharanikot in the Gantur District about the site of Dhanakataka, the old capital. The legends on these do not contain those words, and the coins are of a different type from those found at Kolhāpur. These last, therefore, it appeared to me, were struck on this side of the country, and consequently bore the names of the viceroys under whose authority they were issued. The truth of this conjecture I will demonstrate further on. It will be seen from what is to be stated hereafter that the Vasiṭhiputa of these coins who had Vilivāyakura for his viceroy can be no other than Vasiṭhiputra Puṣumāyi.

¹ No. 19, Jour. B. B. R. A. S., Vol. VI. and Vol. XII., p. 409. In the first copy the name is clearly Sakasena, but in the second, which is Pandit Bhagvānlāl's rubbing, something like an effaced mark for the vowel i appears above the first two consonants. The Pandit, therefore, reads the name as Sirisenasa for Sirisepasya, but the k is distinct even in his copy. Siki cannot mean anything, wherefore it appears that the indistinct marks which do not occur in the first copy are due to some flaw in the rock, and do not represent the vowel i. Dr. Bhāu Dāji also read the name as Sakasena. But the copy of the inscription given in Plate LI. Vol. V. of the Archaeological Survey of Western India and marked No. 14 leaves no doubt whatever on the point. The name there is distinctly Sakasena. Further confirmation if necessary will be found later on. It is therefore clearly a mistake to call the king Sirisena.

Some of the smaller ones appear to be of bronze.

Section IV.

The Gotamîputa must be Gotamîputra Yajña Śātakarṇi of the inscriptions; for the father of Puḷumayi did not reign on this side of the country, as none of the inscriptions are dated in his reign though his exploits are described in the Nāsik Caves. Maḍharîputa must have come after Gotamîputa and not after Vāsithîputa, as is maintained by some scholars; for his viceroy was a different person from that of the other two. The fact that these two had the same viceroy shows that one of them immediately succeeded the other. Another prince with a different viceroy could not come between them. In the stûpa dug out at Supârâ, Paṇḍit Bhagvânâl found a silver coin in a copper casket. On the obverse of the coin, which bears a well-shaped head of the king, we have the legend Rañño Gotamîputasa Siri Yañña Śātakanisa, which means "[this coin is] of the king Gotamîputra Śri Yajña Śāta, karṇi." This therefore is the prince in whose name the coin was issued. There is another legend on the reverse which though some of the letters are not distinct appears to be Gotamîputa-Kumâru-Yañña-Śātakani-Chaturapanasa the sense of which is "[this coin is] of Chaturapana Yañña Śātakani, prince of Gotamîputa."¹ The coin was thus like the Kolhâpur coins issued in the names of two persons; of whom Yajña Śri Śātakarṇi was the reigning sovereign, as his name appears round the bust, and Chaturapana who was his son represented him as viceroy in the province in which the coin was issued, and which from the shape and get-up of the coin appears to have been once ruled over by the Kshatrapas of Ujjayinî or Kāthiâwâḍ.

There is an inscription at Kânheri which is in a mutilated condition, but which with the help of Mr. West's eye copy and an impression given in one of Dr. Burgess' Reports has been partially restored by Dr. Bühler. Therein is made the dedication of a water cistern by Śate-raka who was the confidential counsellor of the Queen of Vāsishthî-putra Śātakarṇi, who belonged to the family of the Karddamakas and was the daughter of a Mahâkshatrapa whose name is obliterated. The opening letters of the second line have also been effaced, but what we might expect to find there is the name of her son, after we have had those of her husband, family, and father. From the letters in West's copy which look like Sakarâja one might think the son meant was Śakasena; still the conjecture is somewhat hazardous.² The name of this Vāsishthî-

Chaturapana
in a Kânheri

¹ The nether portions of the letters chaturapanasa only are impressed on the coin so that the reading is somewhat doubtful; but panasa is distinct enough. Paṇḍit Bhagvânâl puts Chaturapanasa at the beginning of the legend and reads Chaturapanasa Gotamîputa Kumâru Yañña Śātakani which he translates "Yajña Śātakarṇi, son of Gotamîputa, and prince of Chaturapana;" and states his belief that Chaturapana was the name of Yajña Śri's father. But to connect Kumâru, which forms a part of a compound with the genitive, Chaturapanasa, is grammatically not allowable; while the genitive which is always required to show whose coin it is, is wanting. Hence Chaturapanasa is the last word and the whole is a compound, Kumâru is probably a mistake for Kumâra and Yañña Śātakani is the father's name placed before Chaturapanasa to show that he was his son. (Jour. B. B. R. A. S., Vol. XV., pp. 305-6.)

² Jour. B. B. R. A. S., Vol. VI. and Archæol. S. of W. I., Vol. V., Inscription No. 11; also p. 78 of the latter. There would be nothing improbable in it if we here read the name of Śakasena. For this name and that of his mother Maḍhari point to a connection with the Śakas whose representatives the Kshatrapas were, and this connection is unfolded in this inscription.

Section IV.

putra is Śātakarṇi, wherefore he was not Puṣumāyi, but very likely Chatushparṇa (Chatarapana) Śātakarṇi.

Thus then, from these inscriptions and coins we arrive at the names of the following kings arranged in the chronological order indicated by the forms of the characters used and by other circumstances :

Krishnarāja.

Śātakarṇi.

Kshaharāta Nahapāna and his son-in-law Ushavadāta.

Gotamīputra Śātakarṇi.

Vāsishṭhīputra Puṣumāyi.

Gotamīputra Śrī Yajña Śātakarṇi.

Vāsishṭhīputra Chatushparṇa (Chaturapana or Chatarapana) Śātakarṇi.

Maḍharīputra Śakasena.

Besides these, we have the name of Simuka Śātavāhana, a king that reigned earlier than the second in the above list. We shall hereafter assign to him his proper place.

SECTION V.

NATIVE AND FOREIGN PRINCES MENTIONED IN THE INSCRIPTIONS.— IDENTIFICATION OF THE FORMER WITH THE ANDHRABHRITYAS OF THE PURĀNAS.

THE first thing that will strike one on looking at the list given at the end of the last section, is that the name Kshaharâta Nahapâna is not Indian but foreign. The title Kshatrâpa or Mahâkshatrâpa also used in the case of that king, is not Indian, though it is the Sanskritised form of a foreign one, very likely the Persian Satrap. From the statement in the inscription of Gotamîputra that he destroyed the Śakas, Yavanas, and Pahlavas, it appears that the country was at that time very much exposed to the inroads of these foreigners. Yavanas were the Bactrian Greeks, but Kshaharâta Nahapâna does not look a Greek name. He must, therefore, have been either a Śaka or Pahlava. Again, we are told that Gotamîputra left no remnant of the race of Khagârâta or Khakhârâta which name seems to be the same as Kshaharâta or Khaharâta as it is spelled in the Kârli and Junnar inscriptions. It follows, therefore, that the Śakas or Pahlavas made themselves masters of the country some time between the second king in the above list and Gotamîputra Śâtakarṇi, and that they were driven out by Gotamîputra who, by thus recovering the provinces lost to his dynasty, re-established, as stated in the inscription, the glory of the Śâtavâhana race to which he belonged. All the other kings named above belonged to that dynasty.

Now, in the Purānas we have lists of kings and dynasties that ruled over the country. The earliest dynasty with which we are here concerned is the Maurya founded by Chandragupta in B.C. 320, as determined by his relations with Seleucus, one of the generals and successors of Alexander the Great. It ruled over Northern India for 137 years according to the Purānas, and the last king Brihadratha was murdered by his general Pushyamitra or Pushpamitra, who founded the Śunga dynasty. This was in power for 112 years and was succeeded by the Kāṇva family which ruled for forty-five years. The Kāṇvas were overthrown by Sîpraka, Sindhuka, or Śisuka, as he is variously named, who founded what the Purānas call the dynasty of the Andhrabhrityas, that is, Andhras who were once servants or dependents. The second king of this dynasty was Krishna according to all, the third was Śâtakarṇi or Śrisâtakarṇi according to the Vāyu or Vishṇu, while the Bhāgavata corrupts the name slightly to Śântakarna. The Mâtsya interposes three more kings between Krishna and Śâtakarṇi, while the Vishṇu has another Śâtakarṇi to correspond with that of the Mâtsya. Gotamîputra is the thirteenth prince according to the Vāyu, fifteenth according to the Bhāgavata, seventeenth according to the Vishṇu, and twenty-second according to the Mâtsya. according to the Vishṇu, the Bhāgavata, or the Mātsya. These are so many mislections for the Puṣumāyi of our inscriptions and coins. The Vāyu omits his name altogether. His successor was Śiva Śrī according to the Vishṇu and the Mātsya, while the Bhāgavata calls him Vedaśīras, and the Vāyu does not notice him. Yajña Śrī occurs in all, being placed after Śivaskandha, the successor of Śiva Śrī, by all except the Vāyu, which assigns to him the next place after Gotamīputra.

Thus then, the names occurring in the inscriptions and on the coins as well as the order sufficiently agree with those given in the Purāṇas under the Andhrabhṛitya dynasty to justify us in believing that the kings mentioned in both are the same. There is, however, no trace of Chatushparṇa Śātakarṇi unless we are to identify him with Chandaśrī Śātakarṇi. The name Maḍharīputra Śakasena also does not occur in the Purāṇas; and he appears to have belonged to a branch of the dynasty. We shall hereafter assign to him his place in the list. Śimuka, whose name occurs in the Nānāghāt inscription, and who, as I have already observed, was an earlier occupant of the throne than the reigning prince Śātakarṇi, the third in the Purāṇic list, must be the same as Śisuka, the founder of the dynasty. For the Devanāgarī ma is often so carelessly written as to look like sa; hence the true Simuka was corrupted to Sisuka, Śisuka, or Śisuka, in the course of time. The Sindhuka of the Vāyu and the Sīpraka of the Vishṇu are further corruptions. This identification is rendered probable also by the consideration that he who caused the cave to be constructed, and the statues of himself and the younger princes to be carved, might, to give dignity to his race, be expected to get the founder of the dynasty also represented there, especially as he was removed only one degree from him. In this manner the Andhrabhṛitya dynasty of the Purāṇas is the same as the S'atavāhana dynasty of the inscriptions.

SECTION VI.

CHRONOLOGY OF THE ANDHRABHŪTĪYAS OR ŚĀTĀVĀHANAS.

THE next question we have to consider is as regards the dates of these princes. In my paper on the Nāsik cave inscriptions¹, I have accepted A.D. 319 as the date of Gotamīputra's accession, arrived at by taking B.C. 315 as the year in which Chandragupta founded the dynasty of the Mauryas at Pāṭaliputra, and 664 years to have elapsed between him and Gotamīputra, since the periods assigned in the Purāṇas to that dynasty and the subsequent ones, and the durations of the reigns of the Andhrabhūṭīya princes who preceded Gotamīputra according to the Mātsya when added, give 664. The "race of Khagārāta," which Gotamīputra is, as observed before, represented in one of the Nāsik inscriptions to have exterminated, I identified with the dynasty of the Kshatrapas whose coins are found in Kāthiāvād, as well as a few inscriptions, since Kshaharāta or Khagārāta was also a Kshatrapa and had been placed at the head of the dynasty by previous writers. The latest date on the coins of those princes then known was 250, which referred to the Śaka era, is A.D. 328². This comes so close to Gotamīputra's A.D. 319, that the two seemed to corroborate each other. But there are several objections to this view, some of which occurred to me even then. (1)—The inscriptions and coins of the Kshatrapa dynasty concur in carrying the genealogy backward to Chasṭāna and no further, and as yet nothing has turned up to show that any connection existed between him and Nahapāna. (2)—If the Kshatrapa or Satrap dynasty held sway over Mahārāshṭra for about three hundred years as it did over Kāthiāvād, we might reasonably expect to find in that country inscriptions or coins of most of the princes, but a few coins of the later ones only have been discovered in a village near Karādh³ and no inscription whatever. (3)—Rudradāman in his Junāgaḍ inscription calls a Śātakarṇi, 'lord of Dakshinapatha', which he would not have done if he had been the ruler of even a part of the Dekkan. (4)—And the dates occurring on some Satrap coins recently discovered are said to be 300 and 304³ which referred to the Śaka are A.D. 378 and 382, that is, the Satraps were in power even long after A.D. 340, which is the date of Gotamīputra's death according to the Purāṇic accounts. For these reasons it would appear that the "race" of Khagārāta or Nahapāna which Gotamīputra put an end to and which ruled over this country before him, could not have been the dynasty of the Satraps. (5)—Besides, according to my former view, the interval between Nahapāna and Gotamīputra is about 200 years; but the difference in form between the characters in Ushavadāta's and Gotamīputra's inscriptions is not great enough for that period. Hence the two princes must be brought closer together.

Section VI.

Ptolemy's Siro Polemios the same as Siri Puṣumāyi and his Baleocuros
the same as Viṣivāyakura.

From the Greek geographer Ptolemy we learn that in his time the country inland from the western coast was divided into two divisions, of which the northern was governed by Siro Polemios whose capital was Paithan, and the southern by Baleocuros who lived in Hippocura. Siro Polemios is evidently the same name as the Siri Puṣumāyī, curs Puṣumāyi of the inscriptions corresponding to the Pulomata, by Puṣimat of the Purāṇas. But there were two kings who after that name, one the son of Gotamīputra, mentioned in the inscriptions, and another an earlier prince of the Andhrabr̥itya dynasty. This last does not appear to have been a prince of any importance, wherefore very likely the former is the one spoken of by Ptolemy. But the question is almost settled by the medals, believing Baleocuros as the Governor of the southern provinces. It is however, seen that in the legends on the Kolhāpur coins the name Viṣivāyakura is associated with that of Puṣumāyi and of Gotamīputra. A Śakasena Viṣivāyakura is the same as Baleocura, and I have already shown that the reason why his name, in my opinion, occurs along with that of the two princes of the Śātavāhana dynasty, and on the coins of the Nānāghat alone, while it does not occur on those found in the lower districts, is that he was the viceroy of those provinces ruling the country about Kolhāpur. This country answers to the division mentioned by the Greek geographer as being governed by Baleocuros. The Siro Polemios therefore of Ptolemy is the same as the Puṣumāyi of the inscriptions and coins.

Puṣumāyi began to reign about
130 A.D.

Ptolemy died in A.D. 163, and is said to have written his Geography after A.D. 151. Puṣumāyi, therefore, must have been on the throne some time before this last date. We will now proceed to connect this date with those mentioned in the inscriptions, and to determine more particularly the date of Puṣumāyi's accession. Śārad only Ushavadāta's benefactions were founded in the years 40, 41, and 42 of the dynasty and the latest date connected with Nahapāna is that in the inscription of his minister Ayama at Junnar, viz., 46. These dates, I think, be referred to the Śaka era. For, we have seen that at the time of Gotamīputra, the country was subject to the incursions of Śakas and other foreign tribes, and the Scythians who are identified with the Śakas had, according to the Greek geographers, established a kingdom in Sind and even in Rājputānā. The era known by the name of the Śaka and referred to in all the early copper-plate grants as the era of the Śaka king or kings must have been established by the most powerful of the Śaka invaders,¹ who for the first time obtained a permanent footing in the country, and Nahapâna and Chashtana¹ or his father must have been his Satraps appointed to rule over Western India, and Mâlva. On this supposition the latest date of Nahapâna must correspond to A.D. 124. Gotamîputra or Pulumâyî therefore must have acquired possession of this country after that year. The earliest date of Pulumâyî occurring in the inscriptions is the second year of his reign; and since the inscription could not have borne that date if Nahapâna or his successors had been in power, it is clear that Pulumâyî began to reign after the overthrow of the latter. Now, we also learn from Ptolemy that Tiasenes reigned at Ozene about the time when he wrote, and was therefore a contemporary of Pulumâyî. Tiasenes has, I think, been reasonably identified with Chashtana. But according to the Junâgaḍ inscription noticed above, Chashtana's grandson Rudradâman was the reigning prince in the year 72, which, taking the era to be the Śaka, is 150 A.D. Chashtana and Pulumâyî therefore could not have been contemporaries in 150 A.D. Ptolemy's account must, in consequence, refer to a period much earlier, i.e. to about the year 132 A.D., since about eighteen or twenty years at least must be supposed to have elapsed between the date of his information when Chashtana was on the throne and the year 150 A.D. when his grandson was in possession of it, his son Jayadâman having occupied it for some time in the interval. Again, in the nineteenth year of Pulumâyî, Gotamîputra was in possession, according to the large inscription at Nâsik, of a good many of those provinces which, according to the Junâgaḍ inscription, were conquered and ruled over by Rudradâman. The date 72 in the inscription seems to refer to the being swept away by a storm and excessive rain of the dyke on one side of the lake therein mentioned and not to the cutting of the inscription on the rock. So that it is doubtful whether Rudradâman had conquered those year of Kanishka, are considerably later; and both the inscriptions exist in Mathurâ. (3)—There is no ground to believe that Kanishka reigned over Gujarât and Mahârâshtra, but the Śaka era began to be used very early, especially in the last country. (4)—The Guptas whose gold coinage is a close imitation of that of the Indo-Scythian dynasty, came to power in A.D. 319: while the last of the three kings Kanishka, Hushka, and Vâsudeva must, if the reign of the first began in A.D. 78, have ceased to reign about A.D. 178, i.e., about 100 years after the foundation of the dynasty. And the latest date of Vâsudeva is 89. If so, an interval of 140 years must have elapsed between the last of the Indo-Scythian kings and the first Gupta; but the close resemblance in the coinage necessitates the supposition that it was much shorter. Albiruni's statement that the initial date of the Gupta era was 241 Śaka, i.e., 319 A.D., has been pronounced unreliable by some antiquarians. As to this point and the era of the Satrap dates, see Appendix A.

¹ Professor Oldenberg considers Chashtana to be a Satrap appointed by Gotamîputra, a supposition which is unwarrantable, since a prince like Gotamîputra whose aim was to expel and destroy foreigners cannot be expected to appoint a foreigner, as Chashtana's name indicates he was, to be a viceroy, and to use a foreign title; and we have seen that Baleucuros, who was a viceroy of that monarch or of his son, does not use that title. Rudradâman, the grandson of Chashtana, appointed, as we see from his Junâgaḍ inscription, a Pahlava of the name of Suvisâkha, who was the son of Kulaipa, to govern Surâshtra and Ânarta. This circumstance confirms what we gather from other sources, namely, that this was a dynasty of princes of a foreign origin, who had adopted Hindu manners and even names, had in some cases entered into marriage alliance with native royal families, and were domiciled in the country.

provinces before 72 or did so after 72 and before the incision of the inscription. Supposing he conquered them before 72, the nineteenth year of Puṣumāyi must correspond at least to the second or third year before A.D. 150, that is, Puṣumāyi must have begun to reign, at the latest, about the year A.D. 130. And even if we understand him to have conquered them after 72, Puṣumāyi's accession cannot be placed much later, for the interval between Chashtana who was Puṣumāyi's contemporary and his grandson Rudradāman who was reigning in 150 A.D. will be considerably shortened. Nahapāna or his successor must thus have been overthrown by Gotamīputra or Puṣumāyi about five or six years at the most after his latest recorded date, viz. A.D. 124.

The history of the relations of these princes appears to be this. Nahapāna was a Satrap ruling over Mahārāshṭra. His capital was probably Junnar since the inscriptions at the place show the town to have been in a flourishing condition about that time, and we have a record there of the gift of his minister. He must have died soon after 46 Śaka or A.D. 124. Gotamīputra and Puṣumāyi came from the south-east to regain the provinces lost to their family, overthrew Nahapāna's successor, whoever he was, killed all his heirs, and re-established their power over this side of the country. This appears to be what is meant by Gotamīputra's having been represented in the Nāsik inscription to have "left no remnant of the race of Khagārāta," and to have "regained the prestige of his family." Chashtana founded or belonged to another dynasty of Satraps which reigned at Ujjayinī. In the Junāgadh inscription, men of all castes are represented to have gone to Rudradāman and chosen him their lord for their protection;¹ and he is spoken of as having re-established the kingdom that had been lost,² himself assumed the title of the Great Kshatrapa, conquered Akarāvanti, Anūpa, Surāshṭra, Aparānta and other provinces which, as we have seen, were owned by Gotamīputra, and some more; and as having twice subdued Śātakarni, the lord of Dakshināpatha, but still not destroyed him in consequence of his connection³ with him not being remote

² In Pandit Bhagvānlāl's transcript in Vol. VII., Ind. Ant., the reading is भद्रराज्यनिधायकेन. But in a foot-note Dr. Bühler says that the correct reading may be राज्ञ्य for राज. In Dr. Bhāu Dāji's copy of the inscription the ज्ञ्य is distinct, p. 118, Vol. VII., Jour. B. B. R. A. S. Bhāu Dāji and Pandit Bhagvānlāl translate this expression by "obtained glory of great exploits by the re-establishment of deposed kings," (p. 20, Vol. VII., Jour. B. B. R. A. S.), and "he who has restored to their thrones deposed kings," (p. 260 a, Vol. VII., Ind. Ant.) If राज्ञ्य were the reading, this translation would of course be correct, but with राज्ञ्य it is far-fetched. There is nothing here to show that the lost rājya or kingdom re-established by Rudradāman was any other person's than his own. So that, it looks natural to understand him to have re-established (his own) lost kingdom.

³ The reading is संबन्धावदूरया. It is allowable to insert त and take it as संबन्धावदूरतया. But the sense of the word, which is "remoteness," will not suit the context; as he could not have "acquired a good name," i.e. been esteemed by people for not destroying the Lord of the Dekkan on account of the remoteness of the connection. Remoteness or distance of the country would compel one to let his enemy alone, and there could be no virtue in it. The व therefore in the word must have crept in through mistake; wherefore the true reading must be संबन्धादूरतया.

and acquired a good name on that account. The meaning of all this appears to me to be this. Gotamîputra Śātakarṇi, after having destroyed Nahapāna or his successor, turned his arms against another dynasty of foreigners that was ruling at Ujjayinî. Or the Kshatrapa sovereign of Ujjayinî, Chashtana, or very probably his son Jayadāman, having observed the growing power of Gotamîputra or Puṣumâyi who had put an end to a kindred family of rulers, and desirous of preventing his further growth, must have attacked him. A fact such as this must be the basis of the popular stories about a king of Ujjayinî having attacked Śālivāhana at Paiṭhan and been defeated by him. Śālivāhana is but another mode of pronouncing Śātavāhana;¹ and Puṣumâyi or Gotamîputra was a Śātavāhana. The ruler of Ujjayinî was defeated and pursued by the victorious Gotamîputra into his own dominions, when the latter subjugated Avantî, Anūpa, Surāshṭra and Aparānta, and dethroned Jayadāman. For a time he and his successors held sway over the territories owned by Chashtana, but subsequently Rudradāman collected a band of followers, the same as those that are represented in the inscription as having chosen him their lord, and driving away the Śātavāhanas, regained his lost kingdom and got himself crowned as Mahākshatrapa. But as appears from the Supārā coin of Yajña Śrî which bears such striking resemblance to the Kshatrapa coins and is so unlike the Kolhāpur coins of that monarch, large or small, and from the fact that his son Chaturapana was his viceroy or representative, the Śātavāhanas retained possession of a part at least of the Kshatrapa territories up to the time of Yajña Śrî. They even entered into blood relationship with the Kshatrapas, as we learn from the Kānheri inscription, which speaks of the wife of Vās'ishṭhîputra Śātakarṇi being the daughter of a Mahākshatrapa. But Rudradāman pursued his victories and according to his Junāgaḍ inscription twice conquered Śātakarṇi the lord of Dakṣiṇāpatha, but did not destroy him, and acquired a good name by his forbearance towards one whose connection with him was not remote. Thus the lord of Dakṣiṇāpatha that he conquered was Yajña Śrî Śātakarṇi. He could not have been his son Chaturapana; for the expression "non-remoteness of the connection" suits the former better than the latter, as Chaturapana's wife was the daughter of a Mahākshatrapa, perhaps his own and the connection with him was positively close. The re-acquisition of his lost kingdom by Rudradāman took place after the nineteenth year of Puṣumâyi's reign, that is, after about A.D. 149. It is in this way alone that the scraps of information derived from the Greek writers and gathered from inscriptions, coins, and popular legends, as well as the dates, can be made to harmonize with each other.

But the date thus assigned to Gotamîputra is not consistent with that derived from the Mātsya Purāṇa. Our next endeavour, therefore, should be to ascertain whether none of the Purāṇas agrees sufficiently with the conclusion arrived at, and, if any does, to account for the great discrepancy between it and the Mātsya and others. That there is very little agreement among them as regards the Andhrabhṛitya dynasty, I have already indicated above. The genesis of our Purāṇic literature seems to be this. Certain versified accounts of certain things, purporting to be narrated by a bard to Rishis assembled together at a sacrificial session, were handed down orally from generation to generation; and these were after some time committed to writing. The later Purāṇas, devoted to the exaltation of a particular deity and to the inculcation of certain doctrines, derived their accounts of these things from the earliest written Purāṇas and not from the oral tradition. Of the works of this class which I am going to compare for our present purpose, the oldest appears to me to be the Vāyu, and next to it the Mātsya. The Vishṇu is later, and the Bhāgavata, the latest. The text of the old Purāṇas gradually became corrupt, and the authors of the later ones were in some cases misled by their incorrect readings into putting forth statements at variance with the original account. Now the four Purāṇas just mentioned contain general statements about the several dynasties, giving the number of princes belonging to each and its duration in years, and also mention the names of those princes more particularly; while the Vāyu and the Mātsya give in addition the number of years for which each reigned. Often there is a discrepancy between the general and the particular statements. The duration assigned by them all to the Maurya dynasty, founded by Chandragupta whose date as determined by his relations with the successors of Alexander the Great is justly characterised by Professor MaxMüller as the sheet-anchor of Indian chronology, is 137 years. The number of reigning princes given by the Vāyu is nine, and by the rest, ten; but the names actually enumerated in the Vishṇu only are ten, while the Vāyu and the Bhāgavata give nine, and the Mātsya, only four. The total of the years assigned to each prince by the Vāyu is 133 years; so that it is not unlikely that a short reign of four years may have dropped out from the text of that Purāṇa. Thus the general statement about ten princes and 137 years seems to be corroborated, and it appears pretty clear that the text of the Mātsya has in this case undergone a good deal of corruption. Thus, if with Dr. Kern we take B.C. 322 as the date of the foundation of the Maurya dynasty, its overthrow and the foundation of the next or the Śuṅga family must have occurred in the year B.C. 185. The Śuṅgas are generally stated in all the Purāṇas to have been ten and to have reigned for 112 years, though the expression used in the Bhāgavata is not "112 years," but "more than a hundred years." In the actual enumeration, the Mātsya omits two, and the Bhāgavata, one; and the total of the years assigned to each prince in the Vāyu exceeds 112. There is evidently some mistake here; but if we take the general statement to be the correct tradition handed down, the dynasty became extinct in B.C. 73. The dynasty next mentioned is that of the Kāṇvas or Kāṇvāyanas. There were four princes of this line, and they reigned for forty-five years, though the Bhāgavata, through a mistake to be explained hereafter, makes the period to be 345 years. They were followed by the Andhrabhṛityas. But here, there is a statement in the Vāyu and the Mātsya, the like of which does not occur in the account of the other dynasties. The founder of the Andhrabhṛityas, Sindhuka, according to the first Purāṇa, and Śiśuka, according to the other, is said to have uprooted not only the Kāṇvas, but "whatever was left of the power of the Śuṅgas."¹ And the Kāṇvas are pointedly spoken of as S'ungabhṛityas or "servants of the Śuṅgas."² It, therefore, appears likely that when the princes of the Śuṅga family became weak, the Kāṇvas usurped the whole power and ruled like the Peshwas in modern times, not uprooting the dynasty of their masters but reducing them to the character of nominal sovereigns; and this supposition is strengthened by the fact that like the Peshwas they were Brāhmaṇas and not Kshatriyas. Thus then these dynasties reigned contemporaneously, and hence the 112 years that tradition assigns to the Śuṅgas include the 45 assigned to the Kāṇvas. The Śuṅgas and the Kāṇvas, therefore, were uprooted, and the family of the Andhrabhṛityas came to power in B.C. 73. In a general way, the number of princes belonging to this line is given as thirty in the Vāyu, the Vishṇu, and the Bhāgavata, and twenty-nine in the Mātsya; and the total duration is stated to be 411 years in the first, 456 in the second and the third, and 460 in the fourth. The disagreement here is not great, wherefore the tradition as to thirty princes and about 456 years may be accepted as correct. But the discrepancy between this general statement and the more particular accounts that follow, as well as the disagreement between the several Purāṇas in this last, is very great. This will be apparent from the following table:—

Thus, the Vāyu has seventeen princes and 272 years and a half ; and the Mātsya, thirty and 448 and a half. The Vishṇu gives twenty-four names and the Bhāgavata, twenty-two. This last Purāṇa has in many cases corrupted the names and confounded Hāla with the Arishtakarman of the Vishṇu, whom it names Anishtakarman Hāleya. It also omits the fifth prince of the Vishṇu Purāṇa. The details given in the Mātsya come very close to the general tradition and thus confirm it. Should we then attribute the very great discrepancy between these details and those of the Vāyu to the corruption of the text of the latter ? Two or three names might drop away in this manner, but the omission of thirteen names and the reduction of the total duration by 176 years must I think be accounted for in some other way. Besides the tradition about 456 years, there is a statement in the Vāyu Purāṇa, in a verse below, to the effect that the "Andhras will have possession of the earth for three hundred years,"¹ which seems to point to another. That such a tradition existed is indicated by the mistake in the Bhāgavata by which the Kāṇvas are assigned three hundred and forty-five years. The original account, which the author of this Purāṇa must have seen, probably assigned forty-five years to the Kānvas and three hundred to the next or Andhrabhṛitya dynasty. But since that dynasty was also assigned another duration, viz. 456 years, he connected the "the three hundred" with the preceding, and gave 345 years to the Kānṣvāya family. Now, the manner in which the two traditions are to be reconciled is by supposing that the longer period is made up by putting together the reigns of all the princes belonging to the several branches of the Andhrabhṛitya dynasty. That the younger princes often reigned at Paithan and the elderly ones at Dhanakāṭaka appears clear when we compare the inscriptions with the statement in Ptolemy. When the throne at the principal seat became vacant, the Paithan princes succeeded. But some probably died before their elders and never became kings of Dhanakāṭaka. From an inscription found at Banavāsī by Dr. Burgess it would appear that another branch of that dynasty ruled over Kānarā. The period of three hundred years and the seventeen names given in the Vāyu Purāṇa refer probably to the main branch. The Mātsya seems to me to put together the princes of all the branches, and thus makes them out to be thirty. The total of the years assigned to the several reigns in the Vāyu is $272\frac{1}{2}$, and if we should suppose one or two reigns lasting for about twenty-eight years to have dropped out by the corruption of the text, it would become $300\frac{1}{2}$. Thus then the Vāyu and the Mātsya Purāṇas each give a correct account, but of different things. The Viṣṇu, which gives twenty-four princes, is not entitled to so much credit as the Vāyu. It is a later work and the author's purpose being sectarian, he probably did not care so much for the accuracy of his details, and hence omitted even the duration of each reign. The Bhāgavata is still more careless, as has already been shown.

If then we take the account in the Vāyu Purāṇa to refer to the main branch of the dynasty and consequently generally correct, the period that intervened between the rise of the S'ātavāhanas or Andhrabhṛityas and the end of the reign of Śivasvāti is 206 years.¹ The dynasty must, as we have seen, have been founded in B.C. 73, wherefore the end of Śivasvāti's reign and the accession of Gotamīputra must be placed in A.D. 133. We have seen that Puṣumāyi, whose capital was Paithan according to Ptolemy, and who from the inscriptions appears to have been king of this part of the country and to have reigned contemporaneously with his father, must have begun to reign at Paithan about 130 A.D. The father and the son drove the foreigners from the Dekkan, and the son was established as the ruler of the regained provinces, Gotamīputra expecting to succeed to the throne at the original seat of the family. Gotamīputra reigned for twenty-one years according to the Purāṇas, wherefore he must have died in 154 A.D. He was alive, as stated before, in the eighteenth year of Puṣumāyi, i. e. in 148, and also in the nineteenth when the cave temple was dedicated, and not alive in the twenty-fourth, i. e. in 154, according to the two inscriptions mentioned before. Ptolemy's mention of Puḷumāyi I have already referred to about the year 132; so that, the date deduced from this source, and those derived from Gotamīputra's and Puḷumāyi's inscriptions at Nāsik and Rudradāman's at Junāgaḍ on the supposition that the era used in this last is the Śāka, as well as those derived from the Purāṇas may thus be shown to be consistent with each other. The dates of all the princes whose names we find in the inscriptions may therefore be thus arranged :

Simuka began to reign in B.C. 73 and ceased in B.C. 50.

Krishṇa began in B.C. 50 and ceased in B.C. 40.

Śātakarni (third in the Vāyu P.) began in B.C. 40 and ceased in A.D. 16.

Gotamīputra began in A.D. 133 and ceased in A.D. 154.

Of Puḷumāyi.

If the twenty-eight years assigned to Puḷumāyi in the Mātsya Purāṇa are to be reckoned from the year of Gotamīputra's death, he must be considered to have begun to reign at Dhanakāṭaka in A.D. 154, and to have ceased in A.D. 182. He reigned at Paiṭhaṇ from A.D. 130 to A.D. 154, that is, for about twenty-four years, and we have seen that the latest year of his reign recorded in the inscriptions at Nāsik and Kārli is the twenty-fourth. Altogether then his reign lasted for fifty-two years. But if the twenty-eight include the twenty-four for which he ruled at Paiṭhaṇ, he must have died in 158. This supposition looks very probable. He was succeeded by Śivaśrī, whose coin found in the Tailaṅga districts has been described by Mr. Thomas in the Indian Antiquary, Vol. IX., p. 64. He appears to have been Puḷumāyi's brother, since he also is styled on the coin Vāsithīputra, i. e., Vāsishthīputra, or the son of Vāsishthī. He had a reign of seven years and must have died in A.D. 165. Śivaskanda was the next king, to whom also seven years have been assigned. There is no trace of these two princes on this side of the country; while the name of the next, Yajña Śrī, occurs frequently as we have seen in inscriptions and coins. He appears to have been Puḷumāyi's immediate successor at Paiṭhaṇ. His full name was Gotamīputra Yajña Śrī Śātakarni, and he is, as observed before, the Gotamīputra of the Kolhāpur coins. Some copies of the Mātsya assign him twenty-nine years, others nine, and twenty, and the Vāyu, twenty-nine; while the Brahmāṇḍa allows him nineteen. Probably he reigned in Mahārāshṭra for eighteen or nineteen years, since the sixteenth year of his reign is his latest recorded date, and for twenty-nine years at Dhanakāṭaka since, according to our supposition, the Vāyu Purāṇa gives an account of the Dhanakāṭaka branch and his coins are found in Tailaṅga. And this is confirmed by what we have already said. Puḷumāyi reigned at Dhanakāṭaka for four years and his two successors for fourteen. All this while, i. e., for eighteen years, Yajña Śrī was ruler of Mahārāshṭra. He must thus have ceased to reign in the last country in about A.D. 172 and died in about A.D. 202. The next three reigns lasted, according to the Vāyu, for sixteen years. No trace of any of these has yet been found on this side of the country; but coins of Chandra Śrī are found near the original seat of government, and two of these are described by Mr. Thomas in the paper mentioned above. Thus the latest Andhrabhṛitya date is A.D. 218. Maḍharîputa Sakasena of the Kânheri inscription, the same as the Maḍharîputa of the Kolhâpur coins, has been identified with Śiva Śrî, the successor of Puṣumâyi, by Paṇḍit Bhagvânâlâl, and I also at one time concurred with him. But the identification is not, I think, tenable. He was probably led to it by his reading Śirîsena for Sakasena; but I have shown that the reading is incorrect. Mr. Thomas has described a specimen of eleven coins found at Amrâvatî near Dhara-nikot, the legend on which he reads as Sakasakasa, but it is not unlikely Sakasenasasa, "of Sakasena." Besides, Maḍharîputa Śakasena could not have been the immediate successor of Puṣumâyi for a reason which I have already given. One of the Kolhâpur coins figured by Paṇḍit Bhagvânâlâl Indrajî bears the names of both Gotamîputa and Maḍharîputa, showing that the piece originally bearing the name of one of them was re-stamped with the name of the other. Mr. Thomas thinks that it was originally Maḍharîputa's coin. I think it was Gotamîputa's; for, if we see the other figured coins we shall find that they are so stamped as to leave some space between the rim and the legend. This in the present case is utilized and the name of Maḍharîputa stamped close to the rim, which shows that the thing was done later. Maḍharîputa Śakasena, therefore, must have been a successor of Gotamîputa Yajña Śrî Śâtakarṇi. But, as we have seen, none of his three Purâṇic successors bore the name, and the name Śakasena is one which has nothing like it on the long list of the Andhrabhṛityas. Still that king must have reigned at Dhanakataka also if my surmise that Mr. Thomas' Sakasaka is the same as Sakasena is correct. In the same manner, as observed before, Chaturapana Śâtakarṇi's name does not appear in the Purâṇas. But the Purâṇas cannot be expected to give accurate information on these points. In the Mâtsya Purâṇa another Andhra dynasty of "seven princes sprung from the servants of the original Andhrabhṛitya family will," it is said, "come into power after that family becomes extinct." The Vâyû has got a similar verse the reading of which, however, is corrupt; but it appears that this new dynasty is there meant to be spoken of as having sprung from the Andhrabhṛitya family itself and must have constituted a separate branch cut off from the main line. And we can very well understand from the points already made out how such a branch could have constituted itself after Yajña Śrî's ceasing to reign. Vâsishṭhîputra Śâtakarṇi whom I have identified with Chaturapana married a Kshatrapa lady. The Kshatrapas, as I have before observed, were foreigners, most probably Śakas who had become Hindus. Maḍharîputa was not unlikely the son of that lady. And thus he and his father Chaturapana formed, from the very fact of this marriage, a distinct line of princes. Chaturapana appears to have succeeded Yajña Śrî; and Maḍharîputa to have reigned after Chaturapana. The durations of these reigns cannot be made out, but the latest date of the former is the thirteenth year of his reign, which probably correponds to 185 A.D. and of the latter the eighth. The dates of the later Sâtavâhanas are therefore these :

Thus then, the Andhrabhṛityas or Sâtavâhanas ruled over the Dekkan from B.C. 73 to about A.D. 218, i.e., for about three centuries. For some time, however, they were dispossessed of the country by foreigners who belonged to the S'aka tribe. How long these were in power it is difficult to determine. If the S'aka era was established by the foreign conqueror after his subjugation of the country, and if his Satrap Nahapâna or his successor was overthrown by Gotamiputra or Pulumâyi, six or seven years after Nahapâna's latest date, viz. 46, the foreigners held possession of this country only for about fifty-three years.

SECTION VII.

POLITICAL AND LITERARY TRADITIONS ABOUT THE ŚĀTAVĀHANAS OR ŚĀLIVĀHĀNAS.

THE period during which the ŚĀtavāhanas or Andhrabhṛityas ruled over Mahārāshṭra must have been a prosperous one in the history of the country. Hence several traditions with regard to different kings of this dynasty have been preserved. But that Śālivāhana or Śātavāhana was a family name has been forgotten, and different princes of the dynasty have been confounded and identified. Thus Hemachandra in his Deśikosa gives Śālivāhana, Śālana, Hāla, and Kuntala as the names of one individual; but we see from the list given above that the last two were borne by different princes, and both of them were Śālivāhanas. In his grammar he gives Śālivāhana as a Prākṛit corruption of Śātavāhana. In modern times the Śaka era is called the Śālivāhana era or an era founded by Śālivāhana. When it began to be attributed to him it is difficult to determine precisely. All the copper-plate grants up to the eleventh century speak of the era as Śakanripakāla, i.e., the era of the Śaka king, or Śakakāla, i.e., the era of the Śaka, and in an inscription at Bādāmī it is stated to be the era beginning from "the coronation of the Śaka king." Subsequently, the simple expression "Śāke, in the year of the Śaka," was used, and thereafter Śāke or "in the Śaka." The word Śaka thus came to be understood as equivalent to "an era" generally, the original sense being forgotten. And since the era had to be connected with some great king it was associated with the name of Śālivāhana whom tradition had represented to be such a king; and thus we now use the expression Śālivāhana Śaka, which etymologically can have no sense and is made up of the names of two royal families. The current legend makes Śālivāhana the son of a Brāhmaṇ girl who was a sojourner at Paiṭhan and lived with her two brothers in the house of a potter. On one occasion she went to the Godāvarī to bathe, when Śeṣha, the king of serpents, becoming enamoured of her, transformed himself into a man and embraced her. In due course she gave birth to Śālivāhana, who was brought up in the house of the potter.¹ Some time after, king Vikramāditya of Ujjayinī, to whom a certain deity had revealed that he was destined to die at the hands of the son of a girl of two years, sent about his Vetāla or king of Ghosts to find out if there was such a child anywhere. The Vetāla saw Śālivāhana playing with his girlish mother and informed Vikramāditya. Thereupon he invaded Paiṭhan with a large army, but Śālivāhana infused life into clay figures of horses, elephants, and men, by means of a charm communicated to him by his father, the king of serpents, encountered Vikramāditya, and defeated him. This descent of a king of Ujjayin on Paithan I have already alluded to and endeavoured to explain. The Śālivāhana referred to in this tradition appears to be Puṣumāyi who in conjunction with his father freed the country from the Śakas and fought with Chashtana or Jayadāman and Rudradāman whose capital appears to have been Ujjayini. It was in consequence of some faint reminiscence of Puṣumāyi Śālivāhana's relations with the Śakas and their Satrap kings that his name was attached to the era first used by his adversaries.

name in connection with the Bṛhatkathā.

There are also several literary traditions connected with the name of Śātavāhana or Śālivāhana. A work of the name of Bṛhatkathā written in that form of the Prākṛit which is called the Paisāchī or the language of goblins is mentioned by Daṇḍin in his work the Kāvyaḍarśa.¹ Somadeva, the author of the Kathāsaritsāgara, and Kshemendra, the author of another Bṛhatkathā, profess to have derived their stories from this Paisāchī Bṛhatkathā. The stories comprised in this are said to have been communicated to Guṇādhya, who for some time had been minister to Śātavāhana, by a ghost of the name of Kāṇabhūti. They were written in blood and arranged in seven books. Guṇādhya offered them to king Śātavāhana, but he refused to receive such a ghastly work written in blood and in the language of goblins, whereupon Guṇādhya burnt six of them. Some time after, king Śātavāhana having been informed of the charming nature of those stories went to Guṇādhya and asked for them. But the last or seventh book alone remained, and this the king obtained from his pupils with his permission.²

Grammar.

It is narrated in the Kathāsaritsāgara that while Śātavāhana was, on one occasion, bathing with his wives in a tank in a pleasure-garden, he threw water at one of them. As she was tired, she told the king not to besprinkle her with water, using the words modakaiḥ paritāḍaya mām. The king not understanding that the first word was composed of two, mā "do not" and udakaiḥ "with waters," but taking it to be one word meaning "pieces of sweetmeat," caused sweetmeat to be brought and began to throw pieces at the queen. Thereupon she laughed and told the king that he did not know the phonetic rules of Sanskrit, and that while she meant to tell him not to besprinkle her with water, he had understood her to say that she wanted him to throw pieces of sweetmeat at her. There was no occasion for sweetmeat at the place, and this ought to have led the king to the true sense; but he was not. Thereupon the king was ashamed of his own ignorance while his queen was so learned, and became disconsolate. Guṇādhya and Śarvavarman, who were his ministers, were informed of the cause; and the former promised to teach him grammar in six years, though it was a study of twelve. Śarvavarman, however, offered to teach the subject in six months, and his offer was accepted; but as it was not possible to do so, Śarvavarman propitiated the god Kārtikeya or Skanda by his selfmortifications, and the god communicated to him the first Sâtra of a new grammar Siddho Varnasamâmnâyah. Thereupon Śarvavarman repeated the other Sâtras, when Kârtikeya said that if he had not been so hasty and allowed him to repeat the whole, the new grammar would have become superior to Pāṇini's; but since it could not be so now, it would be a small treatise—Kâtantra, and would also be called Kâlâpaka after the tail of his peacock. This new grammar Śarvavarman taught to the king.¹ The same story is told by Tārânâtha in his "History of Buddhism",² but he makes the name of the king to be Udayana, and of Śarvavarman, Saptavarman; while the competitor of Śarvavarman is represented by him to be Vararuchi instead of Guṇâdhya. But Udayana is represented as a king reigning in Southern India and Śâtavâhana in the form of Śântivâhana is also mentioned in connection with the story as a southern king in whose dominions Vararuchi lived. As Udayana frequently figures in Buddhistic stories, the southern prince Śâtavâhana is confounded with him, and this seems to be indicated by the fact that this Udayana is represented to have ruled over a country in the south, though the usual Udayana is a northern prince. It will thus appear that the Kâtantra grammar was composed by Śarvavarman at the request of a prince of the Śâtavâhana family. And this same thing appears to be alluded to even by Hwan Thsang when he says in connection with the shortening of the originally large work on grammar by Pāṇini and others, "lately a Brâhman of South India, at the request of a king of South India, reduced them further to 2,500 ślokas. This work is widely spread, and used throughout all the frontier provinces, but the well-read scholars of India do not follow it as their guide in practice."³

There is a work written in the old Mahârâshṭrî dialect called Saptaśatî, which is of the nature of an anthology consisting of Gâthâs or stanzas in the Âryâ metre, mostly on love matters. The author of this is in the third verse mentioned as Hâla, and ordinarily he is spoken of as S'âlivâhana. Bâna speaks of it in a verse in the introduction to his Harshacharita as "an imperishable and refined repository of good sayings composed by S'âlivâhana." Verses from it are quoted in Dhanika's commentary on the Daśarûpaka, in the Sarasvatî Kanthâbharana, and in the Kâvyaprakâśa. There is, it will be observed, in the list of the Andhrabhṛitya princes, one of the name of Hâla, who probably was either the author of the work or to whom it was dedicated by a court-poet. From these traditions we may, I think, safely conclude that literature flourished under the rule of the Andhrabhṛityas, and that the Prâkṛits or spoken languages, especially the Mahârâshṭrî, were probably for the first time used for literary purposes. In Vâtsyâyana's Kâmasûtra or Institutes of Love, Kuntala S'âtakarṇi S'âtavâhana is spoken of as having killed Malayavatî, who is called

RELIGIOUS, SOCIAL, AND ECONOMIC CONDITION OF MAHÂRÂSHTRA
UNDER THE ANDHRABHŪTAS OR SÂTAVÂHANAS.

DURING this period the religion of Buddha was in a flourishing condition. Princes and chiefs calling themselves Mahâbhojas and Mahârâthhis, merchants (Naigamas), goldsmiths (Suvarnakâras), carpenters (Vardhakas), corn-dealers (Dhânyakâsrenis), druggists (Gândhikas), and ordinary householders (Grihasthas) caused at their expense temples and monasteries to be excavated out of the solid rock for the use of the followers of that religion. It has been mentioned that in the first part of this period the country was exposed to the inroads of foreign tribes, such as Yavanas or Bactrian Greeks, S'akas, and Pahlavas. These afterwards settled in the country and adopted the Buddhist religion. For, among the donors and benefactors whose names are recorded in the cave inscriptions, there are a good many S'akas and Yavanas. But some and especially the S'akas seem to have adopted Brâhmanism. The Buddhist temples were provided with chaityas or tombs in imitation of those in which some relic of Buddha was buried, and these were objects of worship. The monasteries contained cells intended as residences for Bhikshus or mendicant priests. These travelled over the country during the year and spent the four rainy months at one of these monastic establishments. In the month of S'râvâṇa the monks held the ceremony of robing, at which the old clothes were thrown away and new ones worn. To provide these for them, charitable persons deposited, as we have seen, sums of money with certain guilds with directions that out of the interest new robes should be purchased and given to the priests. Villages were assigned by kings and their officers for the support of these religious establishments. The mendicant priests often travelled by sea; and hence at the head of several of the creeks in the Konkan we have cave monasteries intended as Dharmaśâlās or rest-houses for them. We have such caves at Chiplun, Mahâd, and Kudem situated respectively on the Dâbhol, the Bânkoṭ, and the Râjapuri creeks. For those who landed at the head of the Bombay harbour or at Ghodbandar, there were the Kânheri caves.

Brâhmanism also flourished side by side with Buddhism. In the inscription at Nâsik in which Ushavadâta dedicates the cave monastery excavated at his expense for the use of the itinerant "priests of the four quarters," he speaks, as we have seen, of his many charities to Brâhmanas. The same notions as regards these matters prevailed then as now. Ushavadâta fed a hundred thousand Brâhmanas as the Mahârâj Sindia did about thirty years ago. It was considered highly meritorious to get Brâhmanas married at one's expense then as now. Gotamîputra also, in the same inscription which records a benefaction in favour of the Buddhists, is spoken of as the only protector of Brâhmanas, and as having like Ushavadâta put them in the way of increasing their race. Kings and princes thus appear to have patronized the followers of both the religions, and in none of the inscriptions is there an indication of an open hostility between them.

Trade and Commerce,

Identification of towns and

Trade and commerce must also have been in a flourishing condition during this early period. Ships from the western countries came, according to the author of the Periplus, to Barugaza or Bharukachchha, the modern Bharoch; and the merchandize brought by them was thence carried to the inland countries. Onyx stone in large quantities from Paithan, and ordinary cottons, muslins, mallow-coloured cottons, and other articles of local production from Tagara, were carried in waggons to Barugaza and thence exported to the west. Paithan is placed by the author of the Periplus at the distance of twenty days' journey to the south of Barugaza, and is spoken of as the greatest city in Dakhinabades or Dakshinâpatha, and Tagara, ten days' east of Paithan.¹ This town has not yet been identified. Its name does not occur in any of the cave inscriptions, but it is mentioned in a copper-plate grant of the first half of the seventh century; and princes of a dynasty known by the name of Silâhâra call themselves "sovereigns of Tagara, the best of towns," in all their grants. Some have identified it with Devagiri and others with Junnar, but in both cases its bearing from Paithan as given by the Greek geographers has not been taken into account. I have elsewhere discussed the question, and have proposed Dhârur in the Nizâm's territory as the site of the ancient city. The other sea-port towns mentioned in the Periplus are Souppara, the modern Supârem or Supârâ near Bassein and the Sorparaka of the inscriptions and the Purânas, where interesting Buddhistic relics were dug out by Mr. Campbell and Paṇḍit Bhagvânâl; Kalliena, the modern Kalyân, which must have been a place of great commercial importance since a good many of the donors whose names are inscribed in the caves at Kânheri and some mentioned in the caves at Junnar were merchants residing in Kalyân;² Semulla identified with Chembur by some and with Chaul by others; Mandagora, very likely the same as the modern Mândâd, originally Mandagada, situated on the Râjapuri creek near Kudem where we have the caves; Palai-patmai, which probably was the same as Pâl which is near Mahâd; Melizeigara, the second part of the name of which can at once be recognized as Jayagad and which must be identified with that place whatever the first part Meli may mean; Buzantion, and others. Buzantion is probably the Vaijayantî³ of the inscriptions, but with what modern town it is to be identified it is difficult to say. Vaijayantî is mentioned in the Kadamba copper-plates translated by Mr. Telang,⁴ and was most probably some place in North Kânara.

Section VIII.

In a grant of the Vijayanagar dynasty, Mādhava, the great counsellor of king Harihara, is represented to have been appointed viceroy of Jayantīpura. He then conquered Goa and seems to have made that his capital.¹ Jayantīpura is said to be another name for Banavāsī. In the Sabhāparvan of the Mahābhārata, Banavāsī is spoken of as if it were the name of a country, and immediately after it, Jayantī is mentioned as a town.² If then Jayantī and Vaijayantī were two forms of the same name, Vaijayantī was probably the modern Banavāsī, or perhaps in consideration of the facts that the name of Vaijayantī occurs in an inscription at Kārli and also that the Greek geographers in mentioning the places of note on the coast could not have run at once from Jayagad to the southern limit of North Kānarā, Vaijayantī may be identified with Vijayadurg. But these objections are not of very great weight.

It is not possible to ascertain the names of all the towns in the inland country that were in a flourishing condition during the time we have been speaking of. Besides Paiṭhaṇ and Tagara there was Nāsik, which is mentioned in an inscription in one of the caves at the place and also at Beḍṣā. The district about the town was called Govardhana. Junnar was another flourishing town, as is attested by the number of cave-temples at the place. But what its name was we do not know. The name Junnar, Junanara, Jārṇanagara, or Jīrṇanagara, which means the old town, must have been given to it after it had lost its importance. I have already expressed my belief that it was the capital of Nahapāna. Puḷumāyi, who overthrew the dynasty of Nahapāna, is in one of the Nāsik inscriptions styled "lord of Navanara," meant probably for Navanagara or the new town. That he reigned at Paiṭhaṇ we know from Ptolemy, and also from the many traditions about Śālivāhana which locate the person or persons bearing that name at that city. The Navanara, then, of the inscription was probably another name given to the town when Puḷumāyi re-established his dynasty, and, in contrast with it, Nahapāna's capital was called the "Old Town." Or perhaps Puḷumāyi widened the old town of Paiṭhaṇ and called the new extension Navanara. What town existed near the group of caves at Kārli and the adjoining places, we do not know. But the place spoken of in connection with the monastic establishment is in an inscription named Valuraka,³ and the district in which it was situated is called Māmalāhāra,⁴ or the district of Māmala, the modern Māval. Further south there was the town of Karahātaka, the modern Karhād, which is mentioned in an inscription at Kudem⁵ and also in the Mahābhārata.⁶ Kolhāpur also must have been a flourishing town in those days, since a Buddhistic stūpa containing the coins we have already noticed and other remains of antiquity have been found there. The old name of the place is unknown. Either Karhād or Kolhāpur must be the Hippocura of Ptolemy in which he locates Baleocuros whom we have identified with the Viḷivāyakura of the Kolhāpur coins.

Trade-guilds.

Persons engaged in trade and commerce probably acquired large fortunes. The great chaitya cave at Kārli was caused to be constructed by a Seth (Sreshṭhin) of Vaijayantī, and in other places also, especially at Kānheri, their gifts were costly. There were in those days guilds of trades such as those of weavers, druggists, corn-dealers, oil-manufacturers, &c. Their organization seems to have been complete and effective, since, as already mentioned, they received permanent deposits of money and paid interest on them from generation to generation. Self-government by means of such guilds and village communities has always formed an important factor of the political administration of the country. A nigamasabhā or town-corporation is also mentioned in one of Ushavadāta's Nāsik inscriptions, which shows that something like municipal institutions existed in those early days. It is also worthy of remark that the yearly interest on the 2000 kārshāpanas deposited by Ushavadāta was 100 kārshāpanas, and in another case that on 1000 was 75 showing that the rate of interest was not so high as it has been in recent times, but varied from five to seven and a half per cent. per annum. If the rate of interest depends on the degree of security and bears an inverse ratio to the efficiency of government, it appears that the country was well governed notwithstanding political revolutions. To this result the efficient local organization spoken of above, which no changes of dynasties ever affected, must no doubt have contributed in a large measure.

Rate of interest.

Communication between different parts of the country.

Communication between the several provinces does not appear to have been very difficult. Benefactions of persons residing in Vaijayantī or Banavāsi, and Sorparaka or Supārā, are recorded in the cave at Kārli; of a Nāsik merchant at Bedsā; of some inhabitants of Bharukachchha and Kalyān at Junnar; of natives of Northern India and Dāttāmitrī, which I have elsewhere shown was situated in Lower Sindh, at Nāsik; and of an iron-monger of Karahākada or Karhād at Kudem. On the other hand, gifts of natives of Nāsik and Karhād are recorded on the stūpa at Bharhut which lies midway between Jabalpur and Allahābād.¹ Unless there were frequent communications between these places, it is not possible that the natives of one should make religious endowments at another.

PROBABLE HISTORY OF THE PERIOD BETWEEN THE EXTINCTION OF THE ANDHRABHRITYAS AND THE RISE OF THE CHÂLUKYAS.

FOR about three centuries after the extinction of the Andhrabhrityas, we have no specific information about the dynasties that ruled over the country. The Mâtsya and the Vâyû, as observed before, place seven princes of a branch of the Andhrabhrityas after them, and I have given reasons to believe that the Madhariputra of the inscription and the coins referred to before was one of them. This branch seems to have been in possession of the whole extent of the country that was ruled over by their predecessors. If the fact, noticed before, of some coins of the later Kshatrapa kings being found in a village near Karhâd is to be regarded as evidence of their sway over this country and not to be attributed merely to commercial intercourse, the Kshatrapa dynasty also must be considered to have obtained possession of a portion at least of the Dekkan after the Śâtavâhanas. The earliest of these princes is Vijaya Sâha¹ (or Sena) whose date is 144² which, if the era is that of the Ś'aka kings, corresponds to A. D. 222, while the latest date we have assigned to the Śâtavâhanas is about A. D. 218. The last of the princes whose coins are found near Karhâd is Viśva Sâha (Sena), one of whose coins has the date 214 and another 224, corresponding to A. D. 292 and A. D. 302.³ About this time princes of the race of Âbhîras or cowherds must have come into power. Ten of them are mentioned in the Purâṇas. In the Nâsik caves there is an inscription dated in the ninth year of Vîrasena Âbhîra, the son of Damarî and of Ś'ivadatta Âbhîra.⁴ The characters in the inscription, though they do not differ much from those in the inscriptions of the later Andhrabhritya kings, must be regarded as more modern. The language is Sanskrit, which I regard as an indication of a later era. When the popular dialect became different from the Pâli, or the Pâli became less sacred, the people fell back upon the original Sanskrit for such purposes as those of recording religious gifts; and thus in all the later grants we find the Sanskrit used, while, from the times of Aśoka to the extinction of the Andhrabhrityas, the language used was mostly the Pâli, or, to speak more accurately, one or more of the Prâkrits of the period. The Âbhîras were in power for sixty-seven years according to the Vâyû Purâṇa. Many other dynasties are mentioned in the Purâṇas as having ruled over the country. But the information given there is much more confused than in the case of the previous families. It appears that the dynasties that ruled over different parts of India at the same time are put together and confused with those that succeeded each other, so that it is not possible without extraneous assistance to determine their chronological relations.

Section IX.

Râshtrakûtas.

We have seen from the cave inscriptions that from remote times tribes of Kshatriyas calling themselves Bhojas and Raṭṭhis or Râshtrikas were predominant in the country. In the northern part of the Dekkan or Mahârâshṭra these called themselves "the Great Raṭṭhis or Mahârâṭṭhis, the ancient Marâthâs," but in other places the name in use must have been Raṭṭhis or Raṭṭhas, since we know of more modern chiefs in the Southern Marâṭhâ Country who called themselves by that name. Some of the Raṭṭha tribes must have formed themselves into a family or group (kûta) and called themselves Raṭṭhakûḍa, and later on Râṭhoḍa, the Sanskrit original of which is Râshtrakûta. Or the Râshtrakûta family was so called because it was the main branch of the race of the Raṭṭhas that had spread over the whole country. These native chiefs that ruled over the country must have been held in subjection by the Andhrabhṛityas during the continuance of their power, and also by the later Kshatrapas. But after the dynasties became extinct they must have resumed their independence. The Âbhîras held sway for some time and over a part of the country only; for the tradition of Gauḷi or cowherd rulers which very probably refers to them is confined to the Nâsik and Khândes districts. The Râshtrakûtas probably rose to power about the same time as the Âbhîras. Hence in the inscriptions on the Miraj plates and the Yevur tablet first brought to light by Mr. Wathen and Sir Walter Elliot,¹ respectively, it is stated that Jaysinhâ, the founder of the Châlukya dynasty in the Dekkan, established himself in the country after having vanquished Indra, the son of Kṛishṇa of the Râshtrakûta family. The Châlukya dynasty was, as will hereafter be seen, founded in the beginning of the sixth century of the Christian era. From about the end of the third to the beginning of the sixth century, therefore, the Dekkan was ruled over by princes of the Râshtrakûta family.

Traikûtakas.

An inscription on copper-plates found in the chaitya of one of the caves at Kânheri is dated in the 245th year of a dynasty, which, if the word has been correctly lithographed, is called Strakûṭaka.² But the published copy of the inscription was made in the time of Dr. Bird and the plates themselves are not now available for re-examination. This Strakûṭaka may be a mislection for Râshtrakûta. But it is not unlikely Traikûṭaka, as the late Paṇḍit Bhagvânâlâl contended. He has published a copper-plate charter issued from the camp of the victorious army of Traikûṭakas by a prince of the name of Darhase-na³ in the year 207. Traikûṭaka was thus probably the name of a race and the prince belonged to it. And the Kânheri inscription would show that this dynasty had an era of its own. From the form of the characters in the inscription, it appears that it was engraved in the latter part of the fifth century of the Christian era; so that the Traikûṭaka dynasty was founded about the middle of the third century, i. e. after the extinction of the Śātavāhanas. But further information about the dynasty is not available ; and we do not know over what extent of country it ruled. But since the epoch of the era appears to be the same as that of the era used by the kings of Chedi, possibly the race of the Haihayas or Kalachuris which ruled over that province rose to power about 249 A.D. and held sway over a part of the Dekkan including the western coast up to the country of Lāt. They were afterwards driven away by some other race and had to confine themselves to Chedi. The resemblance between the names Tripura the capital of the dynasty and Trikāṭa is perhaps not fortuitous.

THE EARLY CHĀLUKYAS.

Legendary

WE will next proceed to an account of the princes who belonged to the dynasty called Chalukya, Chalukya, or Chālukya.¹ A large number of inscriptions on copper-plates and stone tablets have amply elucidated the history of this dynasty. The legendary origin of this family is thus given by Bilhana, the author of the Vikramādikadevacharita, or life of Vikramāditya a prince of the later or restored Chālukya line. On one occasion when Brahmadeva was engaged in his morning devotions, Indra came up to him and complained of the sinfulness of the world in which no man performed the sacrificial rites or gave oblation to the gods. Brahmadeva looked at his chuluka or the hand hollowed for the reception of water in result of his devotional exercise, and from it sprang a mighty and over-who became the progenitor of the Chālukya race. Some time after, two great heroes of the name of Hārīta and Mānavya Nāsi born in the family and they raised it to very great distinction. The original seat of the dynasty was Ayodhyā, and in the course of time a branch of it established itself in the south.

Traikūṭa

As stated in the opening lines of all the copper-plate grants of this family, the Chālukyas belonged to the Gotra or race of Mānavya and were the descendants of Hārīti. They were under the guardianship of the Seven Mothers and were led to prosperity by the god Kārtikeya. They obtained from Nārāyaṇa a standard with a boar represented on it, and fighting under that standard they subjugated all kings. The Yevur tablet and the Miraj plates, referred to above, agree with Bilhana in representing Ayodhyā as the original seat of the family. But since these were almost contemporaneous with the poet, all the three represent only the tradition that was current in the eleventh century. The first prince who raised the family to ¹ Dr. Fleet draws a distinction between Chalukya and Chālukya and asserts that "this last form belongs only to the restored dynasty commencing with Taila II" and that "it does not occur in any of the genuine early inscriptions." But it does belong to the earlier dynasty also, and is found in genuine early inscriptions. The best way to determine the point whether the first syllable was च or चाल is to refer to verses containing the name, the metre of which will show the quantity unmistakeably. The inscriptions of the earlier dynasty are in prose; we must therefore refer to the versified grants of the Rāshtrakūṭas which speak of the dynasty supplanted by them. In the Rādhapur grant of Govinda III. (Ind. ant., Vol. VI., p. 65), we have यथाचालुक्यकुलदत्तन &c., in verse 3. In the Navasārī grant edited by me (Jour. B. B. R. A. S. Vol. XVIII., p. 257), we have चालुक्यवराजलघेः स्वयमेव लक्ष्मीः &c. In three of the five grants of the eastern branch of the early dynasty edited by Dr. Hultzsch we have चालुक्यानां कुलम् (South Indian Inscriptions, Vol. I., pp. 44, 47 & 57). The form चालुक्य is also frequently used. The distinction between च and चाल and the difference in sense in consequence of the lengthening of the vowel which Dr. Fleet points out have place in the pure Sanskrit of Pāṇini and of the Brāhmaṇas; but there is no room for them in names that came into use in the Prākṛit period long after Sanskrit became a dead language. Chalukya was some vernacular name which was Sanskritized into the various forms we actually find.

After him reigned Ranarâga, who the sovereignty of allalour and had a stately and gigantic person. He was a prince named Govinson Pulakesî, who performed a great Aśvamedha sacrifice, since that and attended equally to the concerns of this world. Kirtivarman had three sons at least Narmā, all young when he died. His brother Maṅgalīśa thereupon ascended the throne after him. Maṅgalīśa vanquished the Kalachuri, assuming the title of prince ruling over the country of Chedi, the capital of which was Tripura or Tevur near Jabalpur. Buddha son of S'aṅkaragaṇa, whom he is represented in one grant² to have conquered and put to flight must have been a Kalachuri prince, as the name S'aṅkaragaṇa frequently occurs in the genealogy of the dynasty. Maṅgalīśa is said to have carried his arms to both the eastern and the western seas. On the coast of the latter he conquered what is called Revatīdvīpa, or the Island of Revatī. A copper-plate grant by a governor of this island was found near Goa,³ from which it would appear that Revatī was very probably the old name of Reddī situated a few miles to the south of Vengurlē. In an inscription in a cave-temple at Bādāmī, it is stated that the temple⁵ was caused to be excavated by Maṅgalīśa. He there placed an idol of Viṣṇu, and on the occasion of its consecration granted a village, out of the revenues of which a ceremony called Nārāyaṇabali was to be performed and sixteen Brāhmaṇs to be fed every day, and the residue to be devoted to the maintenance of recluses. This inscription is dated in the twelfth year of some reign when 500 years of the Śaka era had elapsed. The reign in the published article Dr. Fleet places the accession of Maṅgalīśa in 521 Śaka current, being led to it by the occurrence in an inscription of that prince of the words राज्य पञ्चमश्री वर्षे प्रवर्त्तमाने सिद्धार्थे. I have carefully examined the facsimile of the inscription given in the article; and am satisfied that this is by no means the correct reading. राज्य and प्रवर्त्तमाने are the only words that are certain and perhaps the word श्री also. But पञ्चम is highly doubtful; the letter which Dr. Fleet reads म is exactly like that which he reads उच; and there is some vacant space after उच and म in which something like another letter appears. Similarly the सि of सिद्धार्थे is hardly visible as an independent letter, and the next two letters are also doubtful. Besides in another inscription of the early Chālukya dynasty the cyclic year appears. (See Ind. Ant., Vol. XIX., p. 9 and grant executed in the third year of his reign and in 535 S'aka, he appears to have come to the throne in 533 S'aka or A.D. 611. After Maṅgalīśa's death, the enemies whom his valour had kept in subjection rose on all sides. A prince of the name of Appāyika and another named Govinda who very probably belonged to the Rāshtrakūta race, since that name occurs frequently in the genealogy of that family, attacked the new Chālukya king. The former, who had horses from the northern seas in his army, fled away in fear when opposed by the powerful forces of Pulakeśi, and the latter surrendered to him and becoming his ally was received into favour and rewarded.¹ He then turned his arms against the Kadambas, attacked Banavāsi, their capital, and reduced it. The prince of the Gaṅga family which ruled over the Chera² country situated about the modern province of Maisur, and the head of the Alupa³ race which probably held the province of Malabār, became his allies. He then sent his forces against the Mauryas of the Konkan, who were vanquished without any difficulty. With a fleet of hundreds of ships he attacked Puri,⁴ which was the mistress of the western sea, and reduced it. The kings of Lāṭa, Mālava, and Gūrjara were conquered and became his dependents. About this time, there was a powerful monarch in Northern India whose name was Harshavardhana. He was king of Kanoj, but in the course of time made himself the paramount sovereign of the north. He then endeavoured to extend his power to the south of the Narmadā, but was opposed by Pulakeśi, who killed many of his elephants and defeated his army. Thenceforward, Pulakeśi received or assumed the title of Parames'vara, the lord paramount. This achievement was by the later kings of the dynasty considered the most important, and that alone is mentioned in their copper-plate grants in the description of Pulakeśi II. Pulakeśi appears to have kept a strong force on the banks of the Narmadā to guard the frontiers. Thus, by his policy as well as valour, he became the supreme lord of the three countries called Mahārāshtrakas containing ninety-nine thousand villages. The kings of Kosala and Kalinga⁵ trembled at his approach and surrendered to him. After some time he marched with a large army against the king of Kāñchīpura or Conjeveram and laid siege to the town. He then crossed the Kāveri and invaded the country of the Cholas, the Pāṇḍyas, and the Keralas. But these appear to have become his allies. After having in this manner established his supremacy throughout the south, he entered his capital and reigned in peace. The date of the inscription from which the greater

It was in the reign of this king that Hwan Thsang, the Chinese Buddhist pilgrim, visited India. In the course of his travels through the country he visited Mahārāshtra, which he calls Mo-ho-la-cha. He saw Pulakeśi, whom he thus describes: "He is of the race of Tsa-ta-li (Kshatriyas); his name is Pu-lo-hi-she; his ideas are large and profound and he extends widely his sympathy and benefactions. His subjects serve him with perfect self-devotion."¹ About Pulakeśi's having withstood the power of Harshavardhana, which we have before mentioned on the authority of inscriptions, Hwan Thsang speaks in these words: "At present the great king Śīlāditya (Harshavardhana) carries his victorious arms from the east to the west; he subdues distant peoples and makes the neighbouring nations fear him; but the people of this kingdom alone have not submitted. Although he be often at the head of all the troops of the five Indies, though he has summoned the bravest generals of all the kingdoms, and though he has marched himself to punish them, he has not yet been able to vanquish their opposition. From this we may judge of their warlike habits and manners."² The Chinese traveller visited Mahārāshtra about the year A.D. 639, that is, five years after the inscriptions were raised to above was incised. The kingdom, according to the inscription, covered an area of six thousand li (1200 miles) in circuit and the capital was situated near a large river to the west, and towards the west was situated near a large river to him, was, or and towards the character and general condition of the soil, climate, and the are thus described by him: "The soil is rich and fertile and produces abundance of grain. The climate is warm and healthy. The manners are simple and honest. The natives are tall and have a haughty and supercilious in character. Whoever does them a service may count on their gratitude, but he that offends them will not escape their revenge. If any one insult them they will risk their lives to wipe out that affront. If one apply to them in difficulty they will forget to care for themselves in order to flee to his assistance. When they have an injury to avenge they never fail to give warning to their enemy; after which each puts on his cuirass and grasps his spear in his hand. In battle they pursue the fugitives but do not slay those who give themselves up. When a general has lost a battle, instead of punishing him corporally, they make him wear women's clothes, and by that force him to sacrifice his own life. The state maintains a body of dauntless champions to the number of several hundreds. Each time they prepare for combat they drink wine to intoxicate them, and then one of these men, spear in hand, will defy ten thousand enemies. If they kill a man met upon the road the law does not punish them. Whenever the army commences a campaign these braves march in the van to the sound of the drum. Besides, they intoxicate many hundreds of naturally fierce elephants. At the time of their coming to blows they drink also strong liquor. They run in a body trampling everything under their feet. No enemy can stand before them. The king, proud of possessing these men and elephants, despises and slights the neighbouring kingdoms."

Pulakeśi II. appears undoubtedly to have been the greatest prince of this dynasty; and his fame reached even foreign countries. He is represented in an Arabic work to have sent an embassy to Chosroes II., king of Persia, who reigned from A.D. 591 to A.D. 628, in the thirty-sixth year of that prince's reign, and must have received one from him, either before or after.¹ During his reign the power of the Chālukyas was established over a very large extent of country. His younger brother Vishnuvardhana, otherwise called Vishamasiddhi, seems to have for some time been appointed to rule over the Sâtârâ and Paṇḍharpur districts, since a copper-plate inscription of his found at Sâtârâ records the grant of a village situated on the southern bank of the Bhîmâ.² Vishnuvardhana afterwards obtained the province of Veṅgi between the lower Krishṇâ and the Godâvarî, where he founded another flourishing branch of the Chālukya dynasty. Pulakeśi's second brother Jayasîmha must have been his brother's viceroy in the district about Nâsik. For, in a copper-plate grant found in the Igatpurî tâluka of the district, Nâgavardhana, the son of Jayasîmha, assigns the village of Balegrâma, which has been identified with the modern Belgâm Tarhâlâ about twelve miles to the north-east of Igatpurî, for the worship of the god Kâpâlikeśvara.³ The district in which the village was situated is in the grant called Goparâshtra. Similarly, Pulakeśi's eldest son Chandrāditya ruled over the province which contained the Sâvantvâdî district. In a copper-plate grant, Vijayabhattachârîkâ, the queen of Chandrāditya, who is styled Prithivîvallabha and Mahârâja or great king, assigns to certain Brâhmanas a field along with the adjoining Khajjana (modern Khâjana) or marshy land in the village of Kochareṇi situated on the coast about seven miles to the north of Veṅgurem. In another grant found at Nerur, she assigns a field in the fifth year of svardjya or "one's own reign." Now the reign referred to by this expression must be her husband's, so spoken of to distinguish it from that of his years. Vikramāditya, the second son of Pulakeśi, who succeeded him as the chief seat of government. Chandrāditya was a Chinchhella,⁴ titles above given show, and it is proper that his Chinchhella kings, and should speak of his reign as svardjya or her reign. Chinchhella kings had necessary that charities such as those recorded thereupon Valla-should, like political offices or rights, be conferred on the ruling prince alone. by women as much as by men; and hence a woman like Vijaya-bhattārikā might, during the lifetime of her husband, give a field. The fact of her doing so does not necessitate the supposition that she was a ruler or a regent when she made these grants, as has been thought. She was simply the crowned queen of a reigning monarch at that time. Another son of Pulakeśi named Ādityavarman seems to have ruled over the district near the confluence of the Kṛishṇā and the Tuṅgabhadra,¹ as a copper-plate grant of his issued in the first year of his reign was found in the Karnul District. An undated grant of Pulakeśi found at Chiplun in Southern Konkan has recently been published. In it he sanctions the grant of the village of Āmravātaka made by his maternal uncle Śrīvallabha Senānandarāja "the ornament" of the Sendraka race.² This appears to be a family of minor chiefs with whom the Chālukyas were connected. A similar grant was made by the next king at the request of the Sendraka chief Devāsakti.³ Inscriptions of Sendrakas are found in Gujarāt also, where probably they went when the power of the Chālukyas was established in that province. The name Sendraka is probably preserved in the modern Marāṭhā name Sinde.

Pulakeśi was succeeded by his second son Vikramāditya. In the grants he is called Pulakeśi's priyatanaya or favourite son; so that it appears that Pulakeśi had arranged that Vikramāditya should succeed him at the principal seat of government, and had assigned an outlying province to his eldest son Chandraditya. At the beginning of this reign as of the previous ones there was a disturbance; but it did not come from the princes or chiefs more to the north who seem to have now been permanently humbled, but from the far south. The Pallava king of Kāñchi or Conjeveram and the rulers of the Cholas, the Pāṇdyas, and the Keralas threw off the yoke which Pulakeśi had but loosely placed over them, and rebelled. Vikramāditya, who was a man of abilities and daring adventure, broke the power of the Cholas, Pāṇdyas, and Keralas. He defeated the Pallava king, captured his capital Kāñchi, they compelled him, who had never before humbled himself before their ally, to do him homage. On the back of his horse Chitraspear in hand and sword in hand he is said to have repelled all the enemies who attacked him. In this manner he acquired again the whole battle, institutions ruled over by his father, and became the paramount lord of the country "between the three seas."⁴

The state maintained by Vikramāditya I. a branch of the Chālukyas of several hundreded in southern Gujarāt or the country called drink wine to intoxication. Vikramāditya seems to have assigned that hand, will defy ten brother named Jayasimhavarman Dharāśraya, upon the road the law who thus was another son of Pulakesi II.¹ Śryāśraya Śilāditya son of Jayasimha made a grant of land while residing at Navasāri in the year 421,² and another in 443 while encamped at Kusumesvara with his victorious army.³ In both of these Śryāśraya is called Yuvarāja or prince-regent and not a king. Another son of Jayasimha named Vinayāditya Yuddhamalla Jayāśraya Maṅgalarāja issued a similar charter in the Śaka year 653.⁴ Pulakesi, who represents himself as the younger brother of Jayāśraya Maṅgalarsarāja and as meditating on his feet, granted a village in the year 490.⁵ Both are styled kings. From all this it appears that Jayasimhavarman though made sovereign of southern Gujarāt did not rule over the province himself but made his son Śryāśraya his regent. He held that position for more than twenty-two years; and does not appear to have become king in his own right, as he is not mentioned in Pulakesi's grant. Pulakesi, however, seems from his date to be his younger brother. Śryāśraya died before his father; Jayāśraya succeeded the latter as king and he was succeeded by Pulakesi. The dates 421, 443, and 490, the era of which is not given, would if referred to the Gupta era be equivalent to 739, 761, and 808 of the Christian era respectively; while Jayāśraya's 653 Śaka is 731 A.D. But Vinayāditya the sovereign of the main branch who is mentioned in the grant of 443 died about 697 A.D.;⁶ and Jayasimha whose Yuvarāja was Śryāśraya will have to be supposed to have lived to 761 A.D. i.e. 81 years after the death of his brother Vinayāditya; while the interval between Pulakesi and his immediate predecessor Jayāśraya will become 77 years, as Śaka 653 of the latter corresponds to 731 A.D. The Gupta era will, therefore, not do; and we must with the late Pandit Bhagvānlāl refer the dates to the Traikūtaka era of the use of which we have at least two instances. Thus Śryāśraya's dates will be 670 and 692 A.D., of Jayāśraya 731 A.D. and of Pulakesi 739 A.D., and there will be no incongruity. But the original dates themselves 421 and 490 show the distance of time between Śryāśraya and Pulakesi to be 69 years; and if we take the later date of the former it will be reduced to 47 years. Even this is too much and the only way to account for it is by supposing that the two youngest sons of Jayasimha Dharāśraya were born of a young wife married when he was advanced in years. In Pulakesi's grant it is stated that he vanquished an army of Tājikas which had destroyed the Saindhava⁷, Kachchhella⁸, Saurāshtra, Chāvotaka,⁹ Maurya,¹⁰ Gurjara¹¹ and other kings, and on its way to Dakṣiṇāpatha to conquer the southern kings had come to Navasāri to reduce that country first. Thereupon Vallabhanarendra, who must have been Vijayāditya or Vikramāditya II. the reigning sovereign of the main branch, conferred upon him the titles of "Pillar of Dakṣiṇāpatha" (Dakṣiṇāpatasādhāra), "Ornament of the family of Chaluka" (Chalukakulālaṃkāra), "Beloved of the earth" (Prithivīvalabha), the "Repeller of the unrepellable" (Anivartakani-vartayitri) and "Support of men in the world" (Avanijanaśraya). As "Tājika" is a name applied to Arabs, from which the name "Tājika" of a branch of astrology borrowed in the first instance from the Arabs is derived, the allusion in this grant is to an Arab invasion. And we have a mention of such invasions between the years 711 A.D. and 750 A.D. by Mahammad Kasim and his successors.¹ Navasāri was the capital of the Chālukyas of Lāṭa or southern Gujarāt.

A spurious
Chālukya grant.

A copper-plate grant of the Gujarāt Chālukyas found at Kherā and translated by Prof. Dowson contains the names of three princes, viz., Jayasimharāja, Buddhavarmanrāja, and Vijayarājya.² Scholars and antiquarians have understood the first of these to be the same as Jayasimha the founder of the Chālukya dynasty of the Dekkan. But I think the prince meant is Jayasimhavarman, the brother of Vikramāditya I. and founder of the Gujarāt branch of the dynasty; for nothing has hitherto been discovered connecting the early Chālukya princes with Gujarāt. The grant, however, appears to me to be a forgery.³ The Buddhavarman mentioned in it, if he existed at all, must have been another son of Jayasimhavarman, besides the two spoken of above, and he and his son Vijayarāja must have ruled over another part of Gujarāt. If the grant is to be regarded as genuine, the date 394 will have to be referred to the Gupta era.

Vinayāditya.

After Vikramāditya I. his son Vinayāditya came to the throne. One of his grants is dated Śaka 611, which was the tenth year of his reign,⁴ another in 613 Śaka and in the eleventh year, and a third in 616 Śaka and the fourteenth year.⁵ There is also an inscription of his on a stone tablet, the date occurring in which is 608 Śaka and the seventh year of his reign.⁶ From these it appears that Vinayāditya came to the throne in 602 Śaka corresponding to A.D. 680, in which year his father Vikramāditya must have ceased to reign. His latest is A.D. 694, but his reign terminated in A.D. 696 as is seen from his son's grants referred to below. During his father's lifetime, Vinayāditya assisted him in his wars with the southern kings and won his love by destroying the forces of the Pallava king and of the other three, i.e. Chola, Pāṇḍya, and Kerala, and tranquilizing the country. Between the eleventh and fourteenth years of his reign (A.D. 692—A.D. 695) he succeeded in making the Pallavas, ³ My reasons are these :—(1) Its style is unlike that of the Chālukya grants. (2) It does not contain the usual invocation to the Boar incarnation. (3) It simply gives the three regulation names, i.e., so many as are prescribed, in the legal treatises. (4) There is a uniform mode of naming the three princes, by adding the suffix rāja, a mode not to be met with in the genuine Chālukya grants. (5) None of the three princes has a title or Biruda as all Chālukya princes from Pulakeśi I. downwards had.

Kaḷambhras, Keralas, Haihayas, Vilas, Mālavas, Cholas, Pāṇdyas, and others as steadfast allies of the Chālukya crown as the Gaṅga family of Chera and the Alupas whose loyalty was for the first time secured by Pulakeśi II.¹ The kings of Kāvera, or Kerala as it is read in some of the grants, of the Pārasikas, who were probably the Syrians settled on the coast of Malabār, and of Simhala were made tributaries. He also seems, like his grandfather, to have fought with and defeated some paramount sovereign of Northern India whose name is not given, and to have acquired all the insignia of paramountcy, such as a certain standard called Pāḍidhvaja, the drum called Dhakkā, and others. These events must have taken place after 616 Śaka, since they are not mentioned in his grant of that year, but in those of his successors.² A chief of the name of Maḷārāja Pogilli of the Sendraka family was a feudatory of his in the south about Maisur.³

Section X.

Vinayāditya was succeeded by his son Vijayāditya. He appears to have assisted his grandfather in his campaigns against the southern kings and his father in the expedition into the north. At one time he was captured by his enemies, though they had been defeated and were retreating. Notwithstanding he was in their custody he succeeded in averting anarchy and disturbance in his own country, and when he got off, established his power everywhere and bore all the insignia of supreme sovereignty. There is an inscription at Bādāmi in which it is stated that during his reign, idols of Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Mahēśvara were put up at Vātāpipura in Śaka 621 and the third year of his reign.⁴ One of his grants was issued in Śaka 622 on the full-moon day of Chāḍha and in the fourth year of his reign, another in Śaka 627 on the tenth year, and a third in Śaka 651 on the full-moon day of Chāḍha and in the thirty-fourth year of his reign.⁵ On a comparison of all these dates it follows that his reign began in 618 Śaka after the full-moon day of Āshāḍha corresponding to A.D. 696. The first two of these grants, and another which bears no date, were found at Nerur in the Śāvantvādī state.⁶ Vijayāditya had a long reign of thirty-six years.

Vijayāditya.

After Vijayāditya, his son Vikramāditya II. ascended the throne. A grant of his, engraved on a stone tablet, is dated in 656 Śaka and in the second year of his reign,⁶ wherefore he must have come to the throne in 655 Śaka or A.D. 733. Soon after his coronation he had to turn his arms against his hereditary enemy the Pallava king. The name of the prince who reigned at the Pallava capital at this time was Nandipotavarman. Vikramāditya marched against him in haste and encountered him in the Tudāka country. Nandipotavarman was defeated and had to fly away from the battle-field.

The Châlukya king got a good deal of spoil in the shape of large quantities of rubies, elephants, and instruments of martial music. He then entered the city of Kâñchî, but did not destroy it. In that city he gave a good deal of money to Brâhman and to the poor and helpless, and restored to the temples of Râjasinhêśvara and other gods the gold which, it appears, had been taken away by some previous king. He then fought with the Cholas, the Pândyas, the Keralas, and the Kalabhras, and reduced them.¹ Vikramâditya married two sisters belonging to the family of the Haihayas. The elder of these was called Lokamahâdevî and she built a temple of Śiva under the name of Lokeśvara, at Pattadakal in the Kalâdgi district. The younger's name was Trailokyamahâdevî, and she built another in the vicinity dedicated to the same god under the name of Trailokyêśvara. The latter was the mother of Kîrtivarman the next king.² Vikramâditya reigned for fourteen years.

Kîrtivarman II.

His son Kîrtivarman II. began to reign in 669 Śaka or A.D. 747, since a grant of his, made in the eleventh year of his reign, bears the date 679 Śaka.³ He assisted his father in his wars with the Pallavas. On one occasion he marched against the Pallava king with his father's permission. The ruler of Kâñchî, too weak to face him in the battle-field, took refuge in a fortress. His power was broken by the Châlukya king, who returned to his country with a large spoil. During the reign of this prince the Châlukyas were deprived of their power in Mahârâshtra, and the sovereignty of the country passed from their hands into those of the Râshtrakûta princes. The main branch of the dynasty became extinct; but it had several minor offshoots, and one of these in the person of Tailapa succeeded in the course of time in regaining supreme power. From this time forward, therefore, we do not meet with any copper-plate grants issued by the Châlukyas; but Râshtrakûta plates belonging to this intervening period are met with from Râdhanpur in Northern Gujarât to Sâmagad near Kolhâpur and Nâgpur in the Central Provinces. The grant of Kîrtivarman II., from which the above account of that prince is taken, does not allude to the fact of his disgrace, but he must have lost possession of the greater portion of his kingdom before Śaka 679, the date of the grant. The name of the Râshtrakûta monarch who first humbled the Châlukyas was Dantidurga, and the work begun by him was completed by his successor Krishna. In a copper-plate grant of the former found at Sâmagad he is spoken of as having become paramount sovereign after having vanquished Vallabha.⁴ The date occurring in the grant is 675 Śaka. Before that time, therefore, the Châlukyas must have lost their hold over Mahârâshtra. In the Yevur tablet and the Miraj plates the Châlukyas are spoken of as having lost sovereign power in the reign of Kîrtivarman II. We will therefore here close our account of the early Châlukyas.

During the period occupied by the reigns of these early Châlukya princes, the Jaina religion comes into prominence. Ravikîrti, the Jaina who composed the Aihole inscription and represents himself as a poet, was patronized by Pulakesi II. Vijayâditya gave a village for the maintenance of a Jaina temple to Udayadevapaṇḍita or Niravadyapaṇḍita, the house pupil of Śrīpūjyapâda, who belonged to the Devagana sect of the Mûlasaṅgha, i. e. of the Digambara Jains. Niravadyapaṇḍita is spoken of as a spiritual adviser of Vijayâditya's¹ father, i. e. Vinayaditya. Vikramâditya II. repaired a Jaina temple and gave a grant in connection with it to a learned Jaina of the name of Vijayapaṇḍita, who is represented to have silenced his opponents in argument and is styled the only disputant.² But Jainism in those days, as at present, probably flourished in the Southern Marâṭhâ Country only. If the Pūjyapâda who was the preceptor of Niravadyapaṇḍita was the famous grammarian of that name, he must have flourished some time before 618 Śaka, the date of Vinayâditya's death, i. e. about 600 Śaka or 678 A.D. All that is known about Pūjyapâda and his relations to other Digambara writers is not inconsistent with this date. But another date two hundred years earlier has also been assigned to Pūjyapâda.

No inscription has yet come to light showing any close relations between the Buddhists and the Châlukya princes. But that the religion did prevail, and that there were many Buddhist temples and monasteries, is shown by the account given by Hwan Thsang. Still there is little question that it was in a condition of decline. With the decline of Buddhism came the revival of Brâhmanism and especially of the sacrificial religion. The prevalence of the religion of Buddha had brought sacrifices into discredit; but we now see them rising into importance. Pulakesi I. is mentioned in all the inscriptions in which his name occurs as having performed a great many sacrifices and even the Aśvamedha. I have elsewhere³ remarked that the names of most of the famous Brâhmapical writers on sacrificial rites have the title of Svâmin attached to them; and that it was in use at a certain period, and was given only to those conversant with the sacrificial lore. The period of the early Châlukyas appears to be that period. Amongst the Brâhmaṇ grantees of these princes we have Nandisvâmin, Lohasvâmin, and Bhalla-svâmin;⁴ Dâsasvâmin the son of Jannasvâmin and grandson of Revâsvâmi-Dîkshita;⁵ Devasvâmin, Karkasvâmin, Yajñasvâmin, Nâgammasvâmin, another Devasvâmin, Gargasvâmin, Rudrasvâmin,⁶ Prabhâkarasvâmin, Keśavasvâmin,⁷ &c. There are others whose names have not this title attached to them. Among these names there are three borne by the great commentators on sacrificial sūtras and rites, viz. Karkasvâmin, Devasvâmin, and Keśavasvâmin.

Though it would be hazardous to assume that these writers were exactly the persons who are mentioned in the grants with those names, still it admits of no reasonable doubt that they are to be referred to the period when the Châlukyas reigned in Mahârâshtra; and probably flourished in the Dekkan or the Telugu and Kanarese countries. For the revival of Brahmanism was carried on vigorously in the Southern India. The ritual of the sacrifices must during the previous centuries have become confused, and it was the great object of these writers to settle it by the interpretation of the works of the old Rishis.

Purânic gods.

And the Purânic side of Brahmanism also received a great development during this period. Temples in honour of the Purânic triad, Brahmâ, Vishnu, and Maheshvara with a variety of names were constructed in many places. The worship of Sîva in his terrific form seems also to have prevailed, as the Nâsik grant of Nâgavardhana assigning a certain village to the worship of Kâpâlikeśvara, or the god wearing a garland of skulls, would show. Cave architecture came to be used for the purposes of the Purânic religion about the time of the early princes of the dynasty, as we see from the cave-temple at Bâdâmî dedicated to the worship of Vishnu by Maṅgalîśa. The Châlukyas, like their predecessors in previous times, were tolerant towards all religions.

SECTION XI.

THE RĀSHTRAKŪTAS.

Section XI.

THE Rāshtrakūtas are represented to have belonged to the race of Yadū.¹ According to the Wardhā plates they were members of the Sātyaki branch of the race; and were the direct descendants of a prince of the name of Raṭṭa. He had a son of the name of Rāshtrakūta after whom the family was so called. These are clearly imaginary persons; and as remarked before, the Rāshtrakūta family was in all likelihood the main branch of the race of Kshatriyas named Raṭṭhas who gave their name to the country of Mahārāshtra, and were found in it even in the times of Aśoka the Maurya. The Rāshtrakūtas were the real native rulers of the country and were sometimes eclipsed by enterprising princes of foreign origin, such as the Śātavāhanas and the Chālukyas who established themselves in the Dekkan and exercised supreme sovereignty, but were never extirpated. The earliest prince of the dynasty mentioned in the grants hitherto discovered is Govinda I. But in an inscription in the rock-cut temple of the Daśavatāras at Elurā the names of two earlier ones, Dantivarman and Indrarāja, occur.² The latter was Govinda's father and the former his grandfather. Govinda I. was probably the prince of that name who in Ravikīrti's inscription at Aihole is spoken of as having attacked the Chālukya king Pulakeśi II. and to have afterwards become his ally. Govinda was succeeded by his son Karka, during whose reign the Brāhman performed many sacrifices and who seems to have patronized the old Vedic religion. After him his son Indrarāja came to the throne. Indrarāja married a girl who belonged to the Chālukya family, though on her mother's side she was connected with the lunar race, probably that of the Rāshtrakūtas themselves. From this union sprang Dantidurga, who became king after his father. With a handful of soldiers Dantidurga defeated the army of Karnāṭaka, which hitherto had achieved very great glory by vanquishing the forces of the kings of Kāñchi, the Keralas, Cholas, and Pāndyas, and of Śriharsha, the lord paramount of Northern India, and Vajraṭa³; and thus conquered Vallabha or the last Chālukya king Kirtivarman II. with ease. He thus acquired paramount sovereignty in the south.⁴ He also subdued the kings of Kāñchi, Kalinga, Kosala, Śrī-Śaila,⁵ Mālava, Lāṭa, and Tanka. At Ujjayinî he gave large quantities of gold and jewels in charity.¹ A grant of Dantidurga found at Sâmagad in the Kolhâpur district bears the date 675 of the Śaka era, corresponding to A.D. 753.²

Dantidurga died childless according to a grant found at Kardâ,³ and his paternal uncle Krishnarāja succeeded to the throne. Another grant found at Baroda⁴ omits the name of Dantidurga, since the object of the writer was simply to give the pedigree of the reigning monarch, with reference to whom Dantidurga was but a collateral, and not to give the names of all the previous kings. In that grant Krishnarāja is spoken of as having "rooted out" a prince belonging to the same family with himself who had taken to evil ways and to have himself assumed the task of governing for the "benefit of his race." The prince dethroned or destroyed by Krishnarāja could not have been Dantidurga, as has been supposed by some writers, since he was a powerful monarch who for the first time acquired supreme sovereignty for his family. In a grant found at Kāvî, and another found in the Navasârî district, Krishna is represented to have succeeded to the throne after Dantidurga's death.⁵ The prince whom he set aside, therefore, must either have been a son of Dantidurga or some other person with a better claim to the throne than himself. The statement of the Kardâ plate that Dantidurga died childless may be discredited as being made two hundred years after the occurrence.

Krishnarāja, otherwise called Śubhatuṅga and also Akālarsha, carried on the work of Dantidurga and reduced the Chālukyas to complete subjection. In two of the grants⁶ he is spoken of "as having with the aid of gods in the form of his counsellors or followers churned the ocean of the Chālukya race which had been resorted to by mountains in the shape of kings afraid of their wings or power being destroyed⁷—an ocean that was inaccessible to others,—and drawn out from it the Lakshmi⁸" of paramount sovereignty. He is said to have defeated Râhappa who was proud of his own power and prowess, and afterwards assumed the ensigns of supreme sovereignty. Who⁹ this person was we have not the means of determining. In the Wardhâ plates he is represented to have constructed many temples of Śiva, which resembled the Kailāsa mountain.¹ In the Baroda grant it is stated that Krishnarāja “caused to be constructed a temple of a wonderful form on the mountain at Elāpura. When the gods moving in their aerial cars saw it they were struck with wonder and constantly thought much over the matter saying to themselves, ‘This temple of Śiva is self-existent; for such beauty is not to be found in a work of art.’ Even the architect who constructed it was struck with wonder, saying when his heart misgave him as regards making another similar attempt, ‘Wonderful! I do not know how it was that I could construct it.’ King Krishna with his own hands again decorated Sambhu (Śiva) placed in that temple, by means of gold, rubies, and other precious jewels, though he had already been decorated by the wonderful artificial ornaments of the stream of the Gaṅgā, the moon, and the deadly poison.” The ending pura in the names of towns, when it undergoes a change at all, is invariably changed to ur, as in Sihur for Simhapura, Indur for Indrapura, S’irur for S’rīpura, &c. The Elāpura of the inscription, therefore, is Elur; and the temple described in the grant in such terms must be one of those excavated on the hills at the place, perhaps the temple of Kailāsa itself.² Thus it appears that it was Krishnarāja that caused the Kailāsa to be constructed, and the date assigned to it by Drs. Fergusson and Burgess simply on architectural grounds is verified. Krishnarāja must have reigned in the last quarter of the seventh century of the Ś’aka era, i.e., between 753 and 775 A.D.

⁷ The legend is that in early times mountains had wings, and as they did considerable mischief by their use, Indra set about cutting them. The mountains thereupon took refuge in the sea. The story originated from the double sense which the word parvata bears in the Vedas. It denotes "a mountain" and "a cloud" also. Indra was the god who prevented the clouds from flying from place to place, and compelled them to discharge their freight on the earth for the benefit of his human worshippers.

Govinda II.

Krishnarāja was succeeded by his son Govinda II.³ Nothing particular is recorded of him in the grants, except, of course, the general praise which is accorded to every prince, however weak and inglorious. It however appears from the Vaṇi-Diṇḍorī and Rādhānpur grants that he was superseded by his younger brother

² Dr. Bühler in his paper in Vol. VI., Ind. Ant., simply states that the “grant (Baroda) connects him (Krishnarāja) with the hill at Elāpur, where he seems to have built a fort and a splendid temple of Ś’iva.” He has not identified Elāpura and did not perceive the important significance of this and the next two stanzas. He, however, suspected that one of the verses was badly deciphered. That this and the following verses are somewhat badly deciphered there is no doubt; but the translation in the Bengal Asiatic Society’s Journal is far worse and Dr. Bühler was misled by it. Dr. Fleet has published a revised translation (Ind. Ant., Vol. XII., p. 162), but as regards this passage it certainly is no improvement on the first. He also once spoke of “a hill fort” (Ind. Ant., Vol. XI., p. 124), and now thinks Elāpura is in the passage meant to be represented as Krishnarāja’s “encampments.” He identifies Elāpura with Yellāpur in the North Kānarā districts. But the manner in which the temple is described according to my translation and also the obvious derivation of Elur from Elāpura, and Elurā from Elāpuraka, leave little doubt that a rock-cut temple at Elurā is meant to be spoken of; and actually the existence of a Rāshtrakūṭa inscription in one of the temples confirms my conclusion. That my translation is correct and appropriate, I have shown in an article published in the Indian Antiquary, Vol. XII., p. 228, where the reader will find the point fully discussed.

³ The name of this prince is omitted in the Vaṇi-Diṇḍorī and Rādhānpur grants, for the same reason apparently as that for which Dantidurga’s is omitted in the Baroda grant; but he is alluded to when they state that Dhruva or Nirupama set aside his elder brother.

Section XI.

Dhruva, and the grants endeavour to palliate his crime in having thus usurped the throne. The Wardhâ grant states that he gave himself up to sensual pleasures, and left the cares of the kingdom to his younger brother Nirupama; and thus allowed the sovereignty to drop away from his hands. But subsequently he seems from the Paiṭhan¹ grant to have endeavoured to regain his power with the assistance of the neighbouring princes, when Dhruva vanquished him in a battle and formally assumed the insignia of supreme sovereignty. At the end of a Purâṇa entitled Harivamśa of the Digambara Jinas, it is stated that the work was composed by Jinasena in the Śaka year 705 while Vallabha the son of Kṛishṇa was ruling over the south. Govinda II. is in the Kāvī and Paiṭhan grants called Vallabha, while one of the names of Dhruva, the second son of Kṛishṇa I., was Kalivallabha. Govinda II., therefore, must be the prince alluded to, and he appears thus to have been on the throne in the Śaka year 705, or A.D. 783.²

Dhruva was an able and warlike prince. His other names were Nirupama or the "Matchless," Kalivallabha, and Dhārâvarsha. He humbled the Pallava king of Kāñchī and obtained from him a tribute of elephants. He detained in custody the prince of the Gaṅga family, which ruled over the Chera country. He also carried his arms into the north against the king of the Vatsas, whose capital must have been Kauśāmbī the modern Kosam near Allahabad, and who had grown haughty by his conquest of a king of the Gauda country. He drove the Vatsa prince into the impassable desert of Mārvād and carried away the two state umbrellas which he had won from the Gauda king.³ The Jaina Harivamśa represents a Vatsa prince as ruling over the west in Śaka 705. He must have been the same as that vanquished by Nirupama. According to the Navasārī grant Nirupama took away the umbrella of the king of Kosala also; and in the Wardhâ plates he is represented as having three white umbrellas. A stone inscription at Pattadakal was incised in the reign of Nirupama. There he is styled Dhārâvarsha and Kalivallabha.⁴ The last name occurs also in the Wardhâ grant and the first in that found at Paiṭhan. This prince does not appear to have reigned long, as his brother was on the throne in Śaka 705 and his son in Śaka 716, the year in which the Paiṭhan charter was issued.

Dhruva Nirupama was succeeded by his son Govinda III. The Râdhanpur and Vaṇi-Diḍḍori grants were issued by him in the Śaka year 730 corresponding to A.D. 808⁵ while he was at

Mayûrakhaṇḍî. This place has been identified with a hill-fort in the Nâsik territory of the name of Morkhaṇḍ. Whether Mayûrakhaṇḍî was the capital of the dynasty in the time of this king cannot be satisfactorily determined. Govinda III. was certainly one of the greatest of the Râshtrakûta princes, and the statement in his grant that during his time the Râshtrakûtas became invincible, as the Yâdavas of Purânic history did when under the guidance of Krishṇa, appears credible. Seeing he had grown up to be a brave prince his father proposed to abdicate the throne in his favour; but he declined, expressing himself perfectly satisfied with his position as Yuvarâja or prince-regent.¹ When after his father's death he ascended the throne, twelve kings united their forces and rose against him, desirous of striking an effectual blow at the power of the Râshtrakûtas. But alone and unassisted, he by his personal valour suddenly inflicted a crushing defeat on them and broke the confederacy. He released the Gânga prince of Chera, who had been kept in custody by his father; but no sooner did he go back to his native country than he put himself into an attitude of hostility. But Govinda III. immediately vanquished him, and threw him into captivity again. Subsequently he marched against the Gûrjara king, who fled away at his approach. Thence he proceeded to Mâlva, the king of which country knowing himself to be unable to resist his power surrendered to him. After receiving his obeisance he directed his march to the Vindhya. When Mârâsarva, the ruler of the adjoining country, who had been watching his movements, heard from his spies that Govinda's army had encamped on the slopes of that mountain, he went up to him, and throwing himself at his feet presented to him his most highly valued heirlooms which no other prince had ever got before. On this occasion Govinda spent the rainy season at a place called S'ribhavana, which has not been identified. When the rains were over, he marched with his army to the Tungabhadra, where he stayed for a short time, and brought the Pallava king of Kâñchî under a more complete subjection than before. Thence he sent a message to the king of Veṅgi, or the country between the lower Krishṇa and the Godâvarî, who probably belonged to the eastern Châlukya dynasty, and he came and attended on him as if he were his servant.² This grand victorious march to the north and the south must have taken place before Śaka 726 or A.D. 804. For in a copper-plate grant bearing that date found in the Kânarese country, it is stated that when the king (Govinda III.) "having conquered Dantiga who ruled over Kâñchî, had come to levy tribute, and when his encampments were on the banks of the Tungabhadra," he allotted some lands to one Sîvadhârî at a holy place named Râmesvara.³ His expeditions against the neighbouring princes must have been undertaken after

Govinda III. thus acquired a large extent of territory and established his supremacy over a number of kings. He appears to have become the paramount sovereign of the whole country from Mālvā in the north to Kāñchīpura in the south, and to have under his immediate sway the country between the Narmadā and the Tuṅgābhadra. The Vani-Diṇḍorī plates convey a village situated in the Nāsik district, while those found in the Kānārese country assign some land near the Tuṅgābhadra. The province of Lāta, situated between the Mahī and the lower Tāpī, was assigned by him to his brother Indra,¹ who became the founder of another branch of the dynasty. Govinda III., as stated in the Baroda grant, made and unmade kings. His secondary names as found in his own grants were Prabhūtarsha or "Raining profusely," Prithivīvallabha or "the Lover of the Earth," and Śrī-Vallabha. Others will be noticed below. The Baroda grant was issued by Karka, the son of Govinda's brother Indra, the king of Lāta, in Śaka 734 or A.D. 812, and the Kāvī grant by Govinda the younger brother of Karka, in Śaka 749 or A.D. 827. We need not notice these princes further, since they belong more to the history of Gujarāt than of the Dekkan.

In several of the grants belonging to this dynasty, the son and successor of Nirupama is stated to be Jagattuṅga. Now, since Govinda III. was one of the greatest princes of this dynasty, it is impossible that he should have been passed over by the writers of these grants. Jagattuṅga, the son of Nirupama, must, therefore, be Govinda himself and no other. After his death his son Amoghavarsha, whose proper name appears to have been Śarva,² came to the throne. He seems to have marched against the Chālukyas of Veṅgi and put several of the princes to death.³ In the Navasārī grant Amoghavarsha is spoken of simply as Vallabha and is styled Rājarāja or king of kings and also Vīra-Nārāyaṇa. This last title is justified by the poetic writer of the grant by saying that as the God Nārāyaṇa brought out the earth which was immersed in the ocean, so did Vallabha bring the goddess of sovereignty out of the ocean in the shape of the Chālukyas in which it had sunk. He is also represented to have "burnt" the Chālukyas. These also must be allusions to Amoghavarsha's wars with the Chālukyas of Veṅgi; and he probably conquered some territory belonging to them. In the Kardā grant the city of Mānyakheta is spoken of as being in a very flourishing condition in his time. There is little question that it was his capital; but whether it was he who founded it and made it the capital of the dynasty cannot be clearly made out from that grant, as the reading given by Mr. Wathen is corrupt. But the Wardhā plates are clear on the point. In them the successor of Jagattuṅga is called Nripattuṅga; and he is represented to have founded the city of Mānyakheta, which "put the city of the gods" to shame. Mānyakhēṭa has been properly identified with Mālkhed in the Nizam's territory. In the Kānheri caves there are three inscriptions, in which the reigning paramount sovereign is represented to be Amoghavarsha. In one of them Pullasakti of the Śilāhāra family, and in the other two his son, Kapardin, are mentioned as his dependents ruling over Konkan, which province had been assigned to them by Amoghavarsha. The dates occurring in the last two are Śaka 775 and 799.¹ An inscription at Sirur in the Dhārvād district published by Dr. Fleet is dated Śaka 788, vyaya, which is represented as the fifty-second year of the reign of Amoghavarsha;² so that the year 799 Śaka of the Kānheri inscription must have been the sixty-third of his reign. The cyclic year vyaya corresponds to the Śaka year 788 past and 789 current. This prince appears thus to have begun to reign in Śaka 737 past. In a historical appendix at the end of a Jaina work entitled Uttarapurāṇa, or the latter half of the Mahāpurāṇa, by Guṇabhadra, Amoghavarsha is represented to have been a devoted worshipper of a holy Jaina saint named Jinasena, who was the preceptor of Guṇabhadra, and wrote the Ādipurāṇa or the first part of the same work.³ Jinasena himself at the end of his poem the Pārsvābhyudaya gives expression to a wish that Amoghavarsha may reign for a long time. An important work on the philosophy of the Digambara Jainas entitled Jayadhavalā is represented at the end to have been composed when 759 years of the Śaka king had elapsed, in the reign of Amoghavarsha. In the introductory portion of a Jaina mathematical work entitled Śārasaṃgraha by Virāchārya, Amoghavarsha is highly praised for his power and his virtues, and is spoken of as a follower of the Jaina doctrine (Syādvāda).⁴ He is mentioned there also by his other name Nripatuṅga. The authorship of a small tract consisting of questions and answers on moral subjects, entitled Praśnottara-ratnamālikā, which has been claimed for Śaṅkarāchārya and one Śaṅkaraguru by the Brāhmins, and for Vimala by the Svetāmbaras, is attributed to king Amoghavarsha by the Digambara Jainas. At the end of the Digambara copies occurs a stanza, in which it is stated that Amoghavarsha composed the Ratnamâlikâ after he had abdicated the throne in consequence of the growth of the ascetic spirit¹ in him. There is another Amoghavarsha in the dynasty who is represented as being of a thoughtful and religious temper. But he reigned for a short time and does not appear to have had any connection with the Jainas. There is a translation of the work in the Thibetan language, and there, too, the tract is attributed to Amoghavarsha, who is represented as a great king. The Thibetan translation of the name has been retranslated, however, into Amoghodaya by Schiefner; but if he had known the Digambara tradition, he would have put it as Amoghavarsha.² From all this it appears that of all the Râshtrakûta princes, Amoghavarsha was the greatest patron of the Digambara Jainas; and the statement that he adopted the Jaina faith seems to be true.

Amoghavarsha's son and successor was Akâlavarsha. He married the daughter of Kokkala, king of Chedi, who belonged to the Haihaya race, and by her had a son named Jagattuṅga. Akâlavarsha's proper name was Kṛishṇa as is evident from the Navasâri grant and also from the Wardhâ and the Kardâ plates. He is the Kṛishṇarâja during whose reign a tributary chief of the name of Prithvirâma made a grant of land to a Jaina temple which he had caused to be constructed in the Śaka year 797 at Saundatti.³ Another Jaina temple was built by a Vaisya or Bania named Chikârya during his reign in Śaka 824 at Mulgunda in the Dhârvâd district, and in the inscription which records this fact he is styled Kṛishṇa Vallabha.⁴ Kṛishṇa or Akâlavarsha appears to have been a powerful prince. He is represented as having frightened the Gûrjara, humbled the pride of the Lâta, taught humility to the Gaudas, deprived the people on the sea-coast of their repose, and exacted obedience from the Andhra, Kalinga, Gâṅga, and Magadha.⁵

sena the pupil of Gunabhadra, who was the author of the second part. In the historical appendix, "the lofty elephants of Akālavārsha" are represented "to have drunk the waters of the Ganges rendered fragrant by being mixed with the humour flowing from their temples, and, as if not having their thirst quenched, to have resorted to the Kaumāra forest (in the extreme south), which was full of sandal trees set in gentle motion by the breezes blowing over the sea waves, and into the shade of which the rays of the sun did not penetrate."¹ The date 833 Śaka has also been assigned to Akālavārsha.² It will have been seen that an inscription at Saundatti represents Krishnarāja to have been the reigning prince in Śaka 797, while one in the Kānheri caves speaks of his father Amoghavarsha as being on the throne two years later, i.e., in 799. This discrepancy must be due to the fact mentioned in the Ratnamālikā that the latter had abdicated the throne in his old age. The real reigning prince therefore in Śaka 797 and 799 must have been Akālavārsha his son; but the writer of the Kānheri inscription must in the latter year have put in Amoghavarsha's name, as he was not dead, and his having abdicated had probably no significance in his eyes.

Akālavārsha's son was Jagattuṅga. But he did not ascend the throne as appears from the fact that his name is not mentioned in the list of kings given in the Khārepāṭaṇ grant, after Akālavārsha, but that of Indra, who is spoken of as Akālavārsha's grandson, while Jagattuṅga is mentioned in another connection below. And in the Navasāri grant Indra is represented as "meditating on the feet" of Akālavārsha, and not of Jagattuṅga though he was his father, which shows that he was the immediate successor of Akālavārsha. But the Wardhā grant is explicit. It tells us that Jagattuṅga had a beautiful person, and that he died without having ascended the throne. Jagattuṅga married Lakshmî, the daughter of his maternal uncle, the son of Kokkala, who is called Raṇavigraha in the Sāṅgalî and Navasârî grants, and S'amkaragana in the Kardâ plates. But it will be presently shown that the Kardâ plates contain many mistakes and are the source of a good deal of confusion in the history of this dynasty. From this union sprang Indra, who succeeded his grandfather. His title was Nityavarsha according to the Navasârî grant; and his son Govinda IV. is in the Sāṅgalî grant spoken of as "meditating on the feet" of Nityavarsha, which also shows that that was Indra's title. Nityavarsha is the donor in the Navasârî grant. He is represented as residing at his capital Mānyakheṭa, but to have on the occasion gone to Kurundaka, identified with the modern Kaḍoda on the banks of the Tâpî, for his Paṭṭabandhotsava. This must have been the festival in honour of his coronation. At Kurundaka he granted that and many other villages, and restored four hundred more which had once been given in charity but had been resumed by former kings. He also gave away twenty lacs of Drammas in charity after having weighed himself against gold. The village conveyed by the Navasârî grant is Tenna situated in the Lâṭ country. It has been identified with Tenâ in the Navasârî division of the Baroda State. The grant was issued in S'aka 836; so that Indra appears to have come to the throne in that year. Another set of copper-plates found in the Navasârî district records the grant of the village of Gumra identified with the modern Bagumra by the same prince. The grant was issued at the same time as the other, and the contents mutatis mutandis are exactly the same.¹ From these grants of villages in the Navasârî district which must have formed a part of the old country of Lâṭa, and from the statement in the Wardhâ plates that Krishṇa or Akâlavarsha humbled the pride of the Lâṭa prince, it appears that the main branch of the Râshṭrakûṭas reigning at Mānyakheṭa must have in Akâlavarsha's time supplanted or reduced to a humble position the dynasty of their kinsmen in Gujarât, which had been founded in the time of Jagattuṅga or Govinda III. Indra was the reigning monarch in Śaka 838, the cyclic year being Dhâtva, as appears from an inscription published by Dr. Fleet.²

As regards the next king there is some confusion in the Kardâ plates. The Sāṅgalî grant, however, is clear. Indra married a lady from the Haihaya family of Chedi again. Her name was Vijâmbâ;³ and she was the daughter of Aṅgaṇadeva, the son of Arjuna, who was the eldest son of Kokkala, mentioned above. By her Indra had a son named Govinda, who is the last king noticed in the Sāṅgalî grant, since it was issued by him. But according to the Khâre-pâṭaṇ grant, Govinda was the younger brother of a prince named ³ Dr. Fleet in his revised transcript and translation of the Sāṅgalî grant calls her Dvijâmbâ, but in the facsimile given by him the name is distinctly Vijâmbâ in both the places where it occurs. The Sanskrit of Vijâmbâ is Vidyâmbâ. Ind. Ant., Vol. XII., p. 250.

Amoghavarsha II.

Amoghavarsha.¹ The immediate successor of Indra, therefore, was Amoghavarsha, and after him his younger brother Govinda came to the throne. And this is confirmed by the Karda plates also. Amoghavarsha and Govinda are there meant to be mentioned as the two sons of Ambâ, who is the same as the Vijambâ of the Sângali plate. But in the text of the grant Govinda and Ambâ form one compound, so that the translators of the grant call the lady Govindâmbâ, which certainly is an unique or an absurd name. Thus they drop king Govinda altogether.² But the Wardhâ grant is explicit on the point. From it we learn that Amoghavarsha was the elder brother of Govinda, but that he died immediately after his father, as if "out of love for him", and then Govinda came to the throne. The Sângali grant of Govinda IV., as he must be called, does not mention Amoghavarsha by name; but states that "though Govinda had the power, he did not act with any reprehensible cruelty towards his elder brother, and did not render himself infamous by incest, or assume the nature of a devil by casting aside considerations of purity and impurity, but became Sâhasânka by his matchless enterprise and liberality." What this statement exactly means it is difficult to say. But probably Govinda was believed to have encompassed his brother's death, and the other accusations referred to were whispered against him; and this is

² The 14th stanza, the latter part of which I have construed as in the text, is वैद्यां मातुलशंकरगणात्मजायाममृज्जगत्तुङ्गात् । श्रीमानमोषवर्षो गोविन्दोवाभिधानायाम् ।

Now the first line of this is, as it stands, out of place and must contain some mistakes. For, (1) it contains, in substance, a repetition of what we have in the first line of stanza 12, and (2) if it is read here as it is, we shall have to make Ambâ a wife of Jagattuṅga along with Lakshmi, who has been represented as his wife in stanza 12, and understand her to be Lakshmi's sister, the father of both being Saṅkaragaṇa. But Ambâ or Vijambâ is in the Sângali grant clearly spoken of as the daughter of Aṅganadeva, the son of Arjuna, who was the brother of Banavighraha, the father of Lakshmi; that is, Ambâ was the daughter of Lakshmi's first cousin. She is also distinctly represented as the wife of Indra and the mother of Govinda IV. Again, if we take the lines as they are, the result will be that the Karda grant makes no mention of Indra's wife Vijambâ and of his sons Amoghavarsha and Govinda IV., the latter of whom reigned, as we shall see, for at least fifteen years. Such an omission is not likely. Then, again, the Sângali grant makes no allusion whatever to Jagattuṅga's marriage with a lady of the name of Govindâmbâ. And the second line श्रीमानमोषवर्षो गोविन्दोवाभिधानायाम् looks as if the intention of the writer of it was to set forth the names of the two sons of Indra, Amoghavarsha and Govinda, and of their mother Ambâ or Vijambâ. And it seems to me that the following stanza, in which the liberality of a monarch has been praised refers to Govinda IV, who, as noticed in the text below, was called Suvarṇavarsha by people, because he "rained down gold." The name of that prince, therefore, must occur in the verse immediately previous. The first line must, it is clear to me, have crept in through mistake. If it were not read here, the second would be applicable to the king mentioned immediately before, i. e., Indra, and the whole would be consistent with the information derived from the Sângali grant. The emendation I make in the second line is to read नदौ for न्दौ and then Ambâ would be released from her incongruous association with Govinda, and the whole would be consistent and intelligible. There must be other mistakes also in the Karda grant. Very probably a verse or two are omitted here, as also after the next stanza, where Krishnarāja is abruptly introduced and spoken of parenthetically.

intended as a defence. The Khârepâtan and Wardhâ grants agree in representing Govinda as a prince addicted to sensual pleasures. The former says that he was "the abode of the dramatic sentiment of love and was always surrounded by crowds of beautiful women," and the latter that he was "the source of the sportive pleasures of Love, his mind was enchained by the eyes of women, he displeased all men by his vicious courses, and his health being undermined, he met with an untimely death." The words used have double senses from which it would appear that the affairs of the state also fell into confusion and hastened his destruction. But the Sângali grant which was issued by him has of course nothing but praise for him. Govinda's other names were Prabhûtarsha and Suvarnavarsha (raining gold) and probably Sâhâsanka also. The grant was issued in S'aka 855, or A.D. 933, in the Vijaya¹ year of the cycle, while he was at his capital Mânyakheta. Govinda IV. was on the throne in S'aka 841, as appears from an inscription published by Dr. Fleet, in which under the name of Prabhûtarsha he is represented as the reigning sovereign.² The inscription, however, is dated 840 S'aka; but from the cyclic year Pramâthin, which is also given, it must be understood that the year meant is 841 S'aka. It will appear from this that Indra or Nityavarsha, who succeeded his grandfather in S'aka 836, had a very short reign, and his eldest son, Amoghavarsha, could have been on the throne only for a few months. Govinda IV. like Amoghavarsha I. was at war with the Châlukyas of Veṅgi.³ Another inscription represents Govinda IV. as the reigning monarch in S'aka 851.⁴

From the Khârepâtan plates it appears that Govinda IV. was succeeded by his paternal uncle Baddiga, the second son of Jagattuṅga. He is represented to have been a virtuous prince, serene like a sage. He was succeeded by his son Krishnarâja, and after his death his younger brother Khotika became king. The Kardâ grant is somewhat confusing here, but when properly understood it is perfectly consistent with that of Khârepâtan. It states: "When the elder brother Krishnarâjadeva went to heaven, Khottigadeva, who was begotten by the king Amoghavarsha on Kandakadevî, the daughter of Yuvarâja, became king."⁵ Here the expression "elder brother" must be taken as related to Khottigadeva and not to the preceding king,⁶ whoever he may have been. Khotika therefore was, even

Krishna III. and Khotika.

² Ind. Ant., Vol. XII, p. 222. Dr. Fleet, however, identifies this Prabhûtarsha with Jagattuṅga the son of Akâlavarsha or Krishna II, and father of Nityavarsha. But as we have seen Nityavarsha was on the throne in S'aka 836 and 838, wherefore his father could not have been the reigning prince in S'aka 840 or 841. Besides, as I have shown, Jagattuṅga did not ascend the throne at all.

according to the Kardā grant, the younger brother of Krishnarāja. But he is represented to have been the son of Amoghavarsha, while Krishnarāja is spoken of in the Khārepāṭan plates as the son of Baddiga. In an inscription at Salotgi, Krishnarāja, the son of Amoghavarsha, is represented to have been reigning at Mānyakheta in 867 Saka,¹ that is, twelve years after the Sāngali grant of Govinda IV. was issued. He must have been the same prince as that mentioned in the grants we have been examining. For the Krishṇa of these was the second king after Govinda IV. His father Baddiga, who was Govinda's uncle, must have been an old man when he succeeded, and consequently must have reigned for a very short time. Hence his son Krishṇa came to be king within twelve years after Govinda's grant; and there is no other Krishṇa mentioned in the grants who is likely to have been on the throne in 867 Saka. If, then, the Krishṇa of the grants is the same as the Krishṇa of the Salotgi inscription, here we have evidence that his father's name was Amoghavarsha; so that the Baddiga of the Khārepāṭan plates was the same as the Amoghavarsha of the Kardā plates. Krishnarāja and Khotika were thus brothers, and it would appear from the wording of the statement in the Kardā plates that they were the sons of the same father but of different mothers.²

And these points have been placed beyond the possibility of doubt by the Wardhā grant. After Govinda's death, we are told; the feudatory chiefs entreated Amoghavarsha the son of Jagattuṅga, who was

² Dr. Fleet, following Mr. Wathen's translation, makes Krishṇa, whom he calls Krishna III., the elder brother of Amoghavarsha and thus a son of Jagattuṅga. But in the Khārepāṭan grant he is distinctly represented as the son of Baddiga who was the son of Jagattuṅga, and in the Wardhā plates as the son of Amoghavarsha, the son of Jagattuṅga, and was thus a grandson of Jagattuṅga. He is also represented as Khotika's elder brother. I have shown in the text that the expression "elder brother," occurring in the Kardā grant, should by the rules of construction be taken as referring to Khotika and in this way that grant becomes perfectly consistent with that of Khārepāṭan. The Amoghavarsha who was the son of Jagattuṅga is that spoken of in the sixteenth stanza of the Kardā grant, and was different from the one mentioned in the fourteenth, who was the son of Indra and nephew of that Amoghavarsha, as I have shown above. Dr. Fleet brings in another Krishṇa and makes him the younger brother of Khotika, and identifies him with Nirupama (see the text below) and with the Krishṇa whose dates range from Saka 867 to 878. What his authority is I do not know. But the Khārepāṭan grant mentions one Krishṇa only, the elder brother of Khotika and son of Baddiga. The Kardā also mentions one only, and as to his relation with the other princes, I have shown that that grant agrees with the Khārepāṭan plates. The Krishṇa whose dates range from 867 to 878 is to be identified with the elder brother of Khotika and is not to be considered a different prince unalluded to in the grants. Nirupama, the younger brother of Khotika, is not and cannot have been this Krishṇa, because his elder brother and the elder brother of Khotika was called Krishṇa, and he too could not have been called by the same name. Nirupama does not appear to have been a reigning prince, for in the Kardā plates he is only parenthetically introduced as the father of Kakka, who was a reigning prince; and in the Khārepāṭan grant he is not mentioned at all by name, but Kakkala is said to be the son of the brother of Khotika. Krishṇa, on the other hand, was on the throne from 867 to 878 Saka according to the stone inscriptions. Again if Khotika was the elder brother of this Nirupama-Krishṇa it is impossible that he should be reigning in 893 Saka, while Krishṇa should be on the throne from 867 to 878 Saka, that is, before his elder brother. Krishṇa, therefore, was the elder of the two as stated in the Khārepāṭan grant, and Khotika the younger. Dr.

"first among the wise" and the "best of serene sages", to assume the reins of power. He was assisted in the government by his son Kṛishṇa, who though but a crown-prince wielded very great power. The enemies who transgressed his commands were punished; he put to death Dantiga and Bappuka who had grown insolent. He thoroughly subdued the Gāṅga prince; and planted what appears to be a colony of the Āryas in his dominions. Hearing of the ease with which he captured the strongholds in the south, the Gūṛjara prince, who was preparing to take the fortresses of Kālanjara and Chitrakūṭa in the north, had to give up the enterprize. All feudatory chiefs between the eastern and the western oceans and between the Himālaya and Simhala (Ceylon) paid obeisance to him. After he had thus rendered the power of his family firm, his father died, and he ascended the throne. The Wardhā plates announce the grant of a village to the north-west of Nāgpur near the modern Mohagaon made by Kṛishṇarāja, who is also called Akālavarsha, in the name of his brother Jagattuṅga to a Brāhmaṇ of the Kāṇva school of the White Yajurveda on the 5th of the dark half of Vaiśākha in Śāka 862, corresponding to 940 A.D., the cyclic year being Ś'ārvari. This prince is called Sri-Vallabha also in the grant.

Kṛishṇarāja was the reigning monarch in Śāka 873 and 878.¹ At the end of a Jaina work called Yaśastilaka by Somadeva it is stated that it was finished on the 13th of Chaitra when 881 years of the era of the Śāka king had elapsed, the cyclic year being Siddhārthin, during the reign of a feudatory of Kṛishṇarājadeva. Kṛishṇarājadeva is spoken of as reigning gloriously, having subdued the Pāṇdyas, Simhala, the Cholas, the Cheras and others.² Khotika, his brother, was on the throne in Śāka 893 Prajāpati.³

Khotika was succeeded, according to the Khārepātan grant, by Kakkala, the son of his brother. The name of this brother was Nirupama according to the Karḍā grant. Kakkala is said to have been a brave soldier; but he was conquered in battle by Tailapa, who belonged to the Chālukya race, and thus the sovereignty of the Dekkan passed from the hands of the Rāshtrakūṭas once more

Kakkala or

Fleet, however, being under the belief that this last was the elder brother, gives the following explanation of the discrepancy in the dates:—"Kotṭiga or Khotṭiga left no issue, and this explains why the date of his inscription now published is considerably later than the dates obtained for Kṛishṇa IV.; viz., there being no probability of Kotṭiga leaving any issue, first his younger brother Kṛishṇa IV. was joined with him in the government and then the latter's son Kakka III."—(Ind. Ant., Vol. XII., p. 255.) This supposition is not supported by any circumstance; on the contrary it is utterly disconcerted by the inscriptions of Kṛishṇa which represent him to be the "Supreme king of great kings," (Ind. Ant., Vol. XII., p. 258,) and to have been reigning at the time at Mānyakheta and governing the kingdom (Ind. Ant., Vol. I., p. 210.) Otherwise, they would have spoken of him as Yuvarāja. Thus there were not two Kṛishṇas but only one. He was the son of Baddiga or Amoghavarsha, not his brother. His earliest date is that of the Wardhā grant, i.e., 862 Śāka and the latest 881 that of the Yaśastilaka. He was the same monarch as that spoken of in the Salotgi and other stone inscriptions bearing the dates 867, 873, and 878 Śāka. Khotiga was his younger brother, and Nirupama the youngest.

into those of the Châlukyas. The Kardâ grant, which was made in the reign of Kakkala, is dated S'aka 894 or A.D. 972. And another inscription represents him as being on the throne in 896 current,¹ the cyclic year being S'rîmukha. But in this year or S'aka 895 past Tailapa attained sovereign powers.² The Râshtrakûtas were thus supreme masters of this country from about A.D. 743 to A.D. 973, that is, for nearly two hundred and twenty-five years.

That the princes of this race were very powerful there can be little doubt. The rock-cut temples at Elurâ still attest their power and magnificence. Under them the worship of the Purânic gods rose into much greater importance than before. The days when kings and princes got temples and monasteries cut out of the solid rock for the use of the followers of Gotama Buddha had gone by, never to return. Instead of them we have during this period temples excavated or constructed on a more magnificent scale and dedicated to the worship of S'iva and Vishnu. Several of the grants of these Râshtrakûta princes praise their bounty and mention their having constructed temples. Still, as the Kânheri inscriptions of the reign of Amoghavarsha I. show, Buddhism had its votaries and benefactors, though the religion had evidently sunk into unimportance. Jainism, on the other hand, retained the prominence it had acquired during the Châlukya period, or even made greater progress. Amoghavarsha was, as we have seen, a great patron of it, and was perhaps a convert to it; and some of the minor chiefs and the lower castes, especially the traders, were its devoted adherents. The form of Jainism that prevailed in the country was mostly that professed by the Digambara sect. A good many of the extant Digambara works were, as we have seen, composed during this period.

It is remarkable that, unlike the grants of the early Châlukya princes, those of the Râshtrakûtas contain accounts in verse of the ancestors of the grantor, and most of the verses are of the nature of those we find in the ordinary artificial poems in Sanskrit literature, possessing the same merits and faults. The Râshtrakûtas, therefore, must have been patrons of learning, and probably had poets in their service. One of the three Krishnas belonging to the dynasty is the hero of an artificial poem by Halâyudha entitled the Kavirahasya, the purpose of which is to explain the distinction as regards sense and conjugational peculiarities between roots having the same external form. He is spoken of as the paramount sovereign of Dakshinâpatha.³ Prof. Westergaard, however, thought him to be the Kṛishṇarāya of the Vijayanagar dynasty who reigned in the first quarter of the sixteenth century. But in the Kavirahasya he is spoken of in one place as "having sprung from the Rāshtrakūṭa race,"¹ and is in another called "the ornament of the lunar race,"² which description is of course not applicable to the Vijayanagar prince.

Arabic travellers of the tenth century mention a powerful dynasty of the name of Balharās who ruled at a place called Mānkir. The name of the city would show that the Rāshtrakūṭas, whose capital was Mānyakheta or Mānkhed, were meant. But Balharā, the name of the dynasty, has not been identified with any that might be considered to be applicable to the Rāshtrakūṭas. But to me the identification does not appear difficult. The Rāshtrakūṭas appear clearly to have assumed the title of Vallabha which was used by their predecessors the Chālukyas. We have seen that Govinda II. is called Vallabha in two grants, Amoghavarsha I. in a third, and Kṛishṇa III. in a fourth. In an inscription on a stone tablet at Lakshmeśvar, Govinda III. is called S'ri-Vallabha,³ while in the Rādhanpur plates he is spoken of as Vallabha-narendra. In the Sāngalī and Kardā grants also the reigning king is styled Vallabha-narendra, while in other inscriptions we find the title Prithivīvalabha alone used. Now Vallabha-narendra means "the king Vallabha," and is the same as Vallabharāja, the words rāja (n) and narendra both denoting "a king." Vallabha-rāja should by the rules of Prākṛit or vernacular pronunciation, become Vallaha-rāy, Ballaha-rāy, or Balha-rāy. This last is the same as the Balharā of the Arabs.

SECTION XII.

THE LATER CHÂLUKYAS.

Section XII.

WE left the history of the kings of the Châlukya race at Kîrtivarman II. Between him and Tailapâ, who wrested the supreme sovereignty of the Dekkan from Kakkala, the last of the Râshtrakûta kings, the Miraj copperplate grant and the Yevur tablet place six kings. Kîrtivarman ascended the throne in S'aka 669 and was reigning in 679, before which time he had been reduced to the condition of a minor chief; and Tailapa regained sovereign power in 895 S'aka.¹ We have thus seven princes only between 669 and 895, i. e., for 226 years. This gives an average reign of 32 years to each, which is far too much. This was the darkest period in the history of the Châlukya dynasty, and probably no correct account of the succession was kept. Where the dynasty reigned and what the extent of its power was, cannot be satisfactorily determined in the absence of the usual contemporary evidence, viz., inscriptions. There must have been several branches of the Châlukya family, and it is even a question whether Tailapa sprang from the main branch. I am inclined to believe that he belonged to quite a collateral and unimportant branch, and that the main branch became extinct. For, the princes of the earlier dynasty always traced their descent to Hârîti and spoke of themselves as belonging to the Mânava race; while these later Châlukyas traced their pedigree to Satyâśraya only, and those two names do not occur in their inscriptions except in the Miraj grant and its copies, where an effort is made to begin at the beginning. But evidently the writer of that grant had not sufficient materials at his command, since, as above stated, he places six princes only between Kîrtivarman II. and Tailapa. There is little question that there was no continuity of tradition. The titles Jagadekamalla, Tribhuvanamalla, &c., which the later Châlukyas assumed mark them off distinctively from princes of the earlier dynasty, who had none like them. In a copper-plate grant dated S'aka 735 found in Maisur a Châlukya prince of the name of Vimalâditya, the son of Yaśovarman and grandson of Balavarman, is mentioned. To ward off the evil influence of Saturn from Vimalâditya, a village was granted to a Jaina sage on behalf of a Jaina temple by Govinda III., the Râshtrakûta king, at the request of Châkirâja of the Gaṅga family, the maternal uncle of Vimalâditya.² These three Châlukya names do not occur in the usual genealogy of the family. This therefore appears to have been an independent branch. Another independent offshoot ruled over a province called Jola, a portion of which at least is included in the modern district of Dhârvâd. In the Kanarese Bhârata

A Chālukya prince mentioned in a Vedāntic work.

At the end of a work entitled Samkshepasāraka, the author Sarvajñātman, the pupil of Sureśvara, who himself was a pupil of the great S'ankarāchārya, states that he composed it while "the prosperous king of the Kshatriya race, the Āditya (sun) of the race of Manu whose orders were never disobeyed, was ruling over the earth."¹ This description would apply with propriety to such a king as Ādityavarman, Vikramāditya I., Vinayāditya, Vijayāditya, or Vikramāditya II. of the early Chālukya dynasty, since they were very powerful princes and were "Ādityas of the race of Manu." For the Mānavya race to which they belonged may be understood as "the race of Manu." But Sankarāchārya is said to have lived between S'aka 710 and 742, wherefore his grand-pupil must have flourished about the year 800 of that era, while Vikramāditya II., the latest of the four, ceased to reign in 669 S'aka. Supposing then that the date assigned to Sankarāchārya is correct, the king meant by Sarvajñātman must be one of those placed by the Miraj grant between Kirtivarman II. and Tailapa. He may be Vikramāditya, the third prince after Kirtivarman II.,² but if the description is considered hardly applicable to a minor chief, Sankarāchārya's date must be pushed backwards so as to place the pupil of his pupil in the reign of one of the five princes of the early Chālukya dynasty mentioned above.

Tailapa's expeditions.

Tailapa seems to have carried his arms into the country of the Cholas³ and humbled the king of Chedi.⁴ He despatched an expedition into Gujarāt, under a general of the name of Bārāpa, against Mālarāja, the founder of the Chaulukya dynasty of Anahilapattana, who for some time was hard pressed ; but according to the Gujarât chroniclers the general was eventually defeated with slaughter.¹ Someśvara, the author of the Kîrtikaumudî, speaks of Bârapa as the general of the lord of Lâta, from which it would appear that Tailapa was in possession of that country.² Tailapa invaded Mâlvâ also, which at this time was governed by Muñja, the uncle of the celebrated Bhoja. Muñja, instead of strictly confining himself to the defensive, took the offensive, and, against the counsels of his aged minister Rudrâditya, crossed the Godâvarî with a large army. He was encountered by Tailapa, who inflicted a crushing defeat on him and took him prisoner. At first Muñja was treated with consideration by his captor ; but an attempt to effect his escape having been detected, he was subjected to indignities, made to beg from door to door, and finally beheaded.³ This event is alluded to in one of Tailapa's inscriptions.⁴ Tailapa reigned for twenty-four years.⁵ One of his feudatory chiefs granted a piece of land to a Jaina temple that he had constructed at Saundatti⁶ in the Belgaum district, in the year 902 S'aka or A.D. 980.

Tailapa married Jâkabbâ, the daughter of the last Râshtrakûta king, and had by her two sons, whose names were Satyâśraya and Daśavarman.⁷ The former succeeded him in 919 S'aka or A.D. 997. Nothing particular is mentioned of him in any of the inscriptions. The Khârepâtan grant, which we have so often referred to, was issued in his reign in S'aka 930 by a dependent chief of the S'ilâhâra family which ruled over southern Konkan.⁸

Satyâśraya died without issue and was succeeded by Vikramâditya I.⁹ the son of his younger brother Daśavarman by his wife Bhagavatî. The earliest of his inscriptions is dated S'aka 930, which is also the latest date of his predecessor. He therefore succeeded to the throne in that year, i. e., in 1008 A.D., and appears to have reigned for only a short time.¹⁰ He was succeeded by his brother Jayasimha or Jagadekamalla, who in an inscription dated 941 S'aka, i. e., 1019 A.D., is represented to have put to flight or broken the confederacy of Mâlava and is styled "the moon of the lotus which was King Bhoja," that is, one who humbled him.¹¹ He is also spoken of as having beaten the Cholas and the Cheras. The Miraj grant was executed by him five years later, i. e., in S'aka 946, when "after having subdued the powerful Chola, the lord of the Dramila country, and taken away everything belonging to the ruler of the seven Konkans, he had encamped with his victorious army at bathed in the waters of the river and gave away a great deal of gold in charity. Then entering the river again, he proceeded until the water reached his neck, and, in the din caused by the waves and a number of musical instruments, drowned himself.¹ This event must have taken place in Śaka 991, corresponding to 1069 A.D.² Āhavamalla, according to Bilhana, performed a great many sacrifices and was very liberal to men of learning.³ On account of his virtues, poets made him the hero of the tales, poems, and dramas composed by them.⁴

Someśvara, the eldest son of Āhavamalla, having been prince-regent, ascended the throne as a matter of course, and assumed the title of Bhuvanaikamalla. Vikramāditya received intelligence of his father's death while returning from Veṅgi. He hastened to the capital and was received with affection by his brother. Vikramāditya made over to him all the spoils he had won in the course of his conquests, and for some time there was a good understanding between the brothers. But Someśvara was a weak and tyrannical prince. He oppressed his subjects and lost their affection. He would not be guided by the counsels of wiser and better men; and the kingdom of Kuntala lost a good deal of its importance and influence. Vikramāditya, unable to control his brother and suspecting his intentions towards himself, left the capital with his younger brother Jayasinha and a large army.⁵ Someśvara II. sent his forces after him, but they were defeated by Vikramāditya with great slaughter.⁶ The prince then proceeded to the banks of the Tungabhadra, and, after some time, directed his march towards the country of the Cholas. On the way he stopped at Banavâsi, where he enjoyed himself for some time, and then started for the country of Malaya. Jayakeśi is represented to have submitted to Vikramāditya and "given him more wealth than he desired, and thus to have rendered lasting the smile on the face of the Konkan ladies."⁷ Jayakeśi appears thus to have been king of the Konkan, and was the same as the first king of that name, who in the copper-plate grants of the Goa Kadambas, published by Dr. Fleet, is spoken of as having entered into an alliance with the Chālukya and Chola kings and made Gopakapattana or Goa his capital. Vikramāditya or Tribhuvanamalla in after-life gave his daughter Mallalamahādevī in marriage to his grandson, who also was called Jayakeśi; and this circumstance is mentioned in all the three grants, since the connection with the paramount sovereign of the Dekkan raised the dignity of the family.⁸ The king of the Alupas⁹ also rendered his obeisance to the Chālukya prince, who showed him marks of favour. He then subjugated the Keralas or people of Malabār, and turned towards the country of the Dravīdas or Cholas. Being informed of this, the Chola prince sent a herald with proposals of peace, offering

Some time after, the king of the Cholas died and there was a revolution in the kingdom. When the Chālukya prince heard of this he immediately proceeded to Kāñchī, and placing the son of his father-in-law on the throne, remained there for a month to suppress his enemies and render his position secure. A short time after his return to the Tuṅgabhadrâ, however, Rājiga, the king of Veṅgi, observing that the nobility of the Chola prince were disaffected, seized the opportunity, and, having deposed him, usurped the sovereignty of the country. To embarrass Vikramāditya and prevent his descent on Kāñchī, Rājiga incited his brother Someśvara II. to attack him from behind. Vikramāditya, however, marched on, and, by the time he came in sight of the Draviḍa forces, Someśvara overtook him in his rear. He had a very large army, which was well equipped.² Bilhana, who is, of course, anxious to show his patron to be guiltless in this fratricidal war, represents him to be deeply afflicted when he saw that his brother had made common cause with his enemy, and to have endeavoured to dissuade him from the course on which he had embarked. Someśvara made a show of yielding to his brother's expostulations, seeking however in the meanwhile for a favourable opportunity to strike a decisive blow.³ But Vikramāditya finally resolved to give a fight to the armies of both. Then a bloody battle ensued, Vikramāditya proved victorious, the new king of the Draviḍas fled, and Someśvara was taken prisoner. The Chālukya prince then returned to the Tuṅgabhadrâ, and after some hesitation dethroned Someśvara and had himself crowned king. To his younger brother Jayasimha he assigned the province of Banavâsī.⁴ These events took place in the cyclic year Nala, Śaka 998, or A.D. 1076.⁵

Vikramāditya II. then entered Kalyāṇa and had a long and upon the whole a peaceful reign of fifty years.⁶ He assumed the title of Tribhuvanamalla, and is known by the names of Kalivikrama and Parmādirāya also. He abolished the Śaka era and established his own; but it fell into disuse not long after his death. Some time after his accession, he went to Karahātaka or Karhād and married the daughter of the Śilāhāra king who reigned at the place. Her

Dr. Fleet thinks that the festival of his Pattabandha or coronation, grants on account of which are recorded as made on the 5th day of the bright half of Phālguna in the Nala year, in an inscription at Vadageri, was the annual festival. But this is a mere assumption. One would expect in such a case the word vārshikotsava. The utsava or festival spoken of must be that which followed the ceremony. The date in this inscription refers to the grant, and does not, in my opinion, show at all the day on which the coronation ceremony took place. All we can gather from this inscription and that at Arasēvara is that the Nala Samvatsara was the first year of his reign.

name was Chandralekhâ and she was a woman of rare beauty. Bilhana represents her to have held a svayamvara where a great many kings assembled, out of whom she chose the Châlukya prince and placed the nuptial wreath round his neck. Whether the svayamvara was real, or imagined by the poet to give himself an opportunity for the display of his poetic and descriptive powers, it is not possible to decide. Chandralekhâ is spoken of in the inscriptions as Chandaladevî, and many other wives of Tribhuvanamalla are mentioned besides her. The revenues of certain villages were assigned to them for their private expenses.¹

Some years after, Vikrama's brother Jayasimha, who had been appointed his viceroy at Banavâsi, began to meditate treason against him. He extorted a great deal of money from his subjects, entered into an alliance with the Draviḍa king and other chiefs, and even endeavoured to foment sedition and treachery among Vikramâditya's troops. When the king heard of this, he made several attempts to dissuade his brother from his evil course, but they were of no avail; and in a short time Jayasimha came with his numerous allies and his large army and encamped on the banks of the Kṛishṇâ. He plundered and burned the surrounding villages and took many prisoners, and considered success so certain that he sent insulting messages to Vikrama.² The king then marched against him at the head of his forces. As he approached the river he was harassed by the enemy's skirmishers, but driving them away he encamped on the banks.³ He surveyed his brother's army and found it to be very large and strong. Then a battle ensued. At first the elephants of the enemy advanced and spread confusion in the ranks of Vikrama. All his elephants, horses, and men turned backwards; but with remarkable bravery the king rushed forward on the back of his maddened elephant, dealing heavy blows right and left. The elephants of the enemy were driven back and the king killed a great many of his soldiers. The army was defeated and Jayasimha and his followers fled away. Vikrama did not pursue the enemy, but took the elephants, horses, women, and baggage left on the battle-field, and returned to his capital. After a time Jayasimha was caught skulking in a forest and brought to Vikramâditya, who, however, is represented to have pardoned him.⁴

Invasion of Vikrama's dominions by Vishṇuvardhana.

In the latter part of Vikrama's reign his dominions were invaded by a prince of the Hoysala branch of the Yâdava family reigning at Dvârasamudra, the modern Halebid in Maisur; and with him were associated the kings of the Pândya country, Goa, and Konkan. This Hoysala prince must have been Vishṇuvardhana, the younger brother of Ballâla and the grandson of Vinayâditya, who first brought the dynasty into prominence. For in the inscription of Vira Ballâla, the grandson of Vishṇuvardhana, at Gaddaka, Vishṇuvardhana is represented to have overrun the whole country between his capital and Belvoḷa and washed his horses with the waters of the Kṛishṇā-Veṇā. It is also stated that "he was again and again reminded by his servants of the honour done to him by the king Paramardideva (Vikramāditya), who said, 'Know the Hoysala alone among all princes to be unconquerable.'"¹ Vikramāditya despatched against these enemies a dependent chief of the name of Ācha or Āchagi, whose territory lay to the south. Ācha, who was "a very lion in war and shining like the hot-rayed sun, sounding his war-cry, pursued and prevailed against Poysala, took Gove, put to flight Lakshma in war, valorously followed after Pāndya, dispersed at all times the Malapas, and seized upon the Konkan."² Ācha must have fought several other battles for his master; for he is represented to have made "the kings of Kalinga, Vaṅga, Maru, Gūjara, Mālava, Chera, and Chola (subject) to his sovereign."³ Vikramāditya himself had to take the field against the Chola prince, who had grown insubordinate. He was defeated and fled, and the king returned to his capital.⁴ Vikramāditya II. constructed a large temple of Viṣṇu and had a tank dug in front of it. In the vicinity he founded a town which was called Vikramapura.⁵ He governed his subjects well and they were happy under his rule. The security they enjoyed was so great that, according to Bilhana, "they did not care to close the doors of their houses at night, and instead of thieves the rays of the moon entered through the window openings." He was very liberal and bountiful to the poor and "gave the sixteen great gifts at each holy conjuncture."⁶ That he was a patron of learning is shown by the fact of a Kāśmirian Paṇḍit like Bilhana, who travelled over the whole of India in quest of support, having been raised by him to the dignity of Vidyāpati or chief Paṇḍit. Vijñāneśvara, the author of the Mitāksharā, which is at present acknowledged over a large part of India, and especially in the Marāṭhā country, as the chief authority on matters of civil and religious law, flourished in the reign of Vikramāditya and lived at Kalyāṇa. At the end of most manuscripts of that work there occur three stanzas, which may be translated as follows⁷:

Vijñāneśvara.

"On the surface of the earth, there was not, there is not, and there will be not, a town like Kalyāṇa; never was a monarch like the prosperous Vikramārka seen or heard of; and—what more?—Vijñāneśvara, the Paṇḍit, does not bear comparison with any other"⁸

(person). May this triad which is like a celestial creeper¹ exist to the end of the Kalpa!

"May the Lord of wisdom² live as long as the sun and moon endure,—he who produces words which distil honey and than which nothing is more wonderful to the learned, gives wealth exceeding their wishes to a multitude of supplicants,³ contemplates the form of the subjugator of Mura, and has conquered the enemies that are born with the body.

"May the lord Vikramāditya protect this whole earth as long as the moon and the stars endure,—he whose feet are refulgent with the lustre of the crest jewels of prostrate kings from the bridge, which is the heap of the glory of the best scion of the Raghu race, to the lord of mountains, and from the Western Ocean, the waves⁴ of which surge heavily with the nimble shoals of fishes, to the Eastern Ocean."

Though Sanskrit authors often indulge in hyperbolic expressions without sufficient basis and as mere conventionalities, still the किं चान्यत् and translates "nothing else that exists in this Kalpa bears comparison with the learned Vijñānesvara." To mean "nothing else," किं चान्यत् must be किमप्यन्यत् ; and in this construction पण्डितो, the nominative, has no verb, अन्यत् being taken as the nominative to the verb भजते. Again, it will not do to say "nothing that exists in this Kalpa bears comparison," &c., for one-half of this Kalpa only has passed away ; the other half still remains, and what it will produce but has not yet produced cannot be spoken of as कल्पस्थम् or "existing in the Kalpa." The only proper reading with a slight alteration is that of the Bombay lithographed edition, which he has given in a footnote and which is किंवान्यदन्योपमामाकल्पं. Instead of वा, there must be च here. And this is the reading of a manuscript of the Mitāksharā, dated Samvat 1535 and S'aka 1401, purchased by me about ten years ago for the Bombay Government. The reading is to be translated as in the text.

² Dr. Bühler reads तत्र विज्ञाननाथ and construes it as a vocative. The vocative does not look natural here. The Bombay lithographed edition and my manuscript have विज्ञाननाथः the nominative. Instead of तत्र the former has तज्ञ and the latter तत्त्व. I have adopted this last. The author has here taken the name Vijnānesvara in its etymological sense and given to विज्ञान or "knowledge" the object तत्त्व or "truth," the whole meaning "the lord of the knowledge of truth".

to चट्टलतिमिकुलोत्तुङ्गरिङ्गतरङ्गात् and of my manuscript to तुङ्गन्यतरङ्गात्. The root रिङ्ग is used in connection with waves (see B. & R.'s Lexicon sub voce).

language and manner of these stanzas do show a really enthusiastic admiration in the mind of the writer for the city, its ruler, and the great Paṇḍit, who from the fact of the liberality attributed to him appears to have enjoyed the favour of the king and perhaps held a high office. From this and from the description given by Bilhana, as well as from Vikramāditya's inscriptions, of which we have about two hundred, it appears to be an undoubted fact that he was the greatest prince of this later Chālukya dynasty, and that during his reign the country enjoyed happiness and prosperity.

Vikramāditya II. was succeeded in Śaka 1048 and in the cyclic year Parābhava (A.D. 1127) by his son Someśvara III., who assumed the title of Bhūloka-malla.¹ He had a short reign of about 11 years. He is represented to have "placed his feet on the heads of the kings of Andhra, Draviḷa, Magadha, Nepāla; and to have been lauded by all learned men."² This last praise does not seem to be undeserved; for we have a work in Sanskrit written by Someśvara entitled Mānasollāsa or Abhilashitārtha-Chintāmaṇi, in which a great deal of information on a variety of subjects is given. The book is divided into five parts. In the first are given the causes which lead to the acquisition of a kingdom; in the second, those that enable one to retain it after he has acquired it; in the third, the kinds of enjoyment which are open to a king after he has rendered his power firm; in the fourth, the modes of diversion which give mental pleasure; and in the fifth, sports or amusements. Each of these consists of twenty kinds. In the first are included such virtues as shunning lies, refraining from injury to others, continence, generosity, affability, faith in the gods, feeding and supporting the poor and helpless, friends and adherents, &c. Under the second head are described what are called the seven aṅgas, i. e., the ideal king, his ministers including the priest and the astrologer, the treasury and the way of replenishing it, the army, &c. The enjoyments are—a beautiful palace, bathing, anointing, rich clothing, ornaments, &c. The diversions are—military practice, horsemanship, training elephants, wrestling, cockfights, bringing up of dogs, poetry, music, dancing, and others. The last class comprises sports in gardens and fields, or on mountains and sandbanks, games, enjoyment of the company of women, &c. In connection with these subjects there are few branches of learning or art in Sanskrit the main principles of which are not stated. We have polity, astronomy, astrology, dialectics, rhetoric, poetry, music, painting, architecture, medicine, training of horses, elephants, and dogs, &c. The king does appear to have been a man of learning, and it was on that account that he received the title of *Sarvajñabhūpa*³ or the "all-knowing king." In the Mānasollāsa, in connection with the preparation of an almanac, the day used as an epoch from which to calculate the positions of certain heavenly bodies is stated as "Friday, the beginning of the month of Chaitra, Someśvara III. or Bhāloka-malla was succeeded in the cyclic year Kālayukti,³ Śaka 1060 or A.D. 1138, by his son Jagadekamalla. Nothing particular is recorded of him. He reigned for 12 years and was succeeded by his brother Tailapa II., Nurmāḍi Taila or Trailokyamalla, in Śaka 1072, Pramoda Samvatsara.⁴ During these two reigns the power of the Chālukyas rapidly declined, and some of the feudatory chiefs became powerful and arrogant. The opportunity was seized by a dependent chief named Vijjala or Vijjana of the Kalachuri race, who held the office of Daṇḍanāyaka or minister of war under Tailapa. He conceived the design of usurping the throne of his master, and endeavoured to secure the sympathies and co-operation of some of the powerful and semi-independent chiefs. Vijayārka, the Mahāmaṇḍaleśvara of Kolhāpur, was one of those who assisted him,⁵ and Prolarāja of the Kākatēya dynasty of Tailaṅga, who is represented to have fought with Tailapa, did so probably to advance the same cause.⁶ He kept his master Tailapa under complete subjection till Śaka 1079 or A.D. 1157, when Tailapa left Kalyāṇa and fled to Annigeri in the Dhārvād district, which now became the capital of his kingdom greatly reduced in extent. There is an inscription dated Śaka 1079, in Vijjana's name, the cyclic year being Íśvara; and the next Saṁvatsara, Bahudhānya, is spoken of as the second year of his reign.¹ He does not however seem to have assumed the titles of supreme sovereignty till Śaka 1084, when he marched against Tailapa II., who was at Annigeri, and proclaimed himself an independent monarch. Tailapa seems then to have gone further south and established himself at Banavāsi.² The latest year of his reign mentioned in the inscriptions is the fifteenth, the Saṁvatsara or cyclic year being Pārthiva, which was current next after Śaka 1087.³

For some time there was an interruption in the Chālukya power, and the Kalachuris seem to have held possession of the whole territory of that dynasty. But internal dissensions consequent on the rise of the Liṅgāyata creed and the assassination of Vijjaṇa considerably weakened the power of the Kalachuris, and about the Śaka year 1104 Someśvara, the son of Nurmādi Taila, succeeded in wresting a considerable portion of the hereditary dominions of his family, and established himself at Annigeri. He owed his restoration to power to the valour and devoted attachment of a feudatory of his family named Brahma or Bomma, who fought several battles with the enemies of his master and is said to have conquered sixty elephants by means of a single one.⁴ Bomma is represented in an inscription at Annigeri dated Śaka 1106 to have destroyed the Kalachuris and restored the Chālukyas to the throne.⁵ But a short time after, the Yādavas of the south rose under Vīra Ballāla and of the north under Bhīllama. They both fought with Bomma; but success at first attended the arms of Vīra Ballāla, who subdued the Chālukya general and put an end to the power of the dynasty.⁶ We lose trace of Vīra Soma or Someśvara IV. after Śaka 1111.

The Chālukya family must have thrown out several branches of petty chiefs. One such has been brought to light by a copper-plate grant dated Śaka 1182, Raudra Saṁvatsara, which was in the possession of the Khot of Teravaṇ, a village in the Rājapur tāluka of the Ratnāgiri district.⁷ The donor Keśava Mahājani was the minister of a Mahāmaṇḍaleśvara or chief of the name of Kām-vadeva, one of whose titles was "the sun that blows open the lotus bud in the shape of the Chālukya race." He is also called Kalyāṇa-puravarādhiśvara or "lord of Kalyāṇa the best of cities," which like several such titles of other chiefs⁸ simply shows that he belonged to the family that once reigned with glory at Kalyāṇa. The village conveyed by the grant was Teravātaka, identified with Teravaṇ itself, from which it would appear that Kām-vadeva was chief of that part of Konkan. There is an inscription in the temple

Somadeva was the son of Vetugideva and the father of the last was Karnadeva.¹ Probably the Kām̐adeva of the Teravan grant belonged to this branch of the family. THE KALACHURIS.

Section XIII.

Original seat of the Kalachuri or Haihaya family.

THE earliest mention of a family of this name that we have is in connection with Maṅgalīśa of the early Chālukya dynasty. Vinayāditya is represented in one of his inscriptions to have subdued the Haihayas and Vikramāditya II. married, as we have seen, two girls who were sisters belonging to the family.¹ The later Rāshṭrakūṭa princes were also connected by marriage with the Haihayas. This family known also by the name of Kalachuri or Kulachuri² ruled over Chedi or the country about Jabalpur. The Kalachuris of Kalyāna must have been an offshoot of this family. One of the titles used by Vijjaṇa was Kālañjarapuravarādhīśvara "or Lord of the best city of Kālañjara."³ Kālañjara was a stronghold belonging to the rulers of Chedi⁴ and was probably their capital, though Tripura, the modern Tevur, is also known to have been the principal seat of the family. The title, therefore, connects the Kalyāna branch of the Kalachuris with the Chedi family. This branch was founded by Kṛishṇa, who in the Belgaum grant⁵ is spoken of as "another Kṛishṇa," the incarnation of Viṣṇu, and as "having done wonderful deeds even during his boyhood." He was succeeded by his son Jogama, and Jogama by his son Paramardin. Paramardin was the father of Vijjaṇa. Vijjaṇa before his usurpation called himself only a Mahāmaṇḍaleśvara or minor chief, and is first mentioned as a feudatory of Jagadekamalla, the successor of Someśvara III.⁶ The manner in which he drove away Taila III. from Kalyāna, and having raised himself to the supreme power in the state gradually assumed the titles of a paramount sovereign, has already been described. But soon after, a religious revolution took place at Kalyāna, and Vijjaṇa and his family succumbed to it.

A religious revolution
at Kalyāna.

Its leader.

The principal leader of that revolution was a person of the name of Basava. A work in Kanarese entitled Basava Purāṇa gives an account of Basava; but it is full of marvellous stories and relates the wonderful miracles wrought by him. The principal incidents, however, may be relied on as historical. On the other hand there is another work entitled Vijjalarāyacharita, written by a Jaina, which gives an account of the events from the opposite side, since the attacks of the Liṅgāyatās were chiefly directed against the Jainas, and these were their enemies.

Basava.

Basava was the son of a Brāhmaṇ named Māḍirāja, who lived at Bāgevēdī in the Kalādgi district. Baḷadeva, the prime minister of Vijjaṇa, was his maternal uncle and gave him his daughter in marriage.⁷ After Baḷadeva's death the king appointed Basava his prime minister as being closely related to Balādeva.¹ The Jainas, however, state that Basava had a beautiful sister named Padmāvatī, of whom the king became enamoured and whom he either married or made his mistress²; and it was on that account that he was raised to that office and became a man of influence. There must be some truth in this story; for the Basava Purāna narrates that the king gave his younger sister Nīlalochanā in marriage to Basava, which looks as if it were a counter-story devised to throw discredit on the other which was so derogatory to Basava.³ Basava had another sister named Nāgalāmbikā, who had a son named Chenna-Basava or Basava the younger. In concert with him Basava began to propound a new doctrine and a new mode of worshipping Śiva, in which the Līnga and the Nandin or bull were prominent. He speedily got a large number of followers, and ordained a great many priests, who were called Jāngamas. Basava had charge of the king's treasury, and out of it he spent large amounts in supporting and entertaining these Jāngamas, who led a profligate life. Vijjana had another minister named Mañchanṇa, who was the enemy of Basava, and informed the king of his rival's embezzlements.⁴ In the course of time Vijjana was completely alienated from Basava and endeavoured to apprehend him. But he made his escape with a number of followers, whereupon the king sent some men in pursuit. These were easily dispersed by Basava, and then Vijjana advanced in person. But a large number of followers now joined Basava, and the king was defeated and had to submit to his minister. Basava was allowed to return to Kalyāna and reinstated in his office.⁵ There was, however, no possibility of a complete reconciliation, and after some time the leader of the new sect conceived the design of putting the king to death. The circumstances that immediately led to the deed and the manner in which it was perpetrated are thus stated in the Basava Purāna.

At Kalyāna there were two pious Lingāyatas named Halleyaga and Madhuveyya, who were the devout adherents of their master Basava. Vijjana, listening to the calumnious accusations of their enemies, caused their eyes to be put out. All the disciples of Basava were highly indignant at this cruel treatment of these holy men, and assembled in their master's house. Basava ordered Jagaddeva to murder the king, pronounced a curse on Kalyāna, and left the town. Jagaddeva hesitated for a moment, but his mother spurred him on, and with two companions, Mallaya and Bommaya, went straight to the palace of the king; and rushing through the throng of courtiers, counsellors, and princes, they drew their poignards and stabbed Vijjana. Thence they went into the streets, and brandishing their weapons proclaimed the reason of their perpetrating the deed. Then arose dissensions in the city, men fought with men, horses with horses, and elephants with elephants; the race of Vijjana was extinct, Kalyāna was a heap of ruins, and the curse pronounced by Basava was verified. Basava went in haste to his favourite shrine of Saṅgameśvara, situated on the confluence of the Malaprabhā with the Kṛishnā, and there in compliance with his prayers the god absorbed him in his body.¹

The account given by the Jainas is different. Vijjāna had gone on an expedition to Kolhāpur to reduce the Silāhāra chief Bhoja II. to subjection. In the course of his march back to the capital he encamped at a certain place on the banks of the Bhīmā, and, while reposing in his tent, Basava sent to him a Jaṅgama disguised as a Jaina with a poisoned fruit. Vijjāna, who is said to have been a Jaina himself, unsuspectingly took the fruit from the hands of the seeming Jaina priest; and as soon as he smelled it, he became senseless. His son Immadi Vijjāna and others hastened to the spot, but to no purpose. Vijjāna, however, somewhat recovered his senses for a short while; and knowing who it was that had sent the poisoned fruit, enjoined his son to put Basava to death. Immadi Vijjāna gave orders that Basava should be arrested and all Jaṅgamas, wherever found, executed.² On hearing of this, Basava fled; and being pursued went to the Malabār coast and took refuge at a place called Ulavi.³ The town was closely invested and Basava in despair threw himself into a well and died, while his wife Nīlāmbā put an end to her existence by drinking poison. When Vijjāna's son was pacified, Chenna-Basava surrendered all his uncle's property to him and was admitted into favour.⁴ He now became the sole leader of the Līṅgāyatas; but, even before, his position was in some respects superior to that of Basava. The religious portion of the movement was under his sole direction, and it was he who shaped the creed of the sect. In him the Pranava or sacred syllable Om is said to have become incarnate to teach the doctrines of the Vīra Sāiva faith to Basava,⁵ and, according to the Chenna-Basava Purāṇa, "Chenna-Basava was S'iva; Basava, Vṛishabha (or S'iva's bull, the Nandin); Bijjala, the door-keeper; Kalyāṇa, Kailāsa; (and) S'iva worshippers (or Līṅgāyatas), the S'iva host (or the troops of S'iva's attendants.)"⁶

Chenna-Basava's leadership.

Vijjāna's death took place in S'aka 1089 (1090 current), or A.D. 1167. He was succeeded by his son Soma, who is also called Sovideva or Someśvara. The Belgaum copper-plate charter was issued by him on the twelfth of the bright half of Kārttika in S'aka 1096, the cyclic year being Jaya, to confirm the grant of land to fourteen Brāhmaṇs and the god Someśvara made by one of his queens named Bāvaladevī. The king had given her his consent to make the grant as a reward for a beautiful song that she sang on an occasion when the most influential persons belonging to his own and other kingdoms had gathered together in his audience-hall. Soma reigned till S'aka 1100 and was followed by his brother Saṁkama, whose inscriptions come down to the cyclic year Subhakarit. In an inscription at Balagāṃve the cyclic year Vikārin (S. 1101) is called the third of his reign,¹ while in another at the same place the same year is spoken of as the fifth.² In other inscriptions we have two names Śaṅkama and Āhavamalla and the cyclic years Sārvarin (S. 1102) and Plava (S. 1103) are represented as the third year of his or their reign, which is possible, and Subhakṛit (S. 1104) as the eighth.³ About Śaka 1104 the Chālukya prince Someśvara IV. wrested some of the provinces of his ancestral dominions from the Kalachuris, and the rest must have been conquered by the Northern Yādavas; so that about this time the Kalachuri dynasty became extinct.

During the period occupied by the later Chālukya dynasty and the Kalachuris (Śaka 895-1110 or A.D. 973-1188), the old state of things as regards the religious and social condition of the country may be said to have finally disappeared and the new ushered in. First, we have in this period what might be considered the last traces of Buddhism. In the reign of Tribhuvanamalla or Vikramāditya II., in the cyclic year Yuvan, and the nineteenth of his era (Śaka 1017), sixteen merchants of the Vaiśya caste constructed a Buddhistic vihāra or monastery and temple at Dharmavolal, the modern Dambal in the Dhārvād district and assigned for its support and for the maintenance of another vihāra at Lakkigunḍi, the modern Lakkundi, a field and a certain amount of money to be raised by voluntary taxation.⁴ In Śaka 1032 the S'ilāhāra chief of Kolhāpur constructed a large tank and placed on its margin an idol of Buddha along with those of Śiva and Arhat, and assigned lands for their support.⁵ Jainism ceased in this period to be the conquering religion that it was, and about the end received an effectual check by the rise of the Lingāyata sect. This new creed spread widely among the trading classes, which before were the chief supporters of Jainism. There is a tradition in some parts of the country that some of the existing temples contained Jaina idols at one time and that afterwards they were thrown out and Brāhmaṇic ones placed instead. This points to a change of feeling with reference to Jainism, the origin of which must be referred to this period.

The worship of the Purāṇic gods flourished; and as in the times of the early Chālukyas the old sacrificial rites were reduced to a system, so during this period the endeavours of the Brāhmaṇs and their adherents were for the first time directed towards reducing the civil and the ordinary religious law to a system, or towards its codification, as it might be called. The texts or precepts on the subject were scattered in a great many Smṛitis and Purāṇas; and often there were apparent inconsistencies and the law was doubtful. Nibandhas or digests, of which we have now so many, began to be written in this period, but the form which they first took, and which even now is one of the recognized forms, was that of commentaries on Smṛitis. Bhoja of Dhārā, who belongs to the first part of this period, must have written a treatise on the subject, since under the name of Dhâresvara he is referred to by Vijñāneśvara in his work. He was followed by Vijñāneśvara, who, as we have seen, lived at Kalyāṇa in the reign of Vikramāditya II. Aparārka, another commentator on Yājñavalkya, who calls his work a nibandha on the Dharmaśāstra or institutes of Yājñavalkya, was a prince of the Śilāhāra family of northern Konkan and was on the throne in Śaka 1109 (A.D. 1187) and in the cyclic year Parābhava.¹ Or, if he was the earlier prince of that name, he must have flourished about fifty years before. This movement was continued in the next or thirteenth century by Hemādri, and by Sāyaṇa in the fourteenth.

Authorities.

THE genealogy of the Yâdavas is given in the introduction to the Vratakhanda attributed to or composed by Hemâdri who was a minister of Mahâdeva, one of the later princes of the dynasty. Some of the manuscripts of the work, however, do not contain it, and in others it begins with Bhillama, as it was he who acquired supreme power and raised the dynasty to importance. Others again contain an account of the family from the very beginning, the first person mentioned being the Moon who was churned out of the milky ocean. From the Moon the genealogy is carried down through all the Purânic or legendary ancestors to Mahâdeva. But it is not difficult from the account itself to determine where the legend ends and history begins. Besides, the names of most of the historical predecessors of Bhillama agree with those occurring in the copper-plate grant translated by Paṇḍit Bhagvânâlâl Indrajî.¹ He considered the Yâdava dynasty mentioned in his grant to be different from that of Devagiri and called it "A New Yâdava Dynasty," as, of course, in the absence of the information I now publish, he was justified in doing. But it is now perfectly clear that the princes mentioned in the grant were the ancestors of the Devagiri Yâdavas. The following early history of the family is based on the account given in the Vratakhanda² and on the grant published by the Paṇḍit. The latter, however, brings down the genealogy only to

² The edition of the Vratakhanda in the Bibliotheca Indica contains neither of these two very valuable and important Prasastis. I have therefore had recourse to manuscripts. There is one manuscript only in the Government collections deposited in the Library of the Dekkan College and that is No. 234 of Collection A of 1881-82 which was made by me. It contains the shorter Prasasti beginning with the reign of Bhillama. There is another copy in the collection belonging to the old Sanskrit College of Poona, which contains the longer Prasasti. Unfortunately, however, the third and fourth leaves of the manuscript are missing; and the second ends with Parammadeva the successor of Seunachandra II., while the fifth begins with some of the last stanzas of the introduction referring to Hemâdri and his works. The valuable portion therefore was in leaves 3 and 4; but that is irretrievably lost. I therefore endeavoured to procure copies from the private collections in the city of Poona and obtained one from Khâsgivâle's library. It contains the shorter Prasasti only. My learned friend Gaṅgâdhar Sâstri Dâtâr procured another. In it the two, the shorter one and the longer, are jumbled together. There are in the commencement the first seventeen stanzas of the shorter, and then the longer one begins; and after that is over, we have the remaining stanzas of the shorter. This is the only manuscript of the four now before me which contains the whole of the longer Prasasti, and the information it gives about the later princes of the dynasty known to us from the inscriptions is also valuable and new, but the manuscript is extremely incorrect. I therefore caused a search for other copies to be made at Nâsik, Kolhâpur, and Ahmedabad; but none was available at those places. I give the two Prasastis in Appendix C. [Since the first edition was published I have obtained and purchased another copy of the Vratakhanda for the Government collections. The introductory portion here is more correctly written, and I have used it in revising this section and the Prasasti in Appendix C.]

Seunachandra II. who was on the throne in 991 Śaka or 1069 A.D., and omits the names of some of the intermediate princes. Two other grants by princes of this dynasty found at Saṅgamner and Kalas-Budruk of earlier dates¹ have been recently published, and these also have been compared.

Subāhu who belonged to the Yādava race was a universal sovereign. He had four sons among whom he divided the whole earth ruled over by him. The second son Dṛiḍhaphrahāra² became king in the south or Dekkan. The Yādavas, it is stated, were at first lords of Mathurā; then from the time of Kṛishṇa they became sovereigns of Dvāravatī or Dvārakā; and came to be rulers of the south from the time of the son of Subāhu, viz. Dṛiḍhaphrahāra. His capital was Śrīnagara according to the Vratākhaṇḍa, while from the grant it appears to have been a town of the name of Chandrādityapura, which may have been the modern Chāmdor in the Nāsik district. He had a son of the name of Seunachandra who succeeded to the throne. The country over which he ruled was called Seunadesa³ after him, and he appears to have founded a town also of the name of Seunapura. Seunadesa was the name of the region extending from Nāsik to Devagiri, the modern Daulatābād, since later on we are told that Devagiri was situated in Seunadesa and that this latter was situated on the confines of Daṇḍakāraṇya.⁴ This name seems to be preserved in the modern Khāndes'. In a footnote on the opening page of the Khāndes' Volume, the Editor of the "Bombay Gazetteer" observes that the name of the country was older than Musalman times, and it was afterwards changed by them to suit the title of Khān given to the Fāruki kings by Ahmed I. of Gujarāt. Seunadesa, therefore, was very likely the original name and it was changed to Khāndes', which name soon came into general use on account of its close resemblance in sound to Seunadesa. The country however extended farther southwards than the present district of Khāndes', since it included Devagiri or Daulatābād, and probably it did not include the portion north of the Tāpī.

Seunachandra's son Dhāḍiyappa⁵ became king after him and he was succeeded by his son Bhillama. After Bhillama, his son Śrīrāja according to the grants, or Rājūgi according to the other authority, came to the throne, and he was succeeded⁶ by his son Vaddiga or Vādugi. Vaddiga is in the Saṅgamner grant represented as a follower of Kṛishṇarāja who was probably Kṛishṇa III. of the Rāshtrakūṭa dynasty, and to have married Voddiyavvā, daughter of a prince of the name of Dhorappa. Then came Dhâdiyasa,¹ who was the son of Vâdugi according to the Vratākhaṇḍa. Two of the grants omit his name, probably because he was only a collateral and not an ancestor of the grantor in the direct line, and the third has a line or two missing here. Dhâdiyasa was succeeded by Bhillama, who was the son of Vaddiga or Vâdugi and consequently his brother.² Bhillama married according to the grants Lakshmi or Lachchiyavvâ,³ the daughter of Jhañjha, who was probably the Śilāhāra prince of Thānā of that name. Lachchiyavvâ sprang on her mother's side from the Râshtrakūṭa family, and through her son became "the upholder of the race of Yadu;"⁴ so that she was connected with three ruling dynasties and flourishing kingdoms. The Saṃgamner grant appears to have been issued by this Bhillama in the Śaka year 922, i. e. 1000 A.D., and the prince mentioned in mean "before him," and must mean "after him," and hence the conjectures are groundless. I have never seen a preceding prince mentioned in the grants after his successor, with such an introductory expression as "before him so and so became king." By the occurrence of the word अजनिष्ठ in stanza 23, line 2, Appendix C. I., it appears Rājagi was the son of Bhillama I.

आर्वाक्तस्य वभूव भूतलहरिः श्रविहिगारुयो नृपः
तस्मात्श्रीवरभिष्टमक्षितिपतेः प्रत्यक्षधर्माभवत् ॥

The Paṇḍit translates this:—"Before him was the illustrious king Vaddiga, a Hari on earth; and therefore he was exactly like the illustrious good Bhillama in his actions." I have already remarked that instead of "before him," we should have "after him" here. The word तस्मात् is translated by "therefore," "Wherefore?"

I would ask. No reason is given in the first of these lines for his being exactly like Bhillama; and therefore, it will not do to translate तस्मात् by "therefore." Again, the Paṇḍit's interpretation of प्रत्यक्षधर्मा as "exactly like in actions" is farfetched and unnatural. The thing is, the genitive or ablative क्षितिपतेः cannot be connected with any word in the line, and is therefore one of the innumerable mistakes which we have in this grant and most of which have been pointed out by the Paṇḍit himself. What is wanted here is the nominative क्षितिपतिः for क्षितिपतेः; and then the whole is appropriate, and तस्मात् will have its proper sense of "after him," or "from him."

The correct translation then is "After him was a king of the name of Vaddiga the prosperous, who was a Hari on earth, and after him or of him (i. e. Vaddiga) came the prosperous, great Bhillama in whom Virtue became incarnate." In this way we have here another king Bhillama, as mentioned in the Prasasti in the Vratākhaṇḍa in the passage cited above.

⁴ Here there is another difficulty arising from a mistake in the grant which Paṇḍit Bhagvānlāl has in my opinion not succeeded in solving; and he bases upon that mistake conjectures which are rather too far-reaching (p. 125a, Ind. Ant., Vol. XII.). The stanza is:—

भार्या यस्य च क्षत्रराजतनया श्रीलस्थियव्वाह्वया
धर्मत्यागविवेकबुद्धिसमुणा राष्ट्रकूटान्वया ।
या जाता नवबालनाजसमये यदन्वयाधारिता
सप्तगोचतराज्यभारधरणाद्रायनयार्था ततः॥

The Paṇḍit's translation is:—"Whose wife was the daughter of king Jhañjha Lashthiyavvâ by name, possessed of the (three) good qualities of virtue, liberality, and the grant as having struck a blow against the power of Muñja and rendered the sovereign authority of Raṇaraṅgabhīma firm seems also to be he himself. Raṇaraṅgabhīma was probably Tailapa, and thus it follows that the Yādava prince Bhīllama II. assisted Tailapa in his war with Muñja which we have already noticed. Vaddiga was a follower of Kṛishṇa III. of the Rāshtrakūṭa family, whose latest known date is 881 Śaka, and Bhīllama II. of Tailapa. The date 922 Śaka of Bhīllama's grant is consistent with these facts. The Yādavas appear thus to have transferred their allegiance from the old to the new dynasty of paramount sovereigns as soon as it rose to power. The next king was Vesugi¹ called in Paṇḍit Bhagvānlāl's grant Tesuka, which is a mistake or misreading for Vesuka or Vesuga. He married Nāyaladevī, the daughter of Gogi, who is styled a feudatory of the Chālukya family,² and was perhaps the same as the successor of the Thānā prince Jhañjha. The Rāshtrakūṭas must have been overthrown by the Chālukyas about the end of Jhañjha's reign, and thus his successor became a feudatory of the Chālukyas.

hospitality, who was of the Rāshtrakūṭa race, as being adopted (by them) at the time of the rule of the young prince (during his minority) and who therefore by reason of bearing the burden of the kingdoms, with its seven āngas, was an object of reverence to the three kingdoms."

I agree with the Paṇḍit in reading श्री before राष्ट्रकुटान्वया and taking राज्यत्रय as राज्यत्रय, and, generally, in his translation of the first two and the fourth lines. But the translation of the third line, that is, the portion italicised in the above, is very objectionable. The Paṇḍit reads राज from नाज and says that the य in यद्वन्वया० ought to be long for the metre, but would make no sense. Now, in seeking the true solution of the difficulty here, we must bear in mind that in the fourth line the lady is spoken of as "an object of reverence to the three kingdoms." Which are the three kingdoms? First evidently, that of Jhañjha, her father, who is spoken of in the first line; and secondly, that of the Rāshtrakūṭas from whose race she is spoken of as having sprung in the second line. Now, we must expect some allusion to the third kingdom in the third line. The third kingdom was clearly that of the Yādavas into whose family she had been married. I, therefore, read यद्वन्वया० for यद्वन्वया० and thus the difficulty about the metre is removed, the य becoming prosodially long in consequence of the following द्व. In the same manner I think बालनाज is a mistake for बालजान. The word जान the writer must have taken from his vernacular and considered it a Sanskrit word; or probably not knowing Sanskrit well, he must have formed it from the root जन् on the analogy of माद from मद्, नाद from नद्, मान from मन् &c. Or बालनाज may be considered as a mistake for बालजन्म, the sense being the same, viz. "birth of a child." The compound यद्वन्वयाधारिता is to be dissolved as आधारितः यद्वन्वयः यया । आधारित being made the second member according to Pāṇini II. 2, 37. Or, the line may be read as या याता नवबालजन्मसमये यद्वन्वयाधारिता, the dot over ता being omitted by mistake, and याता written as जाता in consequence of the usual confusion between य and ज. The translation of the line, therefore, is "who became the upholder of the race of Yadu on the occasion of the birth of a new child," i.e. through her child she became the upholder of the Yādava race. In this manner the supposition of her being adopted by the Rāshtrakūṭas during the young prince's minority becomes groundless. She must have belonged to the Rāshtrakūṭa race on her mother's side.

² The expression चालुक्यान्वयमण्डलीक in the grant admits of being taken in the manner I have done, मण्डलीक being a mistake for माण्डलीक. The Paṇḍit understands Gogirāja as belonging to the Chālukya race. I consider my interpretation to be more probable.

Bhillama III., son-in-law of Jayasimha.

Seunachandra II., the ally of Vikramāditya II.

The Vratākhaṇḍa places Arjuna after Vesugi,¹ but the two grants omit his name; and perhaps the former mentions Arjuna not as a Yādava prince, but Arjuna the Pāṇḍava, meaning to compare Vesugi with him and his enemies to Bhīṣma. The next king was Bhillama² who according to the Kalas-Budruk grant was Vesugi's son. He married Hammā, the daughter of Jayasimha and sister of Ahavamalla, the Chālukya emperor, under whose standard he fought several battles.³ The Kalas-Budruk charter was issued by this prince in 948 Śaka. The cyclic year being Krodhana, 948 Śaka must have been the current year, corresponding to 1025 A.D. Paṇḍit Bhagvānlāl's grant then proceeds at once to the donor, the reigning prince Seuṇa, who is spoken of in general terms as "having sprung from the race" of the last-mentioned king, and is represented to have defeated several kings and freed his kingdom from enemies after "the death of Bhillama." This Bhillama was his immediate predecessor, but he was a different person from the brother-in-law of Ahavamalla, since Seuṇa, is spoken of not as the son of the latter or any such near relation but simply as "having sprung from his race." The Vratākhaṇḍa supplies the names of the intermediate princes. The elder Bhillama was succeeded by Vādugi,⁴ his son, "whose praise was sung by poets in melodious words." After him Vesugi⁵ became king, but how he was related to Vādugi we are not told. He humbled a number of subordinate chiefs who had grown troublesome. Then came Bhillama, and after him Seuṇa⁶ who issued the charter translated by Paṇḍit Bhagvānlāl. What relationship the last three princes bore to each other is not stated. Seuṇa is represented to have saved Paramardideva, that is, Vikramāditya II., who is styled the "luminary of the Chālukya family" from a coalition of his enemies, and to have placed him on the throne of Kalyāṇa.⁷ This appears to be a reference to the coalition between the Veṅgi prince and Vikramāditya's brother Someśvara. The Yādava prince Seuṇa was thus a close ally of the Chālukya monarch and their dates also are consistent with the fact. Seunachandra's grant is dated Śaka 991 Saunmya Saṁvatsara, while Vikramāditya II. got possession of the Chālukya throne in Śaka 998 Nala. The grant mentions the relations of previous Yādava princes to the Chālukyās of Kalyāṇa, while the important service rendered by Seunachandra to Vikramāditya is not recorded, and he is spoken of only in general terms as having vanquished "all kings." This itself shows that in all likelihood the fact mentioned in the Vratākhaṇḍa of Seunachandra's having delivered that prince from his enemies and placed him on the throne took place after Śaka 991, and we know it as a matter of fact that Vikramāditya became king in Śaka 998.

Seunachandra was succeeded by Parammadeva who was probably his son, and after him came Simharāja¹ or "King Simha," whose full name was Singhaṇa² and who appears to have been his brother. He is said to have brought an elephant of the name of Karpūratilaka from Lañjīpura and thus did a piece of service to Paramardin, who appears to be Vikramāditya II. of the Chālukya dynasty.³ He was succeeded by his son Mallugi, who took a town of the name of Parnakheṭa from his enemies, and while residing there carried away by force the troop of elephants belonging to the king of Utkala or Orissa.⁴ Then followed his son Amaragāṅgeya⁵ whose name is mentioned in a copper-plate grant issued in the reign of a subsequent king.⁶ After him came Govindarāja who was probably his son. Govindarāja was succeeded by Amaramallagi, a son of Mallugi, and he by Kāliya Ballāla. This prince was in all likelihood the son of Amaramallagi, though it is not expressly stated. Ballāla's sons were set aside and the sovereignty of the Yādava family fell into the hands of his uncle Bhillama,⁷ who was possessed of superior abilities. Bhillama being represented as the uncle of Ballāla must have been another son of Mallugi, and he is so spoken of in the grant referred to above.⁸ He got possession of the throne after two of his brothers and their sons, wherefore he must have been a very old man at the time. Hence it is that he reigned only for a short time, having come to the throne in Śaka 1109 and died in 1113. It was this Bhillama who acquired for his family the empire that was ruled over by the Chālukyas.

Pandit Bhagvānlāl has published a stone-inscription⁹ existing in a ruined temple at Añjaneri near Nāsik, in which a chief of the Yādava family, named Seunadeva, is represented to have made some grant in the Śaka year 1063¹⁰ to a Jaina temple. From the account given above, it will be seen that there were two princes only of the name of Seuna in the Yādava family, and that the later of the two was an ally of Vikramāditya II., and consequently reigned about the end of the tenth and the beginning of the eleventh century of the Śaka era. The Seunadeva of the Añjaneri inscription therefore cannot be this individual, and no other prince of that name is mentioned in the Vratakhanda. Besides Seunadeva calls himself pointedly a Mahāśāmantā or chief only; while about 1063 S'aka, when the Chālukya power had begun to decline, it does not appear likely that the Yādavas of Seunades'a should give themselves such an inferior title. It therefore appears to me that the Seunadeva of Añjaneri belonged to a minor branch of the Yādava family dependent on the main branch, and that the branch ruled over a small district of which Añjaneri was the chief city.

The number of princes who reigned from Driḍhaprahāra to Bhīllama V. inclusive is 22. There are in the list a good many who belonged to the same generation as their predecessors and consequently these twenty-two do not represent so many different generations. Allowing, therefore, the usual average, in such cases of 18 years to each reign, the period that must have elapsed between the accession of Driḍhaprahāra and the death of Bhīllama V. is 396 years. The dynasty, therefore, was founded about 717 Śāka or 795 A.D., that is, about the time of Govind III. of the Rāshtrakūṭa race. Possibly considering that Vaddiga I. was contemporary of Kṛishṇa III., one might say that the dynasty was founded in the latter part of the reign of Amoghavarsha I.

THE YĀDAVAS OF DEVAGIRI.

Later History.

WE have seen that the Hoysala Yādavas of Halebid in Maisur were becoming powerful in the time of Tribhuvanamalla or Vikramāditya II. and aspiring to the supreme sovereignty of the Dekkan, and Vishṇuvardhana, the reigning prince of the family at that period, actually invaded the Chālukya territory and encamped on the banks of the Kṛishṇā-Venā. But those times were not favourable for the realization of their ambitious projects. The Chālukya prince was a man of great ability, the power of the family was firmly established over the country, its resources were large, and the dependent chiefs and noblemen were obedient. But the state of things had now changed. Weaker princes had succeeded, the Chālukya power had been broken by their dependents the Kalachuris, and these in their turn had succumbed to the internal troubles and dissensions consequent on the rise of the Liṅgāyata sect. At this time the occupant of the Hoysala throne was Vira Ballāla, the grandson of Vishṇuvardhana. He fought with Brāhma or Bomma, the general of the last Chālukya prince Somesvara IV., and putting down his elephants by means of his horses defeated him and acquired the provinces which the general had won back from Vijjaṇa.¹

The Yādavas of the north were not slow to take advantage of the unsettled condition of the country to extend their power and territory. Mallugi seems to have been engaged in a war with Vijjaṇa. A person of the name of Dādā was commander of his troops of elephants and is represented to have gained some advantages over the army of the Kalachuri prince. He had four sons of the names of Mahīdhara, Jahla, Sām̐ba, and Gaṅgādhara. Of these Mahīdhara succeeded his father and is spoken of as having defeated the forces of Vijjaṇa.² But the acquisition of the empire of the Chālukyas was completed by Mallugi's son Bhillama. He captured a town of the name of Śrīvardhana from a king who is called Antala, vanquished in battle the king of Pratyāṇḍaka, put to death the ruler of Maṅgalaveshṭaka, (Maṅgalvedhem), of the name of Villana, and having obtained the sovereignty of Kalyāṇa, put to death the lord of Hosala who was probably the Hoysala Yādava Narasiṃha, the father of Vīra Ballāla.¹ The commander of his elephants was Jahlā, the brother of Mahādhara, and he is represented to have rendered Bhillama's power firm. He led a maddened elephant skilfully into the army of the Gūrjara king, struck terror into the heart of Malla, frightened the forces of Mallugi, and put an end to the victorious career of Muñja and Anna.² When in this manner Bhillama made himself master of the whole country to the north of the Kṛishṇā, he founded the city of Devagiri³ and having got himself crowned, made that city his capital. This took place about the Śaka year 1109.

Contests between

Bhillama then endeavoured to extend his territory farther southwards, but he was opposed by Vīra Ballāla, who, as we have seen, had been pushing his conquests northwards. It was a contest for the possession of an empire and was consequently arduous and determined. Several battles took place between the two rivals, and eventually a decisive engagement was fought at Lökkigunḍi, now Lakkunḍi, in the Dhārvaḍ District, in which Jaitrasīṃha, who is compared to "the right arm of Bhillama" and must have been his son, was defeated and Vīra Ballāla became sovereign of Kuntala. The inscription in which this is recorded bears the date Śaka 1114 or A.D. 1192;⁴ and Vīra Ballāla who made the grant recorded in it was at that time encamped with his victorious army at Lökkigunḍi, from which it would appear that the battle had taken place but a short time before. The northern Yādavas had to put off the conquest of Kuntala or the Southern Marāṭhā Country for a generation.

the sacrificial vow on the holy ground of the battle-field and throwing a great many kings into the fire of his prowess by means of the ladles of his weapons, performed a human sacrifice by immolating a victim in the shape of the fierce Rudra, the lord of the Tailangas, and vanquished the three worlds."¹ This same fact is alluded to in the Paithan grant, in which Jaitugi is represented to have killed the king of the Trikalīngas in battle. He is there spoken of also as having released Gaṇapati from prison and to have placed him on the throne.² The Rudra therefore whom he is thus represented to have killed on the field of battle must have been the Rudradeva of the Kākatiya dynasty whose inscription we have at Anamkond near Woraṅgal, and the Gaṇapati, his nephew³ who was probably placed in confinement by Rudradeva. In other places also his war with the king of the Andhras or Tailāṅgas and his having raised Gaṇapati to the throne are alluded⁴ to, and he is represented to have deprived the Andhra ladies of the happiness arising from having their husbands living.⁵ Lakshmīdhara, the son of the celebrated mathematician and astronomer Bhāskarācharya, was in the service of Jaitrapāla and was placed by him at the head of all learned Paṇḍits. He knew the Vedas and was versed in the Tarkasāstra and Mīmāṃsā.⁶

Jaitrapāla's son and successor was Siṅghaṇa, under whom the power and territory of the family greatly increased. He ascended the throne in 1132 Śaka.⁷ He defeated a king of the name of Jajjalla and brought away his elephants. He deprived a monarch named Kakkūla of his sovereignty, destroyed Arjuna who was probably the sovereign of Mālvā, and made Bhoja a prisoner. Janārdana, the son of Gaṅgādhara, who was Jahla's brother, is said to have taught Siṅghaṇa the art of managing elephants which enabled him to vanquish Arjuna.⁸ He had succeeded to the office of commander of elephants held by Jahla and after him by Gaṅgādhara. mīdhara, the lion of Bhambhāgiri, was reduced, the ruler of Dhārā was besieged by means of troops of horses, and the whole of the country in the possession of Ballāla was taken. All this was but a child's play to King Singhana."¹ Jajjala must have been a prince belonging to the eastern branch of the Chedi dynasty that ruled over the province of Chhattisgarh, for that name occurs in the genealogy of that dynasty.² The name Kakkūla I would identify with Kokkala which was borne by some princes of the western branch of the family, the capital of which was Tripura or Tevur. The kings of Mathurā and Kāśī were killed by him in battle, and Hammira was vanquished by but a boy-general of Singhana.³ In an inscription also at Tīlivalī in the Dhārvād District, he is represented to have defeated Jajalladeva, conquered Ballāla the Hoysala king, subdued Bhoja of Panhālā, and humbled the sovereign of Mālava.⁴ He is also spoken of as "the goad of the elephant in the shape of the Gūrjara king."⁵ We have an inscription of his at Gaddaka dated 1135 Śaka, which shows that Vīra Ballāla must have been deprived of the southern part of the country before that time.⁶ Singhana is represented as reigning at his capital Devagiri.⁷

The Bhoja of Panhālā spoken of above was a prince of the Śilāhāra dynasty, and after his defeat the Kolhāpur kingdom appears to have been annexed by the Yādavas to their dominions. They put an end to this branch of the family as later on they did to another which ruled over Northern Konkan. From this time forward the Kolhāpur inscriptions contain the names of the Yādava princes with those of the governors appointed by them to rule over the district. An inscription of Singhana at Khediāpur in that district records the grant of a village to the temple of Koppesvara in the year 1136 Śaka.

invasions of Gujarāt.

Singhana seems to have invaded Gujarāt several times. In an inscription at Āmberī a Brāhmaṇ chief of the name of Kholesvara of the Mudgala Gotra is spoken of as a very brave general in the service of the Yādava sovereign. He humbled the pride of the Gūrjara prince, crushed the Mālava, destroyed the race of the king of the Ābhīras, and being like "wild fire to the enemies" of his master, left nothing for Singhana to be anxious about. His son Rāma succeeded him, and a large expedition under his command was again sent to Gujarāt. Rāma advanced up to the Narmadā, where a battle was fought, in which he slew numbers of Gūrjara soldiers, but he himself lost his life.⁸ From this it would appear that Gujarāt was invaded by Singhana on two occasions at least, if not more; and this is borne out by what we find stated in the authorities for the history of Gujarât. Somadeva, the author of the Kirttikaumudî, which gives an account of the minister Vastupâla and his masters the princes of the Vâghelâ branch of the Chaulukya family, describes an invasion of Gujarât by Singhana in the time of Lavanaprasâda and his son Vîradhavalâ. "The capital of Gujarât trembled with fear when the advance of Singhana's army was reported. Being afraid of this foreign invasion no one among the subjects of the Gûrjara king began the construction of a new house or stored grain, and the minds of all were restless. Neglecting to secure the grain in their fields they showed a particular solicitude to procure carts, and as the army of the enemy approached nearer and nearer, the people with their fears greatly excited removed farther and farther. When Lavanaprasâda heard of the rapid advance of the innumerable host of the Yâdava prince, he knit his brow in anger; and though he had but a small army, proceeded with it to meet that of the enemy, which was vastly superior. When the forces of Singhana arrived on the banks of the Tâpî he rapidly advanced to the Mahî. Seeing, on the one hand, the vast army of the enemy and, on the other, the indomitable prowess of the Chaulukya force, the people were full of doubt and could not foresee the result. The enemy burnt villages on their way, and the volume of smoke that rose up in the air showed the position of their camp to the terrified people and enabled them to direct their movements accordingly. The Yâdavas overran the country about Bharoch while the plentiful crops were still standing in the fields; but the king of Gujarât did not consider them unconquerable."¹ In the mean while, however, four kings of Mârvâd rose against Lavanaprasâda and his son Vîradhavalâ, and the chiefs of Godhrâ and Lâta, who had united their forces with theirs, abandoned them and joined the Mârvâd princes. In these circumstances Lavanaprasâda suddenly stopped his march and turned backwards.² The Yâdava army, however, did not, according to Someśvara, advance farther; but he gives no reason whatever, observing only that "deer do not follow a lion's path even when he has left it."³ But if the invasion spread such terror over the country as Someśvara himself represents, and the army of Singhana was so large, it is impossible to conceive how it could have ceased to advance when the Gûrjara prince retreated, unless he had agreed to pay a tribute or satisfied the Yâdava commander in some other way. In a manuscript discovered some years ago of a work containing forms of letters, deeds, patents, &c., there is a specimen of a treaty with the names of Singhana and Lavanaprasâda as parties to it, from which it appears that a treaty of that nature must actually have been concluded between them.⁴ The result of the expedition, therefore, was that Lavanaprasāda had to submit and conclude a treaty of alliance with Siṅghaṇa.

Second Invasion.

This invasion of Gujarāt must have been one of the earlier ones alluded to in the Āmbem inscription, and Kholesvara himself must have been the commander of the Yādava army on the occasion. For Lavanaprasāda is said to have declared himself independent of his original master Bhīma II. of Anahilapattana about the year 1276 Vikrama,¹ corresponding to 1141 Śāka, which was about the ninth or tenth year of Siṅghaṇa's reign, and the work in which the treaty mentioned above occurs was composed in 1288 Vikrama, i. e. 1153 Śāka. But the expedition under the command of Rāma, the son of Kholesvara, must have been sent a short time before Śāka 1160, the date of the Āmbem inscription. For Rāma's son is represented to have been a minor under the guardianship of that chief's sister Lakshmi, who governed the principality in the name of the boy. Rāma, therefore, had not died so many years before Śāka 1160 as to allow of his boy having attained his majority by that time. On the occasion of this expedition Viśaladeva, the son of Viradhavala, was the sovereign of Gujarāt. For in an inscription of his he boasts in the forms given by the author, he often uses the usual expression amuka, meaning "some one" or "such a one." This general expression, however, is not used to indicate the date, and we have in all the forms one date, viz. 15 Sudi of Vaiśākha, in the year of Vikrama 1288, except in one case where it is the 3rd Sudi. This probably was the date when the author wrote. Similarly, when giving the form of a grant inscribed on copper-plates, the author in order probably to make the form clear, uses real and specific names. He gives the genealogy of the Chaulukya kings of Anahilapattana from Mālarāja to Bhīma II. and then introduces Lavanaprasāda, whom he calls Lāvanyaprasāda and styles a Mahāmaṇḍalesvara, as the prince making the grant. Similarly, in giving the form of a treaty of alliance called yamalapattra, the persons who are introduced as parties to it are Siṅghaṇa and Lāvanyaprasāda and the form runs thus :—

संवत् १२८८ वर्षे वैशाखशुदि १५ सोमेऽद्येह श्रीमद्विजयकटके महाराजाधिराजश्री- मस्तिहणदेवस्य महामण्डलेश्वरराणकश्रीलावण्यप्रसादस्य च । संराज(साम्राज्य or सम्राट्) कुलश्रीश्रीमस्तिहणदेवेन महामण्डलेश्वरराणश्रीलावण्यप्रसादेन पूर्वैरुज्ज्वलभीय
२ (i. e., आत्मीय again) देशेषु रहणीयं । केनापि कस्यापि भूमी नाक्रमणीया ।

"On this day the 15th Sudi of Vaiśākha, in the year Samvat 1288, in the Camp of Victory, [a treaty] between the paramount king of kings, the prosperous Siṅghaṇa and the Mahāmaṇḍalesvara Rāṇaka, the prosperous Lāvanyaprasāda. Siṅghaṇa whose patrimony is paramount sovereignty, and the Mahāmaṇḍalesvara Rāṇa the prosperous Lāvanyaprasāda should according to former usage confine themselves, each to his own country ; neither should invade the country of the other."

The treaty then provides that when either of them is taken up by an enemy, the armies of both should march to his release ; that if a prince from either country ran away into the other with some valuable things, he should not be allowed quarter, &c. Now, it is extremely unlikely that the author of the work should introduce these persons in his form unless he had seen or heard of such a treaty between them. Siṅghaṇa is but another form of Siṅghaṇa, and he is spoken of as a paramount sovereign. The treaty, it will be seen, was concluded in the "victorious camp," which is a clear reference to the invasion described by Someśvara.

In रहणीयं we have, I think, the vernacular root रह "to remain," "to live." For further details see my Report on the search for manuscripts during 1882-83, pp. 39 and 225.

of his having been "the submarine fire that dried up the ocean of Singhana's army,"¹ and he must have succeeded his father about the year 1292 Vikrama corresponding to Śaka 1157,² though he obtained possession of the throne at Anahilapattana in Vikrama 1302, corresponding to Śaka 1167 and 1246 A.D. The foundation of his boast was probably the fact of Râma's having been killed in the battle. What the ultimate result was, however, the inscription does not inform us.

Singhana appointed one Bîchana or Bîcha, the son of Chikka and younger brother of Malla, to be governor of the southern provinces and his viceroy there. He fought with his master's enemies in the south as Kholesvara did in the north and kept them in check. Bîchana is represented to have humbled the Rattas who were petty feudatories in the Southern Marâthâ Country, the Kadambas of Konkan, i. e. of Goa, the Guttas sprung from the ancient Guptas, who held a principality in the south, the Pândyas, the Hoysalas, and the chiefs of other southern provinces, and to have erected a triumphal column on the banks of the Kâveri.³ The date of the grant in which all this is recorded is Śaka 1160 or A.D. 1238.

Conquests in the South.

It thus appears that the Yâdava empire became in the time of Singhana as extensive as that ruled over by the ablest monarchs of the preceding dynasties. The full titles of a paramount sovereign are given to Singhana in his inscriptions, such as "the support of the whole world," "the lover of the earth (Prithvivallabha)," and "king of kings." Since Krishna, the eighth incarnation of Vishnu, is represented in the Purânas to have belonged to the Yâdava family, the princes of Devagiri called themselves Vishṇuvamśodbhava;⁴ and as Krishna and his immediate descendants reigned at Dvârakâ, they assumed the title of Dvâravatîpuravarâdhîśvara, "the supreme lord of Dvâravatî, the best of cities."⁵ In the reign of Singhana as well as of his two predecessors the office of chief secretary or Srîkaraṇâdhipa, which in a subsequent reign was conferred on Hemâdri, was held by a man of the name of Sodhala. He was the son of Bhâskara, a native of Kâśmîr who had settled in the Dekkan. Sodhala's son S'ârîngadhara wrote in this reign a treatise on music entitled Samgîtaratnâkara which is extant.⁶ There is a commentary on this work attributed to a king of the name of Singa who is represented as a paramount sovereign of the Andhra circle. This Singa appears in all likelihood to be Singhana; and the commentary was either written by him or dedicated to him by a dependant, as is often the case.¹ Chāṅgadeva, the grandson of Bhāskarāchārya and son of Lakshmīdhara, was chief astrologer to Singhana; and also Anantadeva, the grandson of Bhāskarāchārya's brother Śrīpati and son of Gaṇapati. Chāṅgadeva founded a Maṭha or college for the study of his grandfather's Siddhāntaśiromaṇi and other works at Pāṭṇā in the Chāliṣgaṇv division of the Khāṇdes district, and Anantadeva built a temple at a village in the same division and dedicated it to Bhavānī on the 1st of Chaitra in the Śaka year 1144 expired.²

Jaitrapāla, Singhana's son, died before him.

Singhana's son was Jaitugi or Jaitrapāla, who "was the abode of all arts, and was thus the very moon in opposition, full of all the digits, that had come down to the earth, to protect it. He was death to hostile kings and firm in unequal fights."³ But if he protected the earth at all he must have done so during the lifetime of his father as Yuvarāja, for the latest date of Singhana is Śaka 1169, and in a copper-plate inscription of his grandson and Jaitugi's son Krishna, Śaka 1175, Pramādi-Samvatsara, is stated to be the seventh of his reign, so that Krishna began to reign in Śaka 1169 corresponding to 1247 A.D.⁴ And in the longer of the two historical introductions to the Vratākhaṇḍa, Jaitugi is not mentioned at all. After Singhana, we are told that his grandsons Krishna and Mahādeva came to the throne, of whom the elder Krishna reigned first.⁵ Krishna's Prākṛit name was Kanhāra, Kanhara, or Kandhāra. He is represented to have been the terror of the kings of Mālava, Gujarāt, and Konkan, to have "established the king of Teluṅga," and to have been the sovereign of the country of the Chola king.⁶ In the Vratākhaṇḍa also he is said to have destroyed the army of Viśala, who we know was sovereign of Gujarāt at this time and who had been at war with Singhana, and, in general terms, to have "conquered a great many enemies in bloody battles in which numbers of horses and elephants were engaged, reduced some to captivity and compelled others to seek refuge in forests, and, having thus finished the work of vanquishing the series of earthly kings, to have marched to the heavenly world to conquer Indra."⁷ Lakshmīdeva, son of Janārdana, is represented by his wise counsels to have helped Krishna to consolidate his power and to have by his sword subdued his enemies.¹ Krishna performed a great many sacrifices and thus "brought fresh strength to the Vedic ceremonial religion which in the course of time had lost its hold over the people." In a copper-plate grant dated Śaka 1171, found in the Belgaum Tāluka, Malla or Malliseṭṭi is spoken of as the elder brother of Bīcha or Bīchana, the viceroy of Singhana in the south, and was himself governor of the province of Kuhunḍi. He lived at Mudugala, probably the modern Mudgala, and gave, by the consent of Krishna, his sovereign, lands in the village of Bāgevādi to thirty-two Brāhmanas of different Gotras.² Among the family names of these it is interesting to observe some borne by modern Mahārāshṭra Brāhmanas, such as Paṭavaradhana and Ghaisāsa, prevalent among Chitpāvanas, and Ghaḥisāsa, Ghaḥisa, and Pāṭhaka, among Deśasthas. The name Trivaddi also occurs; but there is no trace of it among Marāṭhā Brāhmanas, while it is borne by Brāhmanas in Gujarāt and Upper Hindustan. In another grant, Chaunḍa the son of Bīchana, who succeeded to the office and title of his father, is represented to have personally solicited king Krishna at Devagiri to permit him to grant the village mentioned therein.³ Jahlana, son of Lakshmiḍeva who had succeeded his father, assisted Krishna diligently by his counsels in conjunction with his younger brother. He was commander of the troops of elephants and as such fought with Krishna's enemies. He compiled an anthology of select verses from Sanskrit poets, called Sūktimuktāvali, which is extant.⁴ The Vedānta-kalpataru, which is a commentary on Vāchaspatimiśra's Bhāmatī which itself is a commentary on Śaṅkarāchārya's Vedāntasūtra-bhāṣya, was written by Amalananda in the reign of Kṛishṇa.¹

Kṛishṇa was succeeded by his brother Mahādeva in 1182 Śaka or 1260 A.D. "He was a tempestuous wind that blew away the heap of cotton in the shape of the king of the Tailaṅga country, the prowess of his arm was like a thunderbolt that shattered the mountain in the shape of the pride of the swaggering Gūjara, he destroyed the king of Konkan with ease, and reduced the arrogant sovereigns of Kaṛṇāta and Lāṭa to mockery."² The Gūjara here mentioned must be Vīśaladeva noticed above, as Mahādeva is represented in the Paiṭhaṇ grant to have vanquished him;³ and the king of Kaṛṇāta was probably a Hoysala Yādava of Halebid. "King Mahādeva never killed a woman, a child, or one who submitted" to him; knowing this and being greatly afraid of him, the Andhras placed a woman on the throne; and the king of Mālava also for the same reason installed a child in his position, and forthwith renouncing all his possessions practised false penance for a long time. He took away in battle the elephants and the five musical instruments of the ruler of Tailaṅga, but left the ruler Rudramā as he refrained from killing a woman."⁴ In a work on Poetics called Pratāparudrīya by Vidyānatha there occurs a specimen of a dramatic play in which Gaṇapati of the Kākatiya dynasty, the same prince who is represented in the Paiṭhaṇ grant to have been released from confinement by Jaitugi, is mentioned as having left his throne to his daughter, whom, however, he called his son and named Rudra, and who is spoken of as "a king" and not queen. She adopted Pratāparudra, the son of her daughter, as her heir. This, therefore, was the woman spoken of above as Rudramā and as having been placed on the throne by the Andhras.⁵ "Soma, the lord of Konkan, though skilled in swimming in the sea, was together with his forces drowned in the rivers formed by the humour trickling from the temples of Mahādeva's maddened elephants." "Mahādeva deprived Someśvara of his kingdom and his life."⁶ We have seen that Kṛishṇa fought with the king of Konkan, but it appears he did not subjugate the country thoroughly. His successor Mahādeva, however, again invaded it with an army consisting of a large number of elephants.

Soma or Someśvara was completely defeated on land and his power broken, whereupon he appears to have betaken himself to his ships. There somehow he met with his death,¹ probably by being drowned, for it is said that "even the sea did not protect him" and that "he betook himself to the submarine fire," thinking the fire of Mahâdeva's prowess to be more unbearable.² Konkan was thereupon annexed to the territories of the Yâdavas. Hence it is that the country was governed by a viceroy appointed by the Devagiri king during the time of Mahâdeva's successor, as we find from the Thânâ plates published by Mr. Wathen.³ The Someśvara whom Mahâdeva subdued belonged to the Śilâhâra dynasty of Thânâ that had been ruling over that part of Konkan for a considerable period. He is the last prince of the dynasty whose inscriptions are found in the district, and his dates are Saka 1171 and 1182.⁴ Mahâdeva like his predecessors reigned at Devagiri, which is represented as the capital of the dynasty to which he belonged and as situated in the country called Seuna on the borders of Daṇḍakâraṇya. "It was the abode of the essence of the beauty of the three worlds and its houses rivalled the peaks of the mountain tenanted by gods, and the Seuna country deserved all the sweet and ornamental epithets that might be applied to it."⁵ At Paṇḍharpur there is an inscription dated 1192 S'aka, Pramoda Samvatsara, in which Mahâdeva is represented to have been reigning at the time. He is there called Praudhapratâpa Chakravartin, or "Paramount sovereign possessing great valour." The inscription records the performance of an Aptoryâma sacrifice by a Brâhmaṇ chief of the name of Keśava belonging to the Kaśyapa Gotra.

Râmachandra or Râmadeva.

The immediate successor of Mahâdeva was Âmaṇa⁶ who appears to have been his son; but the sovereign power was soon wrested from his hands by the rightful heir Râmachandra, son of Kṛishṇa, who ascended the throne in 1193 S'aka or 1271 A.D. He is called Râmadeva or Râmarâja also. In the Thânâ copper-plate grants he is spoken of as "a lion to the proud elephant in the shape of the lord of Mâlava," from which it would appear that he was at war with that country. He is also called "the elephant that tore up by the root the tree in the shape of the Tailaṅga king." This must be an allusion to his wars with Pratâparudra the successor of Rudramâ, which are mentioned in the work noticed above. Several other epithets occur in the grants; but they are given as mere birudas or titles which were inherited by Râmachandra from his predecessors, and do not point to any specific events in his reign. His inscriptions are found as far to the south as the confines of Maisur, so that the empire he ruled over was as large as it ever was. There is in the Dekkan College Library a manuscript of the Amarakośa written in Konkani on Tāla leaves during his reign in the year 4398 of the Kaliyuga corresponding to Śaka 1219 and A.D. 1297. His viceroy in Konkani in Śaka 1212 was a Brāhman named Kṛishṇa belonging to the Bhāradvāja Gotra, whose grandfather Padmanābha first acquired royal favour and rose into importance in the reign of Siṅghana. One of the Thānā grants was issued by him, and the other dated 1194 Śaka by Achyuta Nāyaka, who was also a Brāhman and who appears to have been a petty chief and held some office which is not stated. Where he resided is also, not clear. By the Paithan copper-plate charter, which was issued in Śaka 1193, Rāmachandra assigned three villages to fifty-seven Brāhmanas on conditions some of which are rather interesting. The Brāhmanas and their descendants were to live in those villages, not to mortgage the land, allow no prostitutes to settle there, prevent gambling, use no weapons, and spend their time in doing good deeds.¹

the minister of Mahādeva and Rāmadeva.

Hemādri, the celebrated author, principally of works on Dharmaśāstra, flourished during the reigns of Mahādeva and Rāmachandra and was minister to both. In the introduction to his works on Dharmaśāstra he is called Mahādeva's Srikaraṇādhipa or Srikaraṇaprabhu. In the Thānā copper-plate of 1194 Śaka also, he is said to have taken upon himself the ādhipatyā or controllership of all karuṇa. This office seems to have been that of chief secretary or one who wrote and issued all orders on behalf of his master and kept the state record. Hemādri is also called Mantrin or counsellor generally. In his other works and in the Thānā plate Rāmārāja instead of Mahādeva is represented as his master. Mahādeva's genealogy and his own are given at the beginning of his works on Dharma. Sometimes the former begins with Siṅghana, sometimes with Bhīllama, while in the Dānakhaṇḍa the exploits of Mahādeva alone are enumerated. The description of the several princes is often couched in general terms and consists of nothing but eulogy. But the Vratākhaṇḍa, which was the first work composed by Hemādri, contains, as we have seen, a very valuable account of the dynasty from the very beginning, and by far the greater portion of it is undoubtedly historical.

Works.

Hemādri was a Brāhman of the Vatsa Gotra. His father's name was Kāmadeva, grandfather's, Vāsudeva, and great-grandfather's, Vāmana.² He is described in terms of extravagant praise; and the historical truth that may be gleaned from it appears to be this. Hemādri was very liberal to Brāhmanas and fed numbers of them every day. He was a man of learning himself, and learned men found a generous patron in him. He is represented to be religious and pious, and at the same time very brave. He evidently possessed a great deal of influence. Whether the voluminous works attributed to him were really written by him may well be questioned; but the idea at least of reducing the religious practices and observances that had descended from times immemorial to a system must certainly have been his, and must have been carried out under his supervision.

His great work is called the Chaturvarga Chintāmaṇi, which is divided into four parts, viz., (1) Vratākhaṇḍa, containing an exposition of the religious fasts and observances; (2) Dānakhaṇḍa, in which the several gifts to which great religious importance is attached are explained; (3) Tīrthākhaṇḍa, which treats of pilgrimages to holy places; and (4) Mokṣākhaṇḍa, in which the way to final deliverance is set forth. There is a fifth Khaṇḍa or part which is called Parīśeshākhaṇḍa or appendix, which contains voluminous treatises on (1) the deities that should be worshipped, (2) on Srāddhas or offerings to the manes, (3) on the determination of the proper times and seasons for the performance of religious rites, and (4) on Prāyaścitta or atonement. All these works are treasured with a great deal of information and innumerable quotations. They are held in great estimation, and future writers on the same subjects draw largely from them. A commentary called Āyurvedarasāyana on a medical treatise by Vāgbhata and another on Bopadeva's Muktāphala, a work expounding Vaiṣṇava doctrines, are also attributed to him.

Other works.

Bopadeva.

This Bopadeva was one of Hemādri's proteges and the author of the work mentioned above and of another entitled Harilīlā, which contains an abstract of the Bhāgavata. Both of these were written at the request of Hemādri as the author himself tells us.¹ Bopadeva was the son of a physician named Keśava and the pupil of Dhaneśa. His father as well as his teacher lived at a place called Sārtha situated on the banks of the Varadā. Bopadeva, therefore, was a native of Berār. Bopadeva, the author of a treatise on grammar called Mugdhabodha, appears to be the same person as this, since the names of the father and the teacher there mentioned are the same as those we find in these works. A few medical treatises also, written by Bopadeva, have come down to us.

the Marāṭhās.

Hemādri has not yet been forgotten in the Marāṭhā country. He is popularly known by the name of Hemādpant and old temples throughout the country of a certain structure are attributed to him. He is said to have introduced the Modī or the current form of writing and is believed to have brought it from Laṅkā or Ceylon. As chief secretary he had to superintend the writing of official papers and records, and it is possible he may have introduced some improvements in the mode of writing.

The great Marāṭhā sādhu or saint Jñāneśvara or Dnyāneśvara as his name is ordinarily pronounced, flourished during the reign of Rāmachandra. At the end of his Marāṭhī commentary on the Bhagavadgītā he tells us: "In the Kali age, in the country of Mahārāshṭra and on the southern bank of the Godāvarī, there is a sacred place five kos in circuit, the holiest in the three worlds, where exists Mahālayā, who is the thread that sustains the life of the world. There, king Rāmachandra, a scion of the Yadu race and the abode of all arts, dispenses justice, and there a vernacular garb was prepared for the Gītā by Jñānadeva, the son of Nivṛttinātha, sprung from the family of Maheśa."¹ The date of the completion of the work is given as Śaka 1212 or A. D. 1290, when we know Rāmachandra was on the throne.

country by the

Rāmachandra was the last of the independent Hindu sovereigns of the Dekkan. The Mussalmans had been firmly established at Delhi for about a century, and though they had not yet turned their attention to the Dekkan it was not possible they should refrain from doing so for a long time. Alla-ud-din Khilji, the nephew of the reigning king, who had been appointed governor of Karra, was a person of a bold and adventurous spirit. In the year 1294 A.D. or Śaka 1216 he collected a small army of 8000 men and marched straight to the south till he reached Ellichpur, and then suddenly turning to the west appeared in a short time before Devagiri. The king never expected such an attack and was consequently unprepared to resist it. According to one account he was even absent from his capital. He hastily collected about 4000 troops, and threw himself between the city and the invading army. But being aware he could not hold out for a long time, he took measures for provisioning the fort and retired into it. The city was then taken by the Mahomedans and plundered, and the fort was closely invested. Alla-ud-din had taken care to spread a report that his troops were but the advanced guard of the army of the king which was on its way to the Dekkan. Rāmachandra, therefore, despairing of a successful resistance, began to treat for peace. Alla-ud-din, who was conscious of his own weakness, received his proposals with gladness and agreed to raise the siege and retire on condition of receiving from the king a large quantity of gold. In the meantime, Rāmachandra's son Saṁkara collected a large army and was marching to the relief of the fort, when Alla-ud-din left about a thousand men to continue the siege and proceeded with the rest to a short distance from the town and gave battle to Śaṃkara's forces. The Hindus were numerically superior and forced the Mahomedans to fall back; but the detachment left to observe the movements of the garrison joined them at this time, and Śaṃkara's followers thinking it to be the main army that was on its way from Delhi were seized with a panic, and a confusion ensued which resulted in the complete defeat of the Hindus.

Rāmachandra or Rāmadeva then continued the negotiations, but Alla-ud-din raised his demands. The Hindu king's allies were preparing to march to his assistance, but in the meanwhile Rāmachandra discovered that the sacks of grain that had been hastily thrown into the fort really contained salt; and since the provisions had been well nigh exhausted he was anxious to hasten the conclusion of peace. It was therefore agreed that he should pay to Alla-ud-din "600 maunds of pearls, two of jewels, 1000 of silver, 4000 pieces of silk, and other precious things," cede Ellichpur and its dependencies, and send an annual tribute to Delhi. On the receipt of the valuable treasure given to him by the Devagiri prince Alla-ud-din retired.

Some time after, Alla-ud-din assassinated his aged uncle and usurped the throne. King Rāmachandra did not send the tribute for several years, and to punish him the Delhi monarch despatched an expedition of 30,000 horse under the command of Malik Kafur, a slave who had risen high in his favour. Malik Kafur accomplished the long and difficult march "over stones and hills without drawing rein," and arrived at Devagiri in March 1307 A.D., or about the end of Śaka 1228. A fight ensued in which the Hindus were defeated and Rāmadeva was taken prisoner.¹ According to another account, Malik Kafur came laying waste the country about Devagiri, and the Hindu king observing the futility of resistance surrendered himself. Rāmachandra was sent to Delhi, where he was detained for six months and afterwards released with all honour. Thenceforward he sent the tribute regularly and remained faithful to the Mahomedans. In Śaka 1231 or A.D. 1309, Malik Kafur was again sent to the Dekkan to subdue Tailaṅgaṇa. On the way he stopped at Devagiri, where he was hospitably entertained by the king.

Rāmadeva died this year and was succeeded by his son Śaṃkara. He discontinued sending the annual tribute to Delhi and Malik Kafur was again sent to the Dekkan in Śaka 1234 or A.D. 1312 to reduce him to submission. He put Śaṃkara to death, laid waste his kingdom, and fixed his residence at Devagiri.

In the latter years of Alla-ud-din his nobles, disgusted with the overwhelming influence which Malik Kafur had acquired over him, revolted. In the meantime Alla-ud-din died and was succeeded by his third son Mubarik. The opportunity was seized by Harapāla, the son-in-law of Rāmachandra, who raised an insurrection and drove away some of the Mahomedan governors. In 1240 Śaka or A.D. 1318 Mubarik marched to the Dekkan in person to suppress the revolt. He took Harapāla prisoner and inhumanly flayed him alive.

Thus ended the last Hindu or Marāthā monarchy of the Dekkan, and the country became a province of the Mahomedan empire.

SECTION XVI.

THE ŚILĀHĀRAS OF KOLHĀPUR.

THREE distinct families of chiefs or minor princes with the name of Śilāra or Śilāhāra ruled over different parts of the country. They all traced their origin to Jīmūtavāhana the son of Jīmūtakeṭu, who was the king of a certain class of demigods called Vidyādhara, and who saved the life of a serpent named Śaṅkhachūḍa by offering himself as a victim to Garuḍa in his place.¹ One of the titles borne by the princes of all the three families was Tagarapuravarādhiśvara or "lords of Tagara, the best of cities," which fact has a historical significance. We have seen that Kāṁvadeva, the donor of the Rājāpur grant who was a Chālukya, called himself Kalyāṇapuravarādhiśvara, and one of the titles of the later Kadambas after they had been reduced to vassalage and of the rulers of Goa was Banavāsipuravarādhiśvara. As these titles signify that the bearers of them belonged to the families that once held supreme power at Kalyāṇa and Banavāsī, so does Tagarapuravarādhiśvara show that the Śilāhāras who bore the title belonged to a family that once possessed supreme sovereignty and reigned at Tagara. In one Śilāhāra grant it is expressly stated that "the race known by the name of Śilāhāra was that of the kings who were masters of Tagara."² As mentioned in a former section, Tagara was a famous town in the early centuries of the Christian era and retained its importance till a very late period, but unfortunately the town has not yet been identified, nor have we found any trace of the Śilāhāra kingdom with Tagara as its capital. Perhaps it existed between the close of the Andhra-bhṛitya period and the foundation of the Chālukya power.

The three Śilāhāra dynasties of Mahāmaṇḍaleśvaras or dependent princes which we have been considering were founded in the times of the Rāshṭrakūṭas. One of them ruled over Northern Konkan, which was composed of fourteen hundred villages, the chief of them being Purī, which probably was at one time the capital of the province. As represented in an inscription at Kānheri noticed before, Konkan was assigned to Pullaśakti by Amoghavarsha a few years before Śaka 775. Another Śilāhāra family established itself in Southern Konkan. The founder or first chief named S'aṇaphulla enjoying the favour of Kṛishṇarāja acquired the territory between the sea-coast and the Sahya range.³ There were three Rāshṭrakūṭa princes of the name of Kṛishṇarāja but the one meant here must be the first prince of that name who reigned in the last quarter of the seventh century of the Ś'aka era or between 753 and 775 A.D.¹ The genealogy of this dynasty is given in the Khârepâtan grant, the last prince mentioned in which was on the throne in S'aka 930 while the Châlukya king Satyâśraya was reigning. The capital must have been situated somewhere near Khârepâtan.

The Kolhâpur
branch.

Jatiga,

The third S'ilâhâra family the history of which falls within the scope of this paper ruled over the districts of Kolhâpur, Miraj, and Karhâd, and in later times Southern Konkan was added to its territory. This dynasty was the latest of the three and was founded about the time of the downfall of the Râshtrakûta empire, as will be hereafter shown. The first prince of the family was Jatiga, who was succeeded by his son Nâyimma or Nâyivarman. Nâyimma was followed by his son Chandrarâja, and Chandrarâja by his son Jatiga, who is called "the lion of the hill-fortress of Panhâlâ."² Jatiga's son and successor was Gomka, otherwise called Gomkala or Gokalla. He is represented to have been the ruler of the districts of Kara-hâta-Kundi³ and Mairiñja and to have harassed Konkan. He had three brothers named Gûvala, Kîrtirâja, and Chandrâditya, of whom the first at least appears to have succeeded him. Then followed Mârasimha the son of Gomka, whose grant first published by Wathen is dated S'aka 980. He is represented to have constructed temples; and to have been reigning at his capital, the fort of Khilîgîli, which probably was another name of Panhâlâ in the Kolhâpur districts. Mârasimha was succeeded by his son Gûvala and he by his brother Bhoja I. Bhoja's two brothers Ballâla and Gaṇḍarâditya governed the principality after him in succession.

An inscription at Kolhâpur mentions another brother named Gaṅgadeva and the order in which the brothers are spoken of is Gûvala

¹ From Śanaphulla the first chief to Raṭṭa the last there are ten generations. Somehow each succeeding chief in this line happens to be the son of the preceding. Though in a line of princes some of whom bear to others the relation of brother or uncle, the average duration of each reign is from 19 to 21 years; the average duration of a generation is always much longer, and varies from 26 to 28 years. One can verify this by taking any line of princes or chiefs in the world. Raṭṭa was on the throne in S'aka 930, and supposing him to have begun to reign about that time, nine generations or about 27×9 years must have passed away from the date of the foundation of the family to S'aka 930. Subtracting $27 \times 9 = 243$ from 930, we have Śaka 687 as the approximate date of Śanaphulla. If we take the average to be 26, we shall have 696 as the date. In either case we are brought to the reign of Krishna I. The dates of Krishna II. range from S'aka 797 to 833 and of Krishna III. from S'aka 862 to 881, and therefore neither of these will do. Even if we take the other average of a reign in the present case and subtract $19 \times 9 = 171$ from 930, we get S'aka 759, which will not take us to the reign of Krishna II. whose earliest date is S'aka 797. The Khârepâtan family therefore was the oldest of the three, and was founded in the reign of Krishna I.

Bâl S'âstri read the name of the last chief in the grant as Rahu; but the second syllable of the name is certainly not ऱ्हा the form of which in the grant itself is different. It looks exactly like the र्हा in the word परम्भारक and आवष्टनानि which occur elsewhere in the grant.

² See the grant of Gaṇḍarâditya published by Paṇḍit Bhagvānlâl Indrajî in Jour. B. B. R. A. S., Vol. XLII., p. 2, of Mârasimha in Jour. R. A. S., Vol. IV., p. 280, and Arch. Surv. W. I., No. 10, p. 102, and of Bhoja II. in Trans. Lit. Soc. Bom., Vol. III.

³ Mârasimha's grant. Kundi or Kuhundi was some part of the Belgaum district, as stated before. Mahiñja is Miraj.

Gaṅga, Ballāla, Bhoja, and Gaṇḍarāditya.¹ But the grants of Gaṇḍarāditya and Bhoja II. agree in representing Bhoja as the elder and Ballāla as the younger brother, and in omitting Gaṅga.

Section XVI.

Of all these brothers the youngest Gaṇḍarāditya seems to have been the most famous. He is the donor, as indicated above, in the grant published by Pandit Bhagvānlāl Indrajī,² and in others recorded on stone at Kolhāpur and in the districts. His dates are Śaka 1032, 1040, 1058.³ He ruled over the country of Miriṅja along with the seven Khollas and over Konkan, which thus seems to have been subjugated by the Kolhāpur Ś'ilāhāras before 1032. Probably it was added to their dominions in the time of Goṅka or soon after. From the grant of Bhoja II. it appears that the part of Konkan ruled over by the Dekkan Ś'ilāhāras was the same as that which was in the possession of the family mentioned in the Khārepāṭaṇ grant,⁴ wherefore it follows that the Ś'ilāhāras of southern Konkan were uprooted by their kinsmen of the Kolhāpur districts. Gaṇḍarāditya fed a hundred thousand Brāhmins at Prayāga. This must be the place of that name which is situated near Kolhāpur; and not the modern Allahābād. He built a Jaina temple at Ājareṃ, a village in the Kolhāpur districts,⁵ and constructed a large tank, called after him Gaṇḍasamudra or "the sea of Gaṇḍa," at Irukūḍi in the Miraj district, and on its margin placed idols of Īśvara or Śiva, Buddha, and Arhat (Jina), for the maintenance of each of which he assigned a piece of land. Several other charities of his, in which the Jainas also had their share, are mentioned, and his bountiful nature as well as good and just government are extolled.⁶ He first resided at a place called Tiravāḍa and afterwards at Valavāṭa, which has been identified with the present Valavdeṃ.⁷

Vijayārka.

Gaṇḍarāditya was succeeded by his son Vijayārka, who was on the throne in Śaka 1065 and 1073.⁸ He restored the chiefs of the territory about Thānā to their principality which they had lost, and replaced the princes of Goa on the throne and fortified their position which had become shaky.⁹ He assisted Vijjāna¹⁰ in his revolt against his masters, the Chālukyas of Kalyāṇa, and enabled him to acquire supreme sovereignty. This event, as we have seen, took place about 1079 Śaka.

¹⁰ In the transcript of the inscription in Vol. IV. Trans. Lit. Soc. Bom. we have Vīkshana for Vijjāna. There is no question this must be a mistake of the reader of the inscription or of the engraver. For the Kalachuri usurper at Kalyāṇa is called both Vijjala or Vijjāna in his inscriptions, and there was none who about the date of Vijayārka obtained the position of a Chakravartin or paramount sovereign, as stated in the inscription.

Section XVI.
Bhoja II.

After Vijayārka, his son Bhoja II. became Mahāmandaleśvara and reigned in the fort of Panhālā. His dates are Śaka 1101, 1109, 1112, 1113, 1114, and 1127.¹ He granted the village of Kaśeli in Konkan near Khārepāṭaṇ on the application of his son Gaṇḍarāditya for feeding Brāhman̄s regularly²; and gave lands for Hindu and Jaina temples in other places also. Two of the grantees in one case at Kolhāpur are called Karahātakas, which shows that the caste of Karhāde Brāhman̄s had come to be recognized in those days; and two others bore the family name of Ghaisāsa, which is now found among Chitpāvan Brāhman̄s.³ In the reign of Bhoja II. a Jaina Paṇḍit of the name of Somadeva composed in Śaka 1127 a commentary entitled *Śabdārnnavachandrikā*⁴ on Pājyapāda's Sanskrit Grammar. The Kolhāpur chiefs enjoyed a sort of semi-independence. Vijjana, the new sovereign at Kalyāna, however, endeavoured probably to establish his authority over Bhoja. But that chief was not content to be his feudatory, and to reduce him to subjection Vijjana marched against Kolhāpur a little before his assassination in Śaka 1089.⁵ On the establishment of the power of the Devagiri Yādavas, Bhoja seems similarly to have assumed independence; but Singhana subdued him completely, and annexed the principality to the Yādava empire.⁶

Approximate
date of the foundation of
branch.

The number of generations from Jatiga, the founder of the dynasty, to Gaṇḍarāditya is seven. The latest date of the latter is Śaka 1058 and the earliest of his successor Vijayārka is 1065; so that if we suppose Gaṇḍarāditya to have died in 1060 and allow about 27 years to each generation, we shall arrive at Śaka 871 as the approximate date of the foundation of the family. At that time the reigning Rāshṭrakūṭa sovereign was Kṛishṇa III., the uncle of Kakkala the last prince.

Religion of
Ś'ilāhāras.

One of the many titles used by the Ś'ilāhāras was Srīman-Mahā-lakshmī-labdha-vara-prasāda, i. e. "one who has obtained the favour of a boon from the glorious Mahālakshmī." Mahālakshmī was thus their tutelary deity, and they were clearly the followers of the Purāṇic and Vedic religion; but they patronized both Brāhman̄s and Jainas alike; and their impartiality is strikingly displayed by the fact noticed above of Gaṇḍarāditya's having placed an idol of Buddha, whose religion had well nigh become extinct, along with those of the gods worshipped by the other two sects, on the margin of the tank dug by him.

There are at the present day many Marāṭhā families of the name of Selāra reduced to poverty, and the name Selāravāḍi of a station

APPENDIX A.

*Note on the Gupta Era.Appendix A.

IN order to render the chronologies of the different dynasties that ruled over western and northern India in the early centuries of the Christian era mutually consistent, it is necessary to discuss the initial date of the Gupta era. Albiruni, who accompanied Mahmud of Ghizni in his invasion of Gujarāt in the early part of the eleventh century, states that that era was posterior to the Śāka by 241 years, and that it was the epoch of the extermination of the Guptas. He mentions another era named after Balaba, the initial date of which was the same as that of the Guptas.

Now in some of the inscriptions of the Gupta kings and their dependent chiefs the dates are referred to Guptakāla or the Gupta era, wherefore Albiruni's statement that it was the epoch of their extermination cannot be true. This error is regarded as throwing discredit on his other statement, viz., that the era was posterior to the Śāka by 241 years. But it has nothing whatever to do with it. Albiruni must have derived his knowledge of the initial date from contemporary evidence, since the era of the Guptas was, as stated by him, one of those ordinarily used in the country in his time, and as his statements regarding the initial dates of the Vikramā and the Śāka eras are true, so must that with reference to the Gupta era be true. On the other hand, his information as regards the event which the Gupta era memorialized must have been based upon the tradition current among the Hindu astronomers of the day, who were his informants. Such traditions are often erroneous, as has been proved in many a case. Albiruni was also informed that the Śāka era was the epoch of the defeat of the Śāka king by Vikramāditya. This was the tradition as to its origin among Indian astronomers, though it has now given place to another. For Sodhala in his commentary on Bhāskarachārya's Karāṇa-kutūhala, a manuscript of which more than four hundred years old exists in the collection made by me for Government during 1882-83, tells us that "the epoch when Vikramāditya killed Mlechchhas of the name of Śakas is ordinarily known as the Śāka era." But we know that in Maṅgalis'a's inscription at Bādāmi it is spoken of as the era of the "coronation of the Śāka king"; that Ravikīrti in the inscription at Aihole describes it as the era of the Śāka kings and that it is similarly represented in many other places. Albiruni's error therefore as regards the origin of the Gupta era no more invalidates his statement as to its initial date than his error about the origin of the Śāka era does his statement about the initial date of that era. The only reasonable course for us under the circumstances is to reject the statement as to the era being an epoch of the extermination of the Guptas and accept that about the initial date of the era. But some antiquarians reject both these statements and accept what simply hangs on them and what must fall with them, viz., that the Guptas were exterminated in Śāka 242, and make elaborate endeavours to find an earlier initial date for the era. If the inscriptions show that the era was not posthumous but contemporaneous, we should rather believe that the Guptas rose to power in Śāka 242, assigning its due value to the statement of Albiruni, which must have been based on contemporary evidence, that the era began in that year. But if instead of that we declare that they ceased to reign in Śāka 242, we in effect reject contemporary evidence and accept a mere tradition which in so far as it represents the era to be posthumous has been proved to be erroneous.

Again, Albiruni's statement that the initial date of the Gupta era and of the Valabhī era was the same seems to some not "at all probable." To my mind the improbability is not so great as to render valueless what clearly is contemporary evidence. We all know that the date occurring in a grant of one of the sons of the founder of the dynasty is 207, and we have a large number of grants of subsequent kings with dates posterior to this and in harmony with it. So that it is clear that these dates cannot refer to an era dating from the foundation of the dynasty. Such a long time as 207 years cannot be considered to have elapsed between the father who founded the dynasty and his son, even supposing him to have been a posthumous son. The dates, therefore, are understood to refer to the Gupta era. What, then, could have been the Valabhî era, if it was never used by the Valabhî princes during the 275 years or thereabouts of the existence of their dynasty? An era cannot receive the name of a certain line of princes unless used by those princes, at least on a few occasions, and enforced. The era used by the Valabhî princes must be the Valabhî era. One certainly would expect that it should be so. The only supposition, therefore, on which the whole becomes intelligible is that the era introduced by the Valabhîs in Surâshtra and used by them was called the Valabhî era by their subjects, and not one dating from the foundation of the dynasty; for such a one, we see, was not used by the Valabhî princes themselves. The era introduced and used by the Valabhîs was that of the Guptas, whose dependents they were in the beginning, and hence Albiruni's statement that the initial date of the Gupta and Valabhî eras was the same is true. From an inscription at Somanâth discovered by Colonel Tod, we gather that Śaka 242 was the first year of the Valabhî era. Hence, therefore, the initial date of the Gupta era was 242 Śaka, as stated by Albiruni.

The question in this way is, I think, plain enough. Still since astronomical calculations have been resorted to to prove the incorrectness of the date given by Albiruni and to arrive at an earlier one so as to place the extinction of the Gupta dynasty in Śaka 242, it is necessary to go into the question further. The following tests may be used and have been used to determine the correctness of a proposed initial date:—

1. The date of Budha Gupta's pillar inscription at Eran, which is Thursday, the 12th of Āshāḍha, in the Gupta year 165.
2. Rājā Hastin's inscription dated 156 Gupta, the year of the 12-year cycle of Jupiter being Mahāvaiśāka.
3. Rājā Hastin's inscription dated 173 Gupta, the year of the 12-year cycle being Mahāsvayuja.
4. Rājā Hastin's inscription dated 191 Gupta, the year of the 12-year cycle being Mahāchaitra.
5. Rājā Saṁkshobha's inscription dated 209 Gupta, the year of the 12-year cycle being Mahāsvayuja.
6. An eclipse of the sun mentioned in the Morvi copper-plate grant dated 5th Phālguna Sudi 585 of the Gupta era.

Before applying these tests to the initial date given by Albiruni, it must be premised that according to the Arabic author the Gupta era was 241 years posterior to the Śaka. To convert a Śaka date into a Valabhî date, or which is the same thing, into a Gupta date, he tells us to deduct from it the cube of 6 and the square of 5, that is, 241. And proceeding to give actual instances, he says 953 Śaka corresponds to 712 Valabhî or Gupta. We have thus to add 241 to a Gupta date to arrive at the corresponding Śaka date. Again, as I shall show in Appendix B, in inscriptions the numerical date indicates, in a large number of instances, the number of years of an era that have elapsed, that is, the past year and in about a third of the instances, the current year. The year of the cycle, however, whenever it occurs, is as a rule the current year, though in rare cases that also is the past year. If, therefore, a past Gupta year is to be converted into the current Śaka year, we shall have to add 242 to the former ; while if both are current or both past, the difference between them is only 241.

Now, as to the first of the above tests, Gupta 165 + 241 = 406 S'aka. If Albiruni is correct, the 12th Āshādha Sudi of this year should be a Thursday. I asked my friend Professor Keru Lakshman Chhatre to make the calculation for me, and he tells me that it was a Thursday. Since our astronomical methods are based on the past S'aka year, and even our present S'aka year 1805 really represents, as I shall show in the next Appendix, the years that have elapsed, the current year being really 1806, Gupta 165 was a past year, as well as S'aka 406. Hence only 241 has to be added. S'aka 406 corresponds to 484 A.D. General Cunningham takes the Gupta 165 to correspond to 483 A.D., adding $240 + 78 = 318$ to it, and of course arrives at the result that "the 12th day of Āshādha Sudi was a Friday instead of a Thursday." If, however, he had added $241 + 78 = 319$ and taken 484 A.D. to correspond to Gupta 165, he would have arrived at the correct result.

Then as to the dates in years of the 12-year cycle, General Cunningham himself has placed before us the means of verifying them. In the tables published by him in Volume X. of the Archæological Reports, the cyclic year corresponding to the current Christian year is given, and if we subtract 78 from the number representing the year, we shall arrive at the current Saka year. Now, if we take the Gupta figured dates to represent the years that had elapsed before the cyclic year commenced, (and this way of marking the dates is, as remarked above, the one we usually find), then 173 Gupta, the third date in the above, corresponds to 414 S'aka past and 415 current, 241 being added in the first case, and 242 in the second. If we add 78 to 415 we shall get the current Christian year, which is 493. Now in General Cunningham's tables we do find the year Mahāśvayuja given as corresponding to 493 A.D. In the same way, 191 Gupta past + 242 = 433 S'aka current, + 78 = 511 A.D. current. In the tables we find 511 put down under Mahāchaitra. Similarly 209 Gupta past + 242 = 451 S'aka current, + 78 = 529 A.D. current which was Mahāśvayuja.

Now, as to the first of the dates in the 12-year cycle, 156 Gupta + 242 + 78 is equal to 476 A.D., which however is Mahāchaitra instead of Mahāvaiśākha. Here there is a discrepancy of one year ; but such discrepancies do sometimes occur even in Śaka dates and the years of the 60-years' cycle given along with them, and some of them will be noticed in the note forming the next Appendix. They are probably due to the fact that the frequent use of the past or expired year and also of the current year led sometimes the past year to be mistaken for the current year, just as we now mistake the year 1805 S'aka for the current year, though it really is the completed or past year. Thus the completed year 157 must, in the case before us, have come to be mistaken by the writer of the inscription for the current year, and he thought 156 to be the past year and thus gave that instead of 157. Now $157 \text{ Gupta} + 242 + 78 = 477 \text{ A.D.}$, which is Mahāvaiśākha, according to the tables.*

* Though by using General Cunningham's table, I arrive at the desired result in three cases, still I now find that his current Christian year is derived by adding 78 to the past S'aka, while I have added 79 ; i.e., the cyclic year given in the dates is true not of the Gupta year in the date as a past year but of the Gupta year + 1 as a past year. And the third date 173 Gupta is a correction of General Cunningham's, the actual date in the inscription being 163. I have, however, allowed the paragraphs to remain, as I am by no means quite satisfied that the question of these cyclic dates is settled beyond dispute (1894).

The eclipse mentioned in the Morvī plate occurred, according to my friend Professor Keru Lakshman, on the 30th of Vaisākha, Śaka 827. The Gupta year given in the plate is 585. If 827 is in the astronomical calculation the current year, it must correspond to 585 Gupta past; for $585 + 242 = 827$. It is by no means necessary to suppose that the eclipse occurred on the new-moon day immediately previous to the 5th of Phālguna Sudi mentioned in the grant. For it is perfectly possible that the actual religious ceremony with reference to the grant was made in Vaisākha and the deed executed in Phālguna.*

I have thus shown that Albiruni's initial date for the Gupta era stands all these tests. It may even be said that it stands them better than 167 A.D. and 190 A.D. proposed by General Cunningham and Sir E. Olive Bayley respectively. But I am loath to decide such questions simply on astronomical grounds; for there are several very confusing elements involved, and a modern astronomer cannot know them all and make allowance for them.

It now remains to notice the last point relied on by the opponents of Albiruni. The date on a copper-plate grant by the last Ś'ilāditya of Valabhī hitherto known is 447. This Ś'ilāditya is also styled Dhruvabhāta in the grant and has been identified with the Tu-lu-va-po-tou or Dhruvabhāta of Hwan Thsang who visited Valabhī in 640 A.D. The date 447 is understood as referring to the Gupta era, and, 319 being added it, corresponds to 766 A.D. It has therefore been argued that an earlier initial date must be assigned to the Gupta era so as to bring this Ś'ilāditya or Dhruvabhāta nearer to the date of Hwan Thsang's visit. But the identification of the last Ś'ilāditya with Hwan Thsang's Dhruvabhāta cannot stand. In the Si-yu-ki the Chinese writer does not speak of a king but of kings, and says they were nephews of Ś'ilāditya of Mālvā and the younger of them named Dhruvabhāta was son-in-law to the son of Harshavardhana. If they were nephews of the king of Mālvā they were brothers and both of them kings. Now, the predecessor of the last Ś'ilāditya of Valabhī was his father, and among the kings of Valabhī we do not find brothers reigning in succession at this period. There were two brothers who occupied the throne before this period, one of them being named Dharasena and the other Dhruvasena. They were the sons of Kharagraha, and the younger of them was the father and predecessor of Dharasena IV. This younger brother or Dhruvasena must have been Hwan Thsang's Dhruvabhāta. Nothing important is involved in the suffix Bhāta. It was a mere title or honorific termination as Pant and Rāv are among us the Marāṭhās. Sena, Simha, and Bhāta were the Valabhī honorific endings and they could be used promiscuously. The king spoken of in the plates as Dhruvasena may have been called Dhruvabhāta by ordinary people, from whom Hwan Thsang must have got the name. Now, a copper-plate grant of Dhruvasena bears the date 310, and the earliest date of his successor Dharasena IV. is 326. The first corresponds to 629 A.D. ($310 + 241 + 78 = 629$), and the second to 645 ($326 + 241 + 78 = 645$). It is quite possible, therefore, that Dhruvasena was on the throne in 640 A.D. at the time when Hwan Thsang visited Valabhī.

* There was an eclipse also in Ś'aka 826 on the new-moon day of Kārttika; so that Gupta 585 past + 241 = 826 Śaka. This is evidently the eclipse mentioned in the grant and not that mentioned in the text. On the whole question see my paper on the epoch of the Gupta era, Jour. B. B. R. A. S., Vol. XVII, p. 80.

Appendix A.

The initial date mentioned by Albiruni is thus consistent with everything with which it has been thought to be not consistent. I have shown that the statement of the Arabic writer is in itself entitled to our confidence, being based, as it must have been, on contemporary evidence, as his statements about the S'aka and Vikrama eras were. I will now show that the date mentioned by him is alone consistent with the information we possess as regards the relations of the several dynasties that ruled over Gujarāt and Kāthiāwād in the early centuries of the Christian era, and the dates proposed by General Cunningham and Sir E. Clive Bayley are not. We know that the Guptas succeeded the Satraps, and the Valabhīs were at first dependents of the Guptas and afterwards attained independence. Chandragupta II. must have been the Gupta prince who overthrew the Satraps, since he is the first prince of that dynasty whose silver coins are a close imitation of those of the Satraps. The latest date of that monarch is 93. This corresponds to 260 A.D. and 283 A.D. on the supposition that the Gupta era took its start in 167 A.D. and 190 A.D. respectively. Now, the latest date of the Satrap dynasty is 304. If the era to which it refers is the S'aka, it corresponds to 382 A.D., that is, we shall have to suppose one of the princes of the dynasty to have reigned about a hundred years after the dynasty had been put an end to by Chandragupta II. The S'aka era will therefore not do. Supposing the Satrap dates refer to the Vikrama era, 304 corresponds to 248 A.D., which of course is consistent with Chandragupta's date 260 A.D. or 283 A.D. If then the Satrap dates refer to the era of Vikrama, Rudradāman's 72 must correspond to 16 A.D. Rudradāman's grandfather Chashtāna will have to be placed about B.C. 4. But Ptolemy, writing after 150 A.D., tells us that Ujjayinī was ruled over about the time when he wrote by Tiastenes, who has been very reasonably identified with Chashtāna. Ptolemy's information cannot certainly be 150 years old. It has, however, been argued that Ptolemy does not state that Tiastenes reigned about the time when he lived, and that he and Siro Polemios were contemporaries. For, he gives the information in the form of two short notes, "Ozone, the royal residence of Tiastenes," and "Baithana, the royal residence of Siro Polemios." Such notes it is possible that one should write even if the princes reigned several hundred years before him, as a modern geographer may mention Berlin as "the capital of Frederick the Great," or Ghizni as "the capital of Mahmud." As to this I have to observe that the analogy does not hold good. A modern geographer and his readers are very well acquainted with past history, while neither Ptolemy nor those for whom he wrote could have known the past history of India. A modern geographer knows which of the princes that ruled over a certain country in past times was the ablest or most powerful, and selects him out of a number and mentions his name in connection with a certain place. It is extremely improbable or almost impossible that Ptolemy should have known many Indian princes who reigned before he lived, along with their achievements, and should have chosen the ablest of them for being mentioned. And, as a matter of fact, we know that one at least of the rulers mentioned by him could be a person of no importance. For Baleocuros who according to him held power in Hippocura was, as we have seen, but a Viceroy or dependent of Pulumāyi and Gotamīputra Yajña Śrī, since as Viḷivāyakura his name occurs along with those of the two princes on the Kolhāpur coins. Again, Ptolemy must have derived his information from merchants carrying on trade with India and these from the natives of the country. And we know that natives of India care very little for past history and soon forget their kings. Hence the information derived by the merchants cannot have reference to princes who reigned long before the time of Ptolemy. It is possible that Indians may remember a celebrated prince for a century or two. But, as stated above, one of the rulers mentioned by Ptolemy was but a dependent sovereign and could not have been a man of note. The only other supposition that our opponents may resort to, is that Ptolemy's statements were based on those of previous geographers whose contemporaries the princes mentioned by him were. No ground whatever has however been adduced in support of such a supposition. In the Periplus which was written before Ptolemy, Paithana and Ozene are mentioned, but Ptolemy and Tiastenes are not. On the contrary, the author of that work says that Ozene was "formerly the capital wherein the king resided." If Tiastenes lived before him, and Ptolemy's mention of the former was due to his having been a prince of note like Frederick the Great and Mahmud of Ghizni in modern times, we should expect the author of the Periplus to have noticed him, especially when he does allude to the kings of Ozene. Tiastenes, Ptolemy and Baleocuros must thus have reigned about the time of Ptolemy. The last two were, we know, contemporaries, and so also must the third have been.

In this manner the Vikrama era will not do for the Satrap dates. Besides, no trace whatever has hitherto been discovered of the use of that era in the early centuries of Christ. Since, then, the use of no other era at the time has been well authenticated, the Satraps must be supposed to have employed the S'aka era. The circumstances of the country at that period render, as I have shown, the establishment of this era by the S'akas who ruled over the country in every way probable. The latest Satrap date will thus correspond to 382 A.D., and Chandragupta, the conqueror of the Satraps, can be rendered posterior to this only by taking 242 S'aka current or 319-320 A.D. as the first current year of the Gupta era; for his 93 past will then correspond to 412-413 A.D. And in this way Rudradâman's 72 will correspond to 150 A.D.; and Chashtana's date will be about 130 A.D., i.e. anterior to the date of Ptolemy's geography by about 25 years.

Thus, then, the evidence in favour of Albiruni's initial date for the Gupta era appears to me to be simply overwhelming.

HISTORY OF

APPENDIX B.

Note on the S'aka dates and the years of the Bārhaspatya cycle, occurring in the Inscriptions.

Appendix B.

THERE are certain difficulties with reference to the S'aka dates and the cyclic years or Samvatsaras occurring in the inscriptions which require to be cleared up. The current S'aka year (A.D. 1883-84) in the Bombay Presidency is 1805, and the year of the sixty years' cycle, Subhānu. In the southern provinces and the Madras Presidency the current S'aka year is 1806, the cyclic year being the same. The first question, then, is, "Do the dates in the inscriptions conform to the Bombay reckoning or the Madras reckoning?" and the next, "What is the cause of this difference of a year?"* We have also to consider whether the S'aka dates in the inscriptions represent the number of years that have expired before the event recorded in them or the current year in which the event took place.

Mr. Robert Sewell of the Madras Civil Service gives in the first column of the Chronological Tables compiled by him the number of the S'aka years that have expired before the beginning of the cyclic year set against it in the same line in the third column. The current S'aka year corresponding to that cyclic year is the one given in the next line in the first column. Thus against S'aka 855, the date of the Sāngali grant of Govind IV. of the Rāshtrakūta dynasty, we have in the third column the cyclic year Vijaya which shows that 855 years of the S'aka era had expired before the Vijaya year began, while the current S'aka year corresponding to Vijaya was that given in the next line, viz. 856. Mr. Sewell follows the Madras reckoning. If we interpret the tables according to the Bombay mode, the S'aka year appearing in the first column will be the current year corresponding to the cyclic year in the same line in the third column, while the number in the line immediately above will represent the years that have expired before the beginning of that cyclic year. Thus against 1805, the current S'aka year on this side of the country, we have in the third column the current cyclic year Subhānu, while 1804 in the line above shows the number of years that have expired. By comparing the S'aka dates and cyclic years occurring in the inscriptions with those in the tables we shall be able to determine the points raised above.

In the analysis of Pāli, Sanskrit, and old Kānarese inscriptions published by Dr. Fleet and Dr. Burgess there are 97 cases in which the S'aka date as well as the cyclic year are distinctly given. On comparing these with the tables I observe that in 58 out of these the given S'aka date occurs in the same line with the cyclic year mentioned in the inscription. These are :—

* It will be obvious to any careful reader that the manner in which the question here proposed for solution is stated, is based upon the ordinary view that S'aka 1805 was the current year in 1883-84. I have no right to assume in the beginning of my inquiry that the ordinary view is mistaken, and it would be unscientific to do so. But having stated the question in that manner, I come at the end of my inquiry to the conclusion that the ordinary view is incorrect, and that 1805 S'aka was not current in 1883-84 A.D. but past, and that the Madras way of understanding the matter alone is correct. In the previous note also I have stated that "we now mistake the year 1805 S'aka for the current year" (in 1883-84); so that there is no possibility whatever of anybody misunderstanding my meaning.

Nos. 18, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 35, 36, 37, 38, 52, 70, 87, 88, 90, 92, 98, 99, 101, 102, 109, 114, 123, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 131, 134, 136, 141, 148, 149, 150, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 183, 189, 201, 214, 215, 219, 229, 230 (first part), 240, 241, 243, 283, 286.

Thus in inscription No. 20, the date given is 1200, and the cyclic year the Bahudhanya, both of which occur in the same line set against each other in the tables.

In 28 cases the S'aka date given in the inscription occurs in the tables in the line below that in which the given cyclic year occurs. These are :—

Nos. 19, 22, 26, 33, 34, 47, 72, 89, 91, 95, 96 (first part), 96 (second part), 100, 110, 111, 112, 118 (first part), 118 (second part), 146, 151, 194, 227, 230 (second part), 231, 234, 236, 237, 281.

In No. 19, for instance, the S'aka date is 1184 and the cyclic year Durmati. In the tables, Durmati occurs in the upper line set against 1183, and 1184 is in the line below, and Dundubhi is the year marked against it.

Now on the supposition that the inscriptions conform to the Madras reckoning, in the first 58 cases the S'aka date represents the number of S'aka years that had expired before the current cyclic year of the inscription and in 28 it shows the current year of that era. If we suppose the Bombay reckoning to have been in use, the dates in the first 58 cases will represent the current year and those in the next 28, the future year and not the past. But since it is almost absurd to suppose that the immediately next year should be stated in the inscriptions, it follows that the Madras mode of reckoning was the one in use. The objection, however, may be obviated by supposing that these 28 cases conform to the Madras reckoning and give the current year, while the first 58 follow the Bombay mode. But this supposition is not reasonable or probable, since these groups are not confined to particular provinces, and often one of the former exists in the same district or even place with one of the latter. We thus see that though in the majority of cases the inscriptions give the past S'aka year, there is a large number in which the current year is given and not the past.

Out of these 24 dates, eight give the current year and the rest the years that had expired, the proportion being the same as in the other case, viz. 1 to 2. In all cases in which the cyclic year is given it is possible to determine whether the date represents the current or past year, but not in others. The inscriptions of the early Chālūkyas do not give it, and hence the exact date remains doubtful.

Now the Bombay mode of reckoning, which is one year behind that prevalent in Madras, is, I believe, due to a mistake. We have seen it was more usual in recording a date to mark the years that had expired than the current year. A word expressive of that sense such as gateshu, "having elapsed," was used after the number, and another such as pravartamāne, "being current," was used in connection with the name of the cyclic year. These words were, for brevity's sake, afterwards dropped; and in the course of time the sense, to express which they were used, was also forgotten, and the number came to be regarded as denoting the current year. So that what we do on this side of the country is that we use the past or expired year without knowing that it is the past year. And there are in the inscriptions instances of mistakes due to the circumstance that the real past year came to be regarded as the current year. Thus in No. 86 of the Pāli, Sanskrit, and old Kānārese inscriptions, S'aka 911 is given along with the cyclic year Vikṛiti. Now, according to the tables, the number of years that had expired before Vikṛiti was 912 and the current year was 913. This discrepancy is to be explained by the supposition that S'aka 912 which represented the years that had expired came to be thought of as the current year, just as we, on this side of the country, consider 1805 as the current year now, though it indicates the past year, and the writer of the inscription wishing to give the years that had expired before his current year, put them as 911. The same is the case with Nos. 27, 67, 115, 130, 224, and 284, the S'aka dates in which are 1444, 1084, 1430, 1453, 1114, and 1128, respectively, and are two years behind the current year as determined by the cyclic years given along with them. In some cases the S'aka dates are in advance of the Saṃvatsara or cyclic year by one year. Thus in the Vanī-Dindori grant of Govinda III. the S'aka date is 730 and the Saṃvatsara Vyaya, and in the Kānheri inscription of Amoghavarsha we have S'aka 775 and the Prajāpati Saṃ- vatsara. Now the S'aka years immediately preceding Vyaya and Prajâpati were 728 and 773, while the current years were 729 and 774 respectively. This difference might be accounted for on the supposition that the current years 729 and 774 were from the usual custom understood to be past years and the writers of the documents desirous of giving the current years added 1 and put them down as 730 and 775. The date in No. 79 of Pâli, Sanskrit, and old Kânarese inscriptions is three years behind the current Samvatsara, and that in No. 228, four years ; No. 221 has 1113 for 1121 ; and No. 246, 1492 for 1485. These must be considered to be mistakes.

The S'aka dates given in the preceding pages represent in most cases the years that had expired before the particular occurrences mentioned. Thus "in 855" means after 855 years of the S'aka era had expired.

१ This महा is omitted in the MSS. since it is followed by another महा, and the copyists mistook the one for the other. The compound is to be dissolved as जगतो जित्वरं जगज्जित्वरम् । जगज्जित्वरं महो यस्य स जगज्जित्वरमहाः. २ चूल for तूल D 2. ३ मदमन्दसत्त्वः which is also the reading of D. 2, as an epithet of Mahādeva, involves censure instead of praise. The correct form of the word is, probably, मदमन्दसत्त्वात्, in which case it would be an epithet of Bhojadeva. 4 After this follow stanzas 14 and 19 of the next Prasāsti in D 2.

INTRODUCTORY.

No authentic work of a definite historical character, written by the ancient inhabitants of Western India, has ever yet come to light. But, in the inscriptions on copper-plates and stone-tablets, on monumental stones, the pedestals of idols, the walls and pillars of temples, and rocks, there have come down to us, particularly in the Kanarese country, a large number of original historical records of the most important kind. And in these records, which, chiefly engraved for the purpose of registering some grant to a priest, temple, or religious community, or of commemorating the death of some hero in battle, usually name the reigning king, with more or less information about his ancestors and predecessors, and are generally dated in his regnal year or in one or other of the Hindú eras, there exist abundant materials for compiling a detailed and connected history of the greater part of the Bombay Presidency and of the neighbouring territories of Madras, Mysore, and Haidarâbâd, from about the middle of the sixth to the end of the sixteenth century A. D., and, at the same time, for illustrating the development of the modern forms of the alphabets, and, in the Kanarese country, of the vernacular language.¹

¹ In defining the limits of the Kanarese language, Sir Walter Elliot said (Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. IV. p. 3; and Madras Jour. of Lit. and Science, Vol. VII. p. 195) that "the boundary of the Kanarese tongue on the west and north may be designated "by a line drawn from Sadâshivagad" (Kârwar), "on the Malabâr coast, to the westward "of Dhârwar, Belgaum, and Hukkêri, through Kâgal and Kurundwâd, passing between "'Keligaon' and 'Pandegaon,' through Brahmapuri on the Bhîma, and Shôlâpur, "and thence east, to the neighbourhood of Bidar." This, however, wrongly excludes Kôlhapur.—Bidar, in the Nizâm's Dominions, is about fifty miles east of Kalyâni, and about sixty miles to the north by east of Mâlkhed. As regards Shôlâpur, which now counts officially as a Marâthi district, Kanarese is still, to a great extent, the vernacular in the south-east corner of it. And there are Kanarese inscriptions of the Western Châlukya, Kâlachurya, and Dêvagiri-Yâdava kings, of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and some later ones, at Shôlâpur itself, and at Kûdal and Môhâl in that district, and at Karajgi, Kûdal, and Tadwâl in the Akalkôt State.—In official language, three out of the four recognised Kanarese districts of this Presidency, viz. the Belgaum, Bijâpur, and Dhârwar Collectories are, together with the Kôlhapur, Miraj, and other Native States, always called the "Southern Marâthâ Country." A more misleading appellation, however it originated, could not well have been devised. It is true that, in one of the earliest inscriptions, of Pulikésin II., this part of the country is included in what was known then, and even many centuries before his time, as Mahârâshtra. But this term, meaning literally "the great country," does not inherently imply any of the racial and linguistic peculiarities which are now naturally attached to the terms Marâthâ and Marâthi, derived from it. In the whole area of the so-called Southern Marâthâ Country, not a single Marâthi inscription has been discovered, of a greater age than two or three centuries. With the exception that two Prâkrit records have been obtained at Banavâsi in North Kanara and 'Malavali' in Mysore, and that a few Prâkrit words occur here and there in other records, the inscriptions are all either in pure Sanskrit or pure Kanarese, or in the two languages combined. This fact speaks of itself, as to what the vernacular of the country was in early times. In the present-day, the people and the language of the British districts are essentially Kanarese; and the Kanarese people and language have been displaced, to a certain extent, by the Marâthi people and language in the Native States, only because those States were established by the aggressions of Marâthâs from

and the decay of old and the growth of new forms of religion, the origin of many of the different land-tenures and territorial divisions that now exist, and many other subjects of political, historical, and antiquarian interest and importance. The title which I have given to my book may, indeed, seem rather to limit the results of the researches into these records to the southernmost parts of the Presidency. But I am not prepared to deal now with the history of Kâthiâwâd and northern Gujarât. For the rest of the Presidency, the dynasties which possessed it, one after the other, all had their chief seats of government in, or close to the borders of, the Kanarese country, and were identified specially with the Kanarese provinces as the most important parts of their dominions. And the title that I have selected will serve the purpose as well as any other, until we come hereafter to deal with the ancient history of India on a more comprehensive plan than has ever yet been aimed at.

The first systematic collection of copies of these inscriptions was made by Sir Walter Elliot, K.C.S.I., who, when in the Madras Civil Service, was employed for a long time in the Kanarese districts. Besides a large number of facsimile impressions of copper-plate grants, he compiled manuscript copies of no less than five hundred and ninety-five stone-tablet inscriptions from the Kanarese country alone and in the Sanskrit and Kanarese languages, in addition to a large number of others from the Telugu country and in the Telugu language. The results of his labours were published in his paper on Hindu Inscriptions, which appeared first in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, First Series, Vol. IV. p. 1 ff., and was afterwards reprinted, with corrections and additions, in the Madras Journal of Literature and Science, Vol. VII. p. 193 ff. One copy of his collection of inscriptions from the Kanarese country, in two volumes entitled Carnâtaaka-Dêsa Inscriptions, was presented to the library of the Edinburgh University; and another copy of it was given to the Royal Asiatic Society, London.¹ And his collection of original copper-plate charters was presented, on his death, to the British Museum. The voluminous contents of the manuscript compilations made by him have as yet only very partially been made public.

In 1865, the Mysore Government published a photographic collection of one hundred and fifty inscriptions on stone-tablets and copper-plates at Chitaldurg, Balagânve, Harihar, and other places in Mysore, from negatives taken by Major Dixon, H. M.'s 22nd Regiment, M. N. I. And, in 1866, Sir Theodore Hope, K.C.S.I., then in the Bombay Civil Service, edited for, and at the cost of, the Committee of Architectural Antiquities of Western India, under the title of Inscriptions in Dharwar and Mysore, a series of sixty-four photographic the north, whose local influence proved to be greater than that of the native rulers whom they dispossessed. Even in those Native States, and in Marâthi official correspondence, the Political Agent at Kôlhâpur is, to the present day, always addressed as the Political Agent, not of the "Dakshina-Mahârâshtra" or "Southern Marâthâ Country," but of the "Karavira Ilâkhâ and the Karnâtaaka Prânt."

¹ My references are to the copy belonging to the library of the Edinburgh University. But probably the paging will be found to be the same in the copy that is in the Royal Asiatic Society's library.—I believe that there were also two other copies of this collection; but, what became of them, I do not know.

copies of inscriptions in the Belgaum, Dhârwâr, Bijâpur, and North Kanara Districts of the Bombay Presidency, and in the neighbouring parts of the Madras Presidency and Mysore, from negatives taken by Dr. Pigou, Bo. M. S., and Col. Biggs, R.A.;¹ and a few other inscriptions, from negatives taken by the same gentlemen, were inserted by him in another work, entitled Architecture in Dharwar and Mysore, edited by him at the same time. These collections being out of print and difficult to obtain, and the negatives being available at the India Office, the contents of them were re-arranged by myself and compiled, with additions, into one volume, which was published by the India Office in 1878, under the title of Pâli, Sanskrit, and Old-Canarese Inscriptions, from the Bombay Presidency and parts of the Madras Presidency and Mysore.² And, in 1879, Mr. Rice, C.I.E., published, under the title of Mysore Inscriptions, translations of all the inscriptions included in Major Dixon's collection, and of some others collected by himself.

Meanwhile, a few detached inscriptions had been published by Sir Walter Elliot, in the Madras Journal of Literature and Science,—by Mr. Wathen and Professor Dowson, in the early volumes of the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society,—by Bal Gangadhar Shastri and General Sir George LeGrand Jacob, in the early volumes of the Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society,—and by Dr. Taylor, in the Transactions of the Literary Society of Bombay.³

These publications, however, were desultory, and few and far between; and it was not till the Indian Antiquary was started by Dr. Burgess, C.I.E., in 1872, that any real impetus was given to the study of the epigraphy of Western India. His journal gradually attracted many competent writers, interested in the whole range of Indian epigraphy. And it undoubtedly also did much towards arousing the official interest which is so necessary for the successful prosecution of antiquarian researches in such a country as India, where official action must do what would elsewhere be accomplished by private enterprise, and which, previously wanting, soon afterwards began to be displayed.

In January, 1883, through the influence, at Simla, of General Sir Alexander Cunningham, K.C.I.E., and Mr. Gibbs, C.S.I., I was appointed to the specially created post of Epigraphist to the Government of India, with the primary duty of preparing the volume that was to contain the inscriptions of the Early Gupta kings. I held that appointment up to June, 1886, when it was abolished. And the book in question, entitled Gupta Inscriptions, and numbered as Volume III.

in the Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum, was finished in 1888. My work was fortunately rendered complete and successful by two things. In consequence of information given by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, Mandasôr was visited,— first in March, 1884; and there my copyists then discovered the all-important inscription which supplied what had always been felt to be a most urgent desideratum, viz. a date, for any one of the Early Gupta kings, recorded in a standard era, capable of identification, other than the era that was habitually used by the Early Guptas themselves. It furnished the date of the Mâlava year, i.e. the Vikrama year, 493 expired, corresponding to A. D. 436-37 current, for Kumâragupta I.; and thus, with also a revised translation, given to me by Professor Wright, of a well-known passage in Albêrûnî's writings, I was enabled to prove, for the first time, what had often been asserted but had never been proved before,— viz. that the Early Gupta kings rose to power in the fourth century A. D., and that the dates of their records run, not from A. D. 77-78, 166-67, or 190-91, but from A. D. 319-20, or very closely thereabouts. And, at the end of 1886, Mr. Shankar Balkrishna Dikshit came to the front,— shewed how, with the use of certain Hindû Tables, Hindû dates may be converted into their exact English equivalents,¹ — and made the necessary calculations, some of them extremely laborious, for the Early Gupta dates, as the result of which, the given unqualified years being applied as current years, the exact epoch, or year 0, of the Gupta era is shewn to be A. D. 319-20, and the first current year, A. D. 320-21.²

During my tenure of the above-mentioned appointment, and for a year or so before it, I had from the Bombay Government an annual grant for the collection of impressions of inscriptions in the Bombay Presidency. Two hundred and twenty-villages, in the Belgaum and Dhârwar Districts and in the Native States of the Southern Marâthâ Country, were visited by the men employed by me. Impressions were made of nearly a thousand inscriptions. And the impressions have now been deposited in the office of Mr. Cousens, Superintendent of the Bombay Archaeological Survey, where they are available to anyone who will take them in hand for publication or study.

¹ See his paper entitled "a Method of calculating the Week-days of Hindû Tithis and the corresponding English Dates," Ind. Ant. Vol. XVI. p. 113 ff., and Gupta Inscriptions, Appendix III.; and, for certain corrected data, his note entitled "a Table for the Abdapa, Tithi-Suddhi, and Tithi-Kendra," Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 268 ff.— Another interesting paper by him is that on "the Twelve-Year Cycle of Jupiter," Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. pp. 1 ff., 312 ff., and Gupta Inscriptions, Appendix III.— On the line of study thus started, further light has now been thrown, by Professor Jacobi, in his papers entitled "Methods and Tables for verifying Hindû Dates, Tithis, Eclipses, Nakshatras, &c.," Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 145 ff., "the Computation of Hindû Dates in Inscriptions, &c.," Epigraphia Indica, Vol. I. p. 403 ff., and "Tables for calculating Hindû Dates in True Local Time," id. Vol. II. p. 487 ff.; by Professor Kielhorn, in his papers on "the Sixty-Year Cycle of Jupiter," Ind. Ant. Vol. XVIII. pp. 193 ff., 380 ff.; and by Dr. Schram, through the production of an English version of his "Tables for the Approximate Conversion of Hindû Dates," Ind. Ant. Vol. XVIII. p. 290 ff.

In November, 1886, Dr. Hultzsch was appointed Epigraphist to the Government of Madras. This post he still holds. And he has already issued one volume, and the first two parts of another, of South-Indian Inscriptions, which furnish a great deal of new and valuable information about the Pallavas, the Eastern Chalukya kings, and their Chôla contemporaries, with incidental references to the history of Western India.

And, at some time in 1888 or 1889, Dr. Burgess, while, in succession to General Sir Alexander Cunningham, he still held the post of Director-General of the Archaeological Survey of India, started, for the Government of India, an official journal entitled Epigraphia Indica, intended specially for the publication of inscriptions. Of this work, Vols. I. and II. have been issued by Dr. Burgess. And subsequent issues are being brought out by Dr. Hultzsch, in connection with the Indian Antiquary, which, conducted by Dr. Burgess to the end of Vol. XIII., was continued through Vols. XIV. to XX. by myself and Major Temple, C.I.E., and is still going on under Major Temple's management.

The publications noted above, the later volumes of the Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, Dr. Burgess' Archæological Reports of Western India, two more books by Mr. Rice entitled Inscriptions at Sravana-Belgola and Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., and the materials collected in the Bombay Presidency, have now made available a great deal of additional information, which it has been my aim to utilise. The constant pressure of official duties has prevented my including all the details that could be supplied from the unpublished materials now on hand. As far as is practicable, however, I have worked them in. And I am able to put forth this second version, of a work which was first issued thirteen years ago under much less favourable conditions and has now been rewritten practically throughout, with the satisfactory knowledge that it contains many substantial improvements, and will add very largely to our knowledge of the ancient history of that part of the country with which it deals.

CHAPTER I.

THE EARLY DYNASTIES.

Chapter I.

The Early Dynasties.

The earliest epigraphic records that bear in any way upon Southern India, are the inscriptions, belonging to the first half of the third century B. C., of the great Buddhist king Asôka, the grandson of the Maurya king Chandragupta of Pâtaliputra who was known to the Greek historians as Sandrocottos. Asôka's dominions proper seem not to have extended south of the Narmadâ (vulgo Nerbudda). But, in all directions, he exercised an active suzerainty over provinces which lay on the borders of his kingdom. And, among the tribes mentioned in this connection, we find,¹ in the south, the Pêtênikas or inhabitants of Pratissthâna, which is the modern Paithân, on the Gôdâvarî, in the Nizâm's Dominions; the Bhôjas, nearer to the Narmadâ, or towards the coast of the Konkan; the Ristikas or Râstikas, who are supposed by some to be the Mahârâshtris or Marâthâs of the Dekkan; and the Andhras, who were the inhabitants of a tract of country which embraced the region towards the east coast lying between the rivers Krishna and Gôdâvarî, and part of which, under the name of the land of Veîngî, came, in the early part of the seventh century A. D., into the hands of the eastern branch of the Chalukya dynasty. Among Asôka's independent neighbours there are mentioned,² for Southern India, two kings named Satiyaputa and Kêralaputa, probably towards the west coast,—the Pândyas, whose country was the triangle at the south of the peninsula, including the present Madura and Tinnevely Districts of the Madras Presidency, and perhaps the Travancore State,—and the Chôðas, i. e. Chôlas, whose territory lay on the east coast, from the northern boundary of the Pândya kingdom up to the river Pâlâru.

It is probably to the first or second century of the Christian era, that we must refer the earliest two inscriptions that have as yet been found in the country with which we are dealing; viz., one in a Prâkrit dialect, engraved on the two edges of a large slate slab, on which there is sculptured a five-hooded cobra, in the court of the great temple at Banavâsi in North Kanara,³ and one, partly in Prâkrit and partly in Sanskrit, on a pillar at 'Malavalli' in the Shikârpur tâluka, Mysore.⁴ They are of the time of a king named Hâritiputra-Sâtakarṇi,⁵ of the

⁵ The second part of this appellation is a dynastic name. The first part is a personal name, a metronymic, meaning literally 'the son of a woman belonging to the family of the Hâritas'; and it is analogous to the Gôtamiputra or Gautamiputra, and the Vâsishṭhi-

The Early Dynasties.

Vijñhukadaḍuṭu or Viñhupaduchuṭu family, in respect of whom the 'Malavalli' record further tells us that he belonged to the Mānavya gōtra or clan,¹ and probably also that he was one of the kings of Vajjantī, i.e. of Banawāsi.² The Banawāsi record is dated in the twelfth putra, of the Andhrabhṛitya kings, and (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XXI, p. 227) to the Vātsīputra, Gaupīputra, and Cārgīputra of one of the Bharaut inscriptions. The same metronymic, or a closely similar one, appears also in an early inscription in the Rīwā or Rēwā State in Central India, which records the construction of a cave by Hāritiputra, or Hāritiputra-Saunaka (Ind. Ant. Vol. IX, p. 121). And the early Kadambas also, and the Chalukyas, are represented as Hāritiputras.—As regards the word Hārita, if it is the name of a Brāhmaṇical gōtra or clan to which a royal family was affiliated (see the next note), that gōtra must be a later offshoot from the original Hārita gōtra of Professor Max Müller's list (Sanskrit Literature, p. 383). But there was also a royal family of Aṅgīrasa-Hāritas, who were descended from Ikshvāku, son of Manu, son of the Sun (see Wilson's Translation of the Vishnu-Purāṇa, Hall's edition, Vol. III, pp. 230, 231, 259, 280, and Muir's Original Sanskrit Texts, Vol. I, p. 225).

² Banawāsi, in lat. 14° 33', long. 75° 5' (Indian Atlas, sheet No. 42, where it is entered as 'Bannawassi'), is a place of very considerable antiquity. It is the Vanivāsi to which, as recorded in the Mahāvamsa, the Buddhist teacher Rakshita was deputed, in the third century B. C., shortly after the great council held at Pāṭali-putra in the eighteenth year of Aśoka (Ind. Ant. Vol. III, p. 273). And it was also mentioned, in the second century A. D., by the geographer Ptolemy, in whose map of India (id. Vol. XIII, p. 329), under the name of Banawāsi, it is entered (quite wrongly) to the east by south from Barygaza, i. e. Broach in Gujarāt. In inscriptions, the earliest mention of it, under the name of Vanavāsi, is in the Aihole inscription of A. D. 634-35 (id. Vol. VIII, p. 244). In later records, the name is usually written as Banavāsi in Sanskrit passages, and as Banavase and Banavāse in Kanarese passages; the latter two forms being specially used, and generally so, when mention is made of the province, which was held to consist of twelve thousand cities, towns, and villages. The form Vanavāsa also occurs (e. g., P. S. and O.-C. Insers. No. 178, l. 33, and Vikramādīkādēvacharita, v. 23, and xiv. 4). Mr. Kittel has expressed the opinion that the etymology is bana, = vana, 'a forest, a wood,' + the Kanarese basi or base, 'a spring,' and that Vanavāsi is only a Sanskritised form (Nāgavarma's Kanarese Prosōdy, Introd. p. xxxi. note 2). But the occurrence of the form Banavāse, with the long ā in the penultimate syllable, seems to be opposed to this, and to point to the Sanskrit vanavāsa, 'the residence or settlement in the forest,' being the original name. And there are traditions to the effect that the province of Vanavāsi is the part of the country in which the Pāṇḍavas spent the twelve years of their banishment to the forests, as related year, on the first day in the seventh fortnight of the cold season.¹ No reference seems to be made to the 'Saka or any other era; nor is this king at present capable of identification. But the record is undoubtedly of very early date: Pandit Bhagwanlal Indraji, who first dealt with it, allotted it to the second century A. D.; and Dr. Bühler, who re-edited it, to a slightly earlier time. And the title of Śātakarni, being associated particularly with the Andhrabhṛitya dynasty, suggests that this Hāritiputra may possibly be a member of that line of kings.²

Chapter I.

The Early Dynasties.

in the Vana-Parvan or third book of the Mahābhārata. Thus, an inscription of A. D. 1035 at Baḷaḡāṇve, eighteen miles to the south-east of Banawāsi, says that, after the celebration of the rājasūya-sacrifice, "the five Pāṇḍavas came to Baḷiḡāve and established there five lingas" (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 155, and Mysore Inscriptions, p. 146). And the town of Hāṅgal, sixteen miles to the north-east of Banawāsi, is called in inscriptions by names which represent it as the city or fort of Virāṭa (see more fully in chapter VIII. below); and Virāṭa was the king at whose court the Pāṇḍavas spent the thirteenth year of their exile, as related in the Virāṭa-Parvan or fourth book of the Mahābhārata.—As regards the identification of Vaijayantī with Banawāsi, there is perhaps no absolute proof; but it is sufficiently established by two points. In the first place, one of the names of Banawāsi was the very similar one of Jayantī: it occurs in many records, and notably in an inscription at Banawāsi itself, at the temple of Madhukēśvara, which records that the stone cot of the god Madhukēśvara was presented "at the town of Jayantī" (Ind. Ant. Vol. IV. p. 207, No. 8); and this same god, which was the family-deity of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, is always called in their records "Madhukēśvara of Jayantī" (see chapter VIII. below). And secondly, a Western Chalukya record of A. D. 692, mentions "the district named Edevolal, in the north-east quarter in the vicinity of the famous town of Vaijayantī" (Ind. Ant. Vol. XIX. p. 152): other records state that the district in question was in the Banawāsi province (e. g., id. Vol. VII. p. 300), and shew that it included Āṇṇr, Araḷēshwar, Bālār, Gejjihalli, Kyāsanūr, and Yelawattī, all within a seven-mile radius of Hāṅgal; and it is obvious that Banawāsi, the capital of the province, is the town with reference to which, under the name of Vaijayantī, the position of the district is defined in the record of A. D. 692. And thus it can hardly be questioned that Vaijayantī, as well as Jayantī,—the latter of which names seems to be simply an abbreviation of the former,—was a name of Banawāsi.—Dr. Bühler, indeed, has quoted the St. Petersburg Dictionary to the effect that Vaijayantī occurs, in both Brāhmanical and Jain books, as the name of a town on the coast of the Koṅkan, and has suggested that it is the sea-port Byzanteion of the Greeks (Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 28, note 2). And, of course, the similarity of the names is very tempting. But, if this identification is to be accepted, then there must have occurred some mistake similar to that which led Albérūnī to speak of Banawāsi, by this name itself, as being on the sea-coast (Albérūnī's India, Translation, Vol. II. p. 202).

² For an account of the Andhrabhṛitya, Śātavāhana, or Śālivāhana kings, see Dr. R. G. Bhandarkar's Early History of the Dekkan (1884), pp. 11 to 34. Some detailed notice of them might suitably have been included in the present work, as their sway embraced some of the more northern parts of the Bombay Presidency; but I have never had leisure to study their records.

Chapter I.

The Early
Dynasties.

The first record, however, which gives us any broad insight into the condition of Southern India, is the Gupta inscription on the Allahâbâd pillar, which asserts that, about the middle of the fourth century A. D., the Early Gupta king Samudragupta captured, and then released again all the kings of the dakṣiṇâpatha or region of the south, i.e. of the Dekkan, including Mahendra of Kôsala, Vyâghrarâja of Mahâkântâra, Maṇṭarâja of Kêrala, Mahendra of Pishtapura, Svâmidatta of Koṭṭûra on the hill, Damana of Êrandapalla, Vishnugôpa of Kâñchî, Nîlarâja of Avamukta or Âvamukta, Hastivarman of Veṅgî, Ugrasêna of Palakka or Pâlakka, Kubêra of Dêvarâshtra, and Dhananjaya of Kusthalapura.¹ The statement that Samudragupta conquered the above-mentioned kings, need not be accepted literally; especially, as it seems almost certain that the Gupta dominions were bounded on the south by the Narmadâ. Nor need we even take it as a fact that he invaded their dominions. But the list has its value, in shewing the principal and best known political divisions and reigning kings of Southern India at the time to which it belongs. Some of the above-mentioned territories and places have not yet been identified. But Kôsala was the country lying round Râypur and Sambalpur in the Central Provinces and Cuttack in Orissa. Mahâkântâra, the name of which means literally "the great forest," was perhaps the wooded hilly territory lying along the south of the Narmadâ. Kêrala was the country now known as the Malabâr District of the Madras Presidency, on the west coast. Pishtapura was the modern Pittâpuram, the chief town of a zamindârî or estate of the same name, twelve miles north by east of Coconâda in the Gôdâvarî District, Madras Presidency. Kâñchî was the modern Conjeeveram, in the Chingleput District, Madras. And Veṅgî² was a country on the east coast, of which the original boundaries appear to have been, towards the west, the Eastern Ghauts, and, on the north and south, the rivers Gôdâvarî and Krishna; an indication of the position of its original capital is probably preserved in the name of Vêgi or Pedda-Vêgi, a village in the Ellore tâluka of the Gôdâvarî District.

Records from the eastern coast will probably enable us hereafter to piece together the history of Southern India for the next two centuries after the date of the Gupta record. For the present, such consecutive knowledge as we have, commences from about A. D. 550, and is derived primarily from the records of the first really great dynasty of Western India, that of the Western Chalukyas of Vâtâpi, which is the modern Bâdâmi, the chief town of the Bâdâmi tâluka in the Bijâpur District.³ And the first of their records to throw any further general light on the subject of the tribal and dynastic divisions of the country, is the pillar-inscription of king Mangalêsa, from Mahâkûta near Bâdâmi,⁴ which asserts that his elder brother

Dynasties.

Kīrtivarman I., who reigned from A. D. 567-68 to 597-98, conquered the hostile kings of Vaṅga, Aṅga, Kāliṅga, Vattūra, Magadha, Madraka, Kērala, Gaṅga, Mūshaka, Pāṇḍya, Dramiḷa, Chōliya (i. e. Chōla), Āluka and Vaijayanti. Most of these names denote countries, and are well known; and some of the territories will be recognised as lying far away to the north and east: thus, Vaṅga and Aṅga were eastern and western Bengal; Magadha was Behār; and Madraka appears to have been somewhere in the north-west of the Pañjāb. The other names, however, all seem to belong to Southern India. Kāliṅga was a country on the east coast, between the rivers Gōḍāvarī and Mahānadi. The Kērala, Pāṇḍya, and Chōla countries have already been defined. The Gaṅga country was probably the Gaṅga-vāḍi province, in Mysore, which will be dealt with further on. Dramiḷa was the Draviḍa or Drāviḍa country of the Pallavas, on the east coast, with Kāñchī, i. e. Conjeeveram, as its capital, with which, again, we shall deal further on. And, as we have already seen, Vaijayanti was Banavāsi in North Kanara.¹ The Mūshaka country seems, if the name may be identified with the Mūshika which occurs elsewhere, to be part of the Malabār Coast, between Quilon and Cape Comorin.² Āluka is a new name; but, as it occurs as an epithet of Śeṣha, the chief of the serpent race, it may possibly denote a branch of the Nāgas, who in early times were powerful in the more western parts of the country that became included in the Chalukya dominions.³ Vattūra, also, is a new name, and is plainly a Drāvidian word: it has not yet been identified; but, like Vaijayanti, it denotes a town or city, not a country.

The record, however, which really starts us on our present inquiry, is an inscription on a stone-tablet at the Mēḡuṭi temple at Aihoḷe, — the ancient Ayyāvoḷe in Kanarese,* and Āryapura in Sanskrit, — in the Bijāpur District.¹ It is of the time of Maṅgalēśa's successor, Pulikēśin II., and is dated in A. D. 634-35. And from it we learn that the dominant families in this part of the country, whom the Chalukyas first overthrew and dispossessed, were the Nalas; the Mauryas, the Kadambas, and the Katachchuris or Kalachuris, and that in the neighbourhood of the kingdom which they thus established, they shortly afterwards came more or less in hostile contact with the Gaṅgas, the Ālupas, the Lātas, the Mālavas, the Gurjaras, the Kōsalas, the Kaliṅgas, the Pallavas, the Chōlas, the Kēralas, and the Pāṇdyas. The territories of some of these tribes have already been defined. As much as is known about the remainder of them will be put together in the following pages of this chapter, though some of it is connected more directly with somewhat later times.

The Nalas.

The Nalas are mentioned in connection with Kīrtivarman I., who was the father of Pulikēśin II. and reigned from A. D. 566 or 567 to 597 or 598. He is described as “the night of destruction to the Nalas, the Mauryas, and the Kadambas.” And again, in the Kauṭhērn grant of Vikramāditya V., dated in A. D. 1003,² and in some similar records which also purport to give the history of the Chalukyas from the very commencement,³ he is spoken of as “destroying the habitations of the Nalas.” Not much else is known about Nalas. But we have evidently the name of their territory, with probably an indication that it lay in the direction of Bellāry and Karṇūl, in the Nalavāḍi viśaya which is mentioned in the copper-plate grant of Vikramāditya I. of about A. D. 657.⁴

The Mauryas.

The Mauryas, as we have just seen, are first mentioned in connection with Kīrtivarman I.; and they, also, are spoken of again in the Kauṭhērn grant, and the other records of that class, as having been conquered by him. All the further information that we have about them, for the same early period, is a statement, in the Aihoḷe inscription, that they were overwhelmed, in the Koṅkan,⁵ by the armies that were sent Tivararāja perhaps conquered the Nāgas (id. p. 298). The Gurjara chieftain Dadda I. claims to have uprooted them (Ind. Ant. Vol. XIII. pp. 84, 90). And they are possibly mentioned as being defeated by the Eastern Chalukya king Narēndrampigarāja Vijayāditya II. (id. Vol. XX. p. 101). They thus seem to have been spread, in early times, over more or less the whole of India. And they were probably an aboriginal tribe of more than usual importance and power.

against them by Pulikēsin II. It is not improbable that their capital is named as "Puri, the goddess of fortune of the western ocean," in the verse immediately following that in which their subjugation is recorded, and that this town is the Puri which, in the ninth and following centuries A. D., was the capital of the feudatory princes of the northern Koṅkan branch of the Śilāhāra family, and was the chief town of Koṅkanas.—The term Koṅkan, though used in the Bombay Presidency in a more restricted sense, denotes properly the whole strip of land lying between the Western Ghāts and the Arabian Sea. The Western Ghāts commence at the valley of the Taṭṭi in Gujarāt. From one point of view, they end at Pālgṛhāt, at the south of the Malabār District, Madras Presidency. But, from another point of view, they include also another range which commences on the south side of the Pālgṛhāt valley; and so they would run on to Cape Comorin, at the southern point of the peninsula.—In ancient times, there were seven divisions of the Koṅkan, called the Seven Koṅkans; (see, for instance, Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 18, and P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 123, lines 25, 26, and No. 180, line 23 (Mysore Inscriptions, pp. 32, 98). They were explained to Prof. H. H. Wilson (see Asiatic Researches, Vol. XV. p. 47, note) as being Kēraja, Tuḷuva, Gōvarāshṭra (which he identified with the modern Goa), the Koṅkan proper (meaning, I suppose, Ratnāgiri and Thāna), 'Kerātaha,' 'Varalatta,' and 'Berbera.' And a verse in Dr. Gundert's Malayālam Dictionary, s. v. Kōṅṇanam,—for which I am indebted to Dr. Hultzsch,—enumerates them thus; Kārd'am cha Virāṭam cha Mardāṃ Kohkanam tatad Hayyagāṃ Tuḷuvam ch = aiva Kēraṭam ch = eti sapṭakam. The list given to Prof. Wilson; and the verse, may probably be accepted, as shewing that Kēraja and Tuḷu, i.e. the Malabār and South Kanara Districts in the Madras Presidency, really were reckoned among the Seven Koṅkans. And the verse appears to preserve a reminiscence of another of them, in the name Hayyaga. But, otherwise, these two enumerations seem very imaginative. Epigraphic records shew that the Payve, Hayve, or Haive five-hundred,—corresponding probably to the North Kanara District, in Bombay, was one of the seven divisions; thus, a record of A. D. 1112 at Balagāṃve in Mysore, giving the myth about the formation of the Koṅkan (which seems to embody the reminiscence of an actual upheaval that occurred within the memory of the present race of mankind), and aiming at also giving the etymology of the word, tells us that Paraśurāma, the son of Jamadagni and Renukā, having twenty-one times slain all the kings of the earth, i.e. the Kshatriyas, gave the whole earth to the Brāhmanas, up to the shores of the ocean; that then, considering that he himself should not dwell in the possessions of the Brāhmanas, he pushed back the ocean with the tip of his bow, and, when the western ocean would not give him even such a trifle as a drop (kana) of water for his support, he took it by force, and, at the place where he took it, acquired, by a boon of the god Śiva (Phanipa-kaṅkana-varade; the reference is to Śiva as wearing a hooded serpent as a bracelet), the Seven Koṅkans as his place of abode; and that Haive was, as it were, the bracelet (kaṅkana) of the lady, the Koṅkan, which was thus considered to be "the creation of Paraśurāma" (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 172, lines 15, 17; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 83). Next to the Haive country, we may place the Koṅkana nine-hundred, which was a portion of the possessions of the Kādamba princes of Goa (chapter VIII. below), and seems to have corresponded pretty closely with the present territory of Goa; this may, perhaps, be identified with the Rvātādvīpa of the Aihole inscription of A. D. 634-35 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 243). Next to the north must have come the Iridige country, mentioned in records of A. D. 700 and 705-706 (Ind. Ant. Vol. IX. pp. 129, 132), which is plainly marked as 'one of the Seven Koṅkans, by being called a mahāsaptama or 'great seventh'; this must have included the Sāwantvāḍi State and the Ratnāgiri District. Next there must be placed the Koṅkana fourteen-hundred of the northern Śilāhāra princes of the Koṅkan (chapter VIII. below), which began somewhere about Chaul or Cheriwal, in the Kolāba District, thirty miles south of Bombay, and appears to have extended over the whole of Kolāba, and Thāna; this was also known as the Kāpardi-kadvīpa or Kavādidvīpālākh-and-a-quarter country (chapter VIII. below). And on the north of this there was the Lāṭa country, which (see page 310 below) probably coincided exactly with the modern Surat District, including such portions of the Baroda territory as are mixed up in it. We should thus have exactly seven acceptable divisions of the Koṅkan. But the subject is capable of further elucidation; especially if the Koṅkan is held to extend beyond the Malabār District, and so to include the Cochin and Travancore States: in the latter case, the seven divisions would probably correspond pretty closely with (1) Travancore and Cochin; (2) Malabār; (3) South Kanara; (4) North Kanara; (5) Goa; (6) Ratnāgiri; and (7) Kolāba, Thāna, and Surat.

a territorial division known as the Koṅkaṇa fourteen-hundred:¹ opinions have been expressed, identifying it with Thāṇa, the chief town of the Thāṇa District, close to Bombay,—with Ghārāpurī or Elephanta, an island, noted for its cave-temples, on the east side of the Bombay harbour, and about four miles distant from the mainland,—and with either Rājpurī in the Kolāba Agency, or Rājāpur in the Ratnāgiri District; but no conclusive identification has as yet been established. And they were perhaps descendants of some branch of the Maurya dynasty of Pāṭaliputra, which was founded by Chandragupta in the fourth century B. C. Other traces, also, of the ancient Mauryas, or of persons who claimed descent from them, are forthcoming from Western India.² A prince named Dhavala, of the Maurya lineage; is mentioned in the Kanaswa inscription, of A. D. 738-39, in the Kōṭah State, Rājputāna.³ And an inscription at Wāghlī, in Khāndēsh, mentions a Maurya chief named Gōvindarāja, with the date of A. D. 1069, as a subordinate of the Yādava Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara or feudatory prince Sēunachandra II. of the Sēuna country, and states that the original town of the Mauryas, or rather of his branch of the Maurya stock, was Valabhī,—the modern Walā,—in Surāshṭra or Kāthiāwāḍ.⁴

² A reminiscence of them is contained in an inscription of A. D. 1203-1204, at 'Bandalike' in Mysore,—(I owe an inspection of ink-impressions of this, and of the record mentioned just after it, to the kindness of Mr. Rice),—which, aiming at a succinct account of successive dynasties, says that the Nine Nandas, the Gupta family, and the Maurya kings, ruled over the land of Kuntala; then the Raṭṭas (i. e. Rāshtrakūṭas); then the Chālukyas; then Bijjala, of the Kalachurya family; and then the Hoysala king Virā-Ballāja II. And an inscription of about the twelfth century, at Kuppār in Mysore, speaks of the district that bore the name of Nāgarakhaṇḍaka, i. e. the Nāgarakhaṇḍa country, as protected by "the wise Chandragupta, who was an abode of the excellent observances of the warrior caste,"—referring possibly to the Maurya king Chandragupta.—A legend about an imaginary king of Pāṭaliputra named Chandragupta (twisted by Mr. Rice from its real purport, so as to make it refer to Chandragupta, the grandfather of Aśōka) has been created—(how long ago, or how recently, is not clear)—among the Jains of Śravaṇa-Belgoḷa. But, as shewn by me elsewhere (Ind. Ant. Vol. XXI. p. 156), there is no basis at all for it in the Śravaṇa-Belgoḷa inscription, of about the seventh century A. D., which contains the epitaph of the Jain teacher Prabhāchandra (for the full text and translation of this record, see Epigraphia Indica, Vol. IV. p. 22); other inscriptions, of the ninth and following centuries, which mention a person named Chandragupta, give no hint whatever in the direction of his being a king, but, on the contrary, distinctly shew that he was simply a Jain teacher, and refer in reality to a pontiff named Guptigupta; and, as far as present information goes, the legend in question,—claiming to connect with Śravaṇa-Belgoḷa, not the great Chandragupta himself, but an otherwise quite unknown grandson of his grandson Aśōka, bearing the same name,—appears first in a Jain compendium, entitled Rājvalī-kathe, put together in the present century!

⁴ Epigraphia Indica, Vol. II. p. 221.—Valabhī is a very well known place, being the capital of a dynasty of kings who succeeded the Early Guptas in Kāthiāwāḍ.—There is a reference to Valabhī, as a tritha, in an inscription of approximately the ninth century A. D., at Araṇṇeshwar in the Hāṅgal tāluka, Dhārwar District; the words are—"he who destroys this, becomes (like) one who commits the five great sins by destroying Balabhi (i. e. Valabhī), Vāraṇāsi, and Śrīparvata."—Another reference to it, in a southern record, is contained in the Ātakār inscription of A. D. 949-50, which mentions a feudatory of the Western Ganga prince Permaṇadi-Bātuga, named Maṇalarata, of the lineage of Sagara, to whom it gives the hereditary title of "lord of Valabhi, the best of towns" (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. II. p. 173). And the same title occurs again in a fragmentary inscription at Muttatti in the Tirumakūḍlu-Narasapur tāluka in Mysore (Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I. No. TN. 12).

The Kadambas.

Chapter I.

The Early
Dynasties.

The Kadambas, again, are first mentioned in connection with the same king Kirtivarman I., who is spoken of as breaking up their confederacy; and his conquest of Banawāsi, which was their chief city, is referred to in all the copper-plate records that include his name, and also in the Mahākūta pillar inscription, where the name used for the city is Vaijayanti.¹ Two later families,— called, with a slight difference in the first syllable of the name, Kādambas,— will be noticed further on, in chapter VIII. And we are concerned here with only an early family, which is known chiefly from ten copper-plate grants, of which seven were obtained at Halsi in the Khānāpur tāluka, Belgaum District,² and three at Dēvagere in the Karajgi tāluka, Dhārwar District.³ Their principal capital was undoubtedly Banawāsi, which is mentioned in their records by the name of Vaijayanti: but Palāśikā, i.e. Halsi,⁴ also was one of the important seats of their power, and Uchchaśringi was another;⁵ and still another is mentioned, Triparvata, which has not yet been identified.⁶

The Halsi grants, which were the first to come to light, disclosed the names of Kākusthavarman and his descendants. But, though the earliest of them, speaking of Kākusthavarman as a Yuvarāja,⁷ shewed that he was not the founder of the family, yet none of them gave

any clue as to how he came to be holding that rank, or indicated in any way how the family had risen to power. This information has now been supplied by an interesting record, of the time of Śāntivarman, obtained by Mr. Rice from Tālgund in Mysore, which gives the following account:¹—There was a family of Brāhman, Hāritiputras, and born in the Mānavya gōtra, who always planted the kadamba-tree (Nauclea Cadamba) in the neighbourhood of their houses, and carefully tended it. From this, the family came to be known as the Kadamba family. And in it there was born a certain Mayūrasarman,² who went, with his preceptor Virāśarman, to the city (or a city) of the Pallavas,³—having a desire to master, in a very brief time, the whole of the sacred writings that are designated by the term pravachana. He was interrupted, in his studies, by a great commotion in the stables of the Pallavas. And, enraged at this, he set himself to shew that, even in the Kali age, Brāhman could be as powerful as the members of the warrior and regal caste. He applied himself to war,—conquered the guardians of the frontier of the Pallava kings,—established himself in a forest, difficult of access, in front of the Śrīparvata mountain,⁴—and levied taxes from the Bāṇas and other kings. The kings of Kāñchī, i.e. the Pallavas, sought to overthrow him, and attacked him in many battles when he was marching through difficult country, and by surprises at night when he was encamped. But, with the “very ocean of an army” that he had got together, he destroyed their forces, and brought them low. And, at last, the Pallava kings, recognising his prowess and ancestry, thought it better to make friends with him; and they conferred on him the pattabandha or binding or of the fillet of sovereignty, and gave him a territory on the shore of the western ocean, with a promise that it should be free from invasion. His son was Kaṅguvarman. His son was Bhagīratha. His son was Raghu, who “made the (whole) earth subject to his family,”—of which the meaning seems to be, that he first placed the power of the family on a really firm and wide footing. And his brother was Bhāgīrath, who established his reputation under the name of Kākusthavarman.

³ The record does not mention any names of individual Pallavas.

The inscription finally records that Kākusthavarman caused a large tank to be built at Śthānakundūra (i. e. Tālgund), or at a temple there, "which had been revered in faith by Sātakarṇi, or by the Sātakarṇis, and others," and that the record itself was composed and engraved by a person named Kubja, at the command of Kākusthavarman's son Śāntivarman. From this record and the Halsi and Dēvagere grants, we obtain the genealogy shewn on page 289 below.

Their records describe the Kadambas as meditating, and as anointed (to sovereignty) after meditating, on the god Svāmi-Mahāsēna, i. e. Kārttikēya, the god of war, and on the assemblage of his mothers;¹ as belonging to the Mānavya gōtra or clan;² and as being Hārīti-putras, or descendants of an original ancestress of the Hārīta gōtra.³ And one passage appears to speak of them as descendants of the ancient sage Āṅgiras.⁴ The seals of some of their grants bear an emblem which appears to be a dog.⁵

Of Kākusthavarman,⁶ we have one grant, from Halsi,⁷ dated, without further details, in the eightieth victorious year, and issued from Palāśikā. In it, he has the title of Yuvarāja;⁸ but no indication is given as to the name of the reigning king,—who would be his father or elder brother. It records that, as a reward for saving himself, he granted a field, at a village named Khētagrāma, to the Sēndpati or General Śrutakīrti.

Of Mrigēsavarman,⁹ we have three grants, all issued at Vaijayanti*. One, from Dēvagere,¹⁰ is dated in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.) in the ¹ So, also, the Tālgund inscription says that Shadānana (Kārttikēya, as being 'six-faced') anointed Mayūrasarman (to sovereignty) after he had meditated on Sēndpati (Kārttikēya, as 'the general') and the Mothers.—The mothers of Kārttikēya are the Pleiades (Kṛittikāh), who reared him from the seed of Śiva, which was first thrown into the fire, and then was received by the Ganges. From this he derived the epithet of shanmātura, 'having six mothers,' as well as his name of Kārttikēya.—The Chalukyas also are described, in somewhat similar terms, as meditating on the feet of Svāmi-Mahāsēna. But the reference to the Pleiades in connection with them is different, and will be commented in its proper place.

³ In the grant of the third year of Mrigēsavarman, the first component of the word is Hārīti, with the short i in the third syllable; and, grammatically, Hārīti-putra is perhaps more correct than Hārīti-putra: but in the other Kadamba records the word is Hārīti-putra, with the long i in the third syllable; and this form was also used preferentially by the Western Chalukyas.—As regards the gōtra-name, see page 277 above, note 5.

⁹ His name also occurs as simply Mrigēśa and Mrigēśvara; and in one instance, in prose, as Mrigēsavaravarman. His father's name occurs also as Śāntivaravarman; once in a metrical passage, and once in prose.

third year of his reign, in the Pausa saṃvatsara;¹ and it records a grant of land, at a village named Brīhat-Paralūr, to "the gods, the supreme Arhats."² Another, also from Dēvagere,³ is dated in the eighth fortnight of the rainy season in the fourth year of his reign, without any reference to the cycle of Jupiter; and records that a village named Kālavaṅgā was divided into three portions, which were given, one to "the gods,—the divine Arhat or Arhats, and the great Jinendra," one to the community of the ascetics of the Svētapata sect, and one to the community of the ascetics of the Nirgrantha sect. And the third, from Halsi,⁴ is dated in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.) in the eighth year of his reign, in the Vaiśākha saṃvatsara; and records that Mrigēśavarman caused a temple of Jina to be built, and gave some land to the divine Arhats, for the Yāpanīyas, Nirgranthas, and Kūrchakas, at Palāsikā. In the grants of his third and fourth years, Mrigēśavarman has the paramount title of Mahārāja, which in Southern India, at this time, still retained its original paramount meaning.⁵ In the latter, his name occurs twice as Vijaya-Siva-Mrigēśavarman; on account of which it has been suggested that he is the Mahārāja Sivakumāra, who is mentioned by Bālachandra, in his introductory remarks on the Prābhṛitasāra, as having for his preceptor the well-known Āchārya Padmanandi-Kuṇḍakunda.⁶ In the grant of his eighth year, it is said that he overturned the lofty Gaṅga family, and was a fire of destruction to the Pallavas.

* Of Ravivarman,⁷ we have two grants; one, from Halsi,⁸ not dated, records various Jain ordinances that were established by him

⁶ By Mr. K. B. Pathak; Ind. Ant. Vol. XIV. p. 15. — But, according to the pat-tāvali of the Sarasvatī-Gachchha, Kuṇḍakunda became pontiff in B. C. 8 (Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 351). And this is altogether too ancient a period for the Early Kadambas.

⁸ Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 25.

at Palâśikâ, including provision for the celebration, every year, on the full-moon day of the month Kârttika (Oct.-Nov.), of the eight days' festival of the god Jinendra; and the other, also from Halsî,¹ and not dated, records a grant of land to the god Jinendra. The latter states that he conquered Vishnuvarman and other kings, and overturned Chandaḍaṇḍa, lord of Kâñchi; and thus settled himself firmly at Palâśikâ. In addition, the Halsî grant² issued by Bhânuvarman, recording a gift of some land at Palâśikâ to the Jains, is dated in the sixth fortnight of the cold season in the eleventh year of the reign of Ravivarman. Like his predecessors, he had the paramount title of Mahârāja.³

Of Harivarman, we have two grants. One, from Halsî,⁴ dated in the month Phâlguna (Feb.-March), in his fourth year, records that, at Uchchaśringî, at the advice of his paternal uncle Sivaratha, he gave a village into the possession of the sect of Vârishênâchârya of the Kûrchakas, for the purposes of a shrine of the Arhat which had been built at Palâśikâ by a certain Mrigêśa, son of the Sênâpati Simha of the Bhâradvâja gôtra. The other, also from Halsî,⁵ dated, without further details, in his fifth year, records that,

at Palāsikā, and by the request of Bhānuśakti of the Sēndraka family, he allotted a village for the purposes of a Jain temple which belonged to the community of ascetics called Aharishṭi. In both of his grants, he uses the paramount title Mahārāja.

One of the Dēvagere grants¹ gives us the names of a Kadamba Mahārāja Krishṇavarman,² and of his son, the Yuvārāja Dēvavarman. As the other grants do in the case of Kākusthavarman and his successors, it describes Krishṇavarman as anointed (to sovereignty) after meditating on the god Swāmi-Mahāsēna and on the assemblage of his mothers, and as belonging to the Mānavya gōtra. It asserts that he celebrated the āsvamēdha-sacrifice.³ And it says that he enjoyed his heritage after attacking some chieftains of Nāga descent.⁴ The charter was issued by Dēvavarman, at Tripurvata. And it records the gift of same land to the Yāpaniya communities, or to the members of the Yāpaniya community, for the purposes of a temple of the divine Arhat.

Closely connected with the preceding, must be another copper-plate grant, which was obtained by Mr. Rice from Banahalli in the Kadūr District, Mysore.⁵ It gives us the names of a Kadamba Mahārāja Viṣṇuvarman,—his son, the Mahārāja Krishṇavarman I.,—his son, the Mahārāja Simhavarman;—and his son, the Mahārāja Krishṇavarman II., who may very possibly be identical with the father of Dēvavarman mentioned above. And it records that, in the seventh year of his reign, Krishṇavarman II. granted to a Brāhmaṇa a village named Kolanallūra, in the Vallāvi vishaya.

Another copper-plate grant, obtained by Mr. Rice from Kūdgere in the Shimogga District, Mysore, gives us the name of a Kadamba Mahārāja Vijaya-Siva-Māndhātṛivarman, who, at Vaijayantī, in the second year of his reign, granted to a Brāhmaṇa some land at a village named Kodāla.

And finally, an inscription at the falls of the Ghaṭparbhā near Koṇṇūr in the Gōkāk tāluka, Belgaum District,⁶ has brought to notice

another Kadamba name, that of Dāmōdara, and may perhaps indicate the point to the north-east, to which the Kadamba territory extended.

The precise date of any of the Kadambas is not yet known. Their records contain no reference to the Śaka or any other era, and are, with one exception, dated only in regnal years; and neither from them, nor from any other genuine early records, can any names or facts be obtained, tending to establish definite synchronisms with other kings whose dates are known.¹ The exception to the dating in regnal years, is in the grant of Kākusthavarman, which is dated in the eightieth victorious year. The year purports, by strict translation, to be his own eightieth year. But it cannot be the eightieth year of his Yuvardja-ship; and, even if such a style of dating were usual, it can hardly be even the eightieth year of his life. It must, therefore, be the eightieth year from the pattabandha of his ancestor Mayūravarma, which is mentioned in the Tālgund inscription.² This, however, helps us no more towards arriving at any definite date. As regards the more general question,—that all these records are of decidedly early date is proved, partly by the palæographic standard of them, partly by the mention of the twelve-year cycle of Jupiter in two of Mrigēśavarman's grants, and partly by the references to the eighth fortnight of the rainy season in the grant of his third year, and to the sixth fortnight of the cold season in Bhānuvarman's grant, which shew that, in the period of these records, the primitive division of the year into three seasons only,—not into six, as now,—was still followed.³ On the other hand, the reference to a Sātakarṇi, or the Sātakarṇis, in the Tālgund inscription, may eventually be used to fix the earliest period to which the Kadambas may be referred. But here, again, it still remains to determine which of the Sātakarṇis is meant, and to fix his date. At present, all that can be safely said, is, that the Kadambas are to be referred approximately to the sixth century A. D.

¹ There might be a temptation to arrive at some very definite fixtures, by identifying the Chanḍaṇḍa, lord of Kāñchi, who was overthrown by Raviyvarman, with the Pallava king Ugradaṇḍa-Lōkāditya-Paramēśvaravarman who was a contemporary of the Western Chalukya king Vikramāditya I. in the period A. D. 655 to 680 (see further on in this chapter). But this would place the Kadambas too late.—Mr. Rice has allotted the specific dates of A. D. 420 or 438 to Kṛishṇavarman (father of Dēvavarman), A. D. 538 to Kākusthavarman, A. D. 570 to Mrigēśavarman, and A. D. 600 to Bhānuvarman (e.g., Mysore Inscriptions, Introd. pp. xxxvii., xxxix, and Coorg Inscriptions, Introd. p. 2, note 5). But these dates depend simply on the statement, in the Western Gaṅga grants, that the sister of a Kadamba king named Kṛishṇavarman was given in marriage to the Gaṅga king Mādhava II., whose reign is accepted by Mr. Rice; on the authority of the same records, as having ended in A. D. 425. And, as the Gaṅga records in question are spurious and worthless for any historical purposes (see further on in this chapter), no dates can be fixed by means of them.—The date of A. D. 438 for Kṛishṇavarman was, in fact, arrived at by myself,—from the spurious Gaṅga records (see Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 23); but this was before I had advanced in epigraphy sufficiently far to recognise their true nature.

² It has been suggested (Ind. Ant. Vol. XIV. p. 13) that it is the eightieth year from the conquest of the Nāgas by Kṛishṇavarman; from which it would follow that Kākusthavarman and his descendants were subsequent to Kṛishṇavarman and Dēvavarman. But this is quite disposed of by the Tālgund record.—While, on the one hand, Kṛishṇavarman cannot now be placed before Kākusthavarman's line, so also there is no reason for placing him after it. The statement, in the Aihole inscription, that Kirtivarman I. broke up the "assemblage or collection," i.e. the "confederacy," of the Kadambas, indicates that there were two or three synchronous reigning branches of the family.

The Early
Dynasties.

The Sendrakas.

An incidental reference in one of the Kādamba records has introduced us to the Sēndraka family, of which the representative in Hari-varman's time was Bhānuśakti. We have also the following information about this family :—The Chiplūn grant, from the Ratnāgiri District,¹ of the Western Chalukya king Pulikēśin II. (A. D. 609 to 642), mentions the Sēndraka prince Śrīvallabha-Sēnānandarāja as his maternal uncle. A grant from Bagumrā in the Nausāri District of the Gaikwār's territory,² giving a short genealogy of Sēndraka princes, furnishes the names of Bhānuśakti;³ his son, Ādityaśakti; and his son, Prithivīvallabha-Nikumbhallaśakti, with a date in the year 406, which, referred to the Kalachuri or Chēdī era,⁴ fell in A. D. 655. The grant of the tenth year of the Western Chalukya king Vikramāditya I., obtained from the Karpāl District in Madras, and belonging to about A. D. 664, records that he bestowed the village of Raṭtagiri at the request of the Rāja Dēvaśakti of the Sēndraka family.⁵ And an inscription at Balagāmve, in Mysore,⁶ shews that the Sēndraka Mahārāja Pogilli was a feudatory⁷ of the Western Chalukya king Vinayāditya (A. D. 680 to 697),—that his government comprised the Nāyarkhanda district, i. e. the Nāgarakhanda division of the Banavāsi province,⁸ and the village of Jedugūr or Jedugūr,⁹ which may perhaps be identified with Jedda in the Sorab tāluka, Shimoggā District, Mysore,—and, probably, that the crest of the Sēndrakas was an elephant. Further, in connection with a Satyāśraya who is probably intended to be Pulikēśin II., one of the Lakshmēshwar inscriptions gives the name of Durgāśakti, son of Kundaśakti, son of Vijayaśakti, in the race of the Sēndra kings, who are allotted by this record to the lineage of the Bhujagēndras or serpent kings.¹⁰

The Katachchuris or Kalachuris.

Chapter I.

The Early Dynasties.

The Katachchuris are mentioned in connection with Maṅgalēśa, who was the younger brother of Kīrtivarman I., and reigned from A.D. 597-98 to 608; he is described as "obtaining as his wife, in a bridal pavilion that was the battle-field, the lovely woman who was the goddess of the fortunes of the Katachchuris,"—i. e. as conquering them.¹ Whether this form of the name is due only to a mistake of the writer or engraver of the record, in forming ta instead of la in the second syllable, or whether it is an authentic variant, the Katachchuris are, undoubtedly, a branch of the same stock with the Kalachuris of the Dāhala or Chēdī country in Central India, whose power, as shewn by the epoch of their own special era, dated back to A.D. 249.² A closer approach to the customary form of the name is to be found in the Kauthēm grant of A.D. 1009, in which Maṅgalēśa is described as "the lord, by force, of the royal fortunes of the Kālachchuris."³ And a Sanskritised form of the name, Kalatsūri, occurs in Maṅgalēśa's pillar inscription at Mahākūṭa.⁴ As, in their later records, the Kalachuris of Central India represent themselves as descended from Sahasra-Arjuna or Sahasrabāhu-Arjuna,⁵ there is possibly an early reference to them, as the Ārjunāyanas, in the list of frontier kings who, according to the Allahābād pillar inscription, did obeisance to Śamudragapta.⁶ Traces of them have been obtained through the copper-plate grants, from the neighbourhood of Jabalpur in the Central Provinces, of the feudatory Mahārājas Jayanātha and Sarvanātha of Uchchakalpa, which refer themselves to an unnamed era that must be the Kalachuri or Chēdī era, and the dates of which range from A.D. 423 to 462.⁷ And further

Vol. XVIII. p. 266) that a Sēndraka is named among the witnesses at the end of the spurious Merkara grant of Avinita-Koṅgaṇi (id. Vol. I. p. 365). But the word there is Sēndrika; not Sēndraka. And whatever it may be,—whether a proper name, or part of the name of a district,—the reference is of no citable value; exactly the same passage occurs both in this spurious Merkara grant of the year 388, and in the equally spurious grant of Arivarman (i. e. Harivarman) of Śaka-Saṁvāt 169 expired (id. Vol. VIII. p. 215).

² See Prof. Kielhorn's paper on the Epoch of the Kalachuri or Chēdī era (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 215), which proves that the epoch or year 0 of the era was A.D. 248-49, and the first current year was A.D. 249-50.

early references to them are probably to be found in the grant, from the Khândêsh District, of the Mahārāja Rudradāsa, which is perhaps dated in the year 118 of an unspecified era;¹ in the grant, from the Surat District, issued from the victorious camp at a place named Āmrakā, of the Traikūtaka Mahārāja Dahrasēna, dated in the year 207 of an unspecified era;² and in the grant from Kanheri, near Bombay, which is dated in the year 245 of the augmenting sovereignty of the Traikūtakas;³ if these dates are to be referred to the Kalachuri era, the results, taking the years as expired, are A. D. 367-68, 456-57, and 494-95. Now, the name Traikūtaka is obviously derived from a place called Trikūta. Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrajī has told us that a place named Trikūta is mentioned, in the Rāmāyaṇa and the Raghuvamśa, as a town of importance in Aparānta or the country along the Western coast, i. e. the Koṅkan.⁴ And the theory propounded by him is as follows:⁵ — In the early centuries A. D., there were certain kings in Western India, holding Gujarāt and the adjacent provinces, whom he has called the Western Kshatrapas, and who, he considered, used the Saka era. Certain coins shew that their rule was once interrupted by an invader, who assumed the titles Rāja and Kshatrapa, and established another era. This invader was a certain Īśvaradatta, whose coins are dated, not in an already existing era, but in the first and second years of his reign. He belonged to a dynasty of the Abhīra caste, of which records are found in the Nāsik caves, and which probably came by sea from Sindh, conquered the western coast, and made Trikūta its capital. He probably attacked, and gained a victory over, the Kshatrapas. When he had consolidated his power, he began to issue his own coins, copying the Kshatrapa coinage of the district. His coins particularly resemble those of the Kshatrapa Viradāman and his brother Vijayasēna. The coins shew that the reign of the latter ended in the year 170 of the era used by the Kshatrapas, i. e. in Saka-Samvat 170 (expired), = A. D. 248-49. Īśvaradatta's conquest thus falls at just about the same time with the foundation of the Kalachuri era, of which the first current year was A. D. 249-50.⁶ And we may thus conclude that Īśvaradatta was the founder of an era, which was first known as the Traikūtaka era,⁷ and only in later times came to be called the Kalachuri or Chêḍī era. As regards subsequent events, the Pandit held that Viradāman's son Rudrasēna restored the Western Kshatrapa power, and drove the invaders out of the country; that the Traikūtakas then retired to Central India, and there assumed the names Haihaya and Kalachuri; that afterwards, when the Kshatrapa power was finally destroyed, at the end of the reign of Rudrasēna, son of Rudradāman, the Traikūtakas regained possession of their former capital, Trikūta; and that it was just about this time that Dahrasēna, for whom we have the date of the year 207 (expired), + A. D. 249-50, = A. D. 456-57, succeeded to the sovereignty.¹ All this appears extremely probable. It is built up, largely, on the fact that, though the Western Chalukya kings of the main line of Bādāmi used the Saka era, the local era of the country extending from probably the Daman-gāṅgā on the south to the Mahī on the north was the Kalachuri era, which we meet with in records of the seventh and eighth centuries, not only in the Gurjara territory in the northern part of that stretch of country, but even in the Lāta province of the Chalukyās in the southern part of it. But this fact itself proves that, at some time or other, the early kings of the Kalachuri dynasty had the sovereignty over the stretch of country in question. And the Pandit's theory adapts itself so well to all the circumstances that have to be accounted for, that it may be accepted as furnishing in all probability the true explanation of them.

Soc.* Vol. XVI. p. 346.³ Cave-temple Inscriptions, p. 57.⁴ It is also mentioned, but without any indication as to its position, in the Vākātaka inscription at Ajantā (Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. V. p. 127).⁵ See the Proceedings of the Aryan Section of the Seventh International Congress of Orientalists, p. 216 ff.⁶ See page 293 above, note 2.⁷ As which, it is indirectly quoted in the Kanheri grant.

As has just been mentioned, the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription of Maṅgalēśa speaks of the Kalachuris by the Sanskritised name of Kalatsūri. It further records that these people were conquered by him in the course of an expedition to the north, and that their reigning king at the time was named Buddha. And it shows that the event took place between A. D. 597-98 and 602. By this conquest,—judging from the localities in Western India in which the Kalachuri era was used,—Maṅgalēśa must have acquired a considerable amount of territory, extending, in the Koṅkan, up to the river Kīm at least, which was the northern boundary of the Lāta country, and perhaps even up to the Mahī: the country between the Kīm and the Mahī, however, belonged to the Gurjara princes, of whom an account will be given further on; and there are grounds for thinking that, though he may have established rights of suzerainty over the Gurjara territory, that country was not actually made a part of his dominions as the Lāta province was. The victory over Buddha or Buddhārāja is also referred to in Maṅgalēśa's copper-plate grant from Nerūr, which adds the information that Buddha's father was Saṃkaragaṇa.² And these early members of the family are doubtless carried back one step further by a grant from Sāṅkhēḍā, in the Barōda State,—referable to the same period,—which mentions a king named Saṃkaragaṇa, son of Kṛṣṇarāja, with fairly certain indications, through the names of the places that are mentioned, that his sovereignty included the territory in the actual neighbourhood of Sāṅkhēḍā.³ The existence, in the direction of Gujārāt, of an early king named Kṛṣṇarāja, who may be allotted to this period just as well as to a somewhat earlier date, has also been established by certain coins from Dēvalānā in the Nāsik

District;¹ and, though the tendency has been to refer these coins to an early Râshtrakûta king, who was supposed to have been conquered, somewhere about A. D. 500, by the Western Chalukya Jayasimha I., still there is nothing that compels us to connect them with the Râshtrakûta or any particular dynasty, and nothing to lead us to believe that any victory over the Râshtrakûtas, or, indeed, any historical achievement at all, was accomplished by Jayasimha I.: the supposed existence of an early Râshtrakûta king Krishnarâja, contemporaneous with Jayasimha I., depends upon nothing but a statement which first appears in the eleventh century A. D., and is to be accounted for by events which occurred about A. D. 975;² and, in all probability, the Dêvalânâ coins are coins of Krishnarâja, the father of Samkaragana.

In their later records, the Kalachuris of Central India call themselves also Haihayas;³ and this enables us to establish certain other connections. The Western Chalukya king Vinayaditya (A. D. 680 to 696) subjugated the Haihayas, i. e. the Kalachuris. Lokamahâdêvi and her younger sister Trailokyamahâdêvi, the wives of his grandson Vikramaditya II. (A. D. 733-34 to 746-47), being Haihayas, were Kalachuri princesses. An intermarriage between the Haihayas, i. e. the Kalachuris, and the Eastern Chalukyas, took place in the case of Vishnuvardhana IV. (A. D. 764 to 799).⁴ The Râshtrakûta king Krishna II. (A. D. 888 and 911-12) married a daughter of the Kalachuri king Kôkalla, Kokkalla, or Kokkala I. His son Jagattunga II. married two sisters, Lakshmi and Gôvindambâ, daughters of Ranavigraha-Samkaragana, a son of Kokkalla I. One of Jagattunga's sons, Indra III., married Vijambâ, a great-granddaughter of the same Kokkalla. Another of his sons, Amôghavarsha-Vaddiga, married Kundakadêvi, a daughter of Yuvarâjadêva I., who was a grandson of the same Kokkalla. And, finally, the Western Châlukya Vikramaditya IV.,—father of Taila II. who reigned from A. D. 973-74 to 996-97,—married Bonthâdêvi, a daughter of Lakshmana, who was a son of Yuvarâjadêva I.⁵

In Western India, a later offshoot of the Kalachuri stock is probably to be found in the Kalachuryas of Kalyâni, who, originally feudatories of the Western Châlukya kings, usurped the sovereignty, on the downfall of Taila III., about A. D. 1162.⁶

Dynasties.

A good deal is now known about certain Gānga or Gāṅga kings of Kalinganagara, which is the modern Kalingapatam, on the east coast, in the Gañjām District, Madras Presidency. Thus, we have the Achyutapuram grant of the Mahārāja Indravarman, also called Rājasimha, dated in the eighty-seventh year of some unspecified era, and attributable approximately to the seventh century A. D.;¹ the Parlā-Kimeḍi grant of the same person, dated in the ninety-first year;² the Chicacole grants of a Mahārāja of the same name, Indravarman, dated in the years 128 and 146, and connected closely with the preceding;³ the Chicacole grant of the Mahārāja Dēvēndravarman, son of Guṇārṇava, dated in the hundred and eighty-third year of an unspecified era which is doubtless identical with that in which the preceding four grants are dated;⁴ the Vizagapatam grant of Dēvēndravarman, son of the Mahārāja Anantavarman, dated in the two hundred and fifty-fourth year of an unspecified era which may fairly be taken to be identical with the era used in the preceding five grants;⁵ the Chicacole grant of another Dēvēndravarman, son of the Mahārāja Anantavarman, dated in the fifty-first year of the Gāṅgēya race;⁶ the Alamanda grant of Anantavarman, son of the Mahārāja Rājēndravarman, dated in the three hundred and fourth year of the Gāṅgēya race;⁷ the Chicacole grant of Satyavarman, son of the Mahārāja Dēvēndravarman, dated in the three hundred and fifty-first year of the Gāṅgēya race;⁸ the Parlā-Kimeḍi grant, not dated, of a king named Vajrahasta;⁹ and, finally, the Vizagapatam grants of king Anantavarman-Chōḍagaṅgaḍēva,¹⁰ which record the date of his coronation in A. D. 1078, and give a long genealogy going back to about the beginning of the eighth century A. D., at which time, it is said, a certain Kōlāhala built the town of Kōlāhalapura in the Gaṅgavāḍi province: this place is, as remarked by Mr. Rice,¹¹ the modern Kōlār,¹² the chief town of the Kōlār District in the east of Mysore: in the numerous inscriptions at the temple of Kōlāramma at Kōlār itself, the name occurs in the form of

Chapter I.

The Early
Dynasties.

Kuvalāla;¹ and other epigraphic forms of the name are Kovalāl and Kōlāla.

But we are concerned here with another dynasty, — doubtless a branch of the same original stock, — which, for the sake of convenience, may be called the dynasty of the Western Gaṅgas or the Gaṅgas of Gaṅgavāḍi, and the possessions of which, usually spoken of as the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six thousand, — meaning “the Gaṅgavāḍi country, consisting of ninety-six thousand cities, towns, and villages,”² — lay principally in what is now the territory of Mysore. In the Tamil inscriptions from the east coast, the name of this country appears as Gaṅgapāḍi.³ And the boundaries of it seem to be defined in a record of A. D. 1117 at Bêlūr, in Mysore,⁴ which says that the Hoysala prince Vishnuvardhana, — mentioned in the same record as having acquired Talakāḍ and the Gaṅga dominions, and elsewhere as ruling the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand; — was then ruling, at Vêlāpura, i. e. Bêlūr, all the territory included between the lower ghaut of Naṅgali on the east, Koṅgu, Chêra, and Anamale on the south, the Bârakanûr pass through the ghauts to the Koṅkan on the west, and Sâvimale on the north : of

² There has been a mistaken idea, which apparently originated with Dr. Burnell (see his South-Indian Palaeography, second edition, p. 67, last paragraph but one), that the numerical components of this and similar appellations denote the amount of revenue. And some apparent reason for it might be found in the facts that there are not as many as twenty thousand villages in Mysore, and not quite forty-four thousand villages and hamlets in the whole of the Bombay Presidency (4,492 in the Belgaum, Bijāpur, and Dhārwar Districts; 18,912 in Kanara, Ratnāgiri, Kolāba, and Thāpa; 6,042 in Gujārāt; and 14,532 in the Dekkan districts of Ahmednagar, Khândesh, Nāsik, Poona, Sātara, and Sholāpur). But there are quite enough passages to show clearly that the reference is to the numbers, real, exaggerated, or traditional, of the cities, towns, and villages: for instance, the Aihole inscription of A. D. 634-35 mentions “the three Mahārāshtras, containing ninety-nine thousand villages” (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 244); the Śilāhāra records of A. D. 1026 and 1095 distinctly speak of a division of the Koṅkan containing “fourteen hundred villages” (id. Vol. V. p. 280, and Vol. IX. p. 38); an inscription at Pāṭṇa in Khândesh, of about A. D. 1222, speaks as distinctly of “the country of the sixteen hundred villages” (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. I. p. 345); and the meaning of the name of a territorial division called the Vêlūgrāma or Vēṇugrāma seventy, is explained by a passage which describes Vêlūgrāma as “resplendent with seventy villages” (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. X. p. 252). — Other instances of very large numbers are, the Nolaṃbavāḍi thirty-two thousand, in the direction of Bellāry; the Kavādīvīpa lākha-and-a-quarter, which was the northern part of the Koṅkan; and the seven-and-a-half-lākha country, which is the expression that was used in later times to denote the territory that was held first by the Rāshtrakūṭas and then by the Western Chālukyas. These large numbers must be gross exaggerations, based possibly on some traditions or myths. But there appears no reason for objecting to accept the literal meaning of such more reasonable appellations as the Koṅkana fourteen-hundred and nine-hundred, the Sântālige thousand, the Tardavāḍi thousand, the Pānuṅgal five-hundred, and the Beḷvola three-hundred; and possibly, when we know more as to how far the larger numbers include the smaller, of the Kūṇḍi three-thousand, the Karahāṭa four-thousand, the Toragale six-thousand, the Palasige twelve-thousand, and the Banavāsi twelve-thousand. — The system of administration by dividing the country into circles of tens, twenties, hundreds, and thousands of villages, is prescribed in the Mānavadharmasāstra, vii. 113 to 117.

these places, Naṅgali is in the Muḃhāgal tāluka of the Kōlār District, Mysore; Anamale is evidently Anamalai in the Coimbatore District, Madras Presidency; and Bārakanūr is doubtless the mediæval Barkalūr, now ruined, in the South Kanara District of the same Presidency.¹ The capital of the Western Gaṅgas appears to have always been Talekkād or Talakād, — called in Sanskrit Talavanapura, — which still exists, under the name of Talakād, on the left bank of the river Kāvērī, about twenty-eight miles to the south-east of the city of Mysore.² Their crest was the madagajēndra-lāñchhana, or crest of a lordly elephant in rut; it stands at the top of two inscribed stones at Kiggatnādu in Coorg,³ and on the seals of the spurious copper-plate charters referred to further on. Their banner was the pin-chha-dhvaja, or banner of a bunch of feathers.⁴ And they had the

In the sixteenth century A.D., it was one of the most noted places of trade in Western India, — Sāvimale has been identified by Mr. Rice (Mysore Inscriptions, p. lxxiv., map), with Savanūr, the chief town of a small Musalmān State in the Dhārwar District. But I know of no substantial grounds for the identification. And the place is of no importance, strategic or otherwise.

⁴ It is mentioned in the Udayēnduram grant of a Gaṅga prince named Hastimalla, a vassal of the Chōla king Parāntaka I. (Manual of the Salem District, Vol. II. p. 369; see also Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 165), and in an inscription of about the eleventh century A.D. at Kalbhāvi in the Belgaum District (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVIII. p. 309), in which it is called "the banner of the divine Arhat." — There appears to have been an original uniform practice of having one device for the lāñchhana or crest, used on the seals of copper-plate charters, at the tops, occasionally, of inscriptions on stone, and on coins, and another device for the dhvaja or banner; and, except in some metrical passages, the distinction is always marked by the use of the technical terms lāñchhana and dhvaja. The Pallavas had the bull-crest, and the banner bearing a representation of the club of the god Śiva. The Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi, and doubtless the later dynasty of Kalyāṇi, had the boar-crest, and the pālidhvaja or banner of a particular arrangement of flags in rows. The Rāshtrakūṭas of Mālkhēḍ had the Garuḍa-crest, and the pālidhvaja, and also the śka-kēru or (?) bird-ensign. The Rāṭṭas of Saundattī had the elephant-crest, and the Garuḍa-banner. The Kādambas of Hāngal had the lion-crest and the monkey-banner. The Kādambas of Goa also had the monkey-banner; and the lion appears on their seals and coins. One branch of the Śindas had the tiger-crest, and the hooded-serpent banner; and another branch had the crest of a tiger and a deer, and the nīla-dhvaja or blue banner. And the Guttas of Guttal had the lion-crest, and the fig-tree and Garuḍa banners. — Among the later families there are some exceptions to the rule of shewing the crest on the seals of charters. The Kaḷachuryas of Kalyāṇi had the bull-banner; and the bull appears on the seals of the two charters which have come to light. The Yādavas of Dēvagiri had the Garuḍa-banner; and the Garuḍa was used on the seals of their charters, — sometimes in connection with a representation of the monkey-god Hanumat, which may have been their crest (especially as in one instance it appears alone). The Śilāhāras, with the Garuḍa-banner, used the same device on their seals. The seal of the only copper-plate charter of the Rāṭṭas of Saundattī that has come to light, shews the Garuḍa, — the device on their banner, — in spite of the elephant-crest being distinctly attributed to them. And the seals of some of the later charters of even the Rāshtrakūṭas of Mālkhēḍ, shew a representation of the god Śiva, instead of the Garuḍa-crest. — The Hoysālas of Dērasamudra are represented as having both the tiger-crest and the tiger-banner. But the passages are in verse; and it is difficult to decide whether the device was that of the crest, or of the banner, or really of both.

hereditary titles of Kovalāla, Kuvalāla, or Kōlāla-puravar-ēśvara or "lord of Kovalāla, Kuvalāla, or Kōlāla, the best of towns," with reference to Kōlār, and of Nandagiri-nātha or "lord of the mountain Nandagiri," with reference doubtless, as Mr. Rice has said,¹ to the modern Nandidurg, a hill-fort about thirty-six miles north of Kōlār; these titles seem to appear first in connection with the first Nītimārga-Koṅṇuivarma-Permanaḍi, in the early part of the ninth century A. D.

The fact has already been stated, that mention is made of some Gaṅgas, as being overthrown by the early Kadamba king Mrigēśavarman.² In the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription, Gaṅgas are included among the hostile peoples whose kings were conquered by Kīrtivarman I. between A. D. 567-68 and 597-98.³ They are referred to again, in the Aihole inscription, as being subjugated, with the Ālupas, by Pulikēśin II., about A. D. 608.⁴ And the Harihar grant of Vinayāditya, dated in A. D. 694, speaks of them, again in conjunction with the Ālupas,—here called Ālūvas,—as hereditary servants of the Western Chalukya kings,⁵ to whose dynasty Kīrtivarman I., Pulikēśin II., and Vinayāditya belonged. These statements cannot all refer, if any of them do so, only to the Gaṅgas of the east coast. And they suffice to shew that, in early times, there really was a reigning Gaṅga family in Western India. For the period, however, with which we are at present more directly concerned, the references are all impersonal; and no individual names are forthcoming until about a century after the latest date mentioned just above. There have, indeed, been known for a long time past various copper-plate charters,⁶ which purport to give an unbroken genealogical list going back to the first century A. D., and to furnish specific early dates in connection with certain names in it; thus, they would give the names of Harivarman with a date in A. D. 248,—of Vishnugōpa, with a date in A. D. 351,—of Avinita-Koṅgaṇi, with dates in A. D. 454-55 and 466,—of Durvinita-Koṅgaṇi, with dates in A. D. 481-82 and 513-14,—and of Śrīpurusha-Prithuvi-Koṅgaṇi, with the dates of A. D. 762 and 776-77. And such supposed information as is derivable from them, from some other epigraphic records which have not yet been fully made available, and from a Tamil chronicle called Koṅṇuḍēsa-Rājākkal, has been compiled and published by Mr. Rice, with the result of a tolerably lengthy and circumstantial account, such as it is.⁷ But the charters in question are all spurious; the information given in them is absolutely unreliable; any similar statements, based on them or on the sources from which they were concocted, and included in later charters that may be genuine, are equally inadmissible; and the chronicle is absolutely worthless for any historical purposes.¹ Almost everything that has been written on the understanding that the records in question, and the chronicle, furnish authentic information, requires to be ignored and cancelled. And the general result is, that no individual Western Gaṅga names are as yet forthcoming for the early period with which this chapter specially deals; and we can treat here only of somewhat later times. Out of the names mentioned in the spurious charters, the first one which is certainly known to be authentic is that of the Mahārāja Śrīpurusha-Prithuvī-Koṅgaṇi, or, as he was more fully styled, Muttarasa-Śrīpurusha-Prithuvī-Koṅgaṇi. His existence is proved, not by the spurious grants, but by undeniably genuine but undated, inscriptions on stone at Talakād, Sivāra, and Sivarpatṇa, in Mysore.¹ On general palæographic grounds, these records may be referred roughly to the eighth or ninth century A. D.; and one particular tell-tale character proves that they cannot have been engraved much after A. D. 804. It is, therefore, quite possible that the spurious Hosūr and Nāgamāṅgala grants have hit off true dates for him, in A. D. 762 and 776-77,² though the person who concocted the Hosūr grant failed to compute the details of the date correctly. But all that can as yet be said with certainty about this Muttarasa-Śrīpurusha-Prithuvī-Koṅgaṇi or more shortly Śrīpurusha-Muttarasa, is, that he was a reigning king, belonging, no doubt, to the Western Gaṅga lineage, and that, pending more precise discoveries, he may be placed in the period A. D. 750 to 850. There is, however, one name which may possibly be placed just before his. The spurious charters mention two persons named Śivamāra,—representing one of them as the father or grandfather, and the other as the son, of Śrīpurusha-Muttarasa; and one of them, at Hallegere, purports to give for the first Śivamāra a date in A. D. 713, while another, at Suradhēnupura,³ purports to give a date in A. D. 807-808 for the second Śivamāra. And, that there really was, just before or just after Muttarasa-Śrīpurusha, a reigning king named Śivamāra, referable to the same lineage, is proved by a genuine, but undated, stone inscription, of his time, at Dēbūr in Mysore,⁴ engraved in well-formed characters of the same period. The record does not connect any title with his name; and it contains nothing that helps us to decide his identity: but it uses an expression which stamps him as a paramount sovereign. As far, therefore, as individual names go, the history of the Western Gaṅgas starts with these two persons, Śrīpurusha-Muttarasa and Śivamāra; and either of them may be the Gaṅga king who was conquered and imprisoned by the Rāshtrakūṭa king Dhruva (between A. D. 754 and 783-84), and was liberated, but afterwards had to be placed in confinement again, by that king's son Gōvinda III. (A. D. 783-84 to 814-815).⁵ Shortly after this,

if the Kadab grant may be relied on, there was a certain Châkirâja, who was governing or reigning over the entire Gaṅga province in A. D. 813.¹ This, however, seems very doubtful. And probably the next authentic names, after those of Śrīpurusha-Muttarasa and Śivamâra, are those of Nitimârḡa-Koṅḡuṇivarma-Permanadi,² with the title of Mahârâjâdhirâja,³ and styled "supreme lord of the town of Kovalâla" and "lord of the mountain Nandagiri," and of his son Satyavâkya-Permanadi, whose existence is proved by a stone inscription from Doddahundi in Mysore:⁴ the record, which mentions the death of this Nitimârḡa-Koṅḡuṇivarma-Permanadi, is not dated; but it was written at any rate not long after A. D. 804. Somewhere about this time, the Eastern Chalukya king Narêndramrigarâja-Vijayâditya II. (A. D. 799 to 843), waged war for twelve years with the Gaṅgas and the Râshtrakûtas;⁵ and, later on, his grandson Gunaka-Vijayâditya III. (A. D. 844 to 888), being "challenged" by the Râshtrakûtas, conquered the Gaṅgas.⁶ The passages, however, which mention this, give no particular names. And the next individual name is that of Satyavâkya-Koṅḡuṇivarma-Râjamalla-Permanadi, mentioned in an inscription at Husukûru in Mysore,⁷ with the date of Śaka-Saṁvat 792 (expired), = A. D. 870-71; the record also mentions a certain Bûtarasa, who was governing the Koṅḡalnâd and Pûnâd districts as Yuvarâja. With this person we have perhaps to identify the Satyavâkya-Koṅḡuṇivarma-Permanadi, in respect of whom an inscription at Kiggatnâd, in Coorg,⁸ cites Śaka-Saṁvat 809 (expired), with a date in the month Phâlguṇa (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 888, as his eighteenth year, and whose first year, therefore, was Ś.-S. 792 (expired), = A. D. 870-71. Next after this comes another Nitimârḡa-Koṅḡuṇivarma-Permanadi, for whom an inscription at Kûlagere, in

Mysore,¹ supplies the date of Saka-Samvat 831 (expired), = A. D. 909-910. We know that shortly after this time there was a king named Ereyappa. We may, therefore, place next an inscription at Iggali, in Mysore,² which mentions another Satyavākya-Koṅṇivarma-Permanāḍi and Ereyappa, and records occurrences that took place in the twenty-second year of this Satyavākya, i. e. not earlier than A. D. 930-31, as shewn by the recorded date of the preceding Nitimarga. This Satyavākya must have been immediately succeeded, and soon after that date, by Ereyappa, whom the Bêgûr inscription, from Mysore, mentions as reigning over the Gaṅgavāḍi province, and fighting with a certain Vira-Mahendra.³ Ereyappa was succeeded by his son Rāchamālla. From an inscription at Ātakûr, in Mysore,⁴ we learn that Rāchamālla was attacked and killed by Satyavākya-Koṅṇivarma-Permanāḍi-Bûtuga or Bûtayya, who had the birudas or secondary names of Nanniya-Gaṅga, "the truthful Gaṅga," Jayaduttaraṅga, "the arch of victory," Gaṅga-Gaṅgēya, "a very Kārttikēya, Karna, or Bhīshma, among the Gaṅgas," and Gaṅga-Nārāyaṇa, "a very god Viṣṇu among the Gaṅgas," and who thereby acquired the Gaṅgavāḍi province; this occurred in or shortly before A. D. 940. An inscription at Hebbāl, in the Dhārwar District,⁵ tells us that (between A. D. 911-12 and 940) Bûtuga married a daughter of the Rāshtrakûṭa king Amôghavarsha-Vaddiga, receiving, as her dowry, the districts known as the Puligere or Purigere three-hundred, which was the country that lay round, and was named after the ancient name of, Lakshmēshwar, in the Miraj State, within the limits of the Dhārwar District,⁶—the Belvola three-hundred, which lay in the same neighbourhood and included, as various records shew, Gadag, Anṇigere, Kurtakôti, and Nargund, in Dhārwar, Hûli in the Belgaum District, and Kukkanûr in the Nizâm's

¹ Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., No. MI. 30.—Mr. Rice (ibid. Intro. p. 4) would identify this Nitimarga-Koṅṇivarma-Permanāḍi with the other person of the same name mentioned in the Doddahundi inscription; but the date of the present record, and the use of the old form of the kh in the Doddahundi record, are inconsistent with this view.—With this Nitimarga-Koṅṇivarma-Permanāḍi, he would also identify the Satyavākya-Koṅṇivarma-Permanāḍi of the Iggali inscription (see further on); but it seems clear to me that a Nitimarga is not, unless under very exceptional circumstances, to be identified with any Satyavākya.—He would further identify the Satyavākya of the Doddahundi inscription with the Ereyappa who came just before A. D. 940 (see further on). And, in short, he has mixed up all these persons in the most complicated manner.

⁴ ibid. Vol. II., p. 168; since then, it has been edited by Mr. Rice also, Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., No. Md. 41.—The Rāshtrakûṭa Dêḍli grant of A. D. 940, which mentions him as Bhâtārya, implies that, in overthrowing Rāchamālla, he received material assistance from the Rāshtrakûṭa king, Kṛishṇa III. And it is this record that fixes the event before A. D. 940.

Dominions,¹—the Kisukâḍ seventy, which was a small district of which the chief town was Paṭṭadakal, the ancient Kisuvolaḷ and Paṭṭada-Kisuvolaḷ, in the Bâdâmi tâluka, Bijâpur District,²—and the Bâge, Bâgenâd, or Bâgadage seventy, which was another small district lying round Bâgalkôṭ, the ancient Bâgadage and Bâgadige, the chief town of the Bâgalkôṭ tâluka in the same district.³ And the Âtakûr inscription further shews that, in or about the Saumya saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 872 (current), = A.D. 949-50, the Râshtrakûṭa king Kṛishṇa III. (A. D. 940 and 956) confirmed him in the possession of the above-mentioned four districts, and also gave him the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, as a reward for treacherously slaying, at a place named Takkôla, the Chôla king Râjâditya, with whom Kṛishṇa III. was then at war. Like his predecessors, Bûtuga used the title Mahârd-jâdhirâja; but, while probably half-independent, he appears also to have acknowledged the suzerainty of the Râshtrakûṭas. The Hebbâl inscription tells us that the son of Bûtuga and the daughter of Amôghavarsha-Vaddiga was Maruḷadêva. To Maruḷadêva and Bijabbe, it says, there was born a son, whom it perhaps names as Rachcha-Gaṅga. And, it continues, immediately after this person had reigned, there came another son of Bûtuga, by his wife Kallabbarasi, who was named Satyavâkya-Koṅṇuivarma-Permanadi-Mârasimha, with a variety of biruḍas such as Chalad-uttaraṅga, "the arch of firmness of character," Dharmâvatâra, "the incarnation of religion," Jagadêkavira, "the sole hero of the world," Gaṅgara-simha, "the lion of the Gaṅgas," Gaṅgavajra, "the Gaṅga diamond or thunderbolt," Gaṅga-Kandarpa, "the Gaṅga god of love," and Nolamba-kul-Ântaka, "the Death of the family of the Nolambas, i. e. the Pallavas," and was plainly a very great personage indeed. He is evidently the Satyavâkya-Permanadi, in connection with whom an inscription at Kârya, in Mysore,⁴ cites the Prabhava saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 890 (current), = A. D. 967-68, as his fifth year,—shewing that he was crowned to the Gaṅga succession in S.-S. 886 current, = A. D. 963-64,—and the Mârasimha-Permâdi, news of whose death, as we learn from an inscription at Mēlâgani,⁵ reached the Pallava king Pallavâditya-Nolambâdhirâja in or just before the month Âshâdha (June-July), falling in A. D. 974, of the Bhâva saṃvatsara, S.-S. 896 (expired). An inscription at Lakshmêshwar, within the Dhârwâr District,⁶ mentioning him with the paramount title of Paramêśvara as well as Mahârd-jâdhirâja, and speaking of "Mârasimha" as his prathama-nâmadhêya or first name, connects him with the date of the Vibhava saṃvatsara, 'S.-S. 890 (expired), = A. D. 968-69, and records a grant by him to a Jain shrine named, after himself, Gaṅgakandarpa-Jinēndramandira. An inscription at Nagarle, in Mysore,¹ dated 'S.-S. 892 (expired), = A. D. 970-71, gives one of his appellations in the form of Permāḍi. An inscription at Adaraguñchi, in the Dhārwar District,² dated in the month Āshāḍha (June-July), falling in A. D. 971, of the Prajāpati saṃvatsara, 'S.-S. 893 (expired), mentions him as then governing the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand, the Purigere three-hundred, and the Beḷvola three-hundred, under the Rāshtrakūṭa king Khoṭṭiga. An inscription at Gundūr, in the same district,³ dated in the same month, falling in A. D. 973, of the 'Sṛimukha saṃvatsara, 'S.-S. 896 (current), mentions him as still governing the Puligere three-hundred and the Beḷvola three-hundred under Khoṭṭiga's successor, Kakka II. The Hebbāl inscription speaks of him as having had in his hands, at some time or other,⁴ the government of a very large area, including, not only the Gaṅgavāḍi province, the Puligere three-hundred, and the Beḷvola three-hundred, but also the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Nalambavāḍi thirty-two thousand (properly a province of the Pallavas, in the direction of Bellāry), and the Sāntalige thousand (apparently somewhere in the west of Mysore).⁵ And an elaborate account of his achievements, given in one of the Śravaṇa-Belgola records,⁶ shews that he was employed by Kṛishṇa III. to command an expedition into Gujarāt; that he subjugated the Pallavas of Nalambavāḍi; and that he fought and conquered in battles on the banks of the Tapti, at Mānyakhēṭa (the Rāshtrakūṭa capital), and at Gōnūr, Uchchangi, and Pāriseyakōṭe, and in the Banavāsi country; and, finally, that, after the overthrow of Kakka II. and his expulsion from Mānyakhēṭa by the Western Chālukyas under Taila II., he made an attempt to continue the Rāshtrakūṭa sovereignty by crowning Indra IV., the grandson of Kṛishṇa III.:⁷ the attempt, which was not successful, must have been made soon after June, A. D. 973, which is the latest recorded date for

Chapter I.

The Early Dynasties.

Kakka II.; and it is to be attributed to the close connection that existed between the two families.¹ Mārasimha must have been immediately succeeded by a certain Pañchaladēva, whom a fragment at Mulgund, in the Dhārwar District,² describes as reigning, as paramount sovereign, in A. D. 974-75, over the whole country bounded by the eastern, western, and southern oceans. Pañchaladēva seems, then, to have taken advantage of the general confusion, that must have attended the downfall of the Rāshtrakūṭas and the death of Mārasimha, to set himself up as an independent king; but he was shortly afterwards killed in battle by the Western Chālukya Taila II. Earlier facts connected with him are to be found in the Adaraguñchi inscription,³ which tells us that, in A. D. 971, when Mārasimha was governing the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand, the Puligere three-hundred, and the Beḷvola three-hundred, under the Rāshtrakūṭa king Khottiga, he himself was governing a small circle of villages which was known as the Sebhi thirty and probably took its appellation from the ancient name of Chabbi or Chebbi in the Hubli tāluka, Dhārwar District; and in the Guṇḍūr inscription,⁴ which mentions him as governing a ninety-six district in A. D. 973: this ninety-six district has not been identified; but possibly the expression is an abbreviation for the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six thousand, which Mārasimha, — mentioned in the same record in connection with only the Puligere three-hundred and the Beḷvola three-hundred, — may have entrusted to Pañchaladēva. Shortly after Pañchaladēva, there was a Satyavākya-Kōṅguṇivarma-Rāchamalla-Permanāḍi, for whom an inscription at Kiggatnāḍ, in Coorg,⁵ furnishes a date in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 978, of the Īśvara samvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 899 (expired), and probably an inscription at Doddā-Homma, in Mysore,⁶ furnishes a date in the preceding year;⁷ and he appears to have had a rather famous minister named Chāmundaṛāya, who wrote the Chāmundaṛāya-Purāṇa and set up the colossal image of Gommatēśvara at Śravaṇa-Belgola.⁸ And this person was probably the last of the independent or semi-independent Western Gaṅga princes.

⁷ We have perhaps another of his records, — in which his name is given as Rājamalla, — in an inscription at Kottatti (Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., No. Md. 107). But, unless there is some mistake in the published text, it is difficult to place this record properly. It purports to be dated in Śaka-Saṃvat 899, coupled with the Pramādin samvatsara. Pramādin, however, was either Ś.-S. 876 current, = A. D. 953-54, or Ś.-S. 936 current, = A. D. 1013-14. Ś.-S. 899 current, = A. D. 976-77, was the Dhātu samvatsara. And Ś.-S. 899 expired, = A. D. 977-78, was the Īśvara samvatsara. Perhaps Pramādin has been read by mistake for Pramāthin, and Ś.-S. 899 is a mistake for 901 (expired) or 902 (current), = A. D. 979-80.

Chapter I.

The Early
Dynasties.

An inscription, indeed, at Bêlûr, in Mysore,¹ gives the name of a Gaṅga-Permanaḍi, who was governing the Kaṇṇāta in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1021, of Śaka-Saṁvat 944 (current), coupled apparently with the Durmukhin saṁvatsara by mistake for Durmati.² But, before this time, the Chôla had invaded the Gaṅgavāḍi province and made it a part of their own kingdom, as is shewn by their records which from about this point are met with in Mysore. Thus, — taking at present only the dated records, — at Kaliyûr there is an inscription³ of the Chôla king Râjarâjadêva, mentioning a minister of his named Apramêya and described as “lord of the Kotta maṇḍala,” dated in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1006, of the Parâbhava saṁvatsara, Śaka-Saṁvat 929 (current). At Balmuri there is another of his records,⁴ dated apparently at the uttarâyaṇa-saṁkrānti or winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1012, of the Paridhâvin saṁvatsara, S.-S. 934 (expired), cited as his twenty-eighth year: this record claims that Râjarâja had conquered the land of the Gaṅgas, Rattavâḍi (the kingdom of the Râshtrakûṭas of Mâlkhêḍ), the Malenâḍ or hill-country along the Western Ghauts, the territories of the Nôlambas and the Andhras, and the rulers of Koṅgu, Kalinga, and Paṇḍya, and had absorbed all their lands into the Chôla kingdom; and it mentions a certain Pañchavamahârâya, whom he had appointed to the military command, as Mahâḍaṇḍanâya, of the Beṅgi maṇḍala, i. e. the land of Veṅgi, the territory of the Eastern Chalukyas,⁵ and the Gaṅga maṇḍala, and who then, it says, entered on a series of conquests more to the west, — seizing the Tuḷuva country, the Koṅkaṇ, and the Male country, pursuing the Chêra, pushing aside Teluga and Raṭṭiga, and coveting even the little Belvôla district. And at Taḍi-Mâlingi and Sindhuvaḷli there are records,⁶ — dated, respectively, in his tenth year, and in the Vyâya saṁvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Saṁvat 1030 by mistake for 1028 expired or 1029 current, = A. D. 1106-1107, cited as his thirty-seventh year, — of the Eastern Chalukya king Râjendra-Chôla-Kulôttuṅga-Chôladêva I., who,⁷ anointed first, like his ancestors, to the sovereignty of Veṅgi, afterwards acquired also the Chôla kingdom and crown. At the end of the tenth century A. D., therefore, the Western Gaṅgas lost all semblance of independence, and, if they continued to be entrusted with any authority at all, sank into the position of mere local representatives of the Chôla and Eastern Chalukya kings, in whose possession their territory remained until about A. D. 1117, when a certain Gaṅgarâja or Gaṅgarasa attacked Adiyama or Idiyama and other feudatories of the

Chôla, encamped at Talakâd, who refused to quietly give up the territory which their sovereign had entrusted to them, defeated them and drove them out, recovered his hereditary province, and placed it in the hands of the Hoysala prince Vishnuvardhana.¹

The Alupas.

The Ālupas, as we have seen above, are mentioned in the Aihole inscription, in conjunction with the Gaṅgas, as being subjugated by Pulikēśin II. about A. D. 608; under the same name, in the Sorab grant of Vinayāditya, dated in A. D. 692, which records that, while camped at the village of Chitrasedu in the Toramara vishaya, he granted the village of Sālivoḡe, in the Edevoḡal vishaya, at the request of the Mahārāja Chitravāha, son of the Ālupa ruler Guṇasāgara;² under the name of Ālupas, in the Harihar grant of the same king, dated in A. D. 694, which speaks of them, with the Gaṅgas, as hereditary servants of the Western Chalukyas, and records that Vinayāditya granted the village of Kīru-Kāgāmāsi, in the Edevoḡal vishaya, at the request of an unnamed Ālupa chief;³ and, under the name of Ālupas again, as foes of the Western Chālukyas in later times, in a record of the Kādambas of Goa which says that they were conquered by Jayakēśin I. (about A. D. 1052-53),⁴ and in the Vikramāṅkadēvacharita of Bilhana.⁵ Who the Ālupas precisely were, has still to be ascertained. But, if they are identical with the Ālukas, who are included among the hostile peoples whose kings, according to the Mahākūta pillar inscription, were conquered by Kīrtivarman I. between A. D. 567 and 597,⁶ then, as āluka is an epithet of Śēsha, the chief of the serpent race, we may perhaps have in them a division of the Nāgas.⁷ And the passages in the grants of Vinayāditya seem to indicate that they had the feudatory government of the Edevoḡal vishaya, which lay just on the north-east of Banawāsi, and may perhaps be identified with the Eḡenād seventy of other records.⁸

The Latas.

The most direct evidence as to the position of the Lāta country, appears to be furnished by some of the Rāshtrakūta records of the ninth century A. D.⁹ From them we learn that Gōvinda III. gave the Lāta province, or, as it was also then called, the province of the lords of Lāta, to his brother Indrarāja. Indrarāja's son Suvar-

⁸ Dr. Bhandarkar has suggested (Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, p. 39, note 3) that the name of the family seems to be preserved in the name of the modern town of 'Alupai' on the Malabar coast. Dr. Bühler, also, says (Ind. Ant. Vol. V. p. 320, note †) that Ālupa is apparently a town on the coast. But I cannot trace any authority for this.

navarsha-Karkarâja had the title of Lâtesvara or "lord of Lâta." We find him and his brother Prabhûtavarsha-Gôvindarâja granting villages of which the modern representatives still exist in the neighbourhood of Barôda and of Jambûsar in the Broach District. And this locates Lâta in Gujarât, and places the country along the south of the river Mahî in the Lâta country, as its boundaries then stood. This, however, was after the absorption of the Gurjara territory into Lâta. And from certain Western Chalukya records which will be noticed in the next chapter, and from the synchronous Gurjara records which will be dealt with just below, we can now recognise that Lâta was originally a smaller territory, bounded on the north, and separated there from the Gurjara country, by the river Kim, which, rising in the hills of the Râjpiplâ State in the Rêwâ-Kânthâ, flows into the gulf of Cambay, between the Narmadâ on the north and the Taptî on the south. The southern boundary is not quite so certain. But, at any rate, Nausârî in the Barôda territory, on the south of Surat, and Ashtgâm or Astgâm, a few miles to the south-east of Nausârî, were in the Lâta country. And, if we bear in mind how many ancient divisions of India have been preserved more or less intact to even the present day, it seems very probable that the southern limit of Lâta was the river Damangangâ, which divides, where they touch each other, the present districts of Surat and Thâna, just as, towards the coast, the Kim separates the Surat District from Broach. On the east, the Lâta country was doubtless bounded by the Western Ghats. As a record of A. D. 888 tells us that a territorial division known as the Variavi hundred and sixteen, which was the country round the modern Wâriâv just to the north of Surat and was in Lâta, was in the Konkana vishaya,¹ it is evident that Lâta was one of the seven divisions of the Konkan; and it was, in fact, the most northern of them. And, from the manner in which, in the grant of the Western Chalukya prince Avanijanaśraya-Pulikêśin, one of the feudatory rulers of Lâta, it is said that the army of the Tâjikas, or Arabs, wishing to enter the Dekkan with the desire of conquering all the kings of the south, came in the first instance to reduce "the Navasârikâ country,"² it seems tolerably certain that the capital of the original Lâta territory was Navasârikâ, i.e. the modern Nausârî.

There is an early epigraphic reference to Lâta in the Mandasôr inscription of A. D. 473, where it is described as a country which was pleasing with choice trees bowed down by the weight of their flowers, and with temples and assembly-halls of the 'gods and vihâras or Buddhist shrines, and the mountains of which were covered over with vegetation.³ And there is also a mention of it in the Bṛihat-Samhitâ of Varâhamihira.⁴ But we know nothing as yet about its ancient history; except that the use of the Kalachuri or Chêdî era, in the Western Chalukya records from Lâta, shews that the province was at one time a part of the dominions of the Kalachuri kings. Mañgalêsa must have acquired the sovereignty of it, when he overthrew the Kalachuri kings Samkaragana and Buddha, and deprived them of their possessions on the western coast. But, as it joined in the general revolt against Pulikêsin II., he must have left it in the administrative charge of some of its native rulers. It was one of the provinces resubjugated by Pulikêsin II., before he established his supremacy over the three Mahârâshtra countries. And he then placed the government of it in the hands of feudatory members of his own family. It is evidently one of the four provinces which in A.D. 610 or 611 were in the hands of Satyâsraya-Dhruvarâja-Indravarman. Vijayavarmarâja held it in A. D. 643. A Sêndraka prince, Prithivîvallabha-Nikumbhallaśakti, was in charge of it in A.D. 654, — apparently because of the failure of that branch of the Western Chalukya family to which Vijayavarmarâja belonged. But from A. D. 670 onwards it was again in the hands of feudatory members of the Western Chalukya stock. The original boundaries of the province must have been preserved up to A. D. 736, when there was still a Gurjara prince in possession of the next territorial division on the north. Shortly after that, however, Avanijanâsraya-Pulikêsin overthrew the invading Tâjikas, who, in the course of their invasion, had destroyed the Gurjaras. And, as we have no later records of the Gurjaras, he doubtless then annexed their territory, and practically extended the province of Lâta, on the north, up to the Narmadâ, or even to the Mahî. Information about the subsequent history of the province will be found under the account of the Râshtrakûtas of Mâlkhêd; in chapter III. below.

The Malavas.

The Mâlavas were, of course, the people of Mâlwa in Central India, and of south-eastern Râjputânâ, from whom¹ the Vikrama era derived its earlier appellation of the Mâlava era. And, lying north of the Narmadâ and well away from the coast, their country was one of the divisions of Northern India.

The earliest trace of the Mâlavas is probably to be found in certain coins, obtained in large numbers at Nâgar in the north of Mâlwa, about forty-five miles north of Koṭâ, which have on them the legend Mâlâvândm jayah, "the victory of the Mâlavas:"² according to General Sir Alexander Cunningham, the characters range "from perhaps B. C. 250 to A. D. 250;" but we must now place these coins in some period not earlier than B. C. 58, the commencement of the Mâlava era. In epigraphic records, the Mâlavas are first mentioned, in the Allahâbâd pillar inscription, among the tribes which were conquered by the Early Gupta king Samudragupta, about the middle of the fourth century A. D.³ And possibly the Varika prince Vishṇuvardhana, — son of Yasôvardhana, who was the son of Yasôrâta, who, again, was the son of Vyâghrarâta,—of whom we have a record at Bijayagadh in the Bharatpur State,¹ with a date which, referred to the Mâlava era, falls in A. D. 372, was the leader of some northern branch of the tribe; he must have been a feudatory of Samudragupta. In the fifth century, we have the names of Viśvavarman, the son or younger brother of Naravarman, with the date of A. D. 423,² and of Bandhuvvarman, son of Viśvavarman, who in A. D. 436, as a vassal of Kumâragupta I., was governing at Daśapura, which is the modern Mandasôr in western Mâlwa.³ After the downfall of the Early Guptas, Mâlwa must have fallen, somewhere between A. D. 484 and 510, into the hands of the foreign invader Tôramâna. His son Mihirakula held it, after him, till somewhere about A. D. 530. And in A. D. 532-33 it was a part of the dominions of a king of Northern India named Vishuvardhana-Yasôdharman, who overthrew Mihirakula, and of whom we have records at Mandasôr:⁴ this king is described as ruling right across Northern India, to the shores of the western ocean; and he is perhaps the paramount sovereign by whom,⁵ just before A. D. 526, the Mahârâja Drôṇasimha of Valabhi,—the modern Walâ,—was anointed to the rule of the then feudatory province of Kâthiâwâd. In A. D. 738-39, the northern parts of Mâlwa were in the possession of a prince named Dhavala, claiming to be of the Maurya race.⁶ But the intermediate history of the country remains to be worked out. Though Pulikésin II. claims to have subdued the Mâlavas, there are no indications that their territory ever became a part of his dominions; and the allusion must be to some successful resistance of an attempted invasion of his kingdom by them.

The Gurjaras.

The Gurjaras are known from five records which establish the genealogy shown in the table on the opposite page.⁷ One of the records says that Dadda II. belonged to the lineage of a certain king Karna.⁸

⁷ There are also three spurious records, which purport to register grants made by Dadda II.; viz., the Umêtâ grant, with the date of 'Saka-Samvat 400, = A.D. 477-78 or 478-79, according as the 'Saka year is taken as current or as expired (Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. p. 61); the Bagumrâ grant, with the date of 'S.-S. 415, = A.D. 492-93 or 493-94 (id. Vol. XVII. p. 183); and the Ilâo grant, with the date of 'S.-S. 417, = A. D. 494-95 or 495-96 (id. Vol. XIII. p. 115). And, accepting these as genuine, Dr. Bühler has deduced a longer genealogy (id. Vol. XVII. p. 191), in which, before Dadda I. of my list, whom he calls Dadda III., he places—Dadda I., about A. D. 430; his son, Vitarâga-Jayabhata I., about A. D. 455; and his son, Prasântarâga-Dadda II., with dates in A. D. 478 to 495. But, as was declared by Pandit Bhagawanlal Indrajî (id. Vol. XIII. p. 72) as well as by myself, these charters are unquestionably forgeries, — concocted, in all probability, by the person who fabricated the spurious grant of Dharasêna II. of Valabhi, of 'Saka-Samvat 400 (id. Vol. X. p. 277). And, thus, Dr. Bühler's paper includes a good deal of imaginary history, for which there is no basis in fact, and some geographical mistakes in connection with the supposed extent of the Broach kingdom.

⁸ Ind. Ant. Vol. XIII. p. 79.

A Gurjara Pedigree.

Chapter I.

The Early
Dynasties.

But, who that person may have been, — whether he was a real historical king, or whether the name is simply that of the epic hero Karna, the elder brother, on the mother's side, of the five Pândava princes, — is not apparent. And the other records simply say that Dadda I. was of the race of the Gurjara kings.¹ They also say that he overthrew some hostile Nâgas;² from which it seems that he acquired the territory and established this branch of the family to which he belonged,³ by ejecting some branch of the Nâga tribe.

The earliest records that can be unquestionably allotted to members of this family, are of the time of Dadda II.⁴ Two of them are copper-plate charters which were obtained at Kaira, the chief town of the Kaira District, Bombay Presidency.⁵ One of them is dated on the full-moon day of the month Kârttika of the (Kalachuri or Chêdî) year 380 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 9th October, A. D. 629; and the other, on the same tithi in the year 385 (expired), ¹ In the Aihole inscription of Pulikêsin II., and in various other records, the family or dynastic name is written Gûrjara, — with the long û. But, in the records of the family itself, it is written Gurjara, — with the short u. And this form, which was accepted by Dr. Bühler, is doubtless the correct one.

⁴ In the Epigraphia Indica, Vol. II. p. 19, there has been published the second half of a copper-plate grant from Sâṅkhêḍâ, in the Barêda State, which is dated in the (Kalachuri or Chêdî) year 346 (expired) = A. D. 595-96, and which is very possibly a record of Jayabhata I. or of Dadda I. But the first plate, containing the donor's name and pedigree and the details of the grant, is not forthcoming. And so it is not certain that it is even a Gurjara record at all. — A peculiarity in this record is the fact that the date is expressed in numerical symbols for 3, 4, and 6, used as if they were decimal figures, — not in numerical symbols for 300, 40, and 6.

corresponding, approximately, to the 14th October, A. D. 634.¹ And they both register the grant, to Brâhmans, of the village of Sirishapadraka in the Akrûrésvara vishaya.² Akrûrésvara,—for which the form Akulésvara occurs elsewhere,³—has been rightly identified by Dr. Bühler with the modern Anklêshwar, the chief town of the Anklêshwar tâluka in the Broach District;⁴ and Sirishapadraka is the modern Sîsôdrâ, about ten miles south of Anklêshwar,—between the rivers Kim and Narmadâ. These two charters were issued from a place named Nândipuri, which Pandit Bhagawanlal Indrajî would have identified with the modern Nândôd, the chief town of the Râjpiplâ State.⁵ Dr. Bühler, however, has told us that Nândôd must represent an ancient Nandapadra; and he has identified Nândipuri with an ancient fort, of the same name, which stood just outside the Jhadésvara gate on the east of the town of Broach.⁶ Of the time of Dadda II., we also have a copper-plate charter from Sâñkhêdâ, in the Barôda State,⁷ registering a grant made by Rajagrâha. The first plate, containing the details of the place of issue and of the village that was granted, is not forthcoming. The date is the new-moon day of the month Vaisâkha of the (Kalachuri) year 391 (expired), corresponding, approximately, by the pûrnamânta arrangement of the lunar fortnights, to the 18th April, A. D. 641.⁸

Of Jayabhata III., we have two records. One is a copper-plate charter obtained at Nausârî, in the Barôda State.⁹ It was issued from the camp at Kâyâvatâra. It is dated on the occasion of an eclipse of the moon on the full-moon day of the month Mâgha of the (Kalachuri) year 456 (expired), corresponding¹⁰ to the 2nd February, A. D. 706. And it registers the grant, to a Brâhman, of some land at the village of Samipadraka in the Kôrillâ pathaka. As Dr. Bühler has shewn,¹¹ Kâyâvatâra is probably the modern Kârvân, about fifteen miles south of Barôda; and Kôrillâ is the modern Kôral, on the north bank of the Narmadâ, sixteen miles to the northeast of Broach. The other record is the second plate of a copper-plate charter which was obtained at Kâvi in the Broach District.¹ It registers a grant that was made at the time of the Karkataka-samkrânti or entrance of the sun into Cancer, on the tenth tithi of the bright fortnight of the month Âshâdha of the (Kalachuri) year 386 (expired), corresponding² to the 22nd June, A. D. 736. And it conveys the grant, to a temple of the god Âśramadêva, of some land in the village of Kêmajju in the Bharukachchha vishaya. Dr. Bühler has identified Kêmajju with the modern Kimôj or Kimaj, in the Jambûsar tâluka of the Broach District, about five miles south of the river Mahî.³

² Why the village was granted twice, within so short a time, is not apparent. But the later charter omits the names of eleven of the original grantees, and adds five new names.

Through the places, mentioned in them, which have thus been identified, these records cover the country from the north bank of the river Kîm to the south bank of the Mahî, and so shew the extent of the Gurjara territory in the neighbourhood of the coast; inland, it doubtless extended to the Western Ghats. On the south of it, separated by the Kîm, there lay the Lâta province of the kingdom of the Western Chalukyas of Bâdâmi. And on the north, across the Mahî, there was the Khêtakâhâra province, — the modern Kaira District, with the Cambay State and some outlying parts of the Gaikwâr's territory, — which, as grants of A. D. 590 and 766,⁴ and intervening records shew, belonged to the rulers of Valabhî. On the east of the Mahî, the Gurjara boundary may have followed the course of that river as far north as Lûnâwâdâ; or there may have been, on the north of the Gurjara country in that direction, another Valabhî province of which the capital was Gôdhrâ, the headquarters station of the present Pañch-Mahâls District, — in which case, the boundary line probably ran through the southern point of the Pañch-Mahâls straight to the Mahî on the west and to Chhôtâ-Udêpur on the east: at any rate, Silâditya VI. of Valabhî was in possession of Gôdrahaka, i. e. Godhrâ, in A. D. 760; and, though he may have only acquired that territory when the Gurjara power came to an end, still it is equally possible that his predecessors had possessed it.

The records give to these Gurjara princes only feudatory titles: they style Dadda I. and Dadda II. Sâmantas;⁵ and, though a somewhat higher title is connected with the name of Jayabhata III., still he was only a Mahâsâmantâdhipati.⁶ On the other hand, they mention no paramount sovereigns. And it would seem that, after the overthrow of the Kalachuri king Buddha, of whom Dadda I. and Jayabhata I. must have been vassals, the Gurjara territory became a buffer state between the kingdoms of Bâdâmi and Valabhî. This would explain why the position of Dadda II. was such that he could give protection to the king of Valabhî, — probably Dharasêna IV., — when⁷ the latter had suffered some defeat at the hands of Harshavardhana of Kanauj. Shortly afterwards, indeed, we find Dharasēna IV., in A. D. 648 or 649, issuing charters from his victorious camp at Bharukachchha, i.e. Broach;¹ from which it has been inferred that the Gurjara territory then belonged, for a time at least, to the kingdom of Valabhī. The villages that were granted, however, lay, not in the Gurjara country, but in the Khēṭakāhāra vishaya. And thus, the grants may well have been made while Dharasēna IV. was simply residing at Broach, enjoying the hospitality of Dadda II., after his defeat by Harshavardhana. Later on, it would seem that the relations between the Gurjaras and the rulers of the countries on each side of them, were not so easy: for, the Gurjara record of A. D. 706 speaks of Dadda III. as waging war with the kings of the east and the west,²—meaning certainly the king of Valabhī in the latter case, and either the Western Chalukyas, or some ruler of Mālwa, in the former case; and the record of A. D. 736 seems to say that Jayabhata III. quieted in battle the impetuosity of the king of Valabhī.³ A. D. 736 is the latest date that has been obtained for the Gurjaras. And, evidently, their power came to an end very shortly after. For, the Nausāri grant of October, A. D. 738, tells us that there had then been an invasion by the Tājikas, or Arabs, in which the Gurjaras had been destroyed.⁴ The Western Chalukya prince Avānijanāśraya-Pulikēśin, however, was successful against the Tājikas, when they attempted to carry the invasion on into his territory. And he doubtless then annexed the Gurjara country, and incorporated it with his own province of Lāṭa.

The Pallavas.

The Pallavas appear to have been by far the most powerful and aggressive foes that the Chalukyas encountered. From the time of Pulikēśin II. onwards, there were constant wars between the two dynasties, with varying results. And to such a pitch did the feeling of hostility rise, that, in the Vakkalēri record, the Pallava king is called the “natural enemy” and the “family foe” of Pulikēśin’s descendant Vikramāditya II.⁵

In their records, the Pallavas claim to belong to the Bhāradvāja gōtra.⁶ Some of the records give them a regular Purāṇic genealogy which appears first in the seventh century A. D., commencing with

So also, the Kaśākūṭi Pallava grant speaks evidently of the Western Chalukyas as the “chief enemies” (dvishatām viśēṣhāt) of Mahēndravarmān I. Compare the description of the Rāshtrakūṭas as the “natural enemies” of the Eastern Chalukya king Amma I. (prakṛiti-sapatna; Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 266, and note 1).

the god Brahman, and taken through Angiras, Brihaspati, Samyu, Bharadvāja, Drōṇa, and Āśvatthāman, to a certain Pallava, the mythical founder of the line of kings. And the name of this eponymous person is explained as having been taken from the fact that he lay on a couch covered with a heap of sprouts (pallava).¹ It seems likely, however, that, whatever may be the ancestral and racial origin of the kings with whom we have now to deal, their name simply represents, in a Sanskritised form, that of the Pahlavas, Palnavas, or Palhavas, who are mentioned in the Purāṇas, and in other records, along with the Śakas and the Yavanas. If so, the original introducers of the name were of foreign descent, and made their way into India from the north-west. As regards the period when this may have occurred, Professor Weber tells us that, "as the name of a people, the word Pahlav became early foreign to the Persians, learned reminiscences excepted: in the Pahlavi texts themselves, for instance, it does not occur. The period when it passed over to the Indians, therefore, would have to be fixed for about the second to the fourth century, A. D.; and we should have to understand by it, not directly the Persians, who are called Pārasikas, rather, but specially the Arsacidan Parthians."² And the epigraphic records fully corroborate this view. The Junāgaḍh inscription, and one of the Nāsik records, tell us, — according to Dr. Bhandarkar's chronology of the Andhrabhṛityas,³ — that in A. D. 150 the Palhava Suviśākha, son of Kulaipa, was settled in Kāthiāwād as a minister of Rudradāman,⁴ and that, about twenty years earlier, Gōtamiputra had destroyed the Palhavas with the Śakas and Yavanas, — i. e. had driven them out of his territories more to the east and south.⁵ And the mention, in the Allahābād pillar inscription of Samudragupta,⁶ of Viṣṇugōpa, king of Kāñchi, who cannot well be any but a Pahlava or Pallava king, — i. e. either a descendant of the original intruders, with a Sanskrit name, or a native ruler belonging to a dynasty which had taken, as its name, the nearest Sanskrit approach to the appellation of the foreign race, — indicates pretty clearly that a dynasty of Pahlavas or Pallavas was firmly established on the eastern coast of Southern India by the middle of the fourth century A. D. The Junāgaḍh and Nāsik records shew some of the steps by which the Pahlavas, or their name and reputation, could manage to reach so far to the south-east. And, if Dr. Oldhausen's actual derivation of the name Pallava, through the form Pahlava, from Parthava, i. e. Parthian,¹ can be upheld we may find another early reference to Pahlavas or Pallavas in Northern India, and another indication of a route by which they could penetrate to the eastern coast, in the Pahlādpur pillar inscription² of a king whose name seems to be Śiśupāla, and who appears to be described as a “protector of the army of the Pārthivas.”

The capital of the Pallavas was Kāñchi or Kāñchīpura, which is the modern Conjeeveram in the Chingleput District, Madras Presidency.³ The surrounding territory was known as the Drāviḍa country,⁴ and also as the Kāñchī-maṇḍala or province of Kāñchi,⁵ and as the Toṇḍa,⁶ Toṇḍai,⁷ Toṇḍīra,⁸ Tuṇḍīra,⁹ and Tuṇḍāka¹⁰ maṇḍala, rāshṭra, viśhaya, or nāḍ. And Kāñchi itself was sometimes called Tuṇḍrapurai,¹¹ as the capital of the territory under the latter name. But the records mention two other towns of importance, from which charters were issued,—Palakkada or Palakkāḍa, and Daśanapura,—which have not yet been identified.¹² And the Pallavas had also a province in Western India, known as the Nōlambavāḍi, Nōlambavāḍi, Nōnambavāḍi, or Nulambapāḍi thirty-two-thousand,¹³ which appears to have included the greater part of the Bellāry District of the Madras Presidency, and the northern and north-eastern parts of Mysore:¹⁴ this was doubtless acquired by them about the middle of the seventh century A.D., when they invaded Bādāmi and for the time being overthrew

³ Lat. 12° 49' ; long. 79° 45'.—The name Kāñchi appears to be simply a Sanskritised appellation. Dr. Hultzsch tells me that the Tamil name is Kachchi,—in literature and inscriptions, and on coins. He says that the Tamil dictionaries give also Kañji, but that he has not yet met with it anywhere else.—The form Kachchi occurs in inscriptions at Tirukkajukkunram (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. pp. 284, 285) ; and a fuller form, Kachhippeḍu, is met with in inscriptions at Conjeeveram itself (South-Indian Insers. Vol. I. pp. 113, 114, 117, 139, 141, 143).—Dr. Burnell has quoted the form Kañji in his South-Indian Palæography, second edition, p. x. note 2.

¹¹ I owe this to Dr. Hultzsch.

¹⁴ Mr. Rice (Mysore Inscriptions, p. liii.) has mentioned several places in the Kōlār District, at which there are Pallava records. And another is Nandi or Bhōga-Nandi (see page 332 below). His Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., No. Md. 13, discloses the existence of a Pallava inscription at Tāyalūr ; but this seems to be rather an intrusive Pallava record in the Western Gaṅga territory.

The Early Dynasties.

the Western Chalukya sovereignty; and it passed out of their possession, and into the hands of the Pāṇḍyas, somewhere about the beginning of the eleventh century A. D.: under the Pāṇḍyas, and probably under the Pallavas before them, the capital of this province was Uchchaṅgi.¹ The crest of the Pallavas was a bull,—doubtless intended for Nandi, the servant and carrier of the god Śiva; it appears, in a more or less easily recognisable form, sometimes recumbent and sometimes standing, on the seals of their copper-plate charters.² Their banner was the khatvāṅga-dhvaja, or banner bearing a representation of a club or staff with a skull at the top of it,—another property of Śiva.³ And, from these two insignia, it may be inferred that Śiva was their family-god.

As has been remarked above, we have undoubtedly the mention of a Pahlava or Pallava king, on the eastern coast of Southern India, about the middle of the fourth century A. D., in the person of the Viṣṇugōpa of Kāñchi, whom the Early Gupta king Samudragupta is said to have captured and liberated again.⁴

Next after this, may be placed the information furnished by two Prākṛit copper-plate grants from the Madras Presidency. One of them, obtained from the Guṇṭūr District, records a grant made by the queen of the Yuvamahārāja Vijayabuddhavarman, in the reign of the Mahārāja Vijayaskandavarman.⁵ The other, obtained from the Bellāry

Dynasties.

District, gives us the name of the *Mahārājādhirāja*¹ Sivaskandavarman; the charter was issued from Kāñchīpura; and it is dated in the eighth (regnal) year on the fifth day in the sixth fortnight of the rainy season.²

The Sanskrit charters are certainly all somewhat later than the preceding. And first among them we may place two copper-plate grants which give the genealogy shewn on the opposite page. The earlier of the two grants³ was issued by Vishnugōpavarman, from a place named Palakkada or Palakkada.⁴ The genealogy commences with Skandavarman I.: the title of Mahārāja is attached to his name, and to those of his son and grandson; and Vishnugōpavarman uses the title of Yuvamahārāja.⁵ The charter, which was addressed to the villagers of Uruvupalli in the Mūḍarāshtra country, is dated in the eleventh year of a Mahārāja Simhavarman (I.), whose position in the family is not stated, but who was probably an elder brother of Vishnugōpavarman.⁶ The grantor was Vishnugōpavarman himself.

⁶ My conjecture seemed subsequently to be supported by another grant, from Udayēndiram in the North Arcot District, Madras Presidency, originally published by Mr. Foulkes (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 167), and recently re-edited by Prof. Kielhorn (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 142) which gives the names of the Rāja Skandavarman (II.); his son, the Mahārāja Singhavarman (= Simhavarman I.); his son, the Mahārāja Skandavarman (III.); and his son, the dharmā-Mahārāja Nandivarman, who issued the charter from Kāñchīpura, in the first year of his reign, and granted the village of Kāñchivāyil, in the Adeyāra rāshtra, to some Brāhmins. The genealogy appears to be intended to fit in with that given by me above; and the names in it may possibly be all quite authentic. But the language and orthography are so corrupt, and the characters are so suspicious, that

He is described as a paramabhôgavata, or "most devout worshipper of the Divine One (Vishnu)." And the grant was made to a temple of the god Vishnuhâra, established by the Sēndpati Vishnuvarman at the village of Kaṇḍukûra. In the second grant,¹ the genealogy commences with Viravarman, and is carried through Skandavarman II. and Vishnugôpavarman,² without any mention of Simhavarman I., to Simhavarman II.: to the names of Viravarman and Skandavarman II., there is attached the title of Mahârâja; Vishnugôpavarman. is styled Fuvarâja, as if he never actually succeeded to the sovereignty; and Simhavarman II. uses the title of Mahârâja.³ In this grant, the Pallavas are described as śrîvallabha, "favourites of fortune." The charter was issued from Daśanapura.⁴ It is addressed to the villagers of Māṅgalûr in the Veṅgorâshtra country. And it is dated in the eighth regnal year of Simhavarman II. himself. The grant was made to Brâhmanas, without any sectarian allotment. But, like his father, Simhavarman II. is styled a paramabhôgavata.

To about the same period must be allotted another grant,⁵ the style and characters of which, as well as the town of issue, connect it closely with both of the preceding. The order contained in it was issued from the record itself cannot be accepted as genuine, and as proving anything that is mentioned in it. — At the end of the record, there is a Tamil endorsement, dated in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of Madiraiṅḍa-Kô-Parakēsarivarman, i.e. the Chôla king Parāntaka I., identical in its wording with the endorsement at the end of the Udayēndiram grant of Nandivarman, son of Hiranyavarman, which will be noticed further on. This endorsement appears to be a genuine one, made actually in the time of Parāntaka I., somewhere about A. D. 935. And I strongly suspect that the record was fabricated then, with the intention of passing it off as a charter issued by that same Nandivarman, son of Hiranyavarman, and that, his true descent being not available to the person who concocted it, that person simply put in the first names that came handy to him.

Dasanapura. But only the first plate of the grant has been obtained; and it supplies nothing more, except the name of the Mahārāja Virā-Kōrchavarman or Virā-Kūrchavarman, the grandfather of the donor. The dynastic name does not occur in the extant portion; but the deed is undoubtedly a Pallava record.

And to much the same period must belong the references to Pallavas, without details of names, in the Kadamba inscription at Tālgund,¹ and in one of the charters of Mrigēsavarman,² and the statement that his son Ravivarman conquered Vishṇuvvarman and other kings, and overthrew Chandadaṇḍa, lord of Kāñchi.³ In fact, this Vishṇuvvarman may quite possibly be identified either with the Vishṇugōpavarman of the table on page 321 above, or with the Sēnd-pati Vishṇuvvarman who is mentioned in the charter issued by him.

We come now, chiefly through work done recently by Dr. Hultzsch, to some far more definite facts and dates. And first, from Pallava records obtained at Kūram, Kaśākūṭi, and Udayēndiram, and from the Western Chalukya record from Vakkalēri,⁴ we obtain the genealogy and synchronisms shewn in the table on the opposite page.⁵

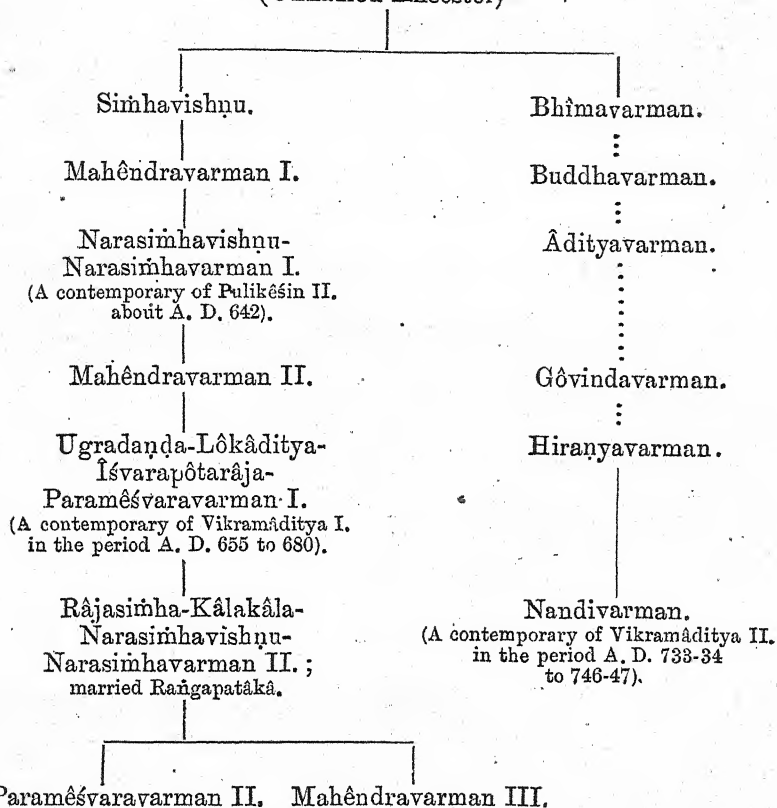

Of the records brought to notice by Dr. Hultzsch, first in order of importance stands the copper-plate grant from Kūram, in the neighbourhood of Conjeeveram.⁶ The historical genealogy commences with Narasiṃhavarman I., who is described as repeatedly defeating the Chōlas, Kēraḷas, Kaḷabhras, and Pāṇdyas, — as writing the word “victory,” as on a plate, on Pulakēśin’s back, which was caused to be visible (i.e., he caused him to turn his back in flight) in the battles of Pariyāla, Maṇimaṅgala, Śūramāra, and other places, — and as destroying the city of Vātāpi, just as the saint Agastya destroyed the demon Vātāpi, in consequence of which, another record shews, he assumed the epithet of Vātāpikōṇḍa, “taker of Vātāpi.”⁷ His son was Mahēndravvarman II. And his son, again, was Paramēśvaravarman I., who, “unaided, made Vikramāditya, whose army consisted of several “hundreds of thousands, take to flight, covered only by a rag.”⁸ The record registers the fact that, at the request of a Pallava prince named

Vidyâvinîta, Paramêśvaravarman I. granted a village to the god Siva, who, under the form of Pinâkapâni, had been installed in the temple of Vidyâvinîta-Pallava-Paramêśvara at the village of Kûra. The period of this record is fixed by the mention of Vikramâditya; he being defeated by the grandson of a king who had inflicted disaster upon a city named Vâtâpi and a king named Pulakésin, it is impossible to accept any conclusions, except that he is the Western Chalukya king Vikramâditya I. (A. D. 655 to 680), and,— if only on the consideration that at least sixty-seven years intervened between him and his great-grandfather Pulikésin I.,— that the Pulakésin of this record is his father Pulikésin II., who reconstructed the Chalukya power at Bâdâmi (Vâtâpi) in A. D. 608-609 and reigned till about A. D. 642.

which has been mentioned on page 317 above; and, after the eponymous Pallava, it places an Asôkavarman, who, as Dr. Hultzsch remarks, "can scarcely be considered a historical person, but appears to be a 'modification of the Buddhist king Asôka.'" After him, it says, there ruled and passed away a number of other Pallava kings, of whom it names Skandavarman, Kalindavarman, Kânagôpa, Vishnugôpa, Virakûrcha, Virasimha, Simhavarman, and Vishnusingha: some of these names have already occurred in the preceding pages; but the present mention of them does not help to settle the relative order of the charters from which they have come to light: it would appear that, when the present record was drawn up, the names of these previous kings were remembered, but nothing definite was known about them, and that the order of their succession, and their relation to each other and to the subsequent line of kings mentioned in the record, had been forgotten. In the connected line of kings, the record first mentions Simhavishnu, apparently known also as Avanisingha, who, it says, defeated the Malaya, Kalabhra, Mâlava, Chôla, Pândya, Simhala, and Kêrala kings. His successor¹ was Mahêndravarman I., who annihilated his "chief enemies"² at Pullalûra: we may safely take these words as denoting the Western Chalukyas of Bâdâmi; and, since Pullalûra is the name of a village in the Conjeeveram tâluka, the Chalukya army had evidently penetrated very far into the Pallava dominions, and the asserted repulse of it is probably to be placed in the campaign in which Pulikêsin II. claims to have made the leader of the Pallavas take refuge behind the ramparts of Kâñchi, about A. D. 609. His son was Narasimhavarman I., who conquered Lañkā, i.e. Ceylon, and Vâtâpi. The Kûram grant has already mentioned the "destruction" of Vâtâpi by Narasimhavarman I., and has supplied the name of the Western Chalukya king in whose time (at the end of his reign) the invasion took place, — viz. Pulikêsin II. And Dr. Hultzsch tells us that the statement about the conquest of Ceylon is confirmed by the Mahāvamsa, from which we learn that the Singhalese prince Mânavarman lived at the court of Narasimhavarman I., and helped him to crush his enemy king Vallabha, i.e. Pulikêsin II., — that the grateful Narasimhavarman twice supplied Mânavarman with an army to invade Ceylon, — and that Mânavarman was successful on the second occasion, and then occupied and reigned over Ceylon. Narasimhavarman's son was Mahêndravarman II. There then came Paramêśvarapôtavarman I., i.e. Paramêśvaravarman I. of the Kûram grant.³ His son was Narasimhavarman II. His son was Paramêśvarapôtavarman II., i.e. Paramēśvaravarman II. of the Kûram grant; further on in this record, he is called Paramēśvarapôtarāja. The record then tells us that, at the time when it was drawn up, the kingdom of Paramēśvaravarman II. was ruled by a certain Nandin, Nandivarman, or Nandipôtarāja, who had been "chosen by the subjects." And it exhibits this king's descent, and his relationship with Paramēśvaravarman II., as follows. The younger brother of the Simhavishṇu mentioned above, was Bhīmavarman. Then came¹ Buddhavarman. Then, Ādityavarman. Then, Gôvindavarman. Then, Hiranya, whose full name may safely be taken to have been Hiranyavarman, and whose wife was Rôhini.² And their son was Nandivarman, to whom the record gives the birudas or secondary names of Kshatriyamalla, Pallavamalla, and Śrīdhara, and the paramount titles of Mahārāja, Rājādhirāja, and Paramēśvara,³ and whom it further describes as a devotee of the god Vishṇu. The record finally registers the fact that, at the request of his Mukhyamantrin or prime minister Brahmasrīrāja or Brahmayuvarāja, Nandivarman, in the twenty-second year of his reign,⁴ granted to a Brāhmaṇ a village named Koḍukolli, which, on thus becoming a brahmudēya, received the new name of Ēkadhīramāṅgala, situated in Ūṛrukkāttukkōṭṭa or, in Sanskrit, Undivanakōshṭhaka, which was a subdivision of the Tondāka rāshṭra, and, by its modern name Ūṛrukkāḍu, is to be placed closely in the neighbourhood of Conjeeveram.

The names subsequent to that of Paramēśvaravarman I. were, indeed, previously known from another copper-plate grant, from Udayēndiram in the North Arcot District, Madras, which was originally published by the Rev. T. Foulkes,⁵ and is now being dealt with more fully by Dr. Hultzsch.⁶ This record, however, lay open to some suspicion: for, at the end of it, there is a Tamil endorsement dated in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of Madiraikonda-Kō-Parakēsarivarman, i.e. of the Chōla king Parāntaka I. (somewhere

¹ Here, again, the relationships are not stated, until we come to Nandivarman, who is called Hairanya, 'son of Hiranya.' But he is also called Bhīmavargya, 'belonging to the branch of Bhīma(varman).' And Bhīmavarman and the others are specified as his sixth, fifth, fourth, third, and second ancestors. And so, whether the succession was exactly from father to son throughout, or not, we have at any rate six generations.

⁴ The year is specified as a current year by the word vartamāna; so also in the Udayēndiram grant (see further on), by the use of the word pūrayati.—I draw attention to this, because it tends to support my view that, whatever may have been the Hindū custom in respect of the years of eras, regnal years would naturally be used as current years.

about A. D. 935); and the characters of the whole record,—both of the original portion, and of the endorsement,—are considerably more modern, not only than those of other Pallava records, but also than those of two other copper-plate grants of Parāntaka I. himself. This fact created a suspicion of forgery. But the final conclusion appears to be,¹ that, in this instance, there is nothing of a spurious nature, and that the grant and its endorsement were copied from a now lost, but genuine, original. And, this view of the case being taken, there is no objection to endorse, as authentic, certain further items of information which this record supplies, in addition to repeating, in slightly different terms, some of the statements made in the Kūram and Kaśākūdi records. Narasimhavarman I., it says, in addition to destroying Vātāpi, repeatedly defeated the vallabha-king, or king Vallabha, i. e. Pulikēśin II., at Pariyala, Maṇimaṅgala, Śūramāra, and other places. Paramēśvaravarman I. defeated the vallabha-army, or the army of Vallabha, i. e. of Pulikēśin's son Vikramāditya I., in the battle of Peruvaṇallūr. And Narasimhavarman II. was a paramamdhēśvara or most devout worshipper of the god Mahēśvara (Śiva). This record represents Pallavamalla-Nandivarman as the son of Paramēśvaravarman II., which appears, at first sight, calculated to induce us to stamp the record as a forgery: the Kaśākūdi grant, however, describes Nandivarman as “chosen by the subjects;” and Dr. Hultzsch has suggested two possible explanations of the statement in the present record,—either that Nandivarman may have thought it politic to give himself out as the adopted son of his predecessor; or that, through sheer carelessness, the scribe, who drafted the inscription, used the word putra, ‘son,’ while he wanted to represent Nandivarman only as a successor, and not as the son, of Paramēśvaravarman II. The record then mentions a military officer of Nandivarman named Udayachandra, belonging to the family of Pūchān, the members of which were hereditary servants of the Pallavas, and mentioned as lord of the city of Vilvalanagara, on the river Vēgavati, which Dr. Hultzsch has identified with the modern Villivalam, in the neighbourhood of Conjeeveram, and near the confluence of the Vēgavati and the Pālāru. And it then describes various services which Udayachandra rendered to the king. The Dramila princes,—meaning probably some relations and followers of Paramēśvaravarman II. who were opposed to Nandivarman establishing himself on the throne,—had besieged Nandivarman in Nandipura; and Udayachandra came to the rescue, and killed, with his own hand, the Pallava prince Chitramāya and others. He defeated the hostile army on the battle fields of Nimbavana, Chūtavana, Saṁkaragrāma, Nellūr, Nelvēli, Śtrāvalundūr, and other places, and thus many times bestowed the kingdom on Nandivarman. At Nelvēli, he also slew in battle the Śabara king Udayana, and seized his mirror-banner embellished with a peacock's tail. In the northern region, he also pursued and defeated the Nishāda chief Prithivīvyāghra, who was performing an aśvamēdha-sacrifice, and drove him out of the territory of Viṣṇurāja,—i. e. out of the land of Veṅgī, the kingdom of the Eastern Chalukya king Vishnuvardhana III. (A. D. 709 to 746),¹—which he made subject to Nandivarman. And, finally, he breached a fortress named Kālidurga, and defeated the army of the Pāṇḍyas at Maṇṇaikudi. The record then registers the fact that, in the twenty-first year of his reign,² at the request of Udayachandra, Nandivarman granted, to a hundred and eight Brāhmanas, a village named Kumāra-maṅgala-Vellattūr, the appellation of which was then changed to Udayachandramaṅgala, and which, through that new name, is to be identified with the modern Udayēndiram itself. At the end of the record, there is a Tamil endorsement, identical with the endorsement at the end of the spurious grant of Nandivarman, the alleged son of a supposed Skandavarman III.,³ to the effect that, in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of Madirai-kōṇḍa-Kō-Parakēsarivarman, i. e. the Chōla king Parāntaka I., the villagers of Udayachandramaṅgala agreed with those of the neighbouring village of Kāñchivāyil, also called Iganmaṛaimaṅgala, to make the two villages into one.

Some extraneous items of information regarding this line of kings, are furnished by two of the Western Chalukya records. Īśvara-pōtavarman, as a variant of the name of Paramēśvaravarman I., is taken from the Haidarābād grant,⁴ which claims that Vikramāditya I. “rubbed out the fame of Narasimha (Narasimhavarman I.), destroyed the power of Mahēndra (Mahēndravarman II.), and surpassed Īśvara (Paramēśvaravarman I.) in statesmanship, and thus bruised the Pallavas;” and that, “conquering Īśvarapōtarāja, he took Kāñchi, whose huge walls were insurmountable and hard to be broken, which was surrounded by a large moat that was unfathomable and hard to be crossed, and which resembled the girdle (kāñchi) of the southern region.” And the Vakkalēri grant⁵ tells us that Vikramāditya II. (A. D. 733-34 to 746-47), having resolved to uproot completely his “natural enemy,”⁶ the Pallava, reached, with great speed, the Tundāka vishaya, attacked and put to flight the Pallava Nandipōtavarman (i. e. Nandivarman, son of Hiranyavarman), who had come to withstand him, took possession of his club-banner and his musical instruments called kaṭumukha or “harsh-sounding” and samudraghōsha or “roar of the sea,”⁷ and then entered,⁸ without destroying it,

⁷ The following special musical instruments of other families are mentioned in epigraphic records: the trivāṭi of the Rāshtrakūṭas of Mākhēd (chapter III. below), which re-appears as the trivale, trivāṭi, or trivāṭi of the Rattas of Saundatti, (chapter VIII.); the damaruka or damaruga, a double drum, of the Kalachuryas of Kalyāṇi (chapter V.); the permaṭṭi of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal and of Goa (chapter VIII.); and the Sāsanadevī-vijaya-bhēri, or victorious drum of a Sāsanadevī, of some of the Western Gāṅgas (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVIII, pp. 312, 313).

⁸ The truth of this statement is proved by the existence of remains of a Kanarese the city of Kāñchī, where he acquired great merit by granting heaps of gold to the Rājasinhésvara and other stone temples which Nārasinhapōtavarman had caused to be built.

And other records of these kings themselves are forthcoming. Of Mahēndravarman I., we appear to have a record in an inscription in a rock-cut Śaiva shrine at Vallam, near Chingleput, in the Madras Presidency,¹ which gives his name in the form of Mayēndirapōttare-saru, i. e. Mahēndrapōtarāja, and allots to him the birūḍas of Lalitāñkura, Śatrumalla, and Guṇabhara, and records that the shrine was made by Skandasēna, son of Vasantapriyarāja, who was a vassal of Mahēndrapōtarāja.

Of Nārasinhavarman I., we have a record in a fragmentary rock-inscription at Bādāmi itself,² which furnishes evidence that, so far at least as a victorious occupation of the town goes, the boast of the Pallavas, that they "destroyed" Vātāpi, is no empty one. The characters alone, especially as contrasted with those of the almost entirely obliterated inscription which lay just below it on the same rock, are sufficient to shew that it is a Pallava record, written, or traced for engraving, by the hand of someone who was a foreigner to Bādāmi. But the contents make the point absolutely certain. In line 2, it mentions Vātāpi and someone whose birūḍa was Mahāmalla; and the passage was evidently to the effect that "Vātāpi, [a city] of enemies, a superhuman or divine [city], [was conquered] by Mahāmalla."³ In line 3, where the metrical portion begins, it speaks of someone adorning a family which, we can now recognise, is plainly specified as the Bhāradvāja gōtra.⁴ And in line 4 it describes him as "the Pallava, the foremost of kings;" while in line 5 it gave his name, which either was Simhaviṣṇu or else ended with those syllables. Now, we have the name of a Simhaviṣṇu at the head of the genealogy given in the table on page 323 above. But there is no mention of Vātāpi in connection with him. Nor is there any mention of the Pallavas in connection with his contemporary Pulikēśin I., who first among the Chalukyas settled at Vātāpi, or in connection with Kirtivarman I. and Maṅgalēśa, the sons of Pulikēśin I., except that the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription would vaguely include the king of Dramiḷa, i. e. the Drāviḍa country, among the rulers against whom, it says, Kirtivarman I. was victorious. It is plain, therefore, that this record must be placed not earlier than, and as a matter of fact in, the time of Pulikēśin II.,⁵ i. e. at the end of his inscription of Vikramāditya II., brought to notice by Dr. Hultzsch (South-Ind. Inscr. Vol. I. p. 147), at the Kailāsanātha temple at Conjeeveram. The record mentions the temple of Rājasinhésvara: from which it follows that it is subsequent to the time of Nārasinhavarman II. who founded that temple (see further on), and, consequently, that it is a record of Vikramāditya II.,—not of his ancestor of the same name.

⁵ Originally, I inferred from this record that Bādāmi was at first a city of the Pallavas; and that it was from them that Pulikēśin I. acquired it. That opinion, however, must be given up.

reign. The name Narasimhavishṇu suits the metre exactly. This name actually occurs, as a variant, in the case of Narasimhavarman II.¹ And there can be no doubt that the name which stood in the Bādāmi record was Narasimhavishṇu; and that this was another form of the name of Narasimhavarman I.

Of Narasimhavarman II., we have a record in the Conjeeveram inscription No. 24, at the Kailāsanātha temple.² This is a record of a Pallava king named Rājasimha, with the birudas of Atyantakāma, Raṇajaya, and Śrībhara. It mentions his father by the biruda of Ugradāṇḍa, describing him as "the destroyer of the city of Raṇarasika," and also by the proper name of Paramēśvara.³ And it thus enables us to determine the identity of the persons named in it.⁴ The hostilities between the Chalukyas and the Pallavas began in the early years of Pulikēśin II., when, in the course of quieting the general disturbances that arose on the death of Maṅgalēśa and of consolidating his own power at Bādāmi, he attacked the Pallavas and drove their leader, probably Mahēndravarman I., back behind the walls of Kāñchi. Accordingly, Ugradāṇḍa-Paramēśvara cannot be placed, as regards the Chalukyas, before the time of Pulikēśin II., and, as regards the Pallavas, before the time of Mahēndravarman I., or of Narasimhavarman I. And, as Raṇarasika was a biruda of Vikramāditya I., son of Pulikēśin II.,⁵ it is plain that Ugradāṇḍa-Paramēśvara was a contemporary of Vikramāditya I., and is to be identified with Paramēśvaravarman I., who is expressly mentioned in the Kūram grant as putting Vikramāditya I. to flight, and that his son Rājasimha is to be identified with Narasimhavarman II. Further, the shrine, round the outside of which this inscription is engraved, is, in the record itself, called

Rājasimhēśvara and Rājasimha-Pallavēśvara, shewing its original name, derived from Rājasimha himself, by whom, moreover, the record says it was built. It is evidently the Rājasimhēśvara temple which, with others, Narasimhapōtavarman caused to be built, as mentioned in the Vakkalēri grant. This identifies Rājasimha with Narasimhapōtavarman, and thus gives another form of the name of Narasimhavarman II. And the fact that some Tamil inscriptions at the same place, of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries A.D., speak of the god of this temple as Rājasimhavarmēśvara,¹ suggests that the full appellation of the founder was Rājasimhavarman, and, so, that Rājasimha, or Rājasimhavarman, was another name, and not a mere biruda, of Narasimhavarman II. Another record of Narasimhavarman II. is No. 31 in Dr. Hultzsch's book,² an inscription in a cave-temple at Panamalai in the South Arcot District, which speaks of him by his name of Rājasimha and his birudas of Raṇajaya and Śrībhara; it is otherwise of interest through indicating that the cave was founded by him, and thus through shewing a point to the south to which the rule of his family extended. Another of his records is the Conjeeveram inscription No. 25; round the inside of the enclosure of the Rājasimhēśvara shrine:³ in addition to giving his name of Rājasimha, it enumerates a great number of his birudas: and among the latter, we may note the following,—“he who has the bull-crest;”⁴ the great jewel of Kāūchī; and the sun of the Pallavas;” and,—as emphasising the fact disclosed by his record on the Rājasimhēśvara shrine, viz. that he was of the Śaiva religion,—“he whose refuge is Īśāna; the devotee of Dēvadēva; the devotee of Śamkara; and the devotee of Īśvara.”⁵ And finally, to him plainly belongs also the Conjeeveram inscription No. 29, again at the Kailāsanātha temple,⁶ which records that Raṅgapatākā, the wife of Kālakāṭa-Narasimhavishṇu “whose bow had become manifest at the destruction of cities,” built a shrine there, and which thus supplies Narasimhavishṇu as a variant of his name, just as the Bādāmi rock-inscription has supplied it as a variant of the name of his ancestor Narasimhavarman I.

Of Mahēndravarmān III. we have a record in the Conjeeveram inscription No. 27, also at the Kailāsanātha temple,⁷ which mentions Lōkāditya “whose valour dried up the army of Raṇarasika,” and thus supplies another biruda of Ugradanḍa-Paramēśvaravarman I.; his son Rājasimha, i. e. Narasimhavarman II.; and his son Mahēndra (Mahēndravarmān III.), who erected a Śaiva shrine called Mahēndrēśvara near the Rājasimhēśvara temple. In the same inscription, the shrine is also called the temple of Mahēndravarmēśvara, from which it is to be inferred that the full name of this Mahēndra was, as usual, Mahēndravarmān.

Chapter I.

The Early
Dynasties.

And lastly, of Nandivarman, we have another record in an inscription on a stone built into a verandah at the Ulahalandaperumāl temple at Conjeeveram:¹ it is dated in the eighteenth year of his reign; and it gives his name as Nandipōttaraiya.

Dr. Hultzsch's researches have brought to notice various other early Pallava records, which, however, cannot yet be allotted to any particular kings and referred to their exact places in the history of the family. The Māmallapuram inscriptions Nos. 1 to 16,² engraved in a very archaic alphabet on the Dharmarāja-Ratha, give the name of a Pallava king named Narasimha, with the virudas of Atyantakāma, Śrībhara, and Śrīnidhi. Nos. 17 to 20, also at Māmallapuram,³ belong to a successor of the above-mentioned Narasimha, named Atyantakāma, with the virudas of Raṇajaya, Śrībhara, and Śrīnidhi, who is allotted by Dr. Hultzsch to probably the sixth century A. D.; from No. 17, it appears that he appropriated to himself the Dharmarāja-Ratha, which had been excavated by Narasimha, and named it the temple of Atyantakāma-Pallavēśvara. Nos. 21 to 23, at the Aṭṭirapachandēśvara temple at Śāluvaṅkuppam,⁴ and belonging perhaps to a slightly later period, shew that the temple was built by a king named Aṭṭirapachanda, who had the virudas of Atyantakāma, Raṇajaya, Śrībhara, and Śrīnidhi. No. 28, in a niche at the Kailāsanātha temple at Conjeeveram,⁵ simply speaks of the temple of the holy Nityavinītēśvara, but seems thus to indicate the existence of a Pallava king or prince named Nityavinīta. Nos. 33 and 34,—cave inscriptions from the Triśīrāpalli or Trichinopoly rock,⁶—mention a king named Guṇabhara, with the virudas of Purushōttama, Śatrumalla, and Satyaśaṁdha, who seems to be indicated as a Pallava king, by a certain reference to the Kāvērī river. And finally, No. 32, a pillar inscription at Amarāvati,⁷ gives us the names of Mahēndrarvarman; his son, Śimhavarman I; his son, Arkavarman; his successor, Ugravarman; his successor, Nandivarman, son of Śimhavishnu; and his successor, Śimhavarman II: it states that the last-mentioned, on his return from an expedition to the north, came to a place which was sacred to Buddha, named Dhānyaghata or Dhānyaghataka, i. e. to Amarāvati: and the chief interest of it is, that it is a Buddhist record: Śimhavarman II. is described as an Upāsaka or lay-worshipper; and, though part of it is lost, it must have referred to a donation made by him to Buddha.

The next notices of the Pallavas belong to the period of the Rāshtrakūṭa supremacy. King Dhruva, of that dynasty, defeated the Pallavas, and took elephants from them.⁸ In or just before A. D. 804, his son, Gōvinda III., conquered, and levied tribute from,

Dantiga, lord of Kāñchi.¹ An inscription at Tāyalūr, in Mysore,² mentions a king named Nolambādhirāja, with the date of 'Saka-Samvat 817 (expired), = A. D. 895-96 : and we perhaps have another record of him in an inscription at Nandi or Bhōga-Nandi, also in Mysore,³ which mentions a king Nolambādhirāja, with the epithet of śrīprithivīvallabha, of the Pallava lineage ; and we appear to learn from an inscription at Kendatti-Maḍivāla⁴ that he was the son of Pallavādhirāja, and that he married Jāyabbe, younger sister of the contemporaneous Nitimārga of the Western Gaṅga family, by whom he had a son named Mahēndrādhirāja. With this son, we may probably identify the Vīra-Mahēndra, with whom the Western Gaṅga king Ereyappa was at war between A. D. 930 and 940.⁵ The Rāshtrakūṭa king Kṛishṇa III. overcame, in or just before A. D. 940, a Pallava king whose name is read as Anthiga ;⁶ and the inscription of his twenty-sixth year, near Vellore in the North Arcot District, mentions a member of the Pallava race named Tribhuvanadhīra-Nulamba, with the śiruda of Pallava-Murāri.⁷ The Western Gaṅga prince Mārasimha is described, in and about A. D. 973, as "a very Death to the family of the Nolambas," and as destroying Nolambādhirāja in war ;⁸ and an inscription at Mēlāgāni⁹ mentions the king, with whom he was chiefly in conflict, as Pallavāditya Nolambādhirāja, with a date in the month Aṣṭādha (June-July), falling in A. D. 974, of the Bhāva saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 896 (expired), when news of Mārasimha's death reached the Pallava king. And an inscription at Kandavāra, in Mysore,¹⁰ gives us the name of a Pallava king Immadi- or Irmadi-Nolambādhirāja, i. e. "the second Nolambādhirāja," with a date in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 977, of the Īśvara saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 899 (expired). After this, however, the available references to the Pallavas cease to mention them as paramount kings, and mostly cease to have any individuality ; from which, it is probably to be inferred that about this time they lost their sovereign power, and sank into the position of mere feudatories and officials. The Western Gaṅga minister Chāmundaīya, whose period was about A. D. 980, is described as "a very Death to the family of the Nolambas."¹¹ A daughter of the Western Chālukya king Irivabedaṅga-Satyāśraya (about A. D. 1000) was married to a Pallava prince named Irivā-Nolambādhirāja, also called Ghatēya-Aṅkakāra ; who in A. D. 1010-11 was governing the Nolambavâdi thirty-two-thousand, the Keṅgali thousand, the Ballakunde three-hundred, the Kukkanûr thirty, and five towns in the Mâsavâdi country, under Vikramâditya V. Records of the time of Jayasimha II., the successor of Vikramâditya V., mention a Pallava named Nolamba-Pallava-Bommaṇayya, who in A. D. 1040-41 and 1042-43 was governing the five towns in the Mâsavâdi country. Sômesvara I., the son and successor of Jayasimha II., perhaps married a Pallava princess; this would explain why his son Jayasimha III. not only had the title of "lord of Kâñchi, the best of cities," and bore the designations of Trailôkyamalla-Nolamba-Pallava-Permâdi-Jayasimhadêva, but also is described as being of the Pallava lineage.¹ The eldest son of Sômesvara I., Bhuvanaikamalla-Sômesvara II., claims to have subdued, and levied tribute from, the Chêra, Chôla, Pândya, and Pallava kings.² His younger brother, Vikramâditya VI., humbled the Pallavas.³ And a successor of the latter, Perma-Jagadêkamalla II., claims to have destroyed the Pallava king, and to have ruled over the Pallava kingdom.⁴ The Hoysala prince Vishṇuvardhana is spoken of as "a forest fire to the country of the chief of the Toṇḍa maṇḍala," and as capturing the Nolambavâdi territory.⁵ His grandson, Ballâla II., is described as terrifying the kings of Lâla (i.e. Lâta), Gurjara, Gauḷa, Chôla, and Pallava.⁶ And finally, the Pallava king is mentioned among the contemporaries of the Dêvagiri-Yâdava king Singhana.⁷ These references, however, are all very vague, and simply shew that the Pallavas continued to exist, and to exercise some kind of power, till as late as the thirteenth century A. D. And the latest individual mention that has been traced, is that of the Pallava prince Karuṇâkara-Toṇḍaimân, who in the period A. D. 1063 to 1112 was a general of the Eastern Chalukya king Kulôttuṅga-Chôdadêva I.;⁸ his descendants appear to have survived till nearly the end of the seventeenth century.⁹

Some detached names.

Before leaving the subject of the early dynasties, we may conveniently notice three other copper-plate records which may, at any time, prove to be of importance in connection with the Western Chalukyas or the Pallavas.

Vijayanandivarman.

One¹⁰ is the grant of a Mahârâja named Vijayanandivarman, the eldest son of the Mahârâja Chandavarman, of the Sâlanikâyana gôtra. The charter was issued from Veṅgîpura; it is dated in the seventh year of the reign of Vijayanandivarman; and the order contained in it is addressed to the villagers of Videnûrapallikâ in the Kudu-hâra or Kuluhâra viśhaya. Vijayanandivarman is described as meditating on the feet of Chitrarathasvâmin, and as being a paramabhâgavata or most devout worshipper of the Divine One (Vishṇu). Mr. Foulkes has said that this has always been regarded as a Pallava record, and that there are circumstances which warrant its classification as such.¹¹

¹¹ Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 170.

Chapter I.
The Early
Dynasties.

But the distinct specification of a different gôtra seems conclusively opposed to such an attribution.

Attivarman.

Another is the grant of the Rāja Attivarman, from the Gunṭūr District, Madras Presidency.¹ It records a grant of some land at the village of Tānthikontha on the south bank of the river Krishṇa-beṇṇā, i.e. the Krishṇa,² and also of a village named Antukkûra. This grant has been treated as a Pallava record. But Attivarman is described as born in the family of king Kandara, which was descended from the lineage of the great saint Ānanda, and was purified by worshipping the god Sāmbhu, i.e. Śiva, at Vakēśvara or Vaṅkēśvara. And, now that we know more about the early history and Purāṇic genealogy of the Pallavas, it is difficult to adapt these details to their accounts, though Attivarman does, like the Pallavas, claim to belong to the posterity of the god Hiraṇyagarbha, i.e. Brahman.³ On the other hand, the name Kandhara,—and, doubtless Kandara also,—is a variant of Krishṇa; and this suggests that we may possibly have here an early Rāshṭrakūṭa record.

Prithivimūla.

And the third is the grant, from the Gôdāvarī District, Madras, of the Rāja Prithivimūla, son of the Mahārāja Prabhākara.⁴ It was issued from a town named Kāndālī; it is dated in the twenty-fifth year of some unspecified reign; and it records a grant, to Brāhman, of the village of Chūyipāka in the Tālupāka vishaya. Prithivimūla is described as a paramamāhēśvara or most devout worshipper of the god Mahēśvara (Śiva). And the record recites that the grant was made at the request of a certain Adhirāja named Indra, who was a son of Mitavarman and belonged to a family that dwelt at a town named Maṇalkudi, and who overthrew the elephant Kumuda that came against the elephant Supratika⁵ which was ridden by himself in the tumultuous combat waged by all the kings who had assembled together to uproot Indra-Bhaṭṭāraka. The reference here seems to be to Indra-Bhaṭṭāraka of the Eastern Chalukya dynasty, who reigned for seven days in A. D. 663.⁶ And the Adhirāja Indra is possibly either the first or the second Mahārāja Indravarman of the Gaṅga dynasty of Kalinganagara.⁷

³ It may also be mentioned that the seal of the grant appears to bear the device of a god, instead of the bull-crest of the Pallavas.—As regards descent from the god Brahman, this was also claimed by the Chalukyas (see chapter II, below); and practically by the Rāshṭrakūṭas (chapter III.), though their Purāṇic genealogy is not actually carried beyond Śōma, the Moon.

⁴ Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XVI. p. 114. — The record is dated in numerical symbols, used properly as such, as well as in words; but without reference to any era.

CHAPTER II

THE WESTERN CHALUKYAS OF BADAMI.

With the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi,¹ whose records, mostly dated in the well-known Śaka era,² cover a period of nearly two centuries, from A. D. 578 to 757, we enter upon a far more definite chapter in the history of Western and Southern India.

The career of the great Chalukya family of Western India was spread over two periods, separated by a considerable interval. The first king, Pulikēśin I., established his power about A. D. 550; and his rule was apparently confined to the territory surrounding Bādāmi. The possessions acquired by him, however, were extended in various directions by his sons, Kīrtivarman I. and Maṅgalēśa. The former attacked and dispossessed the Kadambas of Banawāsi, the Mauryas of the Koṅkan, and the Nālas somewhere in, apparently, the direction

Chapter II.

Chalukyas of

² The epoch or year 0 of the Śaka era is A.D. 77-78; the first current year, as a luni-solar year, began on the 3rd March, A.D. 78, and ended on the 20th February, A.D. 79; and, to convert Śaka years into the equivalent current Christian years, the additive quantities are, 77-78 for a current Śaka year, and 78-79 for an expired Śaka year (see my Note on the Epoch and Reckoning of the Śaka Era; Gupta Inscriptions, Appendix I., and Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 205).—For purposes of accuracy, it is usual, and it is desirable, to quote the two Christian years, in parts of each of which a Śaka year falls; thus, "Śaka-Saṃvat 500 expired, = A.D. 578-79." When, however, an original date contains full details which shew precisely where it falls, it may often be convenient, for extreme exactness, to quote only one of the two Christian years; thus, "Śaka-Saṃvat 500 expired (Kārttika full-moon), in A.D. 578," and "Śaka-Saṃvat 500 expired (Phālguna full-moon), in A.D. 579."—On the general question of the use of current and expired years of the two most commonly used Hindū eras, see Professor Kielhorn's papers on the Śaka and Vikrama eras in Ind. Ant. Vols. XIX., XX., XXIII., XXIV.

of Bellāry and Karpāl. And the latter, in addition to some further successes in the Konkan, conquered, towards the north, the Kalachuri king Buddha, and, by doing so, acquired the northern parts of the Bombay Presidency, certainly up to the river Kim, and perhaps as far as the Mahi. At that point, the progress of Maṅgalēśa was stopped by the rulers of Valabhī, who held Kāthiāwād and the northernmost parts of Gujarāt,—the then representative of the family, whether as a paramount sovereign, or as the local governor for some king of Northern India, being evidently Śilāditya I., for whom we have the date of Gupta-Saṃvat 286 (current), = A. D. 605-606.¹ But there was thus constituted a kingdom which embraced the whole of the Bombay Presidency, excepting Kāthiāwād and northern Gujarāt,—where the kings of Valabhī continued to reign till about A. D. 766,—and, with additions made to it by Pulikēśin II., included also much of the neighbouring territory to the east and south. And, except for a serious reverse, coupled with a suspension of their sovereignty for some thirteen years, which they suffered at the hands of the Pallavas at the end of the reign of Pulikēśin II., the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi held this kingdom until a little more than half-way through the eighth century. They were then completely overwhelmed by the Rāshtrakūṭas; and the family remained in obscurity for over two hundred years. The dynasty was then restored, or, more probably, a side-branch of the same stock was brought into power, by Taila II., in A. D. 973. His successors held the sovereignty for over two centuries more. And then the power of the family finally sank and disappeared. We are dealing now with the earlier of the two periods indicated above.

The accompanying table² gives the genealogy of the Western Chalukyas, from the founder of the family to the last king, Kīrtivarman II. In the records, the dynastic or family name appears as Chalkya, Chalikya, and Chalukya.³ Like the Kadambas, the

³ The earliest form is 'Chalkya,' in the Bādāmi cave-inscription of the time of Kīrtivarman I., of A. D. 578 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 363, text lines 3 and 4; for a lithograph, see Vol. X. p. 58).—The next form is 'Chalikya,' with the Drāviḍian ḷ, in the Mahākūṭa pillar-inscription of Maṅgalēśa, of A. D. 602 (id. Vol. XIX. p. 16, text line 2).—Next comes 'Chalikya,' with the ordinary ḷ, in the Nerūr grant of Maṅgalēśa (id. Vol. VII. p. 162, text line 2; for other instances, see id. Vol. VI. p. 73, Vol. XIX. p. 309, Vol. IX. pp. 127, 130, and Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XVI. pp. 2, 235, where le was formed by mistake for li, and 238).—And then comes 'Chalukya' (which was finally adopted, and occurs most frequently), in the Aihole inscription of the time of Pulikēśin II., dated in A. D. 634-35 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 241, text lines 1 and 3; for other instances, see id. Vol. VII. pp. 163, 301, Vol. VIII. p. 46, Vol. IX. pp. 124, 133, Vol. XIX. p. 149, and Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XVI. pp. 234, 243). In the grant of Kīrtivarman II., of A. D. 757, Mr. Rice's published reading gives 'Chalukya' (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 26, line 4); but there also, as the lithograph shows, the original distinctly has 'Chalukya.'—For the variants of the family name in the Eastern Chalukya records, see Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 95, note 10.—In line 34 of the Nausārī Chalukyas are represented as belonging to the Mānavya gōtra or clan,¹ and as being Hārītīputras, or descendants of an original ancestress of the Hārīta gōtra.² Again like the Kadambas, they claim a certain connection with Kārttikēya, the god of war, and his foster-mothers, the Pleiades. And the usual complete description of them may be best illustrated by quoting the preamble of the Haidarābād grant of Pulikēśin II., of A. D. 612, which, with only a few unimportant verbal differences, was followed in all the later formal records: it speaks³ of "the family of the Chalukyas, "who are glorious; who are of the Mānavya gōtra, which is praised "throughout the whole world; who are Hārītīputras; who have "been nourished by the Seven Mothers who are the seven mothers "of mankind;⁴ who have acquired an uninterrupted continuity of "prosperity through the favour and protection of Kārttikeya; and "who have had all kings made subject to them at the sight of the "boar-crest which they acquired through the favour of the divine "Nārāyaṇa (Vishṇu)." This quotation illustrates the preamble of grant of A. D. 739, of Avanijanāraya-Pulikēśin of Gujarāt (Proceedings of the Āryan Section of the Seventh International Congress of Orientalists, p. 232, and Plate), we have the very exceptional form 'Chalukki.' Whether this stands for 'Chalukika,' as given by Pandit Bhagwanlal Indraji in his reading of the text, or whether 'Chalukya,' was intended, or whether it is a real variant of the name, it is difficult to say.—The form 'Chālukya,' with the long vowel ā in the first syllable, which was used by Taila II. and his successors, does not occur in any genuine document of the early period. It is used, with also the Drāviḍian l in the second syllable, in the Lakshmēshwar inscription, dated in the second year of Vikramāditya II., of A. D. 735 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. p. 106, text line 64; and also in line 52, in another division of the record). But, however admissible this record may be, as a copy, for general purposes, it was not put on the stone till after A. D. 967, and it furnishes no criterion in a detail such as the present one.—The forms 'Chalikya' and 'Chalukya' were perhaps evolved from 'Chalkya,' by the insertion of pronunciativ eals.

² This statement also appears in the Bādāmi cave-inscription, and is repeated in all the subsequent records of a formal kind.—As in the Eastern Chalukya records (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 96, note 11), so also in the western records we find variants of the first component of the word Hārītīputra. The earliest and most usual form is 'Hārītī.' It occurs in the Bādāmi cave-inscription; and other instances are found in Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. pp. 161, 163, Vol. VIII. p. 26 (see the lithograph), 44, Vol. IX. pp. 126, 130, Vol. XIX. pp. 16, 149, and Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XVI. pp. 233, 235, 238, 242. 'Hārītī' occurs in the Haidarābād grant of Pulikēśin II., of A. D. 612 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 73), and in four or five other places. 'Hārītī' occurs in the Chiplūn grant of about the same period (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 50). The 'Hariti' of the Nerūr grant of Vijayāditya, (ibid. Vol. IX. p. 133) is only due to a mistake of the writer or the engraver, in one detail if not in two. The Lakshmēshwar inscription, which was put on the stone after A. D. 967, gives 'Hārītī,' but it is not to be relied in a detail of this sort.—It is plain that, though 'Hārītīputra' may be more correct grammatically, 'Hārītīputra' is the standard form in the Chalukya records, as in also the Kadamba records.—For the gōtra-name itself, see page 277 above, note 5.

⁴ The mothers of mankind are the divine mothers, the personified energies of the principal deities. When taken as seven in number, which is usually the case, they are named as Brāhmī or Brahmāntī, Māhēśvarī, Kaumārī, Vaishṇavī, Vārāhī, Indrāntī or Aindrī or Māhēndrī, and Chāmūḍā. They were closely connected with the worship of Śiva; and they attended on Kārttikēya, who was his son.—They must have some original connection with the Pleiades, derived from the time when the principal stars of that group, visible clearly to the naked eye, were seven in number. Kārttikēya was fostered by the Pleiades (Kṛittikāh); and from this is derived his name of Kārttikēya, and one of his epithets, viz. shunmātura, 'having six mothers.'

their documents, as it was finally settled. But the earlier records contain some slight differences. The Bādāmi cave-inscription of the time of Kīrtivarman I., dated in A. D. 578, represents them as also meditating on the feet of the holy Svāmin, i.e., probably, Kārttikēya, and as having their heads purified by ablutions performed after celebrating the agnishṭōma, agnichayana, vājapēya, pauṇḍarīka, bahusuvārṇa, and āsvamēdha sacrifices.¹ The Mahākūṭa pillar inscription of Maṅgalēśa, dated in A. D. 602, describes them as meditating on the feet of their parents.² And the Nerūr grant of the same king describes them as meditating on the feet of Svāmi-Mahāsēna, i.e. Kārttikēya,³ which statement is repeated in the Sātārā grant of Vishnuvardhana I.,⁴ dated in the eighth year of Pulikēśin II., in A. D. 616 or 617. We have just seen that the Chalukya crest was the vardha-lāṅchhana or boar-crest; in addition to being mentioned in the passage quoted above and in all the similar formal preambles, it appears constantly on the seals of their grants. Their banner was the pālīdhvaja, which is a particular arrangement of flags in rows;⁵ but it is not mentioned in the records until the time of Vijayāditya, whose records say⁶ that it was one of the insignia of supreme dominion, and that it was acquired by his father, Vinayāditya, by crushing some paramount king of Northern India, and add that he himself, pushing on further to the north even than his father, acquired again the pālīdhvaja-banner and also the insignia of the signs of the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā.⁷ From the boar-crest, acquired, according to their tradition, from the god Viṣṇu himself, and from an invocation of Viṣṇu in his incarnation as a boar which stands at the beginning of many of their records irrespective of the particular sectarian subjects of them, it is plain that the family-god of the Chalukyas was Viṣṇu. But, nevertheless, they displayed a considerable amount of tolerance in matters of religion, and patronised the Jains and Śaivas, equally with the followers of the Vaiṣṇava faith.

In later times, there was gradually evolved a legendary history, embodying a variety of inventions devised in order to account for appellations the origin of which had been forgotten in the lapse of time and events of which no very accurate memory had been preserved, which refers the origin of the Chalukyas to Ayôdhyâ or Oudh, and allots them to the Sôma-vamśa, or Lunar Race, in the family of the god Brahman, who sprang from the water-lily that grew from Vishnu's navel. Thus, the Kauthêṃ grant of Vikramâditya V., of A.D. 1009, tells us that fifty-nine kings of the Châlukya¹ lineage reigned at Ayôdhyâ, and, after them, sixteen more over the dakṣiṇâpatha or region of the south, i.e. the Dekkan; that then there was a temporary obscuration of their power; and that eventually it was restored by Jayasimha (I.)² An inscription at Balagâmve, in Mysore, of the time of Jayasimha II., dated in A. D. 1019, states, in the same way, that fifty-nine Châlukya kings reigned at Ayôdhyâ, and subsequently in their lineage there was born Satyâśraya, through whom the family of Brahman came to be called the family of Satyâśraya.³ Another record, apparently of the same reign and dated in A. D. 1025-26, at Kalyân in the Dhârwar District,⁴ says that the mind-born son of the god Brahman was Svayambhuva-Manu; his son was Mânava, from whom came all those who belonged to the Mânava gôtra; Mânava's son was Harita; his son was Pañchaśikhi-Hârîti; and the son of the latter was Châlukya, from whom sprang the race of the Châlukyas. Two inscriptions of the time of Vikramâditya VI., at Gadag in Dhârwar and Kâlige in the Nizâm's Dominions, tell us that the Châlukya race arose in the lineage of Sôma, the Moon, who was produced from the eye of Atri, who was the son of Brahman.⁵ And a later inscription of the same reign, at Handarîke in the Nizâm's Dominions,⁶ introduces a popular etymology of the family-name, and gives us the following account: in the water-lily that sprang from the navel of Vishnu, there was born Hiranyagarbha-Brahman; his son was Manu; his son was Mândavya;⁷ his, Harita; and his, Hârîti-Pañchaśikha; the Châlukyas were born in the interior of his water-pot (chulka),⁸ when he was pouring out a libation to the gods; then a certain Vishnuvardhana-Vijayâditya (a purely imaginary person) appropriated the territories of his enemies; then there reigned fifty-nine kings, commencing with Satyâśraya, lord of Ayôdhyâ; then Jayasimha (I.) became king; and he was succeeded by sixteen others; after whom, the Rattas, i.e. the Râshtrakûṭas, governed the earth.¹ The most full statement, however, is to be found in the records of the eastern branch of the family; and the earliest instance of it occurs in a grant of Vishṇuvardhana-Rājārāja I., of the period A.D. 1022 to 1063. The genealogy there given² commences with the god Brahman, as born from the water-lily that grew from Vishṇu's navel; it is taken through Sôma, the Moon, Budha, the planet Mercury, Parāravas, Āyu, Āyusha, and so on; and the last specific name in this portion of it, is that of Udayana, the son of Satānika. Then comes the legendary connection of the Chalukyas with the preceding. Without any specification of names, we are told that, including Udayana, fifty-nine emperors sat on the throne at Ayôdhya, in unbroken lineal succession.³ Then a member of the family, named Vijayāditya, came to the south, from a desire for conquest, and attacked Trilôchana-Pallava, but lost his life in the attempt. His queen, who was pregnant, escaped with some of her attendants, and, being preserved by a saint named Vishṇubhaṭṭa-Sômayājīn, gave birth to a posthumous son named Vishṇuvardhana. The young prince was nourished; and, having done worship to the goddess Gauri on the mountain called Chalukyagiri,⁴

1 This, with the long vowel ô in the first syllable, is the proper form of the name for the later period to which the Kauthêṃ grant, with the others quoted in the present connection, belongs. The records of that period, however, occasionally use also the earlier form, Chalukya; especially in metrical passages.

² Ind. Ant. Vol. XIV. p. 48; see also Vol. XIX. p. 427, and Vol. XX. p. 274.—There is a similar Purāṇic genealogy, agreeing with it as far as the name of Yayāti, in the records of the Gaṅgas of Kalinganagara (id. Vol. XVIII. p. 170). And another, of the same style, seems to be followed in some of the Kākatiya records (see Wilson's Mackenzie Collection, Introd. p. 74).—A short Purāṇic genealogy of the Sūryavāṇṣa or Solar Race, beginning, in the same way, with Vishṇu and Brahman, but then taken through Marichi, Kaśyapa, and Sūrya, the Sun, was adopted by the Chôlas (e. g., Ind. Ant. Vol. XIX. p. 330).

⁴ With the mountain Chalukyagiri that is introduced here, we may compare the Nandagiri fort which, according to the Kākatiya legend, was founded by Nanda, the son of Uttuṅgabhuja; Nanda's father is represented, in similar manner, as coming from Upper India, and then settling to the south of the Gôdāvari. And, in very similar fashion, the mountain Mahēndragiri,—in this case a really existent mountain,—is introduced into the traditions of the Gaṅgas of Kalinganagara.

he at length assumed all the royal insignia of the family,¹ conquered the Kadamba, Gaṅga, and other kings, and established himself as emperor of all the Dekkan, including seven and a half lākhs of villages, lying between the Bridge of Rāma, i.e. Adam's Bridge or the ridge of rocks connecting Ceylon with the Coromandel coast, and the Narmadā.² The historical genealogy is introduced at this point, with the name of Pulikēśin I. It is connected with the preceding, by making him the son of the second Vijayāditya mentioned above. But, in reality, he was the son of Raṇarāja, who was the son of Jayasinha I.

For the above account, a certain amount of foundation may be derived from the fact that, from the time of Pulikēśin II, onwards, the Western Chalukyas were constantly at war with the Pallavas, who were their most powerful and inveterate foes; coupled with a tradition of the later Kādambas, that the founder of the Kādamba family was a certain Trinētra or Trilôchana. But, in other respects, the account is a mere farrago, of vague legend and Purāṇic myths, of no authority. And the tenth century A. D.,— at about which time, all the great families of Southern India were looking up their pedigrees, and devising more or less fabulous genealogies,— is probably the period to which the invention of it is to be referred.¹ There are, indeed, in the early records, faint indications of some such ideas having been even then entertained: thus, a passage in the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription describes Pulikēśin I. as descended from the god Hiranyagarbha (Brahman);² the Aihole inscription states that Jayasimha I. was preceded by many members of his family, in respect of whom, however, no further information of any kind is offered;³ and a passage which appears for the first time in the grants of Vinayāditya, describes his father, Vikramāditya I., as defeating the lord of the Pallavas, who had been the cause of the humiliation and destruction of “the family (of the Chalukyas) which was as pure as the rays of the moon.”⁴ These statements, however, are too vague to prove that anything had then been devised, at all approaching to the full and detailed accounts which are found in the records of the period after the restoration by Taila II.

² Sētu-Narmadā-madhyam sārāha-sapta-lakṣham dakṣiṇāpatham.—The Narmadā was always recognised as the dividing line between Northern India (uttarāpatha) and Southern India or the Dekkan (dakṣiṇāpatha).—It is to be borne in mind that the record which asserts these details is an Eastern Chalukya record, of the eleventh century A. D. There is nothing in the records of the Western Chalukyas of Badāmi to suggest that their dominions were then known as a seven-and-a-half-lakh country, i.e. (see page 298 above, note 2) as comprising seven hundred and fifty thousand cities, towns, and villages. On the contrary, in connection with Pulikēśin II, their territory is defined, in the Aihole inscription, as consisting of the three Mahārāṣṭras, containing ninety-nine thousand villages (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 244). The references to the seven-and-a-half-lakh country appear first after the period of the Rāshtrakūtas of Mālkhēd, who, succeeding to the sovereignty of the Western Chalukyas, possibly added a good deal, especially in the direction of Mysore, to the territory which they thus acquired. Even the Rāshtrakūta records have not yet disclosed any mention of their territory by the conventional term in question. But it seems likely that the expression did come into use in the time of the Rāshtrakūtas, and that a technical appellation was then adopted, which was retained for some time, even after their sovereignty had passed away, in commemoration of their connection with the territory: for, Irivabedaṅga-Satyāśraya, the second king in the later Chālukya dynasty of Kalyāni which came immediately after the Rāshtrakūtas, is described, in the Khārēpātan grant of A. D. 1008, as ruling over Rattapāṭi, i.e. the country of the Rāshtrakūtas (for pāṭi, = pāṭi, vd li, see page 298 above, note 3); and the records of his Chōla opponent Kō-Rājarāja-Rājakēsarivarman, otherwise called Rājarājadēva, describe the latter as conquering the Rattapāṭi seven-and-a-half-lakh country (e.g., South-Ind. Insors. Vol. I. pp. 63, 65), and Kō-Parakēsarivarman, otherwise called Rājendra-Chōla, the successor of Rājarājadēva, is described as taking the Rattapāṭi seven-and-a-half-lakh country from Jayasinha II., a successor of Irivabedaṅga-Satyāśraya (e.g., ibid. pp. 95, 96, 99). Even then, however, the seven-and-a-half-lakh country was plainly not really looked upon as embracing, as is asserted in the Eastern Chalukya record from which the above quotation has been made, the whole of Southern India; for, Rājarājadēva is described (e.g., ibid. pp. 63, 65) as conquering, in addition to that country, Veṅgaināḍu (the land of Veṅgi, the territory of the Eastern Chalukyas), Gaṅgapāṭi (i.e. the Gaṅgarāṭi ninety-six-thousand), Nulambapāṭi (i.e. the Nulambavāṭi thirty-two-thousand), Taḍigaipāṭi (not yet identified), Kuḍamalaināḍu ("the western hill country," Coorg), Kolla (Quilon), and Kaliṅga (the country between the rivers Gōdāvari and Mahānadi).—The later Western Chālukya records preserve the conventional numerical expression, without the dynastic appellation; e.g., an inscription of A. D. 1103, at Baḷagaṇive (P. S. and O.-C. Insers. No. 171; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 139), mentions the Mahāpradhāna Anantapālayya, a minister of Vikramāditya VI., as managing "the panndya-tax of the saptārḍha-lakṣhe or seven-and-a-half-lakh country.

Jayasimha I.
and Raṇarāga.

The earliest authentic names in the Western Chalukya family are those of Jayasimha I., and his son Raṇaraga, whose designations mean, respectively, “the lion of victory,” and “he who delights in war.” We have no records of the time of either of them. And, among the genuine records of the early period, they are mentioned only in the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription of Maṅgalēsa and the Aihole inscription of the time of Pulikēśin II.; in the former the epithet of vallabhēndra, “the lord or chief of favourites,” and in the latter the simple epithet of vallabha, “the favourite,” is attached to the name of Jayasimha. According to a statement made in the Kaṭhēm grant of A. D. 1009, Jayasimha I. re-established the Chalukya power after a period of obscuration, and did so by conquering a Rāshtrakūṭa king named Indra, son of Krishna, who had an army of eight hundred elephants. But the records of the period with which we are dealing, contain no allusion to any such event, and do not attribute any specific victories, or any historical acts at all, either to Jayasimha I. or to Raṇarāga; and the statement in the Kaṭhēm grant is explained by events which occurred at the time when the Râshtrakûta sovereignty was passing into the hands of the later Châlukya of Kalyâni.¹ Jayasîmha I. and Raṇarâga may very possibly have held some military or executive office under the Kādamba kings of Banawâsi; such a position would have paved the way to the step by which Pulikêśin I. acquired Bādâmi and established his independence. But it seems clear enough that neither of them enjoyed any semblance of sovereign power.² And it may be that their names were simply taken, to be placed at the head of the genealogy, from some grant of Pulikêśin I. drawn up in accordance with the directions of the Sanskrit law-books, which prescribe that the genealogical part of a grant should give the names of at least three generations.³

The son of Raṇarâga, — called, in the Mahākûta pillar inscription, his “dear or favourite son,”⁴ — was Pulikêśin I., whose initial date, reckoning back from the known commencement of his successor’s reign, may be fixed pretty closely in A.D. 550. His name occurs in the various forms of Polekêśin, Polikêśin, Pulikêśin, and Pulakêśin.⁵ He had the birudas of Satyâśraya, “the asylum of truth,” and Raṇavikrama, “the valorous in war.” The Mahākûta pillar inscription, and the Karpûl grant of Âdityavarman, give him the epithet of śrī-prithivīvallabha, “favourite of fortune and the earth :”⁶ but, in the

² I cannot endorse Dr. Hultzsch’s identification of Raṇarâga with the Raṇarasika of the Pallava records, whose army and town were destroyed by Ugradanḍa-Lokâditya-Pâramêśvaravarman I.; see page 329 above.

Aihoḷe inscription, he has the simpler epithet of śrīvallabha, "favourite of fortune;" while, in the formal charters, commencing with the Haidarābād grant of Pulikēśin II., the epithet that is attached to his name is the still plainer one of vallabha, and in the Nerūr grant of Maṅgalēśa, he is referred to simply by that epithet, used there in the place of a proper name,—Vallabha.¹ From the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription, we learn that his wife was Durlabhadēvī, of the Batpūra family.² And the same record describes him as descended from the god Hiraṇyagarbha (Brahman), and as performing the agnishītoma, agnichayana, vājapēya, bahusuvārṇa, pañḍarīka, and āśvamēdha sacrifices. With the exception of the agnichayana, the same attribution of sacrifices is made in the Nerūr grant of Maṅgalēśa, which further describes him as conversant with the code of laws of Manu, the Purāṇas, and the Rāmāyaṇa and Bhārata (Mahābhārata) and (other) Itihāsas. But, in the Aihoḷe inscription and in the subsequent formal charters, the āśvamēdha-sacrifice is the only one that is linked with his name. The only historical fact that we have in connection with him, is recorded in the Aihoḷe inscription; and it is that he made himself master of the town of Vātāpi, which is the modern Bādāmi, the chief town of the tāluḳa of that name in the Bijāpur District.³ His power was doubtless confined to the surrounding territory, which, with the town that he made his capital, he probably wrested from the Kadamhas of Banawāsi. But, that he possessed sovereign powers, is indicated by the title of *Mahārāja*⁴ being attached to his name in all the formal charters, from the time of Pulikēśin II. onwards. He was, therefore, the first king in the dynasty. And the manner in which the genealogy given in the formal charters commences usually with him, shews that he was looked upon as the real founder of the family.⁵ We have, as yet, no genuine records of his time.⁶

Pulikēśin I. was succeeded by his eldest son, Kīrtivarman I., who came to the throne in A. D. 566 or 567.⁷ In the Nerūr grant of

Pulikêśin II., his name appears as Kîrtirāja; but in all the other records he is uniformly called Kîrtivarman, "he whose armour is his fame." The Mahākûṭa pillar inscription describes him as performing the bahusuvārṇa and agnishṭōma sacrifices, and gives him the biruda of Puru-Raṇaparākrama, "puissant in war as Puru," to which allusions are made in some others of the records. And the Nirpaṇ grant of Nāgavardhana would give him the biruda of Satyāśraya; but it is doubtful how far this may be accepted as authentic. Of the formal charters, a few attach to his name the epithet of vallabha; but the majority use the fuller one of prithivīvāllabha, "favourite of the earth:"¹ they all agree in indicating his rank as a paramount sovereign, by the use of the title Mahārāja. From the Chiplūṇ grant, of the time of Pulikêśin II., we learn that his wife was a sister of the Rāja Śrīvallabha-Sēnānanda of the Sēndraka family;² her name, however, is not given. And the same record describes him as "the first maker or creator of Vâtāpi:"³ we have seen, however, that Vâtāpi was acquired by Pulikêśin I.: the statement about Kîrtivarman I. must, therefore, be intended to mean that it was he who began to adorn the city with temples and other buildings; and it was, as a matter of fact, in his time, and under his orders, that at any rate the large Vaishṇava cave-temple there was finished. The Aihole inscription describes him as "a night of death to the Nāḷas, the Mauryas, and the Kadambas," and as breaking up the confederacy of the Kadambas, which indicates pretty well the directions in which, and the extent to which, he enlarged the Chalukya power:⁴ the Kadambas were the kings of Banawāsi in North Kanara; the Nāḷas were evidently the people of the Nāḷavāḍi country, in, apparently, the direction of Bellāry and Karnūl; the Mauryas, as we learn from the Aihole inscription, were a people in the Koṅkaṇ; and Kîrtivarman I. appears to have appointed, in or about A. D. 590, as his governor for the possessions in the Koṅkaṇ which he thus acquired, a certain Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman who, at the beginning of the reign of Pulikêśin II., was stationed in Rēvatīdvīpa, and was governing four provinces.⁵ The Mahākûṭa pillar inscription, giving a larger list of his victories, would claim that they included the kings of Vaṅga, Aṅga, Kālinga, Vattūra, Magadha, Madraka, Kēraḷa, Gāṅga, Mūshaka, Pāṇḍya, Dramiḷa, Chōliya, Āḷuka, and Vajjayantī.⁶ But some of or 490 current, fell in his first current year. And, consequently, his accession took place, on some day still to be exactly determined, in A.D. 566 or 567; on any day from the pāṇnimānta Mārgaśīrsha kṛishṇa 1 of S.-S. 489 current, up to Kārttika sukla 15, the full-moon day, of S.-S. 490 current.

these territories lay so far away to the north and east, that the claim that is made in respect of them is plainly only a mere boast. And the mention of Kēraḷa, Pāṇḍya, Dramiḷa, and Chōliya, has probably not much more substance in it. Vaijayantī, however, was, as we have already seen, Banawāsi in North Kanara, and was the principal capital of the Kadambas; and the reduction of it by Kirtivarman I. is not only implied by his conquest of the Kadambas, but is also specifically recorded in the formal charters, which speak of him as "establishing the banner of his pure fame in the territories of the hostile kings of Vanavāsi and other (cities), that had been invaded by his prowess." And he may easily have come in conflict with some rulers of the Western Gaṅga territory in Mysore, which was adjacent to his own possessions.

We have one record of his time,— the inscription on a pilaster in the verandah of the Vaishṇava cave at Bādāmi.¹ It is dated in the twelfth year of his reign, on the full-moon day of the month Kārttika, Śaka-Saṁvat 500 expired, corresponding to the 31st October, A.D. 578.² And it records that having, under his orders, finished the construction of the cave-temple, his younger brother, Maṅgalēśa, on the occasion of the installation of the image of Viṣṇu, on the above date, granted gifts to Brāhman, and endowed the temple with a village named Lañjīśvara, which³ is the modern Nandikēśwar, close to Bādāmi.

Kirtivarman I. was succeeded, on his death, in A.D. 597 or 598, by his younger brother, Maṅgalēśa,⁴ who seems to have been his half-brother,⁵ and whose name appears in the various forms of Maṅgala-rāja, Maṅgalēśa, Mangaliśa, and Maṅgaliśvara; the first meaning "the

¹ Ind. Ant. Vol. III. p. 305, Vol. VI. p. 363, and Vol. X. p. 57; see also Vol. XIX. p. 10.— For a description of the cave, see Dr. Burgess' Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. I. pp. 19-25.

² This is the earliest epigraphic record, as yet brought to notice, dated in the Śaka era. And it fixes the historical starting-point of the era, as being the rājyābhishēka or 'royal installation,' i. e. coronation, of the Śaka king (or kings).

⁴ His accession took place on some day, still to be exactly determined, from the pūrnimanta Jyēṣṭha kṛishṇa 1 of Śaka-Saṁvat 520 current, in A.D. 597, up to Vaiśākha śukla 15 of S.-S. 521 current, in A. D. 598; see Ind. Ant. Vol. XIX. p. 10.— The Kaṭhēṁ grant says that Maṅgalēśa succeeded as regent during the minority of Pulikēśin II., and peaceably resigned the throne when the latter attained maturity; and it indicates this as the proper custom from which no righteous Chalukya would deviate; but this is only an assertion of the eleventh century A. D. The almost contemporaneous Aihole record simply says that Maṅgalēśa became king on the death of Kirtivarman I., and gives no hint of there being anything unusual in the circumstance. Is it possible that, in the accession of Maṅgalēśa, and in his attempt to secure the succession for his own son, we have an instance of an ancient custom, according to which sovereignty passed to brothers and brothers' sons, instead of in the direct line from the father to his eldest son, then to the latter's eldest son, and so on? This is stated to have been the custom in the Manipur State (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 422). And Major Temple says (id. Vol. XXI. p. 288) that it is the rule throughout the Shan States, and has given instances of it in the Mālēr-Kōtā State, and in the Alompra dynasty of Burma. So peculiar a custom as this, must have some basis in antiquity. And, though, of course, instances could be brought forward to shew that the custom, if it did exist, was not invariably observed,— (Major Temple has suggested causes which would operate against it),— still, the existence of the custom would explain a variety of seeming irregularities in the succession of the Rulers of Valabhi (see id. Vol. XV. p. 273), of the Eastern Chalukyas (see id. Vol. XX. p. 283), and of the Western Chalukyas (see the table in chapter IV. below).

auspicious king," and the others, "the auspicious lord." He had the birudas of Raṇavikrānta, "the valorous in war," and Uru-Raṇavikrānta, "valorous in war as Uru," and the epithets of prithivīvallabha, and śrīprithivīvallabhēndra "or chief of favourites of fortune and the earth:" and he is described as a paramabhāgavata or most devout worshipper of the Divine One (Vishṇu). The important events of his reign were, as mentioned in the Aihole inscription, a conquest of the Kātachchuris, i.e. the Kalachuris,¹ and of a territory called Rēvatīdvīpa. From the Mahākūṭa pillar inscription, we learn that the Kalachuri king at the time was named Buddha: the Nerūr grant gives us the name of his father, Saṁkaragaṇa; and the Mahākūṭa record shews that the victory over Buddha, by which Maṅgalēsa acquired the whole of the northern territory up to the river Kīm or perhaps even to the Mahī, took place before April, A. D. 602. The Nerūr record also states that he slew a chief named Svāmīrāja, of Chalukya descent, who had been victorious in eighteen battles; this person, who was apparently settled in the Koṅkaṇ, is otherwise unknown. The stronghold which was attacked for the reduction of Rēvatīdvīpa, was evidently situated on the coast; for,—the Aihole inscription says,—Maṅgalēsa's army, when it had beset the ramparts, was reflected in the water of the great sea as if it were the army of Varuṇa (the god of the ocean) which had come at his command. And we plainly have a reminiscence of the name of the territory, and very possibly an indication of the exact position of the stronghold itself, in the modern Rēḍi, a fortified promontory about eight miles south of Vengurla in the Ratnāgiri District, Bombay Presidency.² Maṅgalēsa died in the course of civil war between himself and his nephew Pulikéśin II., brought on by an attempt to secure the succession for his own son; his death may be placed in A. D. 608, a year or so before the coronation of Pulikéśin II., to allow time for all that was done by Pulikéśin II., before his coronation, in quieting the general confusion that ensued on the death of Maṅgalēśa.

We have already found Maṅgalēśa mentioned in the Bādāmi cave inscription, which belongs to the time of his elder brother Kīrtivarman I. Of his own reign, we have three records:—

(1) An undated inscription on the rock, just outside the Vaishnava cave at Bādāmi,¹ which endorses or repeats the allotment of the village of Lañjigēśara² to the cave-temple, and appears to make some provision for the garland-makers of the god: this record may have been engraved with the object of making known to ordinary people, in the vernacular, the endowment that had been conveyed by the Sanskrit inscription inside the cave.

(2) An undated copper-plate grant from Nerūr in the Sāwantwādī State,³ which mentions the expulsion of Buddharāja and the killing of Svāmīrāja, and records the grant of a village named Kuṇḍivātaka, in the Koṅkaṇa vishaya, to a Brāhman.⁴

(3) The Mahākūta pillar inscription, from the neighbourhood of Bādāmi.⁵ This is a genealogical and historical record of considerable interest. As regards Maṅgalēśa himself, it says that,—having set his heart upon the conquest of the northern region, and having conquered king Buddha and taken possession of all his substance, and, having a desire to set up a pillar of victory on the bank of the river Bhāgīrathī (the Ganges),—he decided that it would be proper to set up first a pillar of religion; and so he called into his presence his father's wife Durlabhadēvī, and, reminding her that the wealth of the Kalachuri⁶ had been otherwise expended, proceeded to supplement an endowment of the god Makutēśvaranātha,⁷ which had been made by his father and elder brother, by granting ten villages, including Śrīyambātaka, Vṛhimukhagrāma, Kesuvōlala,⁸ Kendōramānya, and Nandigrāma. The this seems too far to the north for Rēvatīdvīpa; the name 'Chorawne' is not unique, occurring again in the Khēd tāluka; and the other place-names cannot be traced at all. I do not find any such names in the Goanese territory, either. But all the places may easily have ceased to exist long ago.

pillar was set up to record the grant. And the date of its erection is given as the full-month day of the month Vaisākha in the Siddhārtha samvatsara, in the fifth year of Maṅgalēsa's reign; the corresponding English date is the 12th April, A. D. 602, in Saka-Sainvat 525 current.¹

It is recorded in the Aihole inscription that Maṅgalēsa had a son, for whom he was desirous of securing the succession after himself. This son's name is not explicitly stated in any of the records. But it is just possible that he is the Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman who in A. D. 610 or 611, in the beginning of the reign of Pulikēśin II. was stationed in Rēvatidvīpa and there was governing four provinces,² and who, as that was his twentieth year, must have been first appointed as governor by Kīrtivarman I., in or about A. D. 590. That this person was, at any rate, in some way or other a connection of Maṅgalēsa, is shewn by his being called "an ornament of the Ādi-mahā-Bappūra-vainśa, or original great Bappūra lineage," which is plainly identical with the Batpūra family from which Pulikēśin I. obtained his wife. The expression may mean that Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman's father was of the Bappūra or Batpūra family; in which case he himself was only a connection of Maṅgalēsa by marriage. But, whether in consequence of his mother being perhaps a Pallava princess, or whether in connection with territorial administration which he held under his father, Jayasimha III., a son of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara I., is sometimes described as belonging to the Pallava lineage. There seems, therefore, nothing in the expression, in the Goa grant, to prevent Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman being a Western Chalukya on his father's side. And it is possible that, like his own father, Maṅgalēsa took a wife from the Bappūra or Batpūra family; and that Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman was his son. But, however this may be, it does not appear that Maṅgalēsa's son ever actually ascended the throne.

Maṅgalēsa aimed,—as we have already seen,—at securing the succession after himself for a son of his own, not mentioned by name. Kīrtivarman I., however, had left certainly two sons,—Pulikēśin II., and Vishṇuvardhana I., whose name means "the increase of Vishṇu," and who was also called Kubja-Vishṇuvardhana;³ and, if the Nirpaṇ grant is to be trusted, also a third son named Jayasimhavarman, "he whose armour is the lion of victory." And there ensued discord and civil war between Maṅgalēsa and Pulikēśin II., in the course of which the former lost his life. It is evidently because of these occurrences, that all the subsequent records pass Maṅgalēsa over without any mention.⁴ After his death, there was a period of anarchy and confu-

² Dr. Bhandarkar has suggested (Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, pp. 39, 47) that the second of these two persons may be the Rāshtrakūṭa Gōvinda I. But there is nothing to shew that Gōvinda I. enjoyed any regal power. Moreover, he seems hardly referable to quite so early a period as this.

⁸ A reminiscence of this is preserved in an inscription at Bhāraṅgi in Mysore, dated in A. D. 1118 (Garn-Dēsa Inscr. Vol. I., p. 557), which, speaking of a conquest of the Chōla king by Sōmēśvara I., says that the Chōla had burned Kālyāṇa, which was the Western Chālukya capital, and implies that he did so in retaliation for Pulikêśin (II.) having (in former times) burned Kāñchī. By the time of Sōmēśvara I., Kāñchī had passed into the hands of the Chōlas.

made allies, while the Pallava army was again dispersed. And so, at length, Pulikēśin II. brought the whole kingdom under his sceptre again, and established himself at the city of Bādāmi.¹ Such is the account as given in the Aihole inscription of A. D. 634-35. It may doubtless be accepted as correct in its general outlines. That all the earlier events recorded in it took place before August, A. D. 612, is established by the Haidarābād grant, which shews that Pulikēśin II. was then in possession of Bādāmi, and, though it does not mention Harshavardhana by name, implies, by the title which was acquired by the victory over him, that that victory had then already been achieved; and they are probably to be placed in A. D. 608-609.

The rājyābhishēka or coronation of Pulikēśin II. took place on some date, still remaining to be exactly determined, from Bhādrapada śukla 1 of Śaka-Saṃvat 532 current, falling in A. D. 609, up to the pūrṇimānta Bhādrapada kṛishṇa 15, the new-moon day, Ś.-S. 533 current, falling in A. D. 610;² and it may probably be safely placed somewhere in the latter part of A. D. 609. His name appears in the variants of Polekēśin, Pulikēśin, and Pulakēśin.³ But he was plainly best known by the biruda of Satyāśraya, which takes the place of his proper name in all the formal charters of his own line, of later times than his own, and in all of the Eastern Chalukya records that mention him. In the Haidarābād grant, he uses the epithet of prithivīvalabha, but, in the Nerūr grant, the plainer one of vallabha; and in the Udayēndiram grant of the Pallava king Nandivarman, he is spoken of, by the last-mentioned epithet, as "the vallabha-king" or "king Vallabha." The epithet used in the Gujarāt records is vallabha. In the Eastern Chalukya records, it is sometimes vallabha, and sometimes vallabhēndra. But, in the subsequent western records, the epithet is always the full one of śrīprithivīvallabha. In his own two charters, he uses the title of Mahārāja, which is employed to denote him in the Sātārā grant of Vishṇuvardhana I., dated in his eighth year, and is attached to his name in the Karnūl grants of the third and tenth years of Vikramāditya I. But in all the subsequent formal charters, the higher title of Mahārājādhirāja is substituted for it. He also acquired the regal title of Paramēśvara or "supreme lord," by the defeat of Harshavardhana which has already been spoken of:⁴ this

An important event of the reign of Pulikēśin II. was the establishment of the Eastern Branch of the Chalukya family in the country of Veṅgī, which was probably made a part of the Chalukya dominions during the campaign that included the conquest of Pittāpuram. The Sātārā grant, with the subsequent eastern records, shews that in A.D. 615 his younger brother Vishṇuvardhana I., who in the Sātārā record is called his *priyānuja*¹ or "dear younger brother," was joined with him in the government as Yuvarāja, and in A.D. 616 or 617 was administering a part of the western territory. Evidently, not long after that date it was found that the kingdom was too extensive to be managed entirely from the western capital at Bādāmi, and Vishṇuvardhana I. was deputed to administer the Veṅgī territory, in the same capacity of Yuvarāja. And then, whether it came to pass through a formal division of the kingdom by mutual consent, or whether there was a distinct act of rebellion on the part of the younger brother, in no great length of time, and at any rate before A.D. 632, Vishṇuvardhana became established on the eastern coast as a sovereign in his own right; and he founded there the Eastern Branch of the family, which held that part of the country for five centuries at least, and remained distinct from and independent of the Western Branch, down to the latest times of both the dynasties.²

The reputation and influence of Pulikēśin II. were by no means confined to India. There is an Arabic chronicle which records the fact that, in the thirty-sixth year of the reign of Khosru II. of Persia, letters and presents were interchanged between him and Pulikēśin;³ and, in one of the caves at Ajantā, there is a painting, depicting the presentation of a letter from a Persian king to an Indian king, which is supposed to commemorate the fact.⁴ The thirty-sixth year of Khosru II. was A. D. 625-26;⁵ and the communication between him and Pulikēśin II., therefore, took place when the latter had been about sixteen years on the throne.

A vivid account of the kingdom of Pulikēśin II., written while he was at the zenith of his power, and probably in A. D. 639, after the date of the Aihole inscription, is given by the Chinese pilgrim Hiuen Tsiang, who travelled in India between A. D. 629 and 645. This person visited the court of Ho-li-sha-fa-t'an-na, otherwise called Shi-lo-o-t'ie-to, i.e. of Harshavardhana-Silāditya of Kanauj; and he describes, and apparently visited, one of the leading cities of the country of Mo-ho-la-ch'a, i.e. Mahārāshtra, the name of the king of which is given by him as Pu-lo-ki-she. And his account is as follows:—“This country is about 5000 li in circuit. The capital¹ borders on the west on a great river. It is about 30 li round. The soil is rich and fertile; it is regularly cultivated and very productive. The climate is hot; the disposition of the people is honest and simple; they are tall of stature, and of a stern, vindictive character. To their benefactors they are grateful; to their enemies relentless. If they are insulted, they will risk their life to avenge themselves. If they are asked to help one in distress, they will forget themselves in their haste to render assistance. If they are going to seek revenge, they first give their enemy warning; then, each being armed, they attack each other with lances (spears). When one turns to flee, the other pursues him, but they do not kill a man down (a person who submits). If a general loses a battle, they do not inflict punishment, but present him with woman's clothes, and so he is driven to seek death for himself. The country provides for a band of champions to the number of several hundred. Each time they are about to engage in conflict they intoxicate themselves with wine, and then one man with lance in hand will meet ten thousand and challenge them in fight. If one of these champions meets a man and kills him, the laws of the country do not punish him. Every time they go forth, they beat drums before them. Moreover, they inebriate many hundred heads of elephants, and taking them out to fight, they themselves first drink their wine, and then rushing forward in mass, they trample everything down, so that no enemy can stand before them. The king, in consequence of his possessing these men and elephants, treats his neighbours with contempt. He is of the Kshattriya caste, and his name is Pulakēsi (Pu-lo-ki-she). His plans and undertakings are wide-spread, and his beneficent actions are felt over a great distance. His subjects obey him with perfect submission. At the present time Silāditya Mahārāja³ has conquered the nations from east to west, and carried his arms to remote districts, but the people of this country alone have not submitted to him. He has gathered troops from the five Indies, and summoned the best leaders from all countries, and himself gone at the head of his army to punish and subdue these people; but he has not yet conquered

"their troops. So much for their habits. The men are fond of learning, and study both heretical and orthodox (books). There are about 100 saṅghārāmas, with 5000 or so priests. They practise both the Great and Small Vehicle.¹ There are about 100 Dēva temples, in which very many heretics of different persuasions dwell. Within and without the capital are five stūpas to mark the spots where the four past Buddhas walked and sat. They were built by Aśoka-rāja. There are, besides these, other stūpas made of brick or stone, so many that it would be difficult to name them all. Not far to the south of the city is a saṅghārāma in which is a stone image of Kwan-tsz'-tsai Bōdhi-sattva. Its spiritual powers extend (far and wide), so that many of those who have secretly prayed to it have obtained their wishes. On the eastern frontier of the country is a great mountain with towering crags and a continuous stretch of piled-up rocks and scarped precipice. In this there is a saṅghārāma constructed, in a dark valley. Its lofty halls and deep side-aisles stretch through the (or open into the) face of the rocks. Storey above storey they are backed by the crag and face the valley (water-course).² This convent was built by the Arhat Āchāra (O'-che-lo).³ Going from this 1000 li or so to the west,⁴ and crossing the Nai-mo-to (Narmadā) river, we arrive at the kingdom of Po-lu-kie-che-po (Bharukachheva; Barygaza or Bharōch)." There can be no doubt that the latter part of the preceding description refers to the rock-cut Buddhist caves in the glen near Ajantā in the Nizām's Dominions;⁵ the towering crags, the piled up rocks and scarped precipice, the dark valley, and the lofty halls and deep side-aisles, facing the valley, and backed storey above storey by the crags, represent most closely the surroundings of the Ajantā caves, and apparently those of no other in any admissible locality. But, as regards the town which Hiuen Tsiang has spoken of as the capital, there has been considerable speculation. Now, the real capital of the Western Chalukya dynasty was, as we have seen, Bādāmi. Its surroundings, however, do not answer to the description given by the Chinese pilgrim; and also, it is under any circumstances inadmissible, because its distance from Broach, 435 miles, is altogether incommensurate with the distance of 1000 li or about 167 miles, which is specified by him as the distance from the so-called capital of Mahārāshtra to the town of Broach. We have, therefore, to look for some subordinate but important town, far to the north of Bādāmi, which was mistakenly spoken of as the capital by Hiuen Tsiang; most probably, because it was the basis of the operations against Harshavardhana of Kanauj, and because, in connection with those operations, Pulikēśin II. happened to be there at the time. And full reasons have been given elsewhere¹ for rejecting certain other places which have been proposed,² and for deciding that the town in question is Nāsik, about 128 miles to the south-south-east of Broach. The Ajantā caves being in the Chândôr or Sātmālā range, just about the point where the range, which finally merges itself in the highlands that form the southern frontier of Berār, turns towards the south, and being, according to Hiuen Tsiang, on the eastern frontier, it is evident, to anyone who has the opportunity of seeing the localities, that the natural northern frontier of the country was the western and principal part of the range, which, forming from Ajantā to near Nāndgaon a conspicuous wall-like boundary between Khândēsh and the country to the south, runs on through Chândor, and eventually joins the Sahyādri chain on the north-west of Nāsik.³ The town of Nāsik lies to the south of the range; i. e., as is required, within the northern frontier of the kingdom. It has been a place of importance from considerable antiquity. And its surroundings answer fully to the details given by Hiuen Tsiang: thus, it is on the Gôdāvarī, which, anywhere along its course, is always counted as one of the great rivers of India; within a distance of six miles on the south-west, there is the Pāṇḍulēṇa group of caves, some of them Buddhist, in which we may locate the saṃghārāma mentioned by Hiuen Tsiang; and finally, as regards the stūpas spoken of by him, one, at any rate, still exists,—near a small waterfall on the Gôdāvarī, about six miles west of the town.⁴

Of the time of Pulikēśin II. we have the following records:—

(1) A copper-plate grant from Goa,—dated on the full-moon day of the month Māgha, Śaka-Saṃvat 532, corresponding, approximately, to the 15th January, A. D. 610, or to the 5th January, A. D. 611, according as the Śaka year is applied as current or as expired,⁵—which mentions him as “the Mahārāja who was the favourite of fortune and the earth,” and records how, with his permission, Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman,⁶ the governor, stationed in Rēvatidvīpa, of four viśhayas and mandalas, granted to a Brāhmaṇa a village named Kārellikā in the Khētāhāra dēśa. The Khētāhāra dēśa is plainly now represented by the Khéd tāluka of the Ratnāgiri District; and Kārellikā may possibly be Kārēl, somewhere in the Rājāpur tāluka.¹ The record is further dated in the twentieth year of the government of Satyāśraya-Dhruvarāja-Indravarman; and this indicates about A. D. 590, in the reign of Kirtivarman I., for the commencement of his administration.

(2) A copper-plate grant from Haidarābād in the Dekkan,² which records that Pulikēsin II. himself, at the city of Vātāpī, granted a village named Mākarappi to a Brāhmaṇ, on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Bhādrapada in the third year of his rājyābhishēka or installation in the sovereignty, 'Saka-Sāmvat 534 expired'; the corresponding English date is the 2nd August, A. D. 612, on which day there was a total eclipse of the sun, though it was not visible in India.³ It is this record that fixes the period of his coronation. And it is also of importance in shewing that Pulikēsin had established himself at Bādāmi before the date recorded in it; and consequently, that the earlier expeditions and successes described in the Aihole inscription as preliminary to the consolidation of his power were at any rate anterior to A. D. 612.

(3) An undated copper-plate grant from Nerūr in the Sāwantwādī State,⁴ the donative passages of which are not very legible, but which contains a mention of Vātāpī.

(4) A copper-plate grant from Chiplūn⁵ in the Ratnāgiri District, which records that his maternal uncle, the Rāja Śrīvallabha-Sēnānanda of the Sēndraka family, granted to a Brāhmaṇ a village named Āmravāṭavaka and an allotment at Avañchapālī on the Vārubennā or Chārubennā, in the Avarētikā vishaya.

(5) A copper-plate grant from Sātārā,⁶ which records that, at a place named Kurumarathī or Kurumarathyā, his younger brother, the Yuvarāja Vishnuvardhana I., granted to some Brāhmaṇs the village of Alandatīrtha, on the south bank of the river Bhīmarathī, in the Śrī-

¹ Mr. K. T. Telang, in editing the Goa grant, proposed (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. X. p. 350) to identify Khētāhāra with Kitiūr in the Belgaum District. But there is absolutely no connection at all between the two names.—The Khētāhāra dhāra of this record is not to be confused with the Khētaka dhāra, or Khētākāhāra vishaya, which is mentioned in some of the Valabhi records and took its name from a town, Khētaka, which is the modern Kaira, the chief town of the Kaira District in Gujārāt.

nilaya bhōga. Alandatīrtha is probably to be identified with 'Alundah,' about thirty-five miles north of Sātārā, on the south bank of the Sivagaṅgā, which is a tributary of the Nīrā, which, again, flows into the Bhīma. The grant was made on the full-moon day of the month Kārttika, in the eighth year of Pulikēśin II.; and the English equivalent of the date is, approximately, either the 31st October, A. D. 616 or the 21st October, A. D. 617, according to what may be the exact starting-point of his regnal years.¹

(6) The stone inscription at the Mēguṭi temple at Aihole in the Bijāpur District.² The historical details given in this record, have been noted above. The direct object of it is to record the completion of the temple, as a shrine of Jinēndra, by a Jain named Ravikīrti, in Kaliyuga-Saṁvat 3735, and 'Saka-Saṁvat 556, expired, = A. D. 634-35,³ while Pulikēśin II. was still reigning at Bādāmi. And it is also of considerable interest from a literary point of view: for, the composer of it, Ravikīrti himself, claims equality of fame with the poets Kālidāsa and Bhāravi; thus shewing that the names of these two poets were already well known, and their fame established, in A. D. 634-35, and fixing a limit later than which they cannot be placed.

In addition to these, there is also a copper-plate grant from Nirpaṇ in the Nāsik District,⁴ which is to be placed in the time of Pulikēśin II., if it is genuine. It first mentions Kīrtivarman I.; then his son, Pulikēśin I.; then a younger brother of the latter, a Rāja named Dharāśraya-Jayasinhavarman, plainly of feudatory rank; and then a son of the latter, the Rāja Nāgavardhana or "increase of the Nāgas," who had the biruda of Tribhuvanāśraya or "asylum of the three worlds," and, judging by the seal, also the biruda of Jayāśraya or "the asylum of victory." The charter purports to record that Tribhuvanāśraya-Nāgavardhana granted a village named Balegrāma, which was in the Gōparāshṭra viśaya and is to be identified with the modern Belgaum-Tarālāhā in the Nāsik District, for the purposes of the worship of the god Śiva under the name of Kapālēśvara. The record is not dated; but the mention of Pulikēśin II., and of no later member of the paramount line, shews that it belongs, or was intended to belong, to his time.¹

¹ The Chīpurupalle grant of Vishṇuvardhana I., of the 7th July, A. D. 632 (Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 15), also falls within the period of the reign of Pulikēśin II., and mentions him as the Mahārāja Satyāśraya. But Vishṇuvardhana I. was then himself a Mahārāja, in independent possession of the territory on the eastern coast. And the record does not bear upon the history of the Western Chalukyas; except in shewing that the formal separation of the two branches of the Chalukya family had taken place before the time when it was drawn up.

The reign of Pulikēśin II. ended in disaster. Doubtless in retaliation for the defeat inflicted on them by him in his early years, the Pallavas, now under Narasimhavarman I., who is described in the Pallava records as putting Pulikēśin I. to flight in battle at Pariyala, Maṇimaṅgala, Śūramāra, and other places, and writing the word "victory" on his back as on a plate, and as destroying the city of Vātāpi, invaded the Western Chalukya dominions, and attacked and laid waste Bādāmi.² The event must be placed after A. D. 634-35, which is the date of the Aihole inscription, and before A. D. 655, which is the earliest ascertainable date for Vikramāditya I. From an indication afforded by a record which will be noticed just below, it must also probably be placed before A.D. 643. And it may, with a close approximation to the truth, be placed in A.D. 642, which allows Pulikēśin II. a reign of about thirty-two years. The "destruction" of Vātāpi undoubtedly denotes more particularly a desecration of the temples there and in the surrounding territory: the family-god of the Pallavas being Śiva, and of the Chalukyas Viṣṇu, the conquest of the country would naturally be attended by a spoliation of the Vaiṣṇava shrines; and the records of Vikramāditya I. specifically state¹ that the grants to gods and Brāhmanas were confiscated by the invading kings.

¹ Without definitely stamping as unauthentic the names that are given in this record, I would draw attention to the following points, which render the record itself extremely suspicious. In the first place, it gives to Kirtivarman I. the virūda of Satyāśraya, which is not borne out by the undoubtedly authentic documents of the Bādāmi line itself. In the second place, it styles Pulikēśin II. a paramandhēśvara or most devout worshipper of the god Mahēśvara (Śiva), and describes him as meditating on the feet of (a previous) Nāgavardhana: these points, again, are not supported by any of the unquestionable records; and the first unchallengeable occurrence of the name Nāgavardhana is in connection with Vikramāditya I. And in the third place, it speaks of him as acquiring the three hereditary kingdoms of the Chēras, the Chōjas, and the Pāṇḍyas, by means of a charger named Kaṇṭhachitra: but none of the indisputable records mention any charger of Pulikēśin II.; and the name seems to be taken, by a mistake, from the name of Chitrakanṭha, the charger of Vikramāditya I. This last point, in particular, suggests that the record is not a genuine one; and that it was fabricated after the restoration of the dynasty by Vikramāditya I.—In addition to possibly this Nirpaṇ grant and the Pimpalner grant from Khāndēś (see page 344 above, note 6), there are two plainly spurious records which purport to belong to the time of Pulikēśin II. One is the copper-plate grant from Hosūr near Bangalore (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. pp. 89, 96, with a lithograph in Vol. IX. p. 304; for the translation, see also Mysore Inscriptions, p. 298), which purports to give the name of a supposed daughter, Ambērā (not of a son, Ambēra, as is indicated by Mr. Rice's rendering: the text being corrupt, a son may possibly have been intended; but it is a daughter who is actually mentioned and named by the text, as it stands), and to record that she granted to some Brāhman a village named Periyāla in the Koṇikal viśaya. And the other is the copper-plate grant from Kāndalgaon in the Ratnāgiri District (Ind. Ant. Vol. XIV. p. 330), which purports to be dated in his fifth year, and to record the grant, to a Brāhman, of a village named Pirigipa, on the north bank of the river Mahānadi, in Rēvatīdvīpa.—Also, a stone inscription which formerly existed at Aminbhavi in the Dhārwar District, of the time of Vikramāditya VI., and dated in A. D. 1113 (Carn. Dēsa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 672: I had a search made for the original stone about ten years ago, but, like many of the inscriptions that were in existence in Sir Walter Elliot's time, it was not forthcoming), included a passage from some spurious record on stone or copper which purported to record that, while reigning at the capital of Kisuvola, on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on Thursday the new-moon day of the month Vaiśākha of the Sarvajit samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 488 by mistake for 489 expired, = A. D. 567-68, Pulikēśin II. made certain grants to the god Kalidēva of Ammaiyyanabhavi, which was an agrahāra in the Kundūr five-hundred of the Palasige viśaya.—An inscription at Lakshmēśwar (Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. p. 110, the second part of the record, lines 51 to 61), which, even if a true copy of an original, is at the best only a copy and was only put on the stone after A. D. 967, mentions a Satyāśraya who is probably intended to be Pulikēśin II., and seems to give him also the name of Ereyya, and purports to record a grant of land to the Jain temple called Śaṅkha-Jinēndra by his feudatory Durgasakti of the Sēndraka family (see page 292 above).

For the interval that followed, we have at present only two records:—

(1) One is the Kaira grant of Vijayarāja or Vijayavarmanarāja,² which, by disclosing the existence of a feudatory branch of the Chalukya family in Gujārāt,—or, speaking more strictly, in the Lāṭa division of the Koṅkan,—furnishes corroboration of the statement of the Aihole inscription that Pulikēśin II. subdued the Lāṭas and the Gurjaras, and shews that he recovered, up to the river Kīm at any rate, the northern provinces of the kingdom that had been put together by his predecessor. The genealogy given in this record commences with a Chalukya prince named Jayasimharāja; his son was the Rāja Buddhavarman, "he whose armour is Buddha," to whose name are attached the epithet vallabha and the biruda Raṇavikrānta; and the latter's son was Vijayarāja, "the king of victory," or, as he is styled in the cancelled grant, the Rāja Vijayavarman, "he whose armour is victory." The charter was issued from his camp at a town named Vijayapura; and it records a grant of the village of Pariyaya, on the east of Sandhiyara, in the Kāśākūla vishaya, to the priests and religious students of Jambūsara. Vijayapura has not been identified.³ But, as pointed out by Dr. Bühler,⁴ Pariyaya is the modern Pariyā, in the Ōlpād tāluka, Śurat District; Sandhiyara is the modern Sandhier, a few miles to the west of Pariyā; the Kāśākūla or Kāśākūla vishaya, which is mentioned again in the grant, dated in A. D. 757, of the Rāshtrakūṭa Kakkarāja II. of Gujārāt, was evidently the country on the northern bank of the Tapti; and Jambūsara is, of course, Jambūsar, the head-quarters of the tāluka of the same name in the Broach District.⁵ The charter is dated on the full-

⁵ Pariyā and Sandhier are on the south of the river Kīm, as is required in accordance with my delimitation of the Lāṭa country (page 310 above). Jambūsar is on the north of the Kīm (and of the Narmadā),—in what was the Gurjara country. But it is moon day of the month Vaiśākha of the (Kalachuri or Chêdi) year 394 (expired);¹ and the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 9th April, A.D. 643.² The use of the title Rāja shews that Jayasimha and his son and grandson were of only feudatory rank, and that, at some time previous to the date of the record, Vijayavarman had been in charge of this part of the country under Pulikēśin II. No indication is given as to the relationship between Jayasimha and the Chalukyas of Bādāmi; and, consequently, he and his son and grandson cannot yet be referred with any certainty to a definite place in the genealogy.³ And this omission to indicate the relationship, or to make any reference at all to the paramount line, seems a plain indication that, when this charter was issued, the latter had experienced disaster, and that the Chalukyas of Gujarāt, while not exactly prepared to assert independence, were in doubt as to what supreme authority they should recognise. It is for this reason that the downfall of Pulikēśin II., and the sacking of Bādāmi, must probably be placed before A.D. 643.

(2) The other is the grant of Prithivīvallabha-Nikumbhallaśakti, of the Sēndraka family, from Bagumrā in the Barōda territory.⁴ It records the grant, to a Brāhman, of the village of Balisa in the Trēyan-nāhāra vishaya, which names are identified by Dr. Bühler with the modern Tēn, near Bārdōli, and Wanesa or Wanisa, south-east of Tēn, mentioned simply as the residence of the grantees. The mention of it does not imply that Vijayavarman had any territorial rights over the place; it simply suggests friendly relations between the inhabitants of the Gurjara and the Chalukya territories.

³ I have long ago (c. g., Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 292, note 10) abandoned my original identification of this Jayasimha with Jayasimha I., the father of Raṇarāga. I then (loc. cit.) proposed to identify him either with the Dharāśraya-Jayasimhavarman of the Nirpan grant, who is represented as a younger brother of Pulikēśin II.; or else with the Dharāśraya-Jayasimhavarman of the Nausāri and Balsār grants, who was a younger brother of Vikramāditya I. The latter suggestion was afterwards adopted by Dr. Bhandarkar (Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, p. 42). But it is not tenable; for it would make Pulikēśin II. contemporaneous with a great-grandson, at a time when the latter was of sufficient age to have exercised feudatory authority. And as regards the former suggestion, though it has been endorsed by Dr. Bühler (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 199), and though, if we accept the Nirpan grant at least so far as proving that Pulikēśin II. really had a younger brother named Jayasimhavarman, there may be nothing in the dates to raise a substantial objection to the identification of that brother with the Jayasimharāja of the Kaira grant, still, if regard is paid to the generations, the Jayasimharāja of the Kaira grant may equally well be made contemporaneous with Pulikēśin I., and may be taken as a younger brother of that person, named after the grandfather Jayasimha I. Pending the acquisition of some distinct hint one way or the other, I think it is better to keep the three names given in the Kaira grant, in a place apart from the main line of the family.

in the Barôda territory.¹ The grant was made on the new-moon day of the month Bhâdrapada, in the (Kalachuri) year 406 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 8th August, A. D. 655. Here, again, though the Sêndrakas were a feudatory family, and in former times, at any rate, under the Western Chalukyas, by whom they appear to have been introduced into Gujarât, and though no sovereign titles are assumed by them in this record, no mention is made of any paramount king. The inference is that this record also belongs to the period when the Western Chalukya sovereignty was in abeyance. From this record, it also seems likely that the first Gujarât branch of the Chalukya family ended with Vijayavarmarâja, and that the Sêndrakas succeeded to the government of the Lâta province pending the establishment of another feudatory branch of the Chalukyas.

The supremacy of the Chalukyas was eventually re-established by Vikramâditya I., "the sun of valour," one of the sons of Pulikêsin II.² The records describe him as the priya-tanaya, or "dear or favourite son," of his father; and this, especially in connection with the facts that he was not the eldest son, and that the expression is applied to him even in the charters issued by his elder brother Chandrâditya, seems to indicate that he had been specially selected by his father for the succession.³ Like his father, he had the biruda of Satyâsraya; but also that of Raṇarasika, "delighting in war," which occurs in his Haidarâbâd grant, and is used to denote him in two Pallava inscriptions at Conjeeveram:⁴ and his epithet was śrīprithivīrallabha. In his own records, he uses the paramount titles of Mahârâjâdhirâja and Paramêśvara; and the Nausârî grant of Sryâsraya-Silâditya, with some of the later records, adds to these titles that of Bhattâraka, "the worshipful one." This latter record also describes him as a paramamâhêśvara, or most devout worshipper of the god Mahêśvara (Siva), and as meditating on the feet of a god or teacher named Nâgavardhana.

The records say that Vikramâditya I. conquered in many battles, by means of his charger Chitrakanṭha, and with the edge of his sword; that he acquired for himself the regal fortune of his father, which had been interrupted by three kings, and so brought the whole kingdom under the sway of himself as sole ruler; that, with his own mouth, he re-established the grants to gods and Brâhmanas which had been confiscated by the three kings in question; and that, defeating the hostile

Vikramâditya I.

¹ Têṇ and Wanesa or Wanisa are on the south, not only of the Kîm, as required, but also of the Tapti.

² The Kanthêrî grant of A. D. 1009 (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVI. p. 17), with certain other records that follow the same draft, introduces two more generations into the genealogy: it gives a person named Neḍamari as the son of Pulikêsin II., and an Âdityavarman as the son of Neḍamari; and it makes Vikramâditya I. the son of this Âdityavarman, and thus the great-grandson, instead of the son, of Pulikêsin II. But this is a pure mistake, based on imperfect tradition, which it is unnecessary even to criticise.—The name of Âdityavarman, as the supposed father of Vikramâditya I., very possibly owed its existence to his really having had a brother of that name (see page 367 below). The name of Neḍamari may have some connection with the fictitious name of the daughter, Ambêrâ (or son, Ambêra), who is allotted to Pulikêsin II. by the spurious Hosdr grant (see page 358 above, note 1).

kings in battle in country after country, he acquired the fortune and sovereignty of his ancestors.¹ The reference to three kings here is explained by the Haidarābād grant, which tells us that he rubbed out the fame of Narasimha (i.e. the Pallava king Narasimhavarman I.), destroyed the power of Mahēndra (i.e. Mahēndravarman II.), and surpassed Īśvara (i.e. Paramēśvaravarman I.) in statesmanship; and thus bruised or crushed the Pallavas, and that, "conquering Īśvarapōtarāja (i.e., again, Paramēśvaravarman I.), he took Kāñchī, whose huge walls were insurmountable and hard to be broken, which was surrounded by a large moat that was unfathomable and hard to be crossed, and which resembled the girdle (kāñchī) of the southern region."² And from this we learn that the Chalukya sovereignty remained in abeyance during the remainder of the reign of Narasimhavarman I., under whom the Pallavas took and devastated Bādāmi,³ the whole of the time of Mahēndravarman II., and the first part of the reign of Paramēśvaravarman I.; and that it was by overthrowing Paramēśvaravarman I., that Vikramāditya I. recovered the kingdom. His success can only have been achieved after a protracted struggle, commenced probably a long time before the period to which the records point for the formal beginning of his reign. And it would appear that he was not at once, or at all easily, victorious: for, the Pallava records represent Paramēśvaravarman I. as defeating him in battle at a place named Peruvalanallūr,—saying that Paramēśvaravarman, unaided, made Vikramāditya, whose army consisted of several hundreds of thousands, take to flight, covered only by a rag; and they even claim that Paramēśvaravarman destroyed his city, i.e. Bādāmi. Subsequent records describe Vikramāditya I. as receiving, by surrender, the town of Kāñchī, after defeating the lord of the Pallavas who had been the cause of the humiliation and destruction of his family,—as humbling the pride of the three kings of Chōla, Pāṇḍya, and Kēraḷa,—as having obeisance done to him by the lord of Kāñchī, who had bowed down to none other,—and as thus becoming the lord of the whole earth included within the three oceans.⁴ Others add the Kalabhras to the list of kings whose pride he humbled.⁵ And they shew that he was greatly assisted by his son and grandson: of the former, Vinayāditya, it is said that, at the command of his father, he arrested the excessively exalted power of the three kings of Chōla, Pāṇḍya, and Kēraḷa, and of the Pallavas, and thus gratified his father's mind by bringing all the provinces into a state of quiet;⁶ and of the latter, Vijayāditya, it is said that, while his grandfather was successfully dealing with his enemies in the south, he himself completely rooted out all the troubles that had beset the kingdom,¹ meaning, probably, that he established and maintained peace and order in the home provinces.

Here, trairājya reads, at first sight, exactly as if it qualifies Pallava or Kāñchīpati; and it was so interpreted by me,—“arrested the extremely exalted power of the Pallavas, whose kingdom consisted of three component dominions.” But it is really explained by the expression Chōla-Pāṇḍya-Kēraḷa-dharanādhara, “the three kings of Chōla, Pāṇḍya, and Kēraḷa,” which stands in the sentence before it.

That all this was accomplished before at any rate A. D. 671, is shewn by the Nausāri grant of Śryāśraya-Silāditya of Gujarāt,² which, dated in January of that year, mentions Vikramāditya I. as having overcome the Pallavas with unrepulsed prowess. But the conquest of the hostile kings in country after country, with the recovery of his ancestral fortune and sovereignty, is mentioned in the charters of Chandrāditya, one of which, dated on the 23rd September A. D. 659, and in the fifth regnal year, indicates,—whether the year be that of Chandrāditya or of Vikramāditya I.,—that the restoration of the sovereignty had been effected before the same date in A. D. 655. On the other side, from the Bagumrā grant of the Sēndraka prince Prithivīvallabha-Nikum-bhallaśakti, we have found reasons for inferring that it was not effected till after the 8th August, immediately preceding. And we shall, therefore, probably be very close to the mark, if we place the formal commencement of his reign somewhere in the autumn of that same year, A. D. 655. This gives about thirteen years for the interval which followed the downfall of Pulikēśin II.; and about twenty-five years for the duration of the reign of Vikramāditya I. And the localities covered by the records of his time in which places are mentioned that can be identified,—Nausāri in the Barōda State, Koehrēm in the Ratnāgiri District, and Ratnāgiri in the southernmost parts of the Bellāry District,—suffice to shew that he really did recover the whole of the Western Chalukya dominions.

Of the time of Vikramāditya I., we have the following records :—

(1) A copper-plate grant from the Karṇūl District, Madras Presidency,³ which records that, in the third year of his reign, on the full-moon day on which the festival of the saṃgama-mahāyātrā was held, Vikramāditya I. granted to a Brāhmaṇ some land at a village named Ratnāgiri, in the Nalavādi vishaya, which is probably the modern Ratnāgiri,⁴ about thirteen miles south-west of Madakaśirā, the chief town of the Madakaśirā tāluka of the Bellāry District. No reference is made to the Śaka or any other era. But, accepting the conclusion that the commencement of the reign may be placed in A. D. 655, the corresponding English date may be placed in A. D. 657.

(2) Another copper-plate grant from the Karṇūl District,⁵ which records that, in the tenth year of his reign, on the full-moon day of the month Āshāḍha, at the request of the Rāja Dēvaśakti of the Sēndraka family, Vikramāditya I. granted to some Brāhmaṇs some lands at a village named Rattagiri on the west bank of the river Andirikā.¹ Here, again, no era is quoted; but the corresponding English date may be taken to be, approximately, the 15th June, A. D. 664.

(3) A Gujarāt Chalukya copper-plate grant from Nausāri in the Parōda State.² It first mentions Pulikēśin II.; and then his son Satyāśraya-Vikramāditya I., whom it describes as a paramamahēśvara or most devout worshipper of the god Mahēśvara,—as meditating on the feet of his parents and of the illustrious or holy Nāgavardhana,³—and as having overcome the Pallava family with unrepulsed prowess. It next mentions another son of Pulikēśin II., named Dharāśraya-Jayasimhavarman,⁴ whose dignity or prosperity, it says, had been augmented by his elder brother Vikramāditya I. It then mentions a son of Jayasimhavarman, the Yuvarāja Śilāditya, “the sun of good character,” to whom the seal gives the biruda of Śryāśraya, the “asylum of Fortune.” And it then records that, while resident or encamped at Navasārikā, Śryāśraya-Śilāditya granted to some Brāhman a village named Āsattigrāma, in the Kāṇḍavalāhāra vishaya, which was in the Thāhīrikā vishaya. The grant was made on the thirteenth day of the bright fortnight of the month Māgha, in the (Kalachuri) year 421 (expired); and the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 30th January, A. D. 671.⁵ Of the places mentioned in this record, Dr. Bühler has identified Navasārikā with Nausāri itself, and Āsattigrāma with Ashtgām or Astgām, a few miles to the south-east of Nausāri.⁶ This record and the other⁷ of Śryāśraya-Śilāditya, both describing him as Yuvarāja, indicate the same dates, A. D. 671 and 692, for his father Dharāśraya-Jayasimhavarman.

(4) A copper-plate grant from Haidarābād in the Dekkan,⁸ which records that Vikramāditya I. granted to some Brāhman a village named Chintakuṇṭha, on the east of the village of Kandugul, in the

⁴ In line 9 of the present grant, the biruda is distinctly Dhārāśraya, with the long d in the first syllable (see the Plate); and it was so given by Pandit Bhagwanlal Indraji in his reading of the text, though in his remarks he substituted the short a (in his translation, the biruda is omitted). But, in lines 13, 17, of the Surat and Nausāri grants of Śryāśraya-Śilāditya and Avanijanāśraya-Pulikēśin (Proceedings of the Aryan Section of the Seventh International Congress of Orientalists, p. 211 ff.; see the Plates), it is distinctly Dhārāśraya, with the short a. And Dhārāśraya, ‘asylum of the earth,’ seems a more probable appellation than Dhārāśraya, ‘asylum of the sword-edge,’ or ‘he whose refuge is the sword-edge.’—In the Nirpan grant, also (see page 357 above), the biruda of the Jayasimhavarman who is there mentioned is distinctly Dhārāśraya, with the short a (see the Plate).

Kaṇṇa vishaya. This record is not dated, either in a regnal year, or with reference to any era.¹

To the time of Vikramāditya I. we have also to refer two copper-plate records which mention an elder brother of his, named Chandrāditya or "moon-sun :"—

One is a grant from Nerūr, in the Sāwantwādī State.² It mentions first Kīrtivarman I. ; then his son, Satyāśraya, i.e. Pulikēśin II. ; then the latter's son, Vikramāditya I. ; and then the latter's elder brother, Chandrāditya. With the name of Chandrāditya there is coupled the epithet prithivīvallabha ; and also the title Mahārāja, which had then come to denote feudatory rank. The object of the record is to state that, in the fifth year of the reign or government, on the second tithi of the bright fortnight of the month Āsvayuja, at the autumnal equinox, Chandrāditya's wife, Vijayabhattachārikā, granted to a Brāhman some land in (a village named) Tarakāgāhara. No era is quoted ; but the corresponding English date is the 23rd September, A. D. 659.³ The feudatory position of Chandrāditya is shewn by the mention of Vikramāditya I. before him, and as the "dear or favourite son" of Pulikéśin II.; as well as by the use of the title Mahārāja in connection with Chandrāditya. The record expressly allots itself to after the time when the sovereignty had been re-established by Vikramāditya I.,—by speaking of him as "the unrepulsed one, who had conquered the hostile kings in country after country and had acquired the fortune and sovereignty of his ancestors." The regnal year is qualified by the words sva-rājya, "own reign or rule:" they seem to construe in direct connection with the name of Vijayabhattachārikā; and, if so, they must refer to the local rule of Chandrāditya: but it is also possible that they are intended to construe in connection with the name of Vikramāditya I.; and, in that case, they definitely fix, within the limit of a year, the date of his accession. In any case, the result for the date shews a starting point in A. D. 654 or 655. And, as the five years of Chandrāditya's government plainly all fell in the time of Vikramāditya I., this record, taken in connection with the Bagumrā grant of the Śēndraka prince Prithivīvallabha-Śēnānanda,¹ suggests that we should place the formal commencement of the reign of Vikramāditya I. somewhere in the autumn of A. D. 655.

² Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. p. 163.—The characters are rather rude ; but the authenticity of the record has not been questioned.

³ From A. D. 634-35 (the latest recorded date for Pulikēśin II.), to A. D. 680 (the year in which commenced the reign of Vinayāditya there are only three occasions on which the tithi Āvina śukla 2 and the autumnal equinox, as represented by the Tulā-saṃkrānti or entrance of the sun into Libra, fell on the same day. (1) In A. D. 640, the tithi, ending on the 23rd September, at about 4 gh. 45 p., = 1 hr. 54 min., after mean sunrise (for Bombay), began on the 22nd, at about 11 ghatis, = 4 hrs. 24 min. ; and the saṃkrānti occurred on the 22nd, at about 31 gh. 30 p., = 12 hrs. 36 min. As is required (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XVIII. p. 250, and Vol. XX. p. 413), the tithi was actually current when the saṃkrānti occurred. But, even apart from the indications given by the Kaira grant of A. D. 643 and the Bagumrā grant of A. D. 655 (see page 360 above), this date is undoubtedly too early to allow time for the overthrow of Pulikēśin II. and the re-establishment of the sovereignty by Vikramāditya I. ; especially, with the completion of four years of government, plainly all under him, by his brother Chandrāditya. (2) In A. D. 659, the tithi, ending on the 24th September, at about 5 ghatis, = 2 hours, began on the 23rd, at about 8 gh. 30 p., = 3 hrs. 24 min. ; and the saṃkrānti occurred on the 23rd, at about 26 gh. 30 p., = 10 hrs. 36 min. Here, again, as required, the tithi was actually current when the saṃkrānti occurred. And (3) in A. D. 678, the tithi ended on the 23rd September, at about 49 ghatis, = 19 hrs. 36 min. ; and the saṃkrānti occurred on the same day, at about 21 gh. 30 p., = 8 hrs. 36 min. Here, also, the tithi was actually current when the saṃkrānti occurred. But this date, only two years, or less,

The other record is a copper-plate grant from Kōchrēm in the Ratnāgiri District.² It gives the genealogy in precisely the same way; and it refers itself, in the same manner, to the period after the restoration of the sovereignty by Vikramāditya I. And, mentioning Chandrāditya's wife as Vijayamahādēvi, it records that she granted to a Brāhman some lands at the village of Kochechuraka, i.e. Kōchrēm before the commencement of the reign of Vikramāditya's successor, Vinayāditya, is decidedly too late.—The words containing the details of the date are Āśvayuja-purnamāśasya dvitīyādyām viśuvā. When I edited the record, led by the fact that Monier-Williams' Sanskrit Dictionary gives purnamāśa only in the sense of 'the day of full-moon,' I translated them as denoting the second tithi after the full-moon; adding in a foot-note that perhaps they might denote the second tithi of the full-moon fortnight, i.e. of the bright fortnight. There can be little doubt, if any, that the latter is what they really denote; especially, as we have now another instance (see page 370 below, note 5) in which the similar word purnamāśa means 'the full-moon fortnight,' and not, as according to the dictionary in question, 'the day of full-moon': the proper terms for the full-moon tithi or day are the feminine forms purnamāśā and purnamāśā. Still, I have thought it worth while to calculate also for the second tithi after the full-moon. And the results are that, though during the above period there are five occasions on which the second tithi after the full-moon of Āśvina, and the saṃkrānti, may be brought on to the same day, on none of them is the condition answered, of the tithi being current when the saṃkrānti occurred. Thus:—(4) In A. D. 636, the tithi ended on the 22nd September, at about 26 gh. 20 p., = 10 hrs. 32 min.; but the saṃkrānti did not occur till about 29 gh. 25 p., = 11 hrs. 46 min. (5) In A. D. 644, the tithi began on the 22nd September, at about 49 gh. 20 p., = 19 hrs. 44 min.; but the saṃkrānti had occurred earlier, at about 33 gh. 35 p., = 13 hrs. 26 min. (6) In A. D. 655, the tithi ended on the 23rd September, at about 22 gh. 25 p., = 8 hrs. 58 min.; but the saṃkrānti did not occur till about 24 gh. 25 p., = 9 hrs. 46 min. (7) In A. D. 663, the tithi began on the 23rd September, at about 50 gh. 30 p., = 20 hrs. 12 min.; but the saṃkrānti had occurred earlier, at about 28 gh. 35 p., = 11 hrs. 26 min. And (8) in A. D. 674, the tithi ended on the 22nd September, at about 59 gh. 25 p., = 23 hrs. 46 min., and may doubtless be brought by other tables to a short time after sunrise on the following day; but the saṃkrānti, on the 23rd, did not occur till about 19 gh. 20 p., = 7 hrs. 44 min.

itself. The grant was made on the twelfth tithi of the bright fortnight of the month Vaiśākha; but no further details are given, by which the English equivalent might be determined. In this record the title allotted to Chandrāditya is the paramount title of Mahārājādhirāja: but, as in the Nerūr grant, his subordination is indicated by his being mentioned after Vikramāditya I., and by the description of the latter as the “dear or favourite son” of Pulikēśin II.; and the use of the paramount title may be justified by the fact that it was used by the Western Chālukya Jayasimha, III., when he was governing at Tardavāḍi in the reign of his father Sômesvara I.¹

Chapter II.

To some time in the same period belongs also another copper-plate grant from the Karnūl District,² which mentions another son of Pulikēśin II., named Ādityavarman, or “he whose armour is the sun,” and records that he granted to a Brāhman an allotment at the villages of Muṇḍakallu and Palgiṛe. The grant was made in the first year of his reign, on the full-moon day of the month Kārttika, at the great festival of Paitāmahī and Hiranyagarbha: but the Śaka year is not given; and there is nothing in the details of the date from which the English equivalent can be determined. With Ādityavarman’s name there are coupled the epithet of prithivīvallabha, and the paramount titles of Mahārājādhirāja and Parāmēśvara; and he is described as the “dear or favourite son” of Pulikēśin II., and as “possessing the supreme rule over the whole circuit of the earth, which had been overcome by the strength of his own arm and his prowess.” It is not altogether easy to locate this record. It makes no mention of Vikramāditya I. There is no information to shew whether Ādityavarman was the elder or the younger brother, as compared either with Chandrāditya or with Vikramāditya I. And Ādityavarman is not mentioned in any other records. But the insertion, in the Kauthēm grant of A. D. 1009,³ of two generations between Pulikēśin II. and Vikramāditya I.,—actually making an Ādityavarman the father of Vikramāditya,—may possibly, mistaken as it is, be a reminiscence of Vikramāditya having had two elder brothers. The description of Ādityavarman, quoted above, distinctly appears to place his charter after the period of disaster which followed the reign of Pulikēśin II. And it seems likely, on the whole, that Ādityavarman was the eldest son of Pulikēśin II.; and either that he made the first attempt to restore the sovereignty, and failed, or else that, after the restoration by Vikramāditya I., he endeavoured to wrest the succession from his younger brother: the former supposition is, however, less probable than the latter; because, if that was the course of events, there would have been no substantial reason for omitting Ādityavarman’s name in all the subsequent records of the family.

"the sun of modesty," whom the subsequent records describe as the "dear or favourite son" of his father; his own records, however, do not mark him in this way. He had the usual biruda of Satyāśraya, and also that of Rājāśraya, "asylum of kings:" the Kauthēn grant mentions him by the biruda of Yuddhamalla, "the wrestler or champion in war," without giving his proper name at all; but there is no contemporaneous authority for this; and it is possibly taken in reality from Yuddhamalla-Maṅgalarasa of Gujarāt, one of the sons of Dharāśraya-Jayasinhavarman. He also had the epithet of śrīprithivīvallabha. And he used the titles of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Bhaṭṭāraka or Bhaṭāra.¹ His own records describe him as arresting, at the command of his father, the excessively exalted power of the three kings of Chōla, Pāṇḍya, and Kēraḷa, and of the Pallavas, and so gratifying his father's mind by bringing all the provinces into a state of peace and quiet;² and as reducing the Pallavas, Kalabhras, Kēraḷas, Haihayas (i.e. Kalachuris), Viḷas, Mālavas,³ Chōlas, Pāṇḍyas, and other peoples, to a similar state of servitude with his hereditary servants the Ālupas (i.e. Ālupas), the Gaṅgas, and others.⁴ And the subsequent records add that he levied tribute from the rulers of the Kavēras or Kamēras and the Pārasīkas, and of Siṃhala, i.e. Ceylon; that he acquired the pāṭidhvaja-banner, and other insignia of sovereignty, by defeating some paramount king of Northern India whose name is not specified,⁵ but who may perhaps be the Vajraṭa whom some of the Rāshtrakūṭa records⁶ mention in connection with the victories of the Western Chalukyas; and that his son Vijayāditya, pushing on further to the north even than himself, acquired again the pāṭidhvaja-banner, and also the signs of the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā, the dhakkā-drum, and other attributes and wealth.⁷

Of the time of Vinayāditya, we have the following records:—

(1) An inscription on stone at Lakshmēshwar, in the Miraj State, within the limits of the Dhārwar District,⁸ which records that on the full-moon day of the month Māgha, Śaka-Saṃvat 608 expired, in the fifth year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at Raktapura,— which seems to denote Lakshmēshwar itself,— he made a grant to an Āchārya of the Dēva-Gaṇa in the Mūla-Saṅgha. There is a mistake here, either in the Śaka year or in the regnal year; but, taking the Śaka year as Saṃvat 603 current, falling in A. D. 680, for the commencement of his reign. The discrepancies may possibly be due to the regnal years being sometimes reckoned from the date of appointment as Yuvarāja and nomination to the succession.

correct, and the fifth as a mistake for the seventh regnal year, the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 3rd February, A. D. 687.

(2) A copper-plate grant from Togarchêdu in the Karnûl District, Madras Presidency,¹ which records that on the full-moon day of the month Kârttika, 'Saka-Saivvat 611 expired, in the tenth year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at Pampâtîrtha,— which is the modern Hampe in the Bellâry District,— he granted to a Brâhman some allotments at the village of Togochehêdu in the Pedekul vishaya, and at the villages of Gullavelendavu, Ereyûr, and Batteyûr. The corresponding English date is, approximately; the 3rd November, A. D. 689.

(3) A copper-plate grant from the Karnûl District,² which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Mâgha, 'Saka-Saivvat 613 expired, in the eleventh year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at the village of Elumpundale, Vinayâditya granted to some Brâhman, at the request of the Yuvardja Vijayâditya, a village named Musuniparu in the (?) Velahiparu bhâga on the north bank of the river Krishnavêrnâ, i.e. the Krishna, and some fields at the villages of (?) Kaduvapavepu, Sihukûra, and (?) Sattikkara. The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 10th January, A. D. 692. The Yuvardja Vijayâditya is evidently Vinayâditya's son of that name.

(4) A stone inscription at Balagâmbe, Balagâmi, or Belagâve, in Mysore,³ which records that, while his feudatory the Mahârâja Pogilli, of the Sêndraka family, was governing the Nâyarkhanda district and Jedugûr or Jedugûr, an official named Kândarba granted, at the time of his accession to office, a remission of certain fees and duties. This record is not dated. The Nâyarkhanda district is identical with the Nâgarakhanda division of the Banavâsi twelve-thousand province; and Jedugûr or Jedugûr may perhaps be identified with Jedda in the Sorab taluka, Shimoggâ district, Mysore.

(5) A copper-plate grant from Sorab, in Mysore,⁴ which records that, at the summer solstice, on Saturday, 'Saka-Saivvat 614 expired, in the eleventh year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at the village of Chitrasedu in the Toramara vishaya, Vinayâditya, at the request of the Mahârâja Chitravâha of the Âlupa family, granted to a Brâhman a village named Sâlvoge in the Êdevolal or Êdevolal vishaya, on the north-east of the town of Vaijayantî (Banawâsi). The corresponding date is Saturday, 22nd June, A. D. 692.⁵

D. 661 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. p. 186; and see Vol. XX. p. 5). The only earlier instance, from any part of the country, is in the Êran pillar inscription of Budhagupta, the date of which falls in A. D. 484 (Gupta Inscriptions, p. 89).

(6) A copper-plate grant from Surat, Bombay Presidency,¹ which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Śrāvaṇa in the (Kalachuri) year 443 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 3rd August, A. D. 692,² the Yuvarāja Śryāśraya-Śilāditya, son of Dharāśraya-Jayasinhavarman who was the younger brother of Vikramāditya I., while encamped at Kusumēśvara near Kārmanēya, granted to a Brāhman a field at the village of Ōsumbhalā, on the west of Allūra, in the Kārmanēyāhāra vishaya. Of the places mentioned here, Dr. Bühler has identified Kārmanēya with Kamrēj or Kāmrej in the Barōda State, near Surat, and Ōsumbhalā with Umbhēl or Umbhēr, and Allūra with Alurā, in the same neighbourhood.³

(7) A copper-plate grant from Harihar, in Mysore,⁴ which records that on the full-moon day of the month Kārttika, Śaka-Saṃvat 616 expired, in the fourteenth year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at the village of Karañjapatra near the town of Harēshapura or Harishapura, Vinayāditya, at the request of an Āluva (i. e. Ālupa) prince, granted to a Brāhman a village named Kiṛu-Kāgāmāsi in the Edevoḷal or Edevoḷal bhāga, in the Vanavāsi maṇḍala, and a field at the village of Per-Gāgāmāsi. The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 9th October, A. D. 694. Harēshapura or Harishapura is possibly Harihar itself.

Vinayāditya was succeeded, in A. D. 696,⁵ by his son Vijayāditya, "the sun of victory," who is styled, both in his own records and in the subsequent ones, the "dear or favourite son" of his father. In the Pattadakal inscription of the time of Kirtivarman II., his name also appears in the form of Vijayādityadēva, "his majesty, the sun of victory." He had the usual biruda of Satyāśraya, and also that of Samastabhuvanāśraya, "asylum of the universe," and the customary epithet of śrīprithivīvallabha; and he used the titles of Mahārājādhirāja and Paramēśvara, with generally Bhaṭṭāraka or Bhaṭṭāra according to the language of the record, but in one instance Paramabhāṭṭā-

rakta, "the most worshipful one."¹ It seems that, while his grandfather was engaged in reducing the southern countries, he himself was employed in maintaining peace and order in the home provinces. By A.D. 692, in his father's time, as we have already seen, he had been appointed Yuvarāja. He assisted his father in a campaign to the north, and, pushing on further to the north even than his father, there acquired for him the signs of the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā. On one occasion, he was led into an ambush and taken prisoner by his enemies; but even then he contrived to tranquillise anarchical disturbances in his own territory, and, without any assistance, to escape and establish his power over the whole of his own dominions. He built the great temple of the god Śiva under the name of Vijayêśvara, now known as Saṅga-mêśvara, at Pattadakal.² And he is perhaps mentioned, with a younger sister named Kuṅkumamahādêvī, in an inscription of the eleventh century A. D. at Gudigere, which states that Kuṅkumamahādêvī built the Jain temple called Ānesejjeya-basadi at Lakshmêśwar.³ One of his records may be of considerable literary interest, in mentioning, with details which would place him just before A. D. 730, a Jain teacher named Pūjyapāda, who may possibly be the celebrated author of the Jainendra-grammar.⁴

Of the time of Vijayāditya, we have the following records:—

(1) A stone inscription at Bādāmi, in the Bijāpur District,⁵ which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Jyêsthā, Śaka-Saṁvat 621 expired, in the third year of his reign, images of the gods Brahman, Viṣṇu, and Mahêśvara (Śiva), were installed, at the victorious capital of Vātāpi. The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 20th May, A. D. 699. The record contained, after the Sanskrit portion, some verses in Kanarese, which is here called "the Prākṛit language:" they are now very illegible; but it can be seen that they mention the town by the name of Bādāvi, which is the Prākṛit equivalent of the Sanskrit Vātāpi.

(2) A copper-plate grant from Nerūr, in the Sāvantwādī State,⁶ which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Āshāḍha, Śaka-Saṁvat 622 expired, in the fourth year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at the city of Rāsenanagara, at the request of a certain Nandereya, he granted to a Brāhman the village of Nerūr, situated between the villages of Ballāvalli and Sahamyapura, on the bank of the river Vihige, in the Iridige vishaya. In this year, the month Āshāḍha was intercalary; and the approximate results for the date are, for the first Āshāḍha, the 6th January, A.D. 700, and for the second Āshāḍha, the 6th July. Rāscna is possibly identical with the Rāsiyana of a Rāshtrakūṭa grant issued in A.D. 807; and, if so, it may be identified with the modern Rāsin or Rāsin in the Karjat tāluka, Ahmednagar District. Nerūr is evidently the village itself, where the record was obtained; for, about three miles on the west of it, there still exists a village named Wallāwal, i.e. Ballāvalli. The river Vihige is now known by the name of Sarambal. The Iridige vishaya was, apparently, the territory, in the Koṅkan, which now forms the Sāvāntwadi State and the Ratnāgiri District.¹

(3) Another copper-plate grant from Nerūr,² which records that, in the tenth year of his reign, Śaka-Samvat 627 expired, at the request of a certain Upēndra, he granted to some Brāhmanas a village named Hikulamba in the Iridige vishaya, which was a mahāsaptama or "great seventh," i.e., evidently, one of the divisions of the seven Koṅkans.³ The date does not include details from which the exact English equivalent can be determined; but the charter was issued not earlier than the pūrṇimānta Śrāvana krishṇa 1, S.-S. 627 expired, corresponding approximately to the 12th June, A.D. 705, and not later than the pūrṇimānta Chaitra new-moon of the same Śaka year, corresponding approximately to the 19th March, A.D. 706.

(4) A stone inscription at Aihole, in the Bijāpur District,⁴ which records certain grants that were made in the thirteenth year and the third month of his reign, at the (autumnal) equinox in the bright fortnight of the month Āsvayuja. The Śaka year is not quoted; but the exact English date is the 23rd September, A.D. 708, in Śaka-Samvat 631 current.⁵

(5) A stone inscription at Mahākūṭa, in the Bijāpur District,⁶ which records gifts that were made to the temple by "the harlot Vināpoṭi, the soul's darling of Vijayāditya." This record is not dated.

(6) A stone inscription at Pattadakal, in the Bijāpur District,⁷ which mentions both Vijayāditya and his son Vikramāditya II., and records certain gifts made by them to a temple of the god Śiva under the name of Lōkapālēsvara. This record also is not dated.

the limits of the Dhârwâr District,¹ which records that, at the time of a total eclipse of the moon on the full-moon day of the month Bhâdrapada, Śaka-Saṃvat 645 expired, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at the town of Raktapura, Vijayāditya granted a village named Sembolala, on the south of the town of Pulikara, to a certain Jayadêvapandita, the dharmatanaya, or son begot from a sense of duty, of Râmadêvâchârya of the Mûla-Saṃgha, for the purposes of a shrine of Jinabhattâraka inside the Jain temple that was known as the Saṅkha-Jinâlaya. The corresponding English date is the 20th August, A.D. 723; on which day there was an eclipse of the moon.² It has already been noted that Raktapura is probably a Sanskrit name of Lakshmêshwar. And Pulikara is the Sanskritised form of Puligere or Purigere, which were the ancient Kanarese names of the same place.

(8) Another inscription on the same stone, immediately below the preceding, at Lakshmêshwar,³ which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Phâlguna, Śaka-Saṃvat 651 expired, in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at Raktapura, Vijayāditya granted to a Jain named Niravadya-Udayadêvapandita, who was a house-pupil of Pûjyapâda, and belonged to the Dêva-Gaṇa in the Mûla-Saṃgha, a village named Kardama, on the south of the town of Pulikara for the purposes of the Jain temple called Saṅkha-Jinêndra. The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 7th February, A. D. 730. This record may be of some literary importance; for it seems very possible that the reference in it is to the celebrated Pûjyapâda, the author of the Jainêndravâkaraṇa, whose proper name was Dêvanandin, and who was also called Jinêndrabuddhi on account of his great learning:⁴ but, whether the record may be accepted as fixing the date of Pûjyapâda, is a question that remains to be fully discussed.⁵

(9) Another copper-plate grant from Nerûr,⁶ which records that his son Vikramâditya II. granted to a Brâhman a village named Malavura. This record is not dated.

⁶ Ind. Ant. Vol. IX. p. 132. The orthography of this record being very bad, and the characters rude, its authenticity is not quite certain.

(10) Another stone inscription at Lakshmêshwar,¹ which does not actually mention Vijayāditya, but which, as it speaks of Vikramāditya II. as Yuvarāja, must be allotted to the period of Vijayāditya's reign.

(11) A copper-plate grant from Balsâr, in Gujarât,² which contains a charter issued from the town of Maṅgalapurī by the Rāja Maṅgalarasa, who had the birudas of Vinayāditya, Yuddhamalla, and Jayāśraya, and was another son of Dharāśraya-Jayasimhavarman, the younger brother of Vikramāditya I. Contrary to the usual practice of the Gujarât grants, this record is dated, not in the Kalachuri or Chêdi era, but in Saka-Saṁvat 653, which, if the year is to be applied as expired, is equivalent to A. D. 731-32;³ and this fact suggests that the record really belongs, not to the Lāta country, but to the territory above the Ghauts, in the direction of Nāsik and Khândêsh.

Vikramāditya II.

Vijayāditya was succeeded, in A. D. 733 or 734,⁴ by his "dear or favourite son" Vikramāditya II., who had the usual biruda of Satyāśraya, the epithet of śrīprithivīvallabha, and the titles of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramêśvara, and in Sanskrit Bhaṭṭāraka or in Kanarese Bhaṭṭāra. In the Paṭṭadakal inscription of the time of Kīrtivarman II., his name appears also in the form of Vikramādityadêva, "his majesty, the sun of valour." His mahādêvī, or queen-consort, was Lōkamahādêvī of the Haihaya race, i.e. of the Kalachuri family. But he also had a queen (rājñī) named Trailōkyamahādêvī, who was the uterine younger sister of Lōkamahādêvī;⁵ and it was from Trailōkyamahādêvī that his son and successor Kīrtivarman II. was born. Lōkamahādêvī built the great temple of the god Śiva under the name of Lōkêśvara, now known as Virūpāksha, at Paṭṭadakal; and Trailōkyamahādêvī built, in the vicinity of it, a great temple of Śiva under the name of Trailōkyêśvara, which seems now to have been completely ruined.⁶ In the Vakkalêri grant of his son and successor, it is recorded that, having resolved to completely uproot his "natural enemy," the Pallava, Vikramāditya II. made a sudden and expeditious incursion into the Tuṇḍāka country, attacked and put to flight the Pallava king Nandipōtavarman who had come out to meet him, and took possession of his musical instruments called kaṭumukha or "harsh-sounding" and samudraghō- sha or "roar of the sea,"¹ of his khātvaṅga-dhvaja or club-banner, and of quantities of elephants and rubies; that he then entered Kāñchī, which, however, he refrained from destroying; that there he acquired great merit by granting heaps of gold to the Rājasimhêśvara and other temples which Narasimhavarman II. had caused to be built; and that, having destroyed the power of the Pāṇḍya, Chôla, Kêrâla, Kalabhra, and other kings, he set up a pillar of victory on the shore of the southern ocean. The conquest of Kāñchī is mentioned in the Pattadakal inscriptions. That Vikramāditya II. did really enter Kāñchī, is proved by the remains of an inscription of his at the Rājasimhêśvara temple. And there appears to have been, in this reign, also a second expedition against the Pallavas, led by Vikramāditya's son Kirtivarman I., as Yuvarāja. From the Nausârî grant of A. D. 739,² we learn that in the time of Vikramāditya II. there was a formidable invasion of Gujârât by the Tājikas or Arabs.³ The Tājikas are described as having already destroyed the Saindhava,⁴ Kachchhella,⁵ Saurâshtra,⁶ Châvôtaka,⁷ Maurya,⁸ and Gurjara⁹ kings. And then, the record says, wishing to enter the Dekkan with the desire of conquering all the southern kings, they came in the first instance to reduce the Navasârikâ country, i. e. the province of Lâṭa.¹⁰ There, however, they were met and conquered by the feudatory Chalukya prince Avanijanâśraya-Pulikêśin. And it seems likely that Pulikêśin then annexed the Gurjara territory, and made it a part of the dominions of the dynasty to a subordinate branch to which he belonged.

We have already found Vikramāditya II. issuing a copper-plate charter in the time of his father, and joining with his father in making certain grants which are recorded in one of the Pattadakal inscriptions; and we have also found him mentioned as Yuvarāja in an inscription at Lakshmêshwar, which has consequently to be allotted to his father's time. Of his own reign, we have the following records:—

(1) A stone inscription at Lakshmêshwar, in the Miraj State, within the limits of the Dhârwâr District,¹¹ which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Mâgha, Śaka-Samvat 656 expired, in the second year

D. 730,—in the preceding reign,—when, he said (quoting Elliot's History, Vol. I. pp. 432-439, and the Sindh Gazetteer, pp. 24, 25), Mahommed, son of Kâsim, conquered Sindh and went very far into the interior of India. But the Tājikas destroyed the Gurjaras. For the Gurjara prince Jayabhata III., we have the date of A. D. 736 (page 315 above); and we have no subsequent dates for his family. And this seems to place the event some seven or eight years later than was supposed by the Pandit.

(3) A much obliterated inscription at the Râjasimhêśvara shrine, in the Kailâsanâtha temple, at Conjeeveram,² which mentions him with the paramount titles, and proves that he really did enter Kâñchi.

(4) Two undated stone inscriptions in the eastern gateway of the temple of Lôkêśvara (Virûpâksha) at Pattadakal, in the Bijapur District,³ the object of which is to record that he conferred the fillet or badge of honour called mâlme-perjerepu-paṭṭa, and the name of Tribhuvanâchârya or "preceptor of the three worlds," upon the architect, Gunḍa, also called Anivâritâchârya, "the unrepulsed Acharya," who built the temple.

(5) Two undated stone inscriptions in the east porch of the same temple:⁴ one of them records that his queen-consort Lôkamahâdêvi confirmed the covenants which had been given to the singers by Vijayâditya; and the other records a grant of the circle of villages known as the Nareyaṅgal fifty, the chief town of which is to be identified with Naregal in the Rôn tâluka, Dhârwar District.

D. 739,⁶ which records, that the Râja Pulikêsin,⁷ who had the biruda of Avanijanâśraya or "asylum of mankind,"—another son of Dharâśraya-Jayasimhavarman, the younger brother of Vikramâditya I.,—granted to a Brâhman a village named Padraha in the Kârmanêyâ-hâra vishaya, i. e.⁸ in the neighbourhood of Kamrêj or Kâmrêj near Surat

In the Pattadakal and Vakkalêri records, the titles attached to his name are the usual ones of Mahârâjâdâhirâja, Paramêśvara, and Bhaṭṭâraka: but, in the Kanarese record at Âḍṛ, Râjâdhirâja is substituted for the first of them, the Bhaṭṭâraka or Bhaṭâra is omitted, the Kanarese arasa, 'king,' is added to his name, and the epithet is shortened to prithi- vivallabha. In the Sāmāṅgaḍ grant of the Rāshtrakūṭa king Dantidurga, he is spoken of as Vallabha, and his army is called the Karṇāṭaka army. The Vakkalēri grant tells us that, learning the use of weapons in his childhood, he so pleased his father as to be invested with the dignity of Yuvarāja, and to be intrusted with the command of an expedition against the "family-foe," the Pallava, the lord of Kāñchī, in which the Pallava king came out to meet him, but proved unable to fight in the open country; whereupon, Kīrtivarman II. drove him back into his fortress, broke his power, and seized multitudes of elephants and rubies, and much gold, which he presented to his father. The grant of the Rāshtrakūṭa king Prabhūtarsha-Gōvinda III., dated in A. D. 804, mentions a grant which Kīrtivarman II. had made, to the god Paramēśvara (Śiva), at the Ramēśvara tīrtha on the Tuṅgabhadra.¹

Chapter II.

The Western Chalukyas of Badāmi.

Of the time of Kīrtivarman II., we have three records:—

(1) A stone inscription at Āḍūr, in the Dhārwar District,² which records a grant to a temple of Jinēndra. This record is not dated.

(2) An inscription on a pillar at Paṭṭadakal, in the Bijāpur District,³ which records that the pillar was set up, by a Brāhmaṇ from Northern India, in the space between the three great Śaiva temples of Vijayēśvara, Lōkēśvara, and Trailōkyēśvara, which had been built by Vijayāditya, and by Lōkamahādēvī and Trailōkyamahādēvī, the wives of Vikramāditya II. Certain grants were given; and one of them was made on the occasion of a total eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Śrāvaṇa: the corresponding English date is the 25th June, A.D. 754, when there was a total eclipse of the sun, visible right across India.

(3) A copper-plate grant from Vakkalēri, in Mysore,⁴ which records that, on the full-moon day of the month Bhādrapada, Śaka-Saṃvat 679 expired, in the eleventh year of his reign, when his victorious camp was at the village of Bhaṇḍāragavittage on the north bank of the river Bhīmarathī, Kīrtivarman II., at the request of a certain Dosirāja, granted to a Brāhmaṇ a village named Sulliyūr, together with Neṅgiyūr and Nandivalli, in the centre of the villages of Tāmaramuge, Pānuṅgal, Kīruvalli, and Bālavūr, on the south bank of

the river Aradore in the Pānūṅgal vishaya. The corresponding English date is the 2nd September, A. D. 757. The Bhīmarathī is, as has already been noted, the river Bhīma; and the village at which Kīrtivarman II. was encamped must be 'Bhandār-Kawte' in the Shōlāpur District,—the 'Kowteh' of the map,—on a stream which flows into the Sina, which again flows into the Bhīma. Pānūṅgal is the modern Hāṅgal in the Dhārwar District; and Bālavūr seems to be the modern Bālūr, three miles south by east of Hāṅgal: the other places have now disappeared.

The Kauthēm grant tells us that in the time of Kīrtivarman II. the Chalukya sovereignty was overthrown; and there is ample evidence of the truth of this statement. No record of any immediate successor of his has ever been obtained. And, not only do the Rāshtrakūta records shew that, within fifty years after the latest date that we have for him, the kings of that dynasty had gained possession of the whole of the Western Chalukya dominions, but the Sāmāṅgaḍ grant of Khadgavalōka-Dantidurga states explicitly that that king acquired the supremacy by conquering Vallabha, i.e. Kīrtivarman II., and by overcoming the army of the Kārṇāṭaka army, i.e. the Western Chalukya forces, which had been expert in defeating the lord of Kāñchi, the king of Kērala, the Chōlas and the Pāṇdyas, and Harsha and Vajrata;¹ and further, its date shews that Kīrtivarman II. had lost the northern provinces of his hereditary dominions even before the date of the Paṭṭadakal record of A. D. 754. An attempt to re-assert the Western Chalukya sovereignty was evidently made, by Kīrtivarman II. himself, in the time of Dantidurga's successor Kṛṣṇa I.; for, the latter is described as transforming into a deer, i.e. putting to flight, the great boar,—the crest of the Chalukyas,—“which was seized with an itching for battle, and which, kindled with the warmth of bravery, attacked him:”² and it is possibly on this occasion that Kīrtivarman II. made, when his victorious camp was on the north of the river Bhīma, the grant which is recorded in the Vakkalēri plates. But, from that time onwards, the Rāshtrakūtas held undisputed possession of the Chalukya territory in Western India, until they were overthrown by Taila II. in A. D. 973.

We have no contemporaneous evidence of Kīrtivarman II. having left any offspring. For the names in the table on the opposite page, which shews the traditional connection between the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi and the Western Chālukyas of Kalyāṇi,³ we are dependent on the Kauthēm grant of A. D. 1009;⁴ and, as we have seven generations spread over a period of two hundred and forty years, counting from the latest date of Vijayāditya to the commencement of the reign of Taila II., it seems probable,—if, indeed, there was a direct lineal descent from Vijayāditya to Taila II.,—that the genealogy is not altogether reliable here, and that some steps must be wanting.

Of Bhīma I., Kīrtivarman III., Taila I., Vikramāditya III., and Bhīma II., we have no record beyond the mere mention of their names. Of Ayyaṇa I.,¹ all that we are told is that he improved the fortunes of his race by marrying a daughter of a certain Krishna, who may perhaps be the Rāshtrakūṭa king Krishna II.: but it has been thought that he may be identical with the Ayyapadēva of the Bēgūr inscription, who was one of the commanders of the forces of Vīra-Mahēndra, and was killed in the war between that king and the Western Gaṅga king Ereyappa; and he might thus be placed about A. D. 935.² Of Vikramāditya IV., we are only told that he married

² Epigraphia Indica, Vol. I. p. 348.—Ereyappa belonged to one generation before A. D. 949-50 (id. Vol. II. p. 171). And Ayyaṇa I. was two generations before A. D. 973-74. For Krishna II., we have the extreme limits of A. D. 888 and 911-12.—Mr. Rice, however, appears to have obtained some evidence that the Ayyapadēva of the Bēgūr inscription was a Pallava (see Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., Introd. p. 4, note 3).

Miscellaneous names.

Bonthādevī, a daughter of king Lakshmaṇa, of the race of the lords of Chêḍi, who may be identified with Lakshmaṇa, the grandson of the Kalachuri king Kokalla I. of Tripura or Têwar.¹

To some time in this period belongs the inscription from Kôṭṭur, in the Belgaum District,² which records how a Saiva ascetic named 'Sambhu voluntarily entered the fire and burned himself to death, as the means of attaining paradise; it mentions a Chalukya prince, with the name or biruda of Parahitarāja, who was doubtless one of the Chalukya chieftains who must have survived, and would probably be entrusted with subordinate authority, during the period of the Rāshtrakūta supremacy. If the Kadab grant, which purports to be dated in A. D. 813, may be accepted, there was at that time, in Mysore, a Chalukya prince named Vimalāditya, governor of the Kununṅil dēśa, a son of Yaśovarman, who was the son of Balavarman.³ An inscription at Varuṇa, in Mysore,⁴ seems to mention a Chālukya Mahāśāmantā named Narasiṃha, and his wife Gāvilabbarasi. Other records at the same place⁵ mention a Chālukya Mahāśāmantā Goggi or Gugga, with the boar-crest; and one of them commemorates the death of a follower of his in a battle between some persons named Polukēsi and Būḍiga. And finally, the Kanarese poet Pampa, the author of the Vikramārjunavijaya or Pampa-Bhārata, who was born in A. D. 902-903, mentions as his patron, in A. D. 941-42, a Chalukya prince named Arikēśarin II., to whom he allots the following descent;—(1) Yuddhamalla I., of the Chalukya race, who ruled over the Sapādalakha or lākḥ-and-a-quarter country; (2) his son, Arikēśarin I., who, with the ministers of the 'Bangerishaya' (? Veṅṅi vishaya), penetrated into the kingdom of a certain Nirupamadēva; (3) his son, Narasiṃhabhadradēva; (4) his son, Dugdhamalla; (5) his son, Baddiga, who acquired the biruda of Sōladaganda, "the undefeated hero," and, "as if seizing a crocodile, entered into the water and proudly seized Bhīma;" (6) his son, Yuddhamalla II.; (7) his son, Narasiṃha, whose preceptor was the Muni Subhadra, and who gave a province to Erapa, subdued the chiefs of the Seven Mālala (?), plucked the goddess of victory from the arms of Ghūrjararāja (sic), defeated a king named Mahipāla, and bathed his horses at the junction of the Ganges; and (8) the poet's patron, Arikēśarin II., the son of this Yuddhamalla and his wife Chandrānanā: his territory is called the Jōla country, i. e. "the land of the great millet;" and he is described as protecting a certain Vijayāditya, who took refuge with him, against a king named Gujjiga or Gojjiga, and as presenting Pampa, as a reward for writing the Vikramārjunavijaya,—for the hero of which poem Arikēśarin II. himself was taken,—with the village of Dharmāūra in the Bachche thousand.⁶ As regards the extraneous persons whose names are mentioned here, Gujjiga or Gojjiga must be the Rāshtrakūṭa king Suvarṇavarsha-Gōvinda IV., who was reigning in A. D. 930 and 933, and whose name actually appears in the form of Gojjigadēva; Vijayāditya is doubtless the Eastern Chalukya king Kollabigaṇḍa-Vijayāditya IV., for whom we have the date of A. D. 918; Erapa may possibly be the Western Gaṅga king Ereyappa, who has been mentioned just above in connection with Ayyapadēva-Ayyapa I.; Bhīma may be the Eastern Chalukya Bhīma I., in the period A. D. 888 to 918; and, judging by the generations, Nirupamadēva may be identified with the Rāshtrakūṭa king Kalivallabha-Nirupama-Dhāravarsha-Dhruva, just before A. D. 804: and these identifications may be taken as establishing the general correctness of the genealogy given by Pampa. Also, as Pampa specifically states that he wrote in the "pithy Kanarese" of Puligere, which is Lakshmēshwar, the village of Dharmāūra may be safely identified with the neighbouring Dambal, in the Dhārwar District, the name of which appears in an inscription of A. D. 1095-96 as Dharmāpura and Dharmavolal; ¹ and this, though the name of the Bachche thousand is not otherwise known, locates the authority of Arikēsarin II. But, to what place in the Chalukya genealogy Yuddhamalla I., the founder of this line, may be referred, is not apparent. On the one hand, the fact that Pampa was born in a family that was settled at the town of Veṅḡ in the Veṅḡ maṇḍala, may be taken as indicating that Yuddhamalla I. was of the eastern branch of the family; but the name of Yuddhamalla does not occur in the eastern genealogy until just before A. D. 925. And on the other hand, if the locality of the government of Arikēsarin II. is held to connect him with the western branch, there is a similar difficulty: the name of Yuddhamalla is, indeed, substituted for that of Satyāśraya-Vinayāditya in the Kaṭhēm grant; but there is no contemporaneous authority for connecting the name with him, even as a piruda; and under any circumstances, his date, A. D. 680 to 696, appears altogether too early, even if regard is paid only to the generations, and is unquestionably so, if the identification of Nirupamadēva with Kalivallabha-Nirupama-Dhāravarsha-Dhruva is accepted. Therefore, while Pampa's statements may be accepted in respect of the names and lineage, we are unable to fit this line of princes into either the Western or the Eastern Chalukya genealogy.

that the Bhīma who was seized by Baddiga might be "the Chālukya" who is mentioned in the Anamkond inscription of the Kākatya king Rudradēva; but the real date of that record is A. D. 1162-63 (Ind. Ant. Vol. XI. p. 9); and there is nothing in it to indicate that the Bhīma who is spoken of in it, was a Chalukya at all. In connection with Baddiga, he drew attention to the supposed existence of a ruler of Kāñcī of that name in A. D. 804, and to the occurrence of the name in the Rāshtrakūṭa dynasty: but the real name of the ruler of Kāñcī was Dantiga (Ind. Ant. Vol. XI. p. 126); and the Baddiga in question is Amoghavarsha-Vaddiga, just before A. D. 945. He proposed to identify Gojjiga with the Rāshtrakūṭa king Kottiga or Khottiga; but Khottiga's date was A. D. 971-72. Vijayāditya, he said, might be the last of the Chalukyas during the supremacy of the Rāshtrakūṭas, and the predecessor of Taila II.; but here the real name is Vikramāditya IV. — Mr. Rice's suggested identifications tended to indicate that Pampa's account was put together from such disconnected sources, as to be practically altogether fictitious; and he thus led me to view the genealogy with a suspicion which I do not now attach to it. I am convinced that much real history might be brought to light, by examining the prastāsis or introductions of the works of the early Kanarese authors, especially among the Jains.

CHAPTER III.

THE RASHTRAKUTAS OF MALKHED.

Chapter III.
The Rāshtrakūtas

So far, we have seen that, beginning, about A. D. 550, with the acquisition of the country round Bādāmi in the Bijāpur District, by the end of the sixth century the Western Chalukyas had created a kingdom which embraced nearly the whole of the Bombay Presidency, —up to the river Kīm, certainly, and possibly up to the Mahī,—with a large extent of adjacent territory to the east and south; and that, save for a short interruption of their sovereignty by the Pallavas of Kāñchī from A. D. 642 to 655 or thereabouts, they held the supremacy over the dominions which they thus put together, until about A. D. 757. Their sway then ceased; the sovereignty being wrested from them by the Rāshtrakūtas. In the north, the Lāta country, with part of the Gurjara territory, was taken by a branch of Rāshtrakūta family which had but a short career, and in which the last known name is that of Kakkarāja II. : at some point, however, north of the Narmadā, —probably at a line which ran through the southern point of the Pañch-Mahāls District straight to the Mahī on the west and to Chhōtā-Udēpur on the east,—the Rāshtrakūtas must, for the time being, have been kept back by the kings of Valabhī; for, a record of A. D. 766¹ shews that the territory which was known as the Khēṭaka dhāra or Khēṭakāhāra vishaya, the modern Kaira District, with the Cambay State and some outlying parts of the Gaikwār's dominions,—named after Khēṭaka, the ancient form of the name of Kaira itself,—was still a portion of the Valabhī kingdom, and a record of A. D. 760² places the country round Gōdhrā in the Pañch-Mahāls in the dominions of Śilāditya VI. of Valabhī. From the central and southern parts of their dominions, the Western Chalukyas were ejected in the first instance by Dantidurga,—the conquest being completed by his uncle Krishna I.,—who belonged to a more powerful branch of the Rāshtrakūta family, which eventually selected Mālkhed in the Nizām's Dominions as its capital, and retained the sovereignty till A. D. 973. The territory of the Mālkhed line was at first bounded on the north, towards the coast, by the southern limit of the Lāta country, where the other branch of the family was then reigning. Shortly after A. D. 783-84, however, Gōvinda III. took that province from his relatives, and made it a part of his own kingdom, in charge of his brother Indrarāja; and the Mālkhed dominions were thus extended up to the southern limit of the Gōdhrā province of Valabhī. Somewhere about the end of the eighth century A. D., the Valabhī dynasty came to an end.³ And the ³ The latest certain date for it is A. D. 766-67, for Śilāditya VII. But the apocryphal Satruñjaya-Māhātmya, which speaks (see Ind. Ant. Vol. II. p. 195) of a Śilāditya who lived in Vikramā-Samvat 477 and reigned till 286 (? 486), may possibly preserve a distorted reminiscence of later dates for him, or for a successor, in Valabhī-Samvat 477 and 486, = A. D. 796-97 and 805-806.

Chapter III.

The Râshtrakûtas

Râshtrakûtas probably then at once annexed all the territory to the north, as far as the Sâbarmatî: at any rate, the grants of Suvarnavarsha-Karkarâja of A. D. 811 or 812, and of Prabhûtavarsha-Gôvindarâja of A. D. 812,¹ suffice to cover the intervening country up to the Mahî; the grant of Dhârâvarsha-Nirupama-Dhruvarâja, son of Suvarnavarsha-Karkarâja,² shews that in A. D. 834 or 835 Kaira was a Râshtrakûta town; and the grant of A. D. 909 or 910³ shews that the country round Kâpadwanaj, further to the north even than Kaira, was then a part of the dominions of Krishṇa II. What became of Kâthiâwâd and northern Gujarât after the end of the Valabhî period, is not yet known. The statements of some of the Arab travellers⁴ would suggest that the Râshtrakûtas pushed on to the frontier of Sindh. But it does not seem likely that they long retained any possessions in that direction. For, in A. D. 914 the territory on the west of the Sâbarmatî was in the possession of a king named Mahîpâla, who had a local representative, Dharanîvarâha, of the Châpa family, at Wadhwan in the north-east corner of Kâthiâwâd.⁵ And in A. D. 941-42⁶ Mûlarâja established the Chaulukya dynasty of Aṇhilwâd, to the north-west of Ahmedâbâd, which retained the sovereignty of that part of the country for the next four centuries: the records of Krishṇa III. point to wars between him and Mûlarâja; and very possibly in his time the Râshtrakûta frontier in that direction had to be drawn back to the Mahî, or even to the Narmadâ. The extent to which the territory acquired by the Râshtrakûtas from the Western Chalukyas was enlarged by them to the east and south, and the various means by which this was done, will be best gathered from the details given in the following pages; in those directions, the climax was reached in the time of Krishṇa III., who penetrated even to the Chingleput District, near Madras, on the east coast, and took Conjeeveram and Tanjore.

The later records of the Mâlkhêd family represent the Râshtrakûtas as descendants of Yadu in the Sômavamśa or Lunar Race;⁷ some of them adding that they belonged to the Sâtyaki branch or clan.⁸ But this statement, which appears first in the Nausârî grants of Indra III. of A. D. 915, simply belongs to a period when all the great families of Southern India were devising Purânic pedigrees,⁹ and does not necessarily prove that the Râshtrakûtas were Âryans. And Dr. Burnell was apparently inclined to look on them as being of Drâvidian origin: for, he gave the word râshṭra as a mythological perversion of raṭṭa, which he held to be equivalent to the Kanarese and Telugu raḍḍi or redḍi;¹⁰ and the latter word is explained in the dictionaries as denoting "the caste of aboriginal Telugu farmers," or as being a title annexed to the proper names of members of that caste, and also as meaning "the head man of a village." Unless, however, the Guṇṭūr grant of Attivarman,¹ is a Rāshtrakūṭa record, the earliest traces of the Rāshtrakūṭas are obtained from Central India and the more northern parts of the Bombay Presidency, where, now at all events, the Reddi caste does not seem to exist. And this fact appears rather to indicate that the full name Rāshtrakūṭa is either the origin, or a Sanskritised form, of Raṣṭōr or Raṣṭōd; and so to connect the Rāshtrakūṭas with Rājputānā and the Kanauj country in the North-West Provinces, which seem to have been the original habitats of the Raṣṭōr clan of Rājputs. On this view, "Ratta" would be an abbreviation of "Rāshtrakūṭa," rather than "Rāshtrakūṭa," an amplified form of "Ratta;" and it may be noted that "Rāshtrakūṭa" is the name that is met with in the earliest documents,—for instance, in the grant of Abhimanyu, the Multāi grant of Nandarāja, and the Sāmāṅgaḍ grant of Danti-durga: the cases in which the name "Ratta" appears in the records of the Rāshtrakūṭas, distinctively so-called, are very few;² and it was specially affected only by the Ratta chieftains of Saundatti³ who did not use the name Rāshtrakūṭa except in metrical passages that aim at grandiloquence. It may also be remarked that the Rāshtrakūṭas had the hereditary title of "lord of the town of Lattalūr or Lattanūr,"⁴ indicative of the place from which they originally started: this place has never yet been identified;⁵ but, if any representative of it still exists, it may not impossibly be found in Ratanpur in the Bilāspur District, Central Provinces; and this identification would be another point in favour of the Rāshtrakūṭas being of northern and Āryan origin. And finally; as another possible way of accounting for the name, it may be remarked that in early times there was a class of officials named Rāshtrakūṭa, which title seems to have designated

"the head man of a rāṣṭra or province," just as Grāmakūta designated "the head man of a village:"¹ the Rāshtrakūtas may have been feudatory and hereditary governors of provinces, who, when they rose to sovereign power, preserved their official title as a dynastic or family-name.²

Chapter III.

The Rāshtrakūtas
of Malkhed.

According to the Kauthêṃ grant of A. D. 1009, there was an early Rāshtrakūta king Indra, son of Kṛishṇa, who was conquered by Jayasimha I., of the family of the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi, about the beginning of the sixth century A. D.³ And the tendency has been to find corroboration of this statement in certain coins from Dēvalānā in the Nāsik District, which may be allotted to the period in question, just as well as to a somewhat later date, and which give the name of an early king Kṛishṇa. But, as has already been pointed out,⁴ the statement in question appears first in the eleventh century A. D., after the overthrow of the Rāshtrakūtas by the Western Chālukyas of Kalyāṇi; in the early records, there is nothing whatever to support it; and it is evidently to be accounted for simply by the fact that, after the overthrow of Kakka II. by Taila II., there survived Indra IV., grandson of Kṛishṇa III., by crowning whom the Western Gaṅga prince Mārasimha attempted to continue the Rāshtrakūta sovereignty.⁵ As regards the coins, there is nothing that compels us to allot them to any dynasty in particular; and they are probably Kalachuri coins of Kṛishṇarāja, the father of Saṅkaragaṇa.

We have possibly a Rāshtrakūta king in the Gōvinda who invaded the Western Chalukya dominions during the confusion that prevailed

² Dr. Bhandarkar's views (Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, p. 10, and note 4, and p. 36) appear to be that the Rāshtrakūtas were an ancient Kshatriya tribe; that they are the Ristikas or Rastikas (= Rāshtrikas) of the Aśoka inscriptions (see, e.g., Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 248); that they are also mentioned in inscriptions as Mahārāṭhis, or, as he writes it, Mahārāṭhis; that they are the ancient Marāṭhas; and that the name Rāshtrakūta originated from some of the Rāṭṭhi or Rāṭṭha tribes forming themselves into a family or group (kūta). I am not prepared at present to discuss all these points. But there is certainly one detail in which he is wrong. He objects to Pandit Bhagwanlal Indraji translating Mahārāṭhi by 'great warrior' (e.g., Cave-Temple Inscriptions, pp. 24, 29, 34; Dr. Bühler has rendered it by 'feudal baron,' Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. V. p. 64), because the feminine form Mahārāṭhī also occurs (Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 27), and, he says, to translate this by 'wife, or daughter, of a great warrior' is "simply begging the question;" his opinion is that "Mahārāṭhi appears clearly to be the name of a tribe, and is the same as our modern Marāṭhā." But, both in former times there was, and in the present day there still is, the practice of mentioning wives of officials by feminine forms of the titles of their husbands; note, for instance, Danḍanāyakkī as a feminine form of Danḍanāyaka, in a inscription of A. D. 1108-1109 (Ind. Ant. Vol. X. p. 254), and the Kanarese Gaulasāni, and the Marāṭhi Pāṭlī and Dēdānī, as the designations of the wives of a Gaula, Pāṭlī, or village-headman, and of a Dēdā or hereditary head official of a pargāṇā: so also, among religious titles, we have Vihāra-sēdāminī, and the feminine form Vihārasēdminī (Gupta Inscriptions, pp. 263, 280).

from the death of Maṅgalêsa to the coronation of Pulikêsin II., and who eventually became an ally of Pulikêsin.¹

And another early Râshtrakûta king may perhaps be found in the person of Attivarman,—of the family of 'king' Kandara, i.e. Krishṇa, in the lineage of the great saint Ānanda, and belonging to the posterity of the god Hiranyagarbha, i.e. Brahman,—whose existence is proved by the copper-plate grant from the Guṇṭur District, Madras Presidency.²

Abhimanyu.

The earliest certain mention of Râshtrakûtas, however,³ is to be found in a copper-plate grant which gives the following short genealogy :— (1) Mâna, or Mânânka, who was "an ornament of the Râshtrakûtas;" (2) his son, Dêvarâja; (3) his son, Bhavishya, with two others whose names are not given; and (4) Bhavishya's son, Abhimanyu, who, when resident at a town named Mânapura, in the presence of a certain Jayasimha who is described as "the chastiser of the Kôṭṭa Harivatsa," granted to a Brâhman a village named Uṇḍikavâtîkâ, on behalf of the god Dakṣhiṇa-Sîva of Pethapaṅgaraka. The record is not dated; but it may be allotted, on palæographic grounds, to approximately the seventh century A. D. And Mânapura may possibly be identified with the modern Mânpur in Mâlwa, about twelve miles south-west of Mhow.⁴ It is to be noted that the crest of these Râshtrakûtas, as indicated by the device on the seal of the charter, was a lion; and they must, therefore, have belonged to a branch of the Râshtrakûta stock separate from that of the Mâlk'hêd family.

Nandarâja.

And next after this comes the Multâi grant, from the Bêtûl District, Central Provinces,⁵ which gives the following list of names "in the Râshtrakûta lineage:"—(1) Durgarâja; (2) his son, Gôvindarâja; (3) his son, Svâmikarâja; and (4) his son, Yuddhâsura-Nandarâja, who granted to a Brâhman a village named Jalâṭkuhe. The grant was made on the full-moon day of the month Kârttika, Śaka-Saṃvat 631; and the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 24th October A. D. 709, if the Śaka year is applied as expired. The device on the seal of the grant is a Garuḍa; from which it may be inferred that these princes were of the same descent with the Râshtrakûtas of Mâlk'hêd: but the exact connection is not yet known.

The
of Mâlk'hêd.

We come now to the Râshtrakûtas of Mâlk'hêd, whose genealogy is given in the accompanying table. In their records, the kings of this line almost invariably give their dynastic or family name as Râshtra-

¹ Page 350 above.—Dr. Bhandarkar has suggested (Early History of the Dehkan, 1884, p. 47) that he was probably Gôvinda I. of the Râshtrakûta line of Mâlk'hêd. But, even apart from the fact that there is nothing to shew that Gôvinda I. enjoyed any regal power, the date of A. D. 608, to which we must refer the Gôvinda who is mentioned in the Aihole inscription, seems altogether too early for this identification.

kūṭa; in fact, except in the biruda Raṭṭa-Kandarpa, applied to Gôvinda IV. and Khottiga,¹ the only citable instances in their own records, in which the form Raṭṭa is used, are in the 'Sirûr inscription, where Amôghavarsha I. is described as "born in the Raṭṭa vanśa or race;"² in the Nausârî grants of Indra III., of A. D. 915, which speak of Amôghavarsha I. as "raising again the glory of the Rattas, which had been drowned in the Chalukya ocean;"³ and in the Dêôli grant, which places an eponymous person named Raṭṭa⁴ at the head of the genealogy, and uses the same word in one or two other places. They had the pālidhvaja-banner, and also the ôkakētu or (?) bird-ensign, the Garuḍa-lāñchhana or crest of Garuḍa, the servant and carrier of Vishṇu, and the hereditary title of "supreme lord of the town of Lattalûra;" they were heralded in public by the musical instrument called ṭivili;⁵ from a verse which stands at the beginning of some of the records,⁶ they seem to have worshipped both Vishṇu and 'Siva as family-gods; the images or emblems of the rivers Gaṅgâ and Yamunâ appear to have been among their insignia,⁷ having been probably acquired by them, with the pālidhvaja-banner, from the Western Chalukyas of Bâdâmi, who had obtained them by conquering some king of Northern India; and their kingdom came to be known as Raṭṭapâṭi, "the country of the Rattas," and as "the Raṭṭapâṭi seven-and-a-half-lâkh country."⁸ As regards the Garuḍa-crest, which ought to appear on the seals of all their copper-plate charters,—as is now shewn by the better preserved seal of the Paithan grant of Gôvinda III., of A. D. 794,⁹ it is met with there, and on the seals of the Sâmâṅgad grant of Dantidurga of A. D. 754, the Kanarese grant of Gôvinda III. of A. D. 804, the Wauṇ grant of the same king of A. D. 807, and the Barôda grant of Suvarṇavarsha-Karkarâja of Gujarât, of A. D. 811 or 812;¹⁰ but the seal of the Kardâ grant of Kakka II., of A. D. 972, bears, instead, an elaborate representative of the god 'Siva.¹¹

From about the middle of the ninth century A. D., we have a variety of interesting contemporaneous references to the kings of this dynasty, under the name of Balharâs, and to their capital, under the name of Mânkir, in the writings of the early Arab travellers and geographers,—the merchant Sulaimân (A. D. 851), Abû Zaid (shortly before A. D. 916), Ibn Khurdâdba (died A. D. 912), Al Mas'ûdî (wrote A. D. 932-933, and died A. D. 956), Al Istakhri (wrote about A. D. 951), and Ibn Haukal (between A. D. 943 and 968).¹ The general purport of these accounts is, that the princes of India did not recognise the supremacy of any one sovereign,—each being his own master; still, the Balharā,—whose appellation is explained as meaning “king of kings,” and as being, not a proper name, but a dynastic title, similar to the Khosru of the Persians,—was recognised as the greatest king in India, and homage was paid to him by all the other princes. Both the Balharā kings, and their subjects, are described as extremely partial to Musalmāns; and Ibn Haukal and Al Istakhri say that Musalmān governors of cities were employed by them. The same two writers appear to describe the Balharā kingdom as extending from Kambāya to Saimūr; as, however, these two cities were on the confines of Sindh, the statement must be intended to give only a northern limit and extent. Sulaimān, on the other hand, says that the kingdom commenced on the sea-side, at the Konkan country; but he does not tell us how far across India it extended. The country is called ‘Kamkar,’ but the origin of this appellation is not apparent.² The capital is called Mānkiṛ, which represents the real name fairly closely; and Al Mas’ūdi specifies it as eighty Sindhī parasangs from the sea: here, however, there must be some mistake; for, the given distance denotes six hundred and forty miles, which, on the latitude of Mālkḥēd, carries us more than quite across India; and Mālkḥēd is as near as possible only two hundred and ninety miles almost due east of Ratnāgiri. According to Al Mas’ūdi, the language of the kingdom was called ‘Kiriya,’ and took its name from a place named ‘Kira.’ Dr. Bühler, however, has pointed out that, with a very slight change of the diacritical points, we may read ‘Kanara,’ i.e. ‘Kannada;’ and the vernacular of the country round Mālkḥēd was, of course, Kanarese.

Dantivarman I., and Indra I.

The first two names, of Dantivarman I. and Indra I., are taken from an inscription at the Daśavatāra temple at Ellōrā, near Aurangābād in the Nizām’s Dominions,³ which, omitting some intermediate names after Dantidurga, carries the genealogy on as far as Amoghavarsha I., but was then left unfinished. It furnishes, however, no historical information in respect of them; and none of the other records carry the genealogy back beyond Gōvinda I.

Gōvinda I., and Karka or Kakka I.

Regarding Gōvinda I., again, and his son, whose name appears sometimes as Kakka and sometimes as Karka, we have no information beyond the mention of their names. No historical facts are recorded in respect of them; and it does not seem at all likely that either of them enjoyed any regal power.¹

And in connection with Indra II., all that we are told is, that his wife, whose name is not given, was the daughter of a Chalukya father and of a mother who belonged to the Sôma-varṇa or Lunar Race.² It is a justifiable inference from this, that up to his time the Râshtrakûtas had not come into hostile contact with the Western Chalukyas, or made any attempt to dispossess them.

The first king in the dynasty, and the real founder of it, was Dantidurga, "he whose fortress is (his) elephant," for whom we have a date in January, A.D. 754.³ His name appears, in one passage, in the form of Dantivarman, "he whose armour is his elephant."⁴ He had the biruda of Khadgâvalôka, meaning probably "he whose glances are as keen as the edge of a sword,"⁵ and the epithet of prithivivallabha; in one of the later records he is spoken of as king Vallabha or the vallabha-king;⁶ and he used the titles of Mahârâjâdhirâja, Paramêśvara, and Paramabhûttâraka. His own record says that his elephants rent asunder the banks of the rivers Mahî, Mahânadî, and Rêvâ (the Narmadâ),—that he acquired the supreme sovereignty by conquering Vallabha, i.e. the Western Chalukya king Kîrtivarman II.,—and that, with but a small force, he quickly overcame the boundless Karpâṭaka army, i.e. the Western Chalukya troops, which had been expert in defeating the lord of Kâñchî, the Chôlas and the Pândyas, and Harsha and Vajraṭa. And the date of it shews that he and his connections had dispossessed Kîrtivarman II. of all except the southern provinces of the Chalukya dominions before A. D. 754; a copper-plate grant from the Surat District, however,⁷ indicates that, in the north, the Lâṭa country was taken, not by Dantidurga, but by some member of a separate independent branch of his family, of which the representative in A. D. 757 was Kakkarâja II. The Ellôrâ inscription, mentioning the conquest of Vallabha, adds that Dantidurga completed the acquisition of sovereignty by subjugating the ruler of (?) Sandhubhûpa, the lord of Kâñchî, the rulers of Kalinga and Kôsala, the lord of the Sṛîsâila country, i.e. the Karṇûl territory, the (?) Sêshas,⁸ and the kings of Mâlava, Lâṭa, and Tanka. He seems to have ultimately made himself unpopular, and to have been deposed in favour of his uncle Krishṇa I.

³ Among the points in support of the position that Dantidurga was the first king in the Malkhed line, the fact may be specially adduced, that his grant does not mention him as meditating on the feet of a predecessor, whereas the formal grants of the later members of the family do so in respect of them.

⁵ The Kadab grant, which purports to be dated in A.D. 813, would speak of him by the biruda of Vairamêgha, "the cloud of enmity" (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 17). Chapter III.

The Rāshtrakūṭas

Of the time of Dantidurga, we have only one record,—a copper-plate grant, obtained at Sāmāṅgaḍ in the Kōlhāpur State,¹ which records that he made a grant to a Brāhmaṇ on the seventh tithi, called ratha-saptamī, in the month Māgha, Śaka-Saṁvat 675 expired. The lunar fortnight is not specified: the Hindū almanacs, however, place the ratha-saptamī of Māgha in the bright fortnight; and, accordingly, the corresponding English date is the 5th January, A.D. 754.² The record is connected, in a general way, with the part of the country in which it was obtained, by the fact that the grantee was a resident of Karahāṭaka, which is the modern Karād or Karhād, the chief town of the tāluka of the same name in the Sātārā District. But a more specific indication is afforded by the fact that, in the description of the boundaries of the village or villages which formed the subject of the grant, mention is made of a village named Aitavādē as defining the northern limit. This seems plainly to be Aitavādē-Khurd,³ seven miles south of Pēṭh, the chief town of the Wāḷwa tāluka, Sātārā District. Accepting this identification, we may take the long word, read as Karamdivadējaphitadēulavādā, which contains the name of the subject of the grant, as giving a combination of the names of two villages, Karañjavadē and Dēwardē, which are just to the south of Aitavādē-Khurd. And it may further be added, that the record places a village named Pāragāvā on the south of the subject of the grant, and the map shews a Pārgaon just to the south by west of Karañjavadē and Dēwardē: it is separated from them by the river Wāṛṇā; but the river may possibly have run somewhat differently in ancient times; and this may account for it not being mentioned among the boundaries.

Kṛishṇa I.

Dantidurga was succeeded by his uncle Kṛishṇa I., who had the birudas of Akālavārsha, “the untimely rainer,” and Subhatunga, “prominent or conspicuous in good fortune.” Some of the records mention him by the epithet of vallabha;⁴ and others of them might be interpreted as giving him the biruda of Śrīvallabha;⁵ but, in the latter case, the word is broken up in a manner that is not customary when it is really intended as a formal attribute.⁶ A later record says that he succeeded because Dantidurga died without issue;⁷ and another says that he succeeded on the death of Dantidurga :¹ but the record that approximates most closely to his own time, and therefore is more probably correct, states that "he uprooted his relative (Dantidurga), who had resorted to evil ways, and appropriated the kingdom to himself, for the benefit of his family ;"² and there are indications elsewhere in support of this. He completed the establishment of the Rāshtrakūṭa supremacy, by finally overthrowing Kirtivarman II. : thus, the Wāṇī grant of A. D. 807 says that he "quickly tore away the goddess of fortune from the Chalukya family, which was hard to be overcome by others ;"³ and the Barōda grant of A. D. 811 or 812 says that "he transformed into a deer, i. e. put to flight, the great boar,—the crest of the Chalukyas,— which was seized with an itching for battle, and which, kindled with the warmth of bravery, attacked him :"⁴ this event must be placed after A. D. 757, which is the latest date that we have for Kirtivarman II. Also, other records describe him as extending his sovereignty by conquering a certain Rāhapa, Rāhappa, or Rāhappya,⁵ whose identity has not yet been made quite clear, but whose high position and power are indicated by the statement that, by conquering him, Kṛishṇa I. attained supreme sovereignty, resplendent by numerous pḍīdhvaja-banners. And one of his achievements was to have constructed in the hill at Ēlāpura, i. e. at Verūl, Yerūl, Yerulā, Ēlūrā, or Ellōrā, in the Nizām's Dominions, an elaborate temple of Śiva which is to be identified with the so-called Kailāsa temple.⁶ It was in

⁶ The place is to be found, under the name Ellōrā, in the Indian Atlas, sheet No. 38, in lat. 20° 2', long. 75° 14'. It is the chief town of the Ellōrā parganā in the Aurangābād tālukā.—To the local inhabitants, it is known only as Verūl and Yerūl,—sometimes pronounced Yerulā; and the name is entered as Verūl in the Survey map of the village. It would be interesting to ascertain how the name Ellōrā, which is undoubtedly more correct, has been preserved; but at present I can only say that this, or Ēlūrā, is the form in which the name is known among Musalmāns.—It is Dr. Bhandarkar who, through being able to quote an unsuspected meaning of the word kirtana, pointed out the correct translation of the passage that describes the construction of the temple for Kṛishṇa I., and indicated the identity of the shrine (Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 228, and Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, p. 48). And, that he is right, cannot be doubted by anyone who has seen the Kailāsa temple, which is of considerable size, most elaborate in its design and details, carved out of the solid rock, and with verandahs and chambers in the rock surrounding it on three sides (see Dr. Burgess' Rock Temples of Elura or Verul, pp. 41-55; also the photograph given by him as the frontispiece of Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. V.).—As regards the identity of the name Ēlāpura with that of the village where the Ellōrā caves are, I do not agree with Dr. Bhandarkar in respect of his view that the modern name is derived from the Sanskrit Ēlāpura. The place is undoubtedly the one which is mentioned as Vellūra in Varāhamihira's Bṛihat-Samhitā, xiv. 14 (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XXII. p. 193); as Vallūra (i. e. Vellūra) in the inscription in the Buddhist vihāra, known as the Ghatōtkacha cave, near Gulwādā in the neighbourhood of Ajantā (Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. IV. pp. 139, 140); and as Valūraka, or probably more correctly Vallūraka (for Vellūraka), in a Buddhist inscription at the chaitya-cave at Kārle (Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 33; I differ from the translation given there, and take the record to mean that the village of Karājika was granted to some members of the community of the ascetics "whose permanent abode was in the cave-temples at Vallūraka," and who had come to pass the rainy season at Kārle). These two records are much older than the Rāshtrakūṭa this reign that the feudatory nobles of the Silâhâra family were first brought to the front, by Krishna I. entrusting Sanaphulla, the founder of the southern Koṅkan branch, with the government of a territory lying between the ocean and the Sahya or Sahyâdri mountains, i.e. the Western Ghauts.¹

We have no records that distinctly refer themselves to the reign of Krishna I. But it is to his time, probably, that we must allot a copper-plate grant from the Surat District,² which gives the earliest indication of branches of the Râshtrakûta family in Gujarât. This record mentions—(1) a Râshtrakûta prince named Kakkarâja I.; (2) his son, Dhruvarâjadêva; (3) his son, Gôvindarâja, whose wife was a daughter of Nâgavarman; and (4) his son, the Mahârâjadêvâdhîrâja, Paramêśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭâraka Kakkarâja II.,—described also as a paramamâhêśvara, or most devout worshipper of the god Mahêśvara (Siva),—who granted to a Brâhman a village named Sthâvarapallikâ in the Kâsâkûla vishaya. The grant was made at the autumnal equinox, on the seventh tithi in the bright fortnight of the month Âśvayuja, Śaka-Samvat 679 (expired); and the corresponding English date is the 24th September, A. D. 757.³ It has already been noted that the Kâsâkûla or Kâsâkûla vishaya was evidently the country on the northern bank of the Taptî.⁴ And Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrajî pointed out that Sthâvarapallikâ is the modern Chhârôli itself, where the plates were obtained. Both the names, and the device of a Garuḍa on the seal, tend to indicate that the persons who are mentioned in this record were of the same branch with the Râshtrakûtas of Mâlkhed. But the place in the genealogy to which they may be referred, is not apparent.⁵ And the record is chiefly of interest in shewing that, contemporaneously with Dantidurga and Krishna I., there was another Râshtrakûta paramount sovereign in the more northern part of the country. It seems possible that this Kakkarâja II. is the Râhapa, Râhappa, or Râhappa, by the defeat of whom Krishna I. extended his period. They, and the passage in the Bṛihat-Saṃhitâ, give the ancient vernacular name of the place. The form Êlârâ or Ellôrâ is naturally derived from it. And Êlâpura is, in my opinion, only a Sanskritised form of the latter. Verûl is, I suppose, a corruption of Vellûr, chiefly by metathesis; and Yerulâ, of Verûl.—There may, quite possibly, be a reference to Ellôrâ, and to the number of the cave-temples there, in the expression ardhrîmśud-vellâpura, which occurs in the Buddhist inscription of A.D. 1095 at Damba (Ind. Ant. Vol. X. p. 186, line 29), and in other inscriptions (not Buddhist) in the Kanarese country.—Dr. Bühler (Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. V. p. 89) has suggested that Êlâpura “may possibly have been on the hill above the Êlârâ caves, on which, beyond the modern town of Rôzah, are the remains of an old Hindî city.” The Musalmân town of Rôzah itself seemed to me to have been largely constructed from Hindî remains. But I think there is no necessity for locating Vellûra, Vellûraka, or Êlâpura, otherwise than where the present village of Verûl is.

It also gives a rather exceptionally late instance of the use of numerical symbols, in expressing the date.

⁵ In editing the record, Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrajî suggested that Kakka or Karka I. may have had, besides Indra II. and Krishna I., another son named Dhruvarâjadêva.

kingdom. And, as Chhârôli is in the Lâta country it may be taken for certain that he was one of the lords of Lâta, whose territory was subsequently given, as a feudatory province, by Gôvinda III. to his younger brother Indrarâja of Gujarât. The intermediate history of the Lâta country has not yet been worked out. But there appears to be, in the records of the brothers Karkarâja and Gôvindarâja, sons of the same Indrarâja, a reference to descendants of Kakkarâja II., who may have continued to hold the province for another thirty years or so, until they were dispossessed by Gôvinda III.

Krishna I. left two sons,—Gôvinda II., and Dhruva. As regards the elder of them, to whose name some of the records attach the epithet vallabha,¹ the most probable conclusion is that he did not succeed to the throne. Dr. Bühler, indeed, has held the opinion that he did reign, but not for long,—being dethroned by his younger brother, Dhruva.² And the statement in the Dêoli grant of A. D. 940, that “sensual pleasures” made him careless of the kingdom, and, entrusting fully the universal “sovereignty to his younger brother, he allowed his position as sovereign “to become loose,” might perhaps be quoted in support of this view. But the earlier records distinctly say that Dhruva attained the sovereignty “by jumping over his elder brother,”³ which points plainly to an act of complete supersession; and, in support of this view, it is to be noted that some of the subsequent records pass Gôvinda II. over quite unnoticed. That he made an attempt to secure the succession, is, indeed, shewn by the statement in the Paithan grant, of A. D. 796, that he called to his assistance even the hostile kings of Mâlava, Kâûchi, and Vengî, and of the Gaṅga country. This, however, seems to only emphasise the real fact that is disclosed by the pointed expression used in respect of Dhruva.⁴

Gôvinda II.

Dhruva.

Krishna I., then, was succeeded by his younger son Dhruva, “the constant or immovable one,” whose name appears also in the Prâkrit form of Dhôra. He had the virudas of Dhârâvarsha, “the heavy rainer,” Kalivallabha, “the favourite of the Kali age,” which appears in his Pattadadal inscription in the Prâkrit form of Kaliballaha, and Nirupama, “the unequalled one,” and the epithet of śrîprithivîvalabha; and he used the titles of Mahârâjâdhirâja, Paramêśvara, and Bhattâra.⁵ He imprisoned a Gaṅga king,—took elephants from a Pallava king, whom he compelled to bow down before him,—and drove Vatsarâja, who had seized the kingdom of Gauda (in Bengal), into the deserts of Maru (Mârvâr), and despoiled him of the two white umbrellas of sovereignty which he had taken from the king of Gauda: this person is Vatsarâja, king of Ujjain, for whom we have, just after Dhruva's time, the date of A. D. 783-84, when he was contemporaneous with Dhruva's son Gōvinda III.;¹ probably he had then re-established himself at Ujjain. His successor's records shew that Dhruva invested Gōvinda III. with the kaṇṭhikā or necklet that was indicative of appointment as Yuvarāja; and they also imply that he contemplated abdicating in Gōvinda's favour, but was dissuaded from doing so.

Of the time of Dhruva, we have only one published record,—the stone inscription at the temple of Lōkēśvara-(Virūpāksha) at Pattadakal, in the Bijāpur District,² which mentions grants that were made to the temple by the harlot Bādipoddi or Bālipoddi; the record is not dated.³

Dhruva was succeeded by his son, Gōvinda III., who, as we have just seen, was invested with the office and authority of Yuvarāja during his father's reign: a later record says that he was specially selected for the succession, from among several brothers, on account of his superior virtues;⁴ and this seems to imply that he was not the eldest son: but it is convenient, in the genealogical table, to enter him as senior at any rate to Indrarāja of Gujarāt, though, as no distinct assertion either way is made in any of the records as yet available, the latter may very possibly have been really the elder. His special birudas were Prabhūtavarsha, "the abundant rainer;" Śrīvallabha, "the favourite of fortune," which appears in the Prākṛit form of Śrīballaha in a Kanarese record at Lakshmēshwar;⁵ and Jagattuṅga, "prominent in the world;" but he was also known as Janavallabha, "the favourite of people,"⁶ and as Kīrti-Nārāyaṇa, "a very Nārāyaṇa (Vishṇu) in respect of fame;"⁷ and he may perhaps be mentioned, by another biruda, as Parabala, the father of Raṇṇādēvi who was the wife of a king of Bengal named Dharmapāla.⁸ His own records couple with his name the epithets of prithivīvallabha, śrīprithivīvallabha, śrīvallabhanarēndra, and śrīvallabhanarēndradēva, and the titles of Mahārājādhirāj, Paramēśvara, Bhaṭāra, and Paramabhaddāraka. And his Kanarese record of A. D. 804 gives his name in the Prākṛit form of Gōvinda, and tells us that his mahādēvi, or queen-consort, was Gāmuṇḍabbe.⁹ Until recently, the earliest absolutely certain date for him was A. D. 804, furnished by that record. But the Paithān grant, which has come to notice lately, gives an earlier date, in A. D. 794. And he is further carried back to A. D. 783-84 by a passage in the Jain Harivamśa of Jinasēna, which, mentioning him as Śrīvallabha, tells us that he was reigning over the south, or the Dekkan, in Śaka-Samvat

705 (expired), and that his contemporaries were — in the north, a certain Indrāyudha, son of a king named Krishna; in the east, Vatsarāja, king of Avanti (Ujjain), who is evidently identical with the Vatsarāja whom Dhruva drove into the deserts of Mārṣād; and in the west, Varāha, who was ruling over the country of the Sauryas.¹ In the other direction, the latest certain recorded date that we have for him is A. D. 812, given in the Tōrkhêdê grant. But there is no reason to suppose that he ceased to reign before A. D. 814 or 815, in one of which years commenced the reign of his son, Amôghavarsha I.²

The manner in which some of the records³ say that, on the birth of Gôvinda III., the Rāshtrakūta family became invincible to its foes, indicates that it was he who first placed the power of his dynasty on a really firm and wide footing. But his accession appears to have been attended by opposition; for, the passage which mentions his being invested by his father with the kanthikâ of Yuvardja-ship is followed immediately by one which relates how, on his father's death, he had to contend against a confederacy of twelve kings, who had combined together to acquire the possession of the whole earth, and who apparently were led by a person named Stambha.⁴ This opposition, however, he quickly, and without extraneous aid, put down. The context of the same passages next describes him as releasing from long captivity, and sending back to his own country, a Gaṅga king, — evidently the one who had been conquered (and imprisoned) by his father, — but as being shortly compelled to reconquer him and put him in fetters again; as marching against the Gurjara king, who fled before him; as receiving the submission of the lord of Mālava, who was too politic to attempt to resist him; and as marching to the Vindhya mountains, and there reducing a prince named Mārāsarva, who gained his goodwill by presenting his choicest heir-looms. And after this, it says, Gôvinda III. spent the rainy season at a place named Śrībhavana, which has not yet been identified, and then marched with his army to the Tuṅgabhadrâ, where he acquired still more wealth from the previously subjugated Pallavas; and it is perhaps in connection with this expedition that we have to take the Kanarese record, which mentions a grant that was made by him when, having conquered Dantiga, king of Kāñchī, and having gone to levy tribute from him, his encampments were on the bank of the Tuṅgabhadrâ. Up to this time, the seat of the Rāshtrakūta power would seem to have been somewhere in the direction of the Nāsik District, and very probably at Nāsik itself; for, both the charters of A. D. 807, which record the above occurrences, were issued from Mayūrakhaṇḍī, which is the modern Mārkiṇḍa, a hill-fort in the range of hills on the south of the Kaḷwaṇ tāluka, Nāsik District.¹ But it appears that Gōvinda III. transferred, or took measures with a view to transferring, the seat of government. For, one of the same records tells us that he sent a brief peremptory order to the lord of Veṅgi, and made him come and construct the outer wall round a city, which was apparently in course of construction or fortification as a capital. This seems to have been done just before the setting in of the rainy season of A. D. 807; for, while it is mentioned in the Rādhapur charter that was issued in August of that year, it is not referred to in the Wanī charter of the preceding April. If so, the lord of Veṅgi must be the Eastern Chalukya king Narēndramrigarāja-Vijayāditya II., who was on the throne of Veṅgi from A. D. 799 to 843, and is described, in the records of his family, as having fought, during twelve years, by day and by night, a hundred and eight battles with the armies of the Gaṅgas and the Rāshtrakūtas.² And there seems little doubt that the city, thus referred to, is the Mānyakhêṭa of subsequent records, and the modern Mālkhêd in the Nizām's Dominions, about ninety miles in a south-easterly direction from Shōlāpur,³ the importance of which place, with a view to resisting attacks from the east, will be apparent at once if a map is consulted. The record of A. D. 811-12 tells us that Gōvinda III. took from his enemies the (emblems of the) rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā, charming with their waves, and acquired, at the same time, that supreme position of lordship (which was indicated) by the form of a visible sign of those two rivers;⁴ this was doubtless done in his wars with the Eastern Chalukya Vijayāditya II. And a later record, of A. D. 866, claims that he conquered the Kēralas, the Mālavas, the Śantas, the Gurjaras, and those who dwelt at the hill-fort of Chitrakūta, i. e., this place being apparently Chitrakōṭ or Chatarkōṭ in Bundēlkhāṇḍ, the Kalachuris of Central India. His dominions thus extended from the western coast far across towards the east, and from the neighbourhood of the Vindhya mountains and Mālava in the north to at least the Tuṅgabhadra in the south; and his power and influence were spread over even a greater area. It was, doubtless, in consequence of the wide extent of his kingdom, and in connection with the design of locating the capital at Mālkhēd, that he gave to his brother Indrarāja of Gujarāt the feudatory government of the Lāṭa country or province of the lords of Lāṭa.

Ant.* Vol. VI. p. 64).—The real name of the place is undoubtedly Mōrkhaṇḍī. Its actual name is a corruption, due to a legend connecting it with the sage Mārkaṇḍēya (see the Gazetteer of the Bombay Presidency, Vol. XVI., Nasik, p. 357).

³ Lat. 17° 10', long. 77° 13'; Indian Atlas, sheet No. 57,—'Mulkaid.'—The identification of Mānyakhêṭa with Mālkhêd was first suggested by Prof. H. H. Wilson (Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. II. p. 393; at any rate, by "Mankhera in the Hyderabad country," he seems to mean Mālkhêd); and it was ratified by Dr. Bühler (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 64).—The literary reference, in the Kaṭhākośa, to a 'Subhatuṅga at Mānyakhêṭa' (Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 215; and see page 410 below, note 2), must be connected with Kṛishṇa II. or III.; at any rate not with Kṛishṇa I.

Of the time of Gôvinda III., we have the following published records :¹—

(1) A copper-plate grant from the well-known Paithan, in the Nizām's Dominions,² which records that, on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon tithi of the month Vaiśākha, Śaka-Saṃvat 716 (expired), when his victorious camp was located outside Pratiśthāna, he granted, to some Brāhmaṇs, a village named Limbārāmikā, in the circle of villages known as the Sārākachchha twelve which was in the Pratiśthāna bhukti, i. e. in a territorial division that took its name from Pratiśthāna, which is Paithan itself. The corresponding English date is the 4th May, A. D. 794, on which day there was a total eclipse of the sun, visible right across India.³

(2) A copper-plate grant from somewhere in the Kanarese country,⁴ which records that, on Thursday, the fifth tithi of the dark fortnight of the month Vaiśākha of the Subhānu saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 726 (expired), when, having conquered Dantiga, the ruler of Kāñchī, and having gone to levy tribute from him, his encampments were on the bank of the river Tuṅgabhadra, he had good sport with wild boars at the Rāmésvara tīrtha,⁵ and he gave to the Gorava, or Saiva priest of the place, a grant which the Western Chalukya king Kirtivarman II. had given

¹ In addition to those enumerated here, I am much inclined to include No. 24 in Mr. Rice's Inscriptions at Sravasa-Belgola, which gives us the name of the Mahāmāhā-sāmantādhipati Raṇavalōka-Kambaiya (I quote the correct biruda from an ink-impression received from Dr. Hultzsch), son of the Paramēśvara and Mahārāja Śrīvallabha. The characters of the record allow very well of its being referred to the time of Gôvinda III. The title Mahārāja is rather peculiar for his period; but the other title Paramēśvara proves that the Śrīvallabha of the record was a paramount sovereign. The authentic existence of any other sovereign with that biruda, in the same period, has not been established. And the biruda Raṇavalōka is curiously analogous to Khadgavalōka, the biruda of Dantidurga. The exceptional title Mahāmāhā-sāmantādhipati, and the regal expression prithivī-rājyaṃ-gēyye, 'reigning over the earth,' indicate someone superior to any Mahāsāmantādhipati; and they might well be applied to a king's son, who, though not appointed Yuvarāja, was nevertheless entrusted with high and extensive authority, and may have been a younger brother of the chosen successor of Gôvinda III. I refrain, however, from at once deciding the point as I feel inclined, and entering Kambaiya now in the table as another son of Gôvinda III.

to the god Paramēśvara (Siva). The corresponding English date is Thursday, 4th April, A. D. 804.¹

(3) A copper-plate grant from Wani in the Nāsik District,² which records that, at the time of an eclipse of the moon on the full-moon day of the month Vaiśākha in the Vyaya saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 730 (current), when residing at Mayūrakhaṇḍī, he granted to a Brāhmaṇa a village named Ambakagrāma in the Vatanagara viśaya in the Nāsika dēśa. The corresponding English date is the 25th April, A. D. 807; but there was no eclipse of the moon.³

(4) A copper-plate grant from Rādhānpur in Gujarāt,⁴ which records that, at the time of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Śrāvaṇa in the Sarvajit saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 730 (current), when residing at Mayūrakhaṇḍī, he granted to Brāhmaṇas a village named Rattajjuṇa in the Rāsiyana bhukti. The corresponding English date is the 7th August, A. D. 807; when there was a total eclipse of the sun, though it was not visible in India.⁵ As was

³ Here, again, the saṃvatsara is determined by the mean-sign system. By the southern luni-solar system, Vyaya coincided with Śaka-Saṃvat 729 current, and therefore cannot be connected with the figures 730. But, by the mean-sign system, it began on the 4th June, A. D. 806, in Ś.S. 729 current, and ended on the 31st May, A. D. 807, in Ś.S. 730 current.—The nearest lunar eclipses were on the 26th February and 21st August. And there was no lunar eclipse, on the given tithi, in either the preceding or the following year.—In connection with the absence of the eclipse (for which see Von Oppolzer's Canon der Finsternisse, p. 356), it may be noted that Prof. Jacobi has indicated (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVII. p. 155, note 12, and Epigraphia Indica, Vol. I. p. 423) that, eclipses being particularly auspicious occasions of donation, they would probably be calculated beforehand, in order to have all the arrangements ready, instead of being taken from actual observation; that, within and near the limits of a possible eclipse, the Hindū tables and system might at any time predict an eclipse when none would occur, or vice versa; that the Hindūs, placing implicit trust in their Śāstras, would not think it necessary to test a calculation by actual observation, especially as small eclipses, particularly of the sun, are apt to escape notice; and that the writer of an inscription would, therefore, mention an eclipse, irrespective of whether it was actually seen or not, if he found it predicted.

pointed out by Dr. Bühler,¹ Râsiyana may be identified with the modern Râsin or Râsin in the Karjat tâluka, Ahmednagar District; and we have perhaps a mention of it, as Râsenanagara, in one of the records of the Western Chalukya king Vijayâditya.²

(5) A copper-plate grant from Barôda,³ which records that the Mahâsâmantâdhipati Suvarnavarsha-Karkarâja of Gujarât, when settled at Siddhasâmî, granted to a Brâhman a village named Vadapadraka in the Ankoṭṭaka eighty-four. The grant was made on the full-moon day of the month Vaisâkha, Saka-Saṃvat 734; and the corresponding English date is, approximately, either the 12th April, A. D. 811, or the 30th April, A. D. 812, according as the Saka year is to be applied as current or as expired. Dr. Bühler has identified Ankoṭṭaka and Jambuvârikâ, which is one of the villages mentioned in defining the position of Vadapadraka, with the modern Ankût and Jambavâ, five or six miles to the south of Barôda.⁴

(6) A copper-plate grant from Torkhêde in the Khândêsh District,⁵ which records that the Mahâsâmantâ Buddhavarasa, of the Salukika family, a feudatory of Prabhûtavarsha-Gôvindarâja of Gujarât, granted to some Brâhman a village named Gôvattana in the Siharakhî or Siharakkhî twelve. The grant was made on the seventh tithi, called vijaya-saptami, of the bright fortnight of the month Pausha in the Nandana saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 735 (current); and the corresponding English date is the 14th December, A. D. 812.⁶ Siharakhî or Siharakkhî is probably the modern Serkhi, somewhere close in the neighbourhood of Barôda.

(7) A copper-plate grant, of doubtful authenticity, from Kaḍab in Mysore.⁷ This document refers itself to the reign of Gôvinda III. It mentions a Châlukya prince named Balavarman; his son, Yaśôvarman, who married a sister of Châkirâja, a ruler of the Gaṅga maṇḍala; and Yaśôvarman's son, Vimalâditya, who was governing the Kunuṅgil dêsa. And it purports to record that, in order to ward off the evil influence of the planet Saturn from Vimalâditya, the vallabhêndra, i.e. Gôvinda III., when his victorious camp was at Mayûrakhandî, granted, at the request of Châkirâja, to a Jain teacher named Arkakirti, the disciple's disciple of the Âchârya Kûvi whose feet were praised by the body of saints of Guptigupta,¹ and who belonged to the lineage of the Âchârya Kirti in the Nandi-Saṃgha, the Punnâga-Vriksha, and the Mûla-Gaṇa, a village named Jâlamangala in the Idigûr vishaya, for the purposes of a Jain temple at a town called Mânyapura. The grant purports to have been made on Monday, the tenth tithi in the bright fortnight of the month Jyêshtha, Śaka-Saṃvat 735 expired: but these details do not work out correctly; for, the corresponding English date was, not a Monday, but Friday, 13th May, A. D. 813.

In connection with Krishṇa I. we have already met with a separate line of Râshtrakûtas, the last of whom, at least, was a paramount sovereign in Gujarât, or more particularly in the Lâta province of Gujarât. In a more or less independent form, the power of the members of this separate branch of the family must have continued on to the time of Gôvinda III.; for, as has been already mentioned, one of his acts was to give "the province of the lords of Lâta,"² or, as it was also called, "the Lâta province,"³ to his brother Indrarâja, in whose person there was thus established another Gujarât branch of the family, feudatory to the kings of the main line, but perhaps not always maintaining a condition of very close and faithful obedience. Of Indrarâja himself, we have as yet no records. And all that we are told, is, that it was to him that Gôvinda III. gave the province; that he quickly put to flight the leader of the Gurjaras, who attempted to oppose the arrangement; that, apparently in opposition to his brother and sovereign, he gave protection to some chieftains of the south, whose possessions were taken away from them by Gôvinda III.;⁴ and that he had for his friends a certain people named Mâna.⁵ The record which mentions the last point, declares his feudatory position,— which is also clear enough from various other details,— by saying that the province of Lâta had been given to him by his "lord or master."⁶ Of both his sons, however, we have records, belonging to the time of Gôvinda III., which, with another record of Gôvindarâja, of the time of Amôghavarsha I., make the feudatory position of this branch of the family still clearer, if possible. The first of them is the Barôda grant, No. 5 in the list above. After the description of Indrarâja, it mentions his son Karkarâja, with the biruda of Suvarnavarsha, "the rainer of gold," whom it styles Lâtêsvara or "lord of Lâta," and who, it says, protected the king of Mâlava against a lord of the Gurjaras who had become evilly inflamed by conquering the lords of Gauda and Vaṅga. It gives to Karkarâja the feudatory title of Mahâsâmantâdhipati; and it further emphasises his position by speaking of Gôvinda III. as his svāmin or master. And it furnishes for him a date either in April, A. D. 811, or in the same month of the following year. The other record is the Tōrkhêdê grant, No. 6 in the list above. In the opening passages, it refers itself to the reign of Gôvinda III. It mentions Gôvinda-âja as the younger brother of Karkarâja.¹ And it furnishes for him a date in December, A. D. 812. The later date for Gôvinda-âja, in April, A. D. 826 or 827, — his viruda Prabhû-tavarsha, — and his title Mahāsāmantādhipati, — are supplied by a grant from Kāvî, which will be noticed more fully in connection with Amôghavarsha I.

Chapter III.

The Rashtrakûtas of Malkhêd.

Gôvinda III. was succeeded, in A. D. 814 or 815, by a son who reigned for at least sixty-two years.² The records have not yet disclosed his real name; and he is best known, by one of his birudas, as Amôghavarsha, “the fruitful rainer, or he who rains not in vain.”³ He had also the special birudas of Nripatunga, “prominent among kings,” and Mahârâja-Sarva, “a very Sarva (Siva or Vishnu) among kings;”⁴ and he was also styled Mahârâja-Shaṇḍa,⁵ “a very bull among great kings,” and Atiśayadhavala, “the excessively white one.”⁶ His Amôghavarsha I.

² By the 'Sirr inscription, noticed in full further on, the new-moon day of the amānta Jyêshṭha, Śaka-Saṃvat 789 current, fell in the fifty-second year of the reign of Amôghavarsha I. Consequently, the new-moon day of the amānta Jyêshṭha, Ś.-S. 738 current, fell in his first year; and his regnal years run from some date, still to be exactly determined, from Āshāḍha śukla 1 of Ś.-S. 737 current, in A. D. 814, up to the amānta Jyêshṭha kṛishṇa 30, the new-moon day, of Ś.-S. 738 current, in A. D. 815. — As regards the latest date for him, A. D. 877-78, the text distinctly gives Ś.-S. 799, in words, as well as in figures. And I myself have a record from Rôp, in the Dhārwar District, which gives for him a date in the Jaya samvatsara, Ś.-S. 796 (expired), in A. D. 874, within three years of the above. — On the grounds that “it is very improbable that a prince should reign for such a long period,” Dr. Bhandarkar has suggested (Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, Supplement, p. ii.) that “there must be a mistake somewhere.” But, as regards the 'Sirr record at any rate, the suggestion is quite gratuitous: the text is perfectly preserved and legible; and there is no mistake, except that, in my published translation (Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 219), I carelessly gave the Śaka year as 787, instead of 788 as it is in the text.

⁶ Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. pp. 219, 220. — The Nausârî grants of Indra III., of A. D. 915, seem to speak of him also by the viruda of Śrîvallabha. But this is an isolated instance. And the word does not occur there under circumstances which render its acceptance as a formal viruda compulsory. — Again, the Bhādāna grant of the Koṅkan Śilāhâra prince Aparâjita, of A. D. 997, would give him the viruda of Durlabha, “hard to be obtained, precious;” but this is not borne out by any other records.

records give him the titles of Mahârâjâdhirâja, Paramêśvara, Bhatâra, and Paramabhattachâraka, and the epithets of prithivîvallabha and śrîprithivîvallabha. And the Sirûr inscription describes him as having three white umbrellas of (sovereignty), the śaṅkha or conch-shell, the pâlidhvaja-banner, and the ôkâ-kêtu or (?) bird-ensign; as being born in the Ratta race;¹ as having the crest of a Garuda; as being heralded in public by the sounds of the musical instrument called ṭivili; and as having the hereditary title of "supreme lord of the town of Lattalûra."² The spurious Western Gaṅga grant from Sûdî³ would allot to him a daughter named Abbalabbe, who, it says, was married to Gunaduttaraṅga-Bûtuga, the great-grandfather of the Permanadi-Bûtuga who was a contemporary of Krishṇa III. The statement may be correct; but, until it is authenticated by some genuine record, we may abstain from accepting it so far as to include the name of Abbalabbe in the genealogical table of the dynasty.

It would seem that the accession of Amôghavarsha I., again, was disputed; and that he owed it in great measure to assistance rendered by his cousin, Suvarṇavarsha-Karkarâja of Gujarât: for, the records say that Amôghavarsha destroyed his enemies and reconquered his kingdom, which had fallen off or tottered;⁴ and, more explicitly, that Karkarâja "vanquished the tributary Râshtrakûtas who, after they had voluntarily promised obedience, dared to rebel with a powerful army," and "speedily placed Amôghavarsha on his throne."⁵ But, when once established on the throne, he probably enjoyed fully the same extent of dominions as did his father, and carried his successes quite as far and wide. The Sirûr inscription claims that worship was done to him by the kings of Āṅga, Vaṅga, Magadha, Mâlava, and Veṅgî. As regards Āṅga, Vaṅga, and Magadha, — places which lay very far to the east, in the direction of Bengal, — the assertion is doubtless hyperbolic. But no particular objection need be raised in the case of Mâlava; and none at all in respect of Veṅgî. During the whole of this period there were constant wars, with varying success on both sides, between the Râshtrakûtas and the Eastern Chalukyas of Veṅgî. We have already seen that Gôvinda III. made the lord of Veṅgî, i. e. Narêndramrigarâja-Vijayâditya II., come and help to fortify a town. And the Sâṅgli grant, of A. D. 933, states that Amôghavarsha I. conquered the Châlukyas, — i. e. the Veṅgî branch of the family, — at a place named Viṅgavalli; and the Kardâ grant, of A. D. 972, describes him as having been "a fire of destruction to the Châlukyas." The latter record, and the Dêôli grant of A. D. 940, say also that it was he who made the city of Mānyakhêta, which is the modern Mālkhêd in the Nizām's Dominions, about ninety miles towards the south-east from Shôlâpur;¹ and, as this appears to be the town round which Gôvinda III. caused the Eastern Chalukya king to build a wall for him, the text seems to mean that Amôghavarsha I. completed the fortification of the place, and made it the capital of his dynasty. The published records, noted further on, give a certain amount of information as to the extent of his dominions and as to his principal feudatories. And some further details for the southern provinces are furnished by an unpublished inscription at Nidagundi in the Dhârwar District, which mentions a feudatory of his, named Bankeyarasa, of the Chellakêtana family,² who had the government of the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, the Belgali three-hundred, the Kundarage seventy, the Kundûr five-hundred, and the Purige three-hundred. A verse which allots to an Amôghavarsha, who can hardly be any but the present king, the composition of a Jain work named Ratnamālikā or Praññottaramālā, tells us that "he laid aside the sovereignty through discrimination."³ It appears, therefore, that eventually, in consequence of extreme old age and waning strength, he abdicated in favour of his son Krishna II., who, as we shall see further on, was associated in the administration with him, as Yuvarāja.

Of the time of Amôghavarsha I., we have the following published records:—

(1) A copper-plate grant from Kâvî in the Broach District,⁴ which records that, while residing at Bharukachchha, i. e. Broach, the Mahâ-

² It was this person who gave his name to the town of Banâkâpur in Dhârwar (Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 217, and note 23).—Mr. K. B. Pathak has said (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XVIII. p. 223) that the word chella-kêtana means 'cloth-bannered.' But I do not find the authority for this in the paper (in Ind. Ant. Vol. XIV. p. 104) to which he refers as furnishing it.

³ Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 218; see also Vol. XIX. p. 378 f.—In connection with this verse, I have elsewhere (id. Vol. XX. p. 114) interpreted a short record at Aihole, in the Bijâpur District, as shewing that at some point in his long reign there was a definite break, which might be attributable to a defeat at the hands of the Eastern Chalukya king. On fuller consideration, however, I think that the expression, which is an ambiguous one (nava-rajyam-geye), is not to be taken in that way, viz. "reigning again." Dr. Hultzsch tells me that, as the Tamil Dictionary enumerates nine kharjas or divisions of the known continent, viz. the eight principal points of the compass and the madhyama-kharja or central division, and as Reeve and Sanderson's Kanarese Dictionary gives nava-kharja-prithivi as meaning 'the earth, as composed of nine parts,' he is inclined to take the expression as simply equivalent to the ordinary prithivi-rajyam-geye. And this may be correct. At the same time, the expression, in this meaning, would be an exceptional one. And I am more inclined to take it as referring to some nine kingdoms, which it was customary to group together. What the nine kingdoms were, I am not at present able to determine. But possibly some of them were Kuntala, Avanti, Kalînga, Kôsala, Trikutâ, Lâta, and Andhra, according to the names that are extant in the Vâkâtaka inscription at Ajantâ (Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. V. p. 127). Or the whole list may perhaps be found in the inscription at the Daśavatâra-cave at Ellôrâ, in which Pandit Bhagwanlal Indraji read the eight names of Sandhubhûpa or Sandhukûpa, Kâñchi, Kalînga, Kôsala, Srisailla, Mâlava, Lâta, and Tanika (Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 96), and in which I am inclined to find also a ninth name, that of the Sêshas, meaning possibly the Nâgas.—It may be noted that the Silâhâra chieftain Gâhala is described, hyperbolically, in either sense,—as nava-rajya-samudharana, "the support of the nine kingdoms, or of the earth" (Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 102, text, line 15-16.)

śāmantādhipati Prabhūtarsha-Gōvindarāja of Gujarāt bathed in the Narmadā, and presented a village named Thūṛnavi to a temple of the sun under the name of Jayāditya, "the sun of victory," at Kōtipura which was included in Kāpikā. The grant was made on the full-moon day of the month Vaiśākha, Śaka-Saṃvat 749; and the corresponding English date is, approximately, either the 26th April, A. D. 826, or the 15th April, A. D. 827, according as the Śaka year is to be applied as current or as expired. Kāpikā is the modern Kāvī itself, close to the south bank of the Mahī; and Thūṛnavi is Thanavi or Thānawa, a few miles to the south of Kāvī.¹

(2) A copper-plate grant from Barōda,² which records that the Mahāśāmantādhipati Dhāravarsha-Nirupama-Dhruvarāja, son of Kararāja of Gujarāt, while residing at Sarvamaṅgalāsattā outside Khē-taka or Śrikhētaka, gave to a Brāhmaṇ a village named Pūsilāvillī in the Kāśahrada dēśa. The grant was made on the full-moon day of the month Kārttika, Śaka-Saṃvat 757; and the corresponding English date is, approximately, either the 22nd October, A. D. 834, or the 11th October, A. D. 835, according as the Śaka year is to be applied as current or as expired. Khētaka, or Śrikhētaka, is the modern Kaira; and the Kāśahrada dēśa must be some territorial division in that neighbourhood.

(3) An inscription at the Daśavatāra cave at Ellōrā in the Nizām's Dominions.³ That this record belongs actually to the time of Amōghavarsha, cannot be declared with absolute certainty; because it was left unfinished. But, mentioning him as Mahārāja-Sarva, it takes the genealogy as far as him, and breaks off abruptly in one of the verses descriptive of him. The extant portion does not contain a date.

(4) An inscription on the architrave over the verandah of the Kanheri Cave No. 78 in the island of Salsette, Thāna District,⁴ which records that, in the reign of Amōghavarsha, and during the rule of the Mahāśāmantā Pullasakti, of the northern Koṅkaṇ branch of the Śilāhāra family, who was governing the whole of the Koṅkaṇ, headed by the city of Purī, which he held through the favour of Amōghavarsha, Pullasakti's old minister, Vishṇu. . . ., having done obeisance to the Buddhist community at the mount Krishnagiri, gave certain grants of coins called drammas, for the purpose of making repairs and providing clothes and books. The record is dated Śaka-Saṃvat 765, without any further details; and the corresponding Christian year is A. D. 843-44, if the Śaka year is taken as expired. As regards the places mentioned in this record,—Krishnagiri is, of course, Kanheri itself; and reference has already been made to Purī, in connection with the Mauryas of the Koṅkaṇ.⁵

cords that, in the reign of Amoghavarsha, and during the rule of the *Mahāśāmantā*¹ Kapardin II., son and successor of the Mahāśāmantā Pullaśakti mentioned above, a Buddhist named Avighnākara, who had come from the Gauda country, had some caves, suitable for meditation, made at Krishnagiri, and gave a perpetual endowment of one hundred drammas, from the interest on which, after his death, the monks were to be provided with clothes.² The record is dated on Wednesday, the second tithi of the dark fortnight of the month Āśvina in the Prajāpati samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 775; which, though the year is given both in words and in figures, is a mistake for 773 (expired) or 774 (current); and the corresponding English date is Wednesday, 16th September, A.D. 851.³

(6) A stone inscription at Sirūr in the Dhārwar District,⁴ which records that, in the fifty-second year of the reign of Amoghavarsha and in the Vyaya samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 788 (expired), an officer of his, named Dēvanayya, who was governing the Belvola three-hundred at Anūgere, made a grant, or remitted a tax, on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on Sunday, the new-moon-day of the month Jyāishtha. Here, the corresponding English date is Sunday, 16th June, A.D. 866; on which day there was a total eclipse of the sun, which was visible right across India.⁵

(7) A copper-plate grant from Bagumrā in the Nausārī District in the Barōda territory,⁶ which records that the Mahāśāmantādhipati Dhāravarsha-Nirupama-Dhruvarāja of Gujarāt,—the second of that name, the son of Akālavarsha-Subhatunga,—bathed in the Narmadā at the Mūlasthāna tīrtha at Bhṛigukachchha (Broach), and granted to

² For similar endowments, see Gupta Inscriptions, pp. 33, 262, and probably also pp. 38, 39, 40, 41, 265.

a Brāhmaṇa a village named Pārāhaṇaka, which was included in the one hundred and sixteen villages that were connected with the town of Karmāntapura. The grant was made on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Jyāishtha, Śaka-Saṃvat 789; and the corresponding English date is the 16th June, A. D. 866, or the 6th June, A. D. 867, according as the Śaka year is taken as current or as expired: on each of these days there was a total eclipse of the sun, visible in India.¹ The village of Pārāhaṇaka is the modern 'Parona,' in the Surat District.²

(8) Another inscription at Kapheri,³ in the same position with No. 4 above, which records that, in the reign of Amōghavarsha, and during the rule of the Muhāsāmanta Kapardin II., mentioned above, a person named Vishṇu gave one hundred drāmmas to the monks of the Buddhist community at Krishṇagiri, and caused a cave, suitable for meditation, to be constructed, in which the monks should receive clothes and other gifts. The record is dated Śaka-Saṃvat 799, without any details; and the corresponding Christian year is A. D. 877-78, if the Śaka year is applied as expired.⁴

Three of the records mentioned just above are of special interest, in shewing that Buddhism was still, in the ninth century A. D., a living religion, favoured by the authorities, in Western India.⁵ At the same time, however, a sudden development, of a very marked kind, was being accomplished by its chief rival, Jainism, which was eventually to do more than any other form of belief towards its downfall. The writer Jinasēna, who has been referred to above in connection with Gōvinda III., was one of a series of celebrated Digambara Jain authors, who came to the front, propagating their religion, and increasing the power of their sect as they did so, during the earlier part of the Rāshtrakūta period.⁶ The first of these authors was Samantabhadra, whose "appearance in Southern India marks an epoch, not "only in the annals of Digambara Jainism, but in the history of "Sanskrit literature;" and whose chief work, the Aptamīmāṃsā, "is "regarded as the most authoritative exposition of the śāstrāda-dharma "trine and of the Jain notion of an omniscient being, and passes in

⁶ I take these details from a paper by Mr. K. B. Pathak, entitled "Bhartṛhari and Kumārila," in the Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XVIII. p. 213 ff.

"review all the contemporary schools of philosophy, including the brah-māṇḍalī doctrine."¹ This person is mentioned, with a good deal of flourish, in the Sravāṇa-Belgola epitaph of Mallishēṇa,² which represents him as professing, to a prince of Karahāṭaka (Karāḍ, in the Sātārā District), that he had made a missionary tour to Pātāliputra (Patna in Behar), Mālwa, Sindh, Thakka (the Panjib), Kāñchi, and Vaidisa (Bēsnagar). After him came Akalaṅka, Akalaṅkadēva, or Akalaṅkachandra, who wrote the Ashṭaśatī, the earliest commentary on the Āptamīmāṃsā; the Sravāṇa-Belgola epitaph mentions him specially, as defeating the Buddhists in disputation. Then came Vidyānanda, apparently known also as Pātrakēśarin, who wrote the Āptamīmāṃsādharmikā or Ashṭasahasrī, the second and more exhaustive commentary on the Āptamīmāṃsā, and who tells us that he followed the Ashṭaśatī as his guide. Then followed Māṇikyanandin, author of the Parīkshāṃukha, in which he mentions Samantabhadra, Akalaṅka, and Vidyānanda. After him came Prabhāchandra, author of the Pramāyukamalamārtanda, which is the earliest commentary on Māṇikyanandin's Parīkshāṃukha, and of the Nyāyākumudachandrodāya, which is a commentary on the Laghyastraya of Akalaṅka: he tells us that Akalaṅka was his teacher; and his epitaph is at Sravāṇa-Belgola.³ After him came Jināsēna, author of the Jain Harivaṃśa, of which a first recension was completed in A. D. 783-84, in the time of Gōvinda III., and of a portion of the Ādi-Purāṇa, which was part of the Jain Mahā-Purāṇa: in his Āli-Purāṇa, he mentions Akalaṅka, Prabhāchandra, and Pātrakēśari (Vidyānanda); and in another of his works, the Pār'vābhyaṇudāya, he describes himself as the Paramaguru or chief preceptor of Amōghavarsha I.,⁴ whom, in the same passage, he mentions with the paramount title of Paramēśvara,—thus shewing that he lived on into the actual reign of that king, i.e. until, at any rate, A. D. 814-15.⁵ And finally there came Jināsēna's pupil, Guṇabhadra, who completed the Āli-Purāṇa and wrote the Uttara-Purāṇa, or second part of the Mahā-Purāṇa, which he finished in A. D. 837, in the reign of Amōghavarsha's successor, Kṛishṇa II. As regards the period of these writers,—their latest limit is deter-

Soc.* Vol. XVIII. p. 224. — To much the same purport, a passage in the prastā of the Uttara-Purāṇa says that Amōghavarsha I. bowed down at the feet of Jināsēna, and considered himself to be purified thereby. — The same prastā tells us that Jināsēna's teacher was Vīrasēnabhaṭṭāraka, belonging to the Sēna avaya, or succession of teachers and disciples, in the Māla-Saṃgha.⁵ Mr. K. B. Pathak would make him live on till A. D. 838-39. For, stamping the Jain Harivaṃśa as a work of his youth and the Ādi-Purāṇa as a highly-finished composition of much later date, and quoting a work named Jayadhavalatka, which mentions Amōghavarsha I. and Jināsēna and gives the date of its own completion as Śaka-Saṃvat 759 expired, = A. D. 837-38, he says that, from this, "we may safely accept 'Śaka 760 as the date of the Ādi-Purāṇa; for, at this time, Jināsēna must have been 'very old, as he wrote his first work, the Harivaṃśa, in Śaka 735" (loc. cit. pp. 224 to 227). The reasoning, however, on which Śaka-Saṃvat 760 (expired), = A. D. 838-39, is thus taken to be "the date" of the writing of Jināsēna's portion of the Ādi-Purāṇa is not apparent. — The passage containing the date of the Jayadhavalatka is worth quoting in connection with the nomenclature and origin of the Śaka era; it runs—ekādśa-shashti-samādhiḥ-septa-sat-ābdēshu Śaka-narēndrya-samattēshu.

mined by the dates mentioned above for Jinasēna and Gunabhadra. And, except in the cases of Samantabhadra and Akalanka, their earlier limit is fixed by the facts, that both Vidyānanda and Prabhāchandra quote the Sanskrit grammarian Bhartṛihari, author of the Vākyapadīya, — Prabhāchandra also mentioning Kumārila, who again quotes Bhartṛihari, — and that, according to the statement of the Chinese pilgrim I-tsing, Bhartṛihari died in A. D. 650.¹

The first, second, and seventh of the above records give further information about the feudatory branch of the family in Gujarât. No. 1, the Kāvī grant, furnishes the later date for Gôvindarâja, in April A. D. 826. or 827. And a peculiar point about it is that, for some reason which is not disclosed, it takes the genealogy of the main line only as far as Gôvinda III., and makes no reference of any kind to Amôghavarsha I., though the latter was then the reigning king. The explanation of this may possibly be that, when this charter was issued, Gôvindarâja was in rebellion against his sovereign. At the same time, it duly gives to him simply his feudatory title of Mahâsāmantâdhipati. No. 2, the Barôdâ grant, on the other hand, takes the genealogy of the main line as far as Amôghavarsha I., whom it mentions by his birûda of Mahârâja-Sarva. It then mentions Indrarâja of Gujarât; and then his son Karkarâja, of whom it says, — referring, probably, to some descendants of Kakkarâja II., the contemporary of Krishna I.,² — that “he vanquished the tributary Râshtrakûtas, who, after they had voluntarily promised obedience, dared to rebel with a powerful army; and he speedily placed Amôghavarsha on his throne.”³ And then, apparently without any reference to Gôvindarâja, it introduces Karkarâja’s son, the Mahâsāmantâdhipati Dhâravarsha-Nirupama-Dhruvarâja, for whom it furnishes a date in October, A. D. 834 or 835. No. 7, the Bagumrâ grant, again takes the genealogy of the main line as far as Amôghavarsha I., whom it mentions both as Mahârâja-Sarva and as Amôghavarsha. It then takes up the genealogy of the feudatory branch. In connection with Indrarâja, it tells us that he had some devoted followers in the Mâna tribe, skilled in the use of the bow. In the account of Karkarâja, — whose name it gives in the form of Kakkarâja, — it repeats the statement about his conquering the rebellious tributary Râshtrakûtas and placing Amôghavarsha I. on the throne. And then, certainly with no mention of Gôvindarâja, it passes on to Karkarâja’s son Dhruvarâja, who, it says, lost his life in battle with the forces of a certain Vallabha.⁴ Dhruvarâja was succeeded

by a son, whose proper name is not given, but who had the birudas of Akālavarsha and Subhatuṅga; and of this person we are told that, though his servants were disloyal, he quickly recovered his paternal kingdom, which had been attacked by the army of Vallabha. He was succeeded by his son, another Mahāsāmantādhipati Dhruvarāja, who, like his grandfather of the same name, had the birudas of Dhāravarsha and Nirupama, and for whom the record furnishes a date in June, A. D. 866. In connection with him, the record tells us that, though attacked on one side by the host of the powerful Gurjaras,¹ and on another by the hostile Vallabha, and though hampered by seditious kinsmen and the treachery of an unnamed younger brother, he quieted all disturbances; that, unaided, he easily put to flight the very strong army of the Gurjaras, which had been reinforced by his kinsmen; and that he defeated a powerful king called Mihira. In addition to the treacherous unnamed younger brother, spoken of above, the record mentions, at the end, another younger brother of Dhruvarāja, named Gōvindarāja.

From the fact that, in the Bagumrā grant certainly, and probably also in the Barōda record, there is no mention of Gōvindarāja, and from the statement in the Barōda grant, that Karkarāja reduced to obedience some rebellious tributary Rāshtrakūṭas, it has been held that Gōvindarāja was an usurper.² This was at a time when only one date was known for him,—that of A. D. 826 or 827, furnished by the Kāvī grant. And, while it seems more likely that at that time, if anything was wrong, he was in rebellion against his sovereign Amōghavarsha I., the earlier date, in A. D. 812, furnished by the Tōrkhdē grant, does seem to shew that there was then some action on his part, temporarily successful, hostile to his elder brother. If Gōvindarāja succeeded regularly to the local government, and was in his turn regularly succeeded by the first Dhruvarāja, Karkarāja must have died before December A. D. 812, and consequently before the accession of Amōghavarsha I. in A. D. 814 or 815. But, that he survived longer is distinctly proved by the statement that he placed Amōghavarsha I. on the throne. It appears plain, therefore, that, towards the end of the reign of Gōvinda III., Gōvindarāja did engage in some enterprise which was hostile to the government of his elder brother, and which afterwards developed into an attempt to prevent the accession of Amōghavarsha I. himself. And, from the reference to tributary Rāshtrakūṭas who rebelled after having voluntarily promised obedience, it further seems probable that what he did was to join in an attempt to secure succession to the throne of the main line for some descendant of Kakkarāja II., the contemporary of Krishna I. Later on, having become reconciled and loyal again, he may have naturally succeeded Karkarāja in the local government; and then, in A. D. 826 or 827, he may have fallen into some fresh act of rebellion against Amōghavarsha I., which ended in the local administration being taken out of his hands and made over to his nephew Dhruvarāja.

Krishna II.

Amoghavarsha I. was succeeded by his son Krishna II., whose name appears also in the Prākṛit form of Kannara.¹ This king had the birud of Akāavarsha and Subhatunga,² and the usual titles of Mahārājadhīrāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhāṭṭāraka. In formal passages, the customary epithet of śrīprithivīvallabha is connected with those titles: but, also, vallabha was sometimes attached to his name, which then appears as Krishnavallabha; ³ and in one instance the epithet vallabhardja, "king of favourites," is connected with his biruda Akāavarsha.⁴ His wife was a younger sister of Saṅkuka, and a daughter of Kokkala or Kokkalla, elsewhere also called Kōkalla, king of Chēḍī, who is said in the Kardā grant of A. D. 972 to be of the Haihaya family,⁵ and in the Śāṅgī grant of A. D. 933 to be of the lineage of Sahasrārjuna, i. e. of Kārtavīrya, or Sahasrabāhu-Arjuna, prince of the Haihayas; this Kokkala or Kokkalla, king of Chēḍī, is, therefore, the first of that name, in General Sir Alexander Cunningham's list of the Kalachuri kings of Tripuri or Tēwar near Jabalpur.⁶ The earliest synchronous date that we have for Krishna II. is in April, A. D. 888, furnished by the Bagumā grant (if it is genuine) which is mentioned further on, and failing that, by an unpublished inscription at Betgere in the Dhārwar District, which is a few days later in actual date: but he must have succeeded to the throne very soon after A. D. 878, at the latest; for his father had then been reigning for sixty-four years. The latest certain

And, this being so, my suggestion (Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 25; see also note 9) that Biṭṭa was expanded into its Sanskrit form when Vishnuvardhana I. was installed as Vicardja, is perhaps untenable.

² The literary reference, in the Kathāśāṭa of a modern writer named Brahmanēmidatta, to a Subhatunga at Mānyakhēṭa (Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 215; in the text, as there given, for bhavati read Bharatē, as intimated by Mr. K. B. Pathak in the Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc., Vol. XVIII. p. 22, note 21), must be connected either with this king, or with Krishna III. At any rate, it cannot apply to Krishna I., as I originally thought; for everything points to the foundation of Mānyakhēṭa having not been commenced till the time of Gōvinda III., and to the city having, in all probability, not been made the capital until the time of Amoghavarsha I.

date that we have for him, is A. D. 911-12. A Sanskrit commentary on Guṇabhadra's Ātmānuśāsana, describing that person as the preceptor of Kṛṣṇa II. while the latter was Yuvardja, indicates that, before his actual accession to the throne, he had been formally associated with his father in the administration; and the date of A. D. 875-76 for him, as Yuvardja, is perhaps supplied by one of the later records of the Ratta chieftains of Saundatti.¹ It was during his reign, and in the Piṅgala saṃvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 820 (current), with a date falling in A. D. 897,² that Guṇabhadra finished his Uttara-Purāṇa; and the prāśasti of that work mentions, in the passage that gives that date, a certain Lōkāditya, of the Chellapatāka or Chellakētana family, who, as a feudatory of Kṛṣṇa II., was then governing the Banarāsi province at the town of Vankāpura, which is the modern Bāṅkāpur in the Dhārwar District.³ Though the Rāshtrakūta records themselves contain no allusion to the fact, the wars with the Eastern Chalukyas continued in this reign also. It is claimed for Guṇaka-Vijayāditya III. (A. D. 844 to 888) that "challenged by the lord of the Rattas, he conquered the unequalled Gaṅgas, cut off the head of Maṅgi in battle, and frightened 'the fire-brand' Kṛṣṇa (II.); and

completely burnt his city (Mālkhēd);" and also that Krishna II. did honour to his arms.¹ But, on the other hand, the subsequent Eastern Chalukya records admit that, later on, the land of Veṅḡt was overrun by the Rāshtrakūtas under Krishna II., and had to be reconquered by Chālukya-Bhīma I. (A. D. 888 to 918).² The Kalachuri records claim that Krishna's father-in-law, Kōkalla I., gave some support to his rule;³ and this may well have been on the occasion when he suffered disaster at the hands of Vijayāditya III.

Of the time of Krishna II., we have five published records:—

(1) A copper-plate grant, of doubtful authenticity, from Bagumrā in the Barēda territory,⁴ which purports to record that the Mahāśā-mantādhipati Akālavarsha-Krishnarāja of Gujarāt, when resident at Ankulēsvara, bathed in the Narmadā at the Bhagavat tīrtha, and granted to two Brāhmaṇas a village named Kaviṭhasādhi in the Variavi hundred-and-sixteen which was in the Koṅkaṇa viśaya. The grant was made on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Chaitra, Śaka-Saṃvat 810 (expired); and the equivalent English date is the 15th April, A. D. 888, on which day there was a total annular eclipse of the sun, visible in India.⁵ Of the places mentioned, Ankulēsvara is the modern Ankulēswar or Ankulēsvar, the chief town of the tāluka of the same name in the Broach District; Variavi is the modern Wariāo, on the Tapti, in the Barēda territory, three or four miles north of Surat; and Kaviṭhasādhi is the modern Kōśād, close by, in the Ōlpād tāluka of the Surat District.⁶

(2) A stone inscription at Nandwādige in the Bijāpur District,⁷ which refers itself expressly to the reign of Krishna II., and records a grant made by the villagers on Thursday, the fifth tithi of the bright fortnight of the month Māgha in the Dundubhi saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 822, by mistake for 824 (expired) or 825 (current). The corresponding English date is Thursday, 6th January, A. D. 903.⁸

(3) A stone-inscription at Mulgund in the Dhārwar District,¹ which, again, expressly refers itself to his reign, and records a grant made by a Jain named Arasārya to a temple which his father Chikārya had caused to be built. The record is dated in the Dundubhi saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 824 expired (A. D. 902-903), without any further details.²

(4) A copper-plate grant from Kāpadwāṇaj in the Kaira District.³ It takes the genealogy of the main line from Kṛishṇa I. as far as Kṛishṇa II. It then mentions a feudatory of his, the Mahāsāmanṭa Prachandā, son of Dhavalappa, of the Brahmanavaka family; and a Dandādhyakā, or leader of the forces, of Dhavalappa, named Chandragupta. And it proceeds to record that Kṛishṇa II. granted to a Brāhmaṇa a village named Vyāghrāsa, and also called Vallurikā, in the Rūridhātēn, which was in the Karpātavāṇijya eighty-four, which, again, was in the Harshapura or 'Sriharshapura seven-hundred-and-fifty. The grant was made, or the record was written, on the full-moon day of the month Vaiśākha, 'Saka-Saṃvat 832; and the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 8th April, A. D. 909, or the 27th April, A. D. 910, according as the 'Saka year is taken as current or as expired. Of the places mentioned above, Karpātavāṇijya is, of course, Kāpadwāṇaj itself; and Vyāghrāsa has been identified by Dr. Hultzsch, in editing the record, with the modern Waghās, on the east of Kāpadwāṇaj. The record also mentions Khētaka or 'Srikhētaka, Harshapura and Kāsahrada, as leading towns of the seven-hundred-and-fifty district that is referred to; and the first of these seems undoubtedly, as was held by Dr. Hultzsch, to be the modern Kaira.

(5) A stone inscription at Aihole in the Bijāpur District,⁴ which again, expressly refers itself to the reign of Kṛishṇa II., and records the building or opening of an ascetic's abode. This record is simply dated in the Prajāpati saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 831, by mistake for 833 (expired) or 834 (current) (A. D. 911-912), without any further details.⁵

Accepting the historical details as authentic, from the first of the above records we obtain certain additions to our knowledge of the period Māgha śukla 5 ended on Sunday, 17th January, A. D. 902, and cannot be connected with a Thursday at all. By the southern luni-solar system, however, the saṃvatsara coincided with 'S.-S. 825 current (824 expired); and in this year the given tithi ended on Thursday, 6th January, A. D. 903. There is, therefore, a mistake in respect of the 'Saka year; in spite of its being expressed in words.—This and the next record, dated in the same year, give the earliest certain instance, as yet obtained, of the use of the luni-solar system of the cycle in Southern India. The 'Sīdr inscription, dated in A. D. 866, possibly gives an earlier instance; but the point is not certain in that case.

⁴ Ind. Ant. Vol. XII, 222.

Chapter III.
The Rāshtrakūṭas

Gujarāt branch of the family. Agreeing in all essential points with the Bagumrā grant of A. D. 866, as far as the latter goes, it takes us, in much the same way, to the verse which, in the latter grant, gives the name of the first Dhāravarsha-Nirupama-Dhruvarāja of Gujarāt; but the verse is left incomplete. It then, in another incomplete verse, mentions a person named Dantivarman, but without explaining his connection with the family; and all that can be said is, that he must be placed closely after the second Dhāravarsha-Nirupama-Dhruvarāja, for whom we have the date of A. D. 866: whether he was his son, or what the relationship was, is not known. And it then mentions the Mahā-sāmantādhipati Akālarvarsha-Krishnarāja, as a son of this Dantivarman; and it tells us that "he conquered his enemies in Ujjayini before the eyes of the vallabha-king or of king Vallabha," i.e., probably, of Krishna II. of the main line. For this person, the record gives us a date in April, A. D. 888.

Jagattuṅga II.

Krishna II. had a son, whose proper name has not yet been disclosed by the records, and who is known only by the biruda of Jagattuṅga. The Dēoli grant of A. D. 940 tells us that he died without obtaining the sovereignty.¹ And all else that we know about him is derived from the Sāngli grant of A. D. 933 and the Kardā grant of A. D. 972. The former tells us that he married Lakshmī, a daughter of Ranavighraha, who was a son of Kokkala, i.e. of the Kalachuri king of Chēḍī who was the father-in-law of Krishna II.; and that by her he had a son, Indra III.² The Kardā grant gives the same names, Lakshmī and Indra, for his wife and son. But it states that Lakshmī was a daughter of Saṁkaragaṇa, lord of Chēḍī. And it adds that, not being contented with the hostile territories that had been acquired by his father, Jagattuṅga went forth to make the whole earth subject to his father's sway; and that then, in Chēḍī, he married Gōvindāmbā, a daughter of his maternal uncle Saṁkaragaṇa, and had by her another son, Amōghavarsha-(Vaddiga).³ These accounts are to be reconciled by taking Ranavighraha and Saṁkaragaṇa to be one and the same person,—the latter appellation being his real name, and the former a biruda,—and to be a brother of the daughter of Kokkala whom Krishna II. took to wife: in this way Lakshmī and Gōvindāmbā would be sisters;⁴ and Ranavighraha-Saṁkaragaṇa would really be the maternal uncle, as well as the father-in-law, of Jagattuṅga II.⁵

Krishna II., then, was succeeded by his grandson, Indra III., who had the biruda of Nityavarsha, "the perpetual rainer,"—the customary titles of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭāraka,—and the usual epithet of śrīprithivīvallabha. The Nausârî grants specify the 24th February, A. D. 915, as the day of his coronation. And the other record of his time gives a date for him in A. D. 916-17. All else that we know about him is, that his wife was Vijāmbā, a daughter of Ammaṇadēva, son of Arjuna, who was a son of Kokkala of the Hailaya race,¹ i. e. of Kokkala I., king of Chêdî, who has already been mentioned in connection with Krishna II. and Jagattuṅga II.

Of the time of Indra III., we have three published records:—

(1) A copper-plate grant from Nausârî in the Barôda territory,² which records that he had come from the capital of Mānyakhêta to a village named Kurundaka, for the paṭṭabundh-ôtsava or festival of his coronation; and that, on the seventh tithi of the bright fortnight of the month Phālgunā of the Yuvan saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 836 (expired),—corresponding to the 24th February, A. D. 915,³—on the completion of the ceremony, he had himself weighed against gold, and then, while still in the scales, granted to a Brāhmaṇa a village named Tenna, in the neighbourhood of Kammanijja in the Lâta dēśa.

but he has done so unnecessarily. He seems to object primarily to the name Gôvindāmbā which he styles 'unique,' 'queer,' and 'absurd.' He then corrects the Amôghavarshô Gôvindāmb-âbhīdhānāyām of the Kardâ grant into Amôghavarshô Gôvindô-Albāmb-âbhīdhānāyām. And, finding in the passage, thus corrected, two sons, Amôghavarsha and Gôvinda, of a lady named Ambā, he identifies this Ambā with Vijāmbā, the wife of Indra III., and the two sons with Amôghavarsha II. and Gôvinda IV., the real sons of the same person. Also, he relies on the Sāngli grant making no mention of the marriage of Jagattuṅga II. with Gôvindāmbā; and to the Kardâ grant omitting to mention the sons of Indra III.—Now, his objection to the name Gôvindāmbā is capricious and unsustainable. It is the exact Sanskrit correlation of Gôvindavva,—(to be looked for as Gôvindabbe or Gôyindabbe in any Kanarese inscription),—which occurs freely in the Kanarese country in the Nîmdâr-Raddêr, Dâsar or Kabbêr, and Waddêr castes, and especially in the former of these, in which it seems to be rather a favourite (as analogous names, I may quote Sivavva, Rudravva, Basavva, Sivabasavva, and Channabasavva). And, as regards his other objections, as the Sāngli grant is a record of Gôvinda IV., it naturally does not mention the succession after him, and consequently it had no occasion to mention the second wife of Jagattuṅga II. to whose son the succession then went; and the reason why the Kardâ grant, which does mention Indra IV., omits to mention his sons, is fully explained by the fact that Amôghavarsha II. did not reign, and by the statement in the Wardhâ grant, that Gôvinda IV. alienated the affections of his people, and that the kingdom was restored by Amôghavarsha-(Vaddiga), the son of Jagattuṅga II. There is no need to assume any needless repetition, or any omissions, in the Kardâ grant, as Dr. Bhandarkar did; or to alter the text in any way whatever.—While differing from Dr. Bhandarkar on this point, I recognise, and endorse certain valid corrections, which he has pointed out, in the subsequent steps of the genealogy as previously given by me.

(3) A stone inscription at Hattī-Mattūr in the Dhārwar District,² which records the grant of a village by the Mahāsāmanta Lendeyarasa, who was governing the Purigere three-hundred, in the Dhātu samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 838 (expired), = A. D. 916-17.³

Amoghavarsha II.

Indra III. had two sons. The proper name of the elder of them has not been disclosed by the records; and he is only known, by a biruda, as Amoghavarsha II.⁴ He appears to have survived his father; for, the Sānglī grant speaks of Gōvinda IV. as displaying no forbidden cruelty towards his elder brother, though he had the power to do so. But he did not reign.⁵ And it seems, therefore, that Gōvinda IV. quietly set him aside, and usurped the sovereignty.⁶

Gōvinda IV.

The succession, then, went from Indra III. to his second son Gōvinda IV., whose name appears also in the Prākṛit form of Gojjiga.⁷ This king had the special birudas of Prabhūtavarsha, Suvarnavarsha, and Nripatunga; and, among other miscellaneous ones, also those of Vīra-Nārāyaṇa, "a very Nārāyaṇa (Vishnu) among brave men,"—Ratta-Kandarpa, "the Ratta god of love,"—Sāhasāṅka, "characterised by daring,"—and Nripati-Trinētra, "a very Trinētra (Śiva) among kings." His titles were the customary ones of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭāraka. And he had the epithets of prithivīvallabha and vallabhanarēndradēva; also, in the Kalas inscription, vallabha is attached to his name, which there appears as Gojjigavallabha. His Sānglī grant speaks of the rivers Gaṅgā and Yamunā as doing service at his palace,⁸ and mentions Mānyakhēta (Mālkḥēd) as his permanent capital. His two published records give dates for him in December, A. D. 918, and August, A. D. 933. And a slightly later date is furnished by an inscription at Kalasāpur in the Gadag tāluka, Dhārwar.

District;¹ the details are Pausha śukla 8, Sunday, of the Vijaya saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 855 (expired), corresponding probably to the 29th December, A. D. 933. In this reign, again, there was war between the Rāshtrakūṭas and the Eastern Chalukyas.² One of the Eastern Chalukya records tells us that Amma I. (A. D. 918 to 925) used his sword against some feudatory relatives who had joined the party of his natural adversaries, and won over to himself the subjects and the army of his father and his grandfather;³ the meaning being that some of the members of his family had entered into a conspiracy with the Rāshtrakūṭas to prevent his accession to the throne of Veṅḡī. And another tells us that Chālukya-Bhīma II. (A. D. 934 to 945) destroyed a great army that was sent against him by Gōvinda IV.⁴ The Dēolī grant of A. D. 940 says that Gōvinda IV. took to vicious courses, by which he alienated the affections of his people, ruined his own constitution, and weakened the government; and that thus he met with destruction.⁵

Of the time of Gōvinda IV., we have two published records:⁶—

(1) A stone inscription at Daṇḍāpur in the Dhārwar District,⁷ which records certain private grants that were made in the Pramāthin saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 840 (expired), on an unspecified tithi in the month Pausha, when the sun came to the Makara-saṃkrānti or winter solstice. The corresponding English date is the 23rd December, A. D. 918.⁷

(2) A copper-plate grant from Sāṅglī, the chief town of the Native State of the same name in the Southern Māāthā Country,⁸ which records that, while permanently settled at his capital of Mānyakhēta, Gōvinda IV. granted to a Brāhman a village named Lēhagrāma in the Rāmapurī seven-hundred. The grant was made on Thursday, the full-moon day of the month 'Srāvaṇa in the Vijaya saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat

⁷ The saṃvatsara is determined here by the mean-sign system. By the southern luni-solar system, it coincided with 'Saka-Saṃvat 842 current, and cannot be connected with the year 840 at all. But, by the mean-sign system, it commenced on the 12th February A. D. 918, in 'S.-S. 840 current, and ended on the 8th February, A. D. 919, in 'S.-S. 841 current. The Makara-Saṃkrānti occurred on the 23rd December, A. D. 918, in 'S.-S. 841 current (840 expired). And the corresponding tithi is the third of the dark fortnight of the amanta Pausha.

855 (expired). And the corresponding English date is Thursday, 8th August, A.D. 933.¹

From Gōvinda IV., the sovereignty passed to his paternal uncle Vaddiga, the son of Jagattuṅga II. by his second wife Gōvindāmbā. We have as yet no records that can with certainty be allotted to his time.² But, that he actually did reign, is proved, partly by the explicit statement of the Dēoli grant, that, at the request of the feudatory chiefs, he ascended the throne in order to maintain the greatness of the sovereignty of the Rāṭṭas,³ and partly by the manner in which the same record couples with his biruda of Amōghavarsha the titles of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭāraka, and describes Krishna III. as meditating at his feet; so, also, the Ātakūṛ inscription of A. D. 949-50 couples with his biruda two of the above paramount titles and the epithet of sriprithivīvalīabha, and describes Krishna III. as a bee at the water-lilies that were his feet. He is spoken of by only his biruda of Amōghavarsha in the above two records, in the Śālōṭgi inscription of A. D. 945, and in the Kardā grant of A. D. 972; his proper name appears, in Prākṛit forms, as Vaddiga in the Khārēpāṭaṇ grant, and as Baddega in records from the Kanarese country.⁴ The Kardā grant tells us that his wife was Kundakadēvi, a daughter of Yuvarāja,⁵ who may safely be identified, as was done by General Sir Alexander Cunningham, with Yuvarāja I. of the Kalachuri dynasty of Tripura.⁶ From the Hebbāl inscription,⁷ we learn that a daughter of his was married to the Western Gaṅga prince Satyavākya-Koṅṅuivarma-Permanadi-Bātuga, who received, as her dowry, the districts known as the Puligere or Purigere three-hundred, the Belvola three-hundred, the Kisukāḍ seventy, and the Bāge, Pāgenāl, or Bāgaḍage seventy.

Krishna III.

The successor of Vaddiga was, his eldest son Krishna III., whose name appears also in the Prākṛit form of Kannara:⁸ in one passage he is mentioned as "the dear or favourite son" of his father;⁹ and in another he is spoken of as a paramamāhēśvara or most devout worshipper of the god Mahēśvara (Śiva).¹⁰ He had the biruda of Akālavar-

sha,¹ — the usual titles of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭāraka, — and the epithets of prithivīvallabha, śrīprithivīvallabha, and samastabhuvandśraya.² Later records of the Raṭṭa chieftains of Saundatti, of the thirteenth century A. D., speak of him as Krishna-Kandhara and Krishna-Kandhāra, with the title of Kandhārapuravarādhiśvara or “supreme lord of Kandhārapura, the best of towns,” — a place, however, which is otherwise unknown;³ and one of them would give him the name or viruda of Tuliga.⁴ Mānyakhēta (Mālkhed) continued to be his capital. The earliest date that we have for him is in April, A. D. 940. The latest date, furnished by his published records, is in November A. D. 951. But an inscription at Ālār in the Hāngal tāluka, Dhārwar District, mentions him as still reigning in May, A. D. 956. The Vellore inscription⁵ shews that he reigned for at least twenty-six years. And the date of A. D. 968-69 may perhaps be furnished by the Lakshmēshwar inscription of the Western Gaṅga prince Satyavākya-Koṅgunivarma-Mārasimha,⁶ who was then, or had been, a feudatory of his; but the record does not make it clear whether Krishna III. was at that time still alive or not. An important event of this reign was the war with the Chōla king Rājāditya. This is specially referred to in the Ātakūr inscription, which tells us that in or just before A. D. 949-50, Krishna III. fought and killed Rājāditya at a place named Takkōla; that the actual slayer of the Chōla king was the Western Gaṅga prince Satyavākya-Koṅgunivarma-Permanadi-Būtuga, who killed him treacherously, while they were out together, taking the air;⁷ and that, in recognition of this, Krishna III. gave to Būtuga the Banavāsi twelve-thousand province, the Purigere three-hundred, the Belvola three-hundred, the Kisukāl seventy, and the Bāgenād seventy. The Būtuga who is mentioned here had acquired the Gaṅgarāḍi province by killing Rāchamalla, son of Ereyaṅga; and the Dēōlī grant indicates that, in doing this, he received material assistance from Krishna III. The spurious Sūdī grant speaks of Būtuga as besieging Tanjore;⁸ and this appears to be borne out by the Tirukkalukkunṅam inscriptions, which describe Krishna III. as the taker of Kāñchi and Tanjore. The Dēōlī record states that

² The last epithet occurs in an inscription at Rōṇ in the Dhārwar District. It is met with in earlier times in connection with the Western Chalukya king Vijayāditya (page 370 above). Krishna III. probably obtained it through contact with the Eastern Chalukyas, among whom it belonged to his contemporary Amma II.

⁶ Ind. Ant. Vol. VII. p. 101.

⁷ The defeat, but not the killing, of Rājāditya is also mentioned in the spurious Sūdī grant, which adds that Būtuga laid siege to Tanjāpur, and burned Nālkōṭe and other hill-forts, and presented to Krishna III. elephants and horses and a great store of wealth (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 183).

Chapter III.

The Rāshtrakūṭas
of Mālkhed.

Krishna III. slew two kings named Dantiga and Vappuka; that he subdued many hostile Gaṅgas; and that he overcame a Pallava king whose name is read as Anṭhiga: and it also implies that he protected the Kalachuris of Central India from an attack by the Gurjara, i.e. doubtless, the followers of the Chaulukya king Mūlārāja of Anhilwād, who had entertained the idea of seizing the hill-forts of Kālānjara and Chitrakūṭa. Also, the Lakshmēshwar record speaks of a campaign to the north, in which the Gurjara king was conquered by Mārasimha under the orders of Krishna: this campaign is mentioned again in one of the 'Sravana-Belgoḷa inscriptions,'¹ and the Lakshmēshwar record, speaking of Krishna III. as "the king who was a very Antaka (Death) to the Chōla," shews that it must have taken place after A. D. 949-50. Other records of interest in connection with this reign are—two inscriptions at Kyāsandr in the Dhārwar District, dated in A. D. 945-46, which tell us that the government of the Banavāsi province was then in the hands of the Mahāsāmānta Kali-Viṭṭa, of the Chēllakēṭana family, as a feudatory of Krishna III.; and some later records of the Ratta chieftains of Saundatti which shew that it was he who brought that family to the front, by raising a religious student named Prithvirāma to the rank and authority of a Mahāsāmānta and also claim that the Rattas were descended from him.² Another feudatory of his was Vandiga or Vaddiga, of the Yādava family of Sēṇadēśa.³

Of the time of Krishna III. we have seven published records:—

(1) A copper-plate grant from Dēōli in the Wardhā District, Central Provinces,⁴ which records that, to increase the religious merit of his most beloved younger brother Jagattuṅga III., he granted to a Kanarese Brāhman a village named Tālapurumshaka in the Nāgapura-Nandivardhana district. The grant was made at the capital of Mānyakhēṭa, on the fifth tithi of the dark fortnight of the month Vaiśākha of the Śirvarin saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 862 (expired); and the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 30th April, A. D. 940.⁵ Among the boundaries of the village that was granted, there are mentioned—on the south, the river Kandānā, Kanhana, or Kandavā; on the west, the village of Mōhamagrāma; and on the north, the village of Vadhīrā: and these have been identified by Dr. Bhandarkar with the river Kanhana which has a course from the north-west of Nāgpur to the south-east,—the modern Mōhgaon in the Chhindwāra District, about fifty-miles to the north-west of Nāgpur,—and the modern Berdi, in the vicinity of Mōhgaon.

the Brāhmanas residing at a college at the village of Pāvittage in the Karpapurī vishaya. The grants were made on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun, on Tuesday, the new-moon day of the month Bhādrapada in the Plavaṅga saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 867 (expired); and the corresponding English date is Tuesday, the 9th September, A. D. 945: on this day there was an annular eclipse of the sun, which was visible over probably the whole of India.¹

(3) A stone inscription at Ātakūr in Mysore,² which records that, in recognition of his having killed the Chōla king Rājāditya, Krishṇa III. gave to the Western Gaṅga prince Satyavākya-Koṅṭgūnivarman-Permanadi-Būtuga the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Belvola three-hundred, the Purigere three-hundred, the Kisukād seventy, and the Bāgenād seventy; and that Būtuga granted some land to a temple of the god Śiva, under the name of Challaśvara, at Ātakūr, and also granted to a follower of his, named Manalarata, the group of villages known as the Ātakūr twelve, and the village of Kōṭeyūr of the Belvola country. The record is dated in simply the Saūmya saṃvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 872 (current), = A. D. 949-50, without any further details.³

(4) A stone inscription at Soratūr in the Dhārwar District,⁴ which records certain grants that were made on the occasion of an eclipse of the moon on Sunday the full-moon tithi of the month Mārgaśīra in the Virōdhikrit saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 873 (expired). The corresponding English date is Sunday, 16th November, A. D. 951, on which day there was an eclipse of the moon.⁵

(5) and (6) Two inscriptions at Tirukkalukunram in the Chingleput District, Madras Presidency,⁶ which record grants made by private persons to the Mūlāsthāna temple, in the seventeenth and nineteenth years of his reign.

(7) An inscription on a rock at the top of the Bavāji hill near Vellore in the North Arcot District, Madras Presidency,⁷ which records that, in the twenty-sixth year of his reign, a member of the Pallava race named Tribhuvanadhīra-Nulamba, with the biruda of ¹ The tithi is determined by the amānta arrangement of the lunar fortnights.—As regards the saṃvatsara, there is a difficulty. By the southern luni-solar system, Plavaṅga coincided with Śaka-Saṃvat 870 current; and thus it cannot be connected with the year 867 at all. And by the mean-sign system, it began on the 17th October, A. D. 945, in 'S.-S. 868 current (867 expired), and ended on the 13th October, A. D. 946, in 'S.-S. 869 current; and the month Bhādrapada of the saṃvatsara fell in A. D. 946, and cannot be connected with 'S.-S. 867 at all. The Plavaṅga saṃvatsara, however, commences when Jupiter enters Mithuna (Gemini). And Mr. Sh. B. Dikshit tells me that,—though, by no authority known to him, did the saṃvatsara begin, according to the mean-sign system, on or before the 9th September, A. D. 945,—Jupiter's apparent longitude on the day in question was 72° 55'; and thus he was in Mithuna.—This result indicates, therefore, that there may also have been an apparent-sign system of the cycle.

The Rāshtrakūṭas
of Mālkhēḍ.

Jagattuṅga III.

Pallava-Murāri, granted the village of Vēlūrppāḍi to a temple of Śiva under the name of Pannappēsvara.

Jagattuṅga III. is known only from the Dēôlī charter of A. D. 940, the grant recorded in which was made by Krishṇa III. for his spiritual benefit. He is described in it as the best beloved younger brother of Krishṇa III.; and, his exact order of seniority being not further determined, it is convenient to place him in the table next after Krishṇa III. As he did not succeed to the throne, he must have died before Krishṇa III.; and so also must have died Krishṇa's son, not mentioned by name, who was the father of Indra IV.

The successor of Krishṇa III. was another younger brother whose name appears in the Prakrit forms of Khottiga, Khôtika, and Kottiga.¹ He had the special biruda of Nityavarsha; and, among other minor ones, also that of Ratta-Kandarpa, "the Ratta god of love." And the record of his time, which describes him as reigning over the whole earth bounded by the four oceans, gives him the usual titles of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēsvara, and Paramahatādraka, and the customary epithet of śrīprithivīvalabha. The only date that we have for him, as yet, is in October, A. D. 971. Siyaka-Harsha, one of the Paramāra kings of Mālwa, claims to have taken the wealth of Khottiga in battle; and it appears that Mālkhēḍ itself was plundered, either by that king, or by his successor Muñja.²

Of the time of Khottiga, we have one published record.³ It is a stone inscription at Adaraguñchi in the Dhārwar District,⁴ which refers to certain private grants that were made while his feudatory, Permanadi-Mārasimha,—i.e. the Western Gaṅga prince Mārasimha, who has been mentioned above in connection with Krishṇa III.,—was governing the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand, the Purigere three-hundred, and the Belvola three-hundred. I use the form that is given by the earlier of the two Sanskrit records.

³ At the temple of Nāgārjuna at Nāgāvi in the Gadag tāluka, Dhārwar District, there is an inscription which is dated at the time of an eclipse of the moon, under the Mṛgaśira nakshatra, on Friday, the full-moon day of the month Mārgaśira of the Śukla samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 891 (expired), corresponding probably to Friday, 26th November, A. D. 969, when there was a lunar eclipse. It is probably a record of the reign of Khottiga. But the original is much damaged; the passage containing the king's biruda or name, at the commencement, is broken away and lost; and the ink-impression of the remainder does not suffice to supply the requisite information.—At the temple of Kannūra-Basappa, at the same village, there is an inscription the preamble of which refers to the reign of Khottiga, who is mentioned as Nityavarsha-Khottigadēva. The original is much damaged. But it appears, from the ink-impression, not to be dated.—At Hirē-Handigōl in the same tāluka, on the back of a stone on which there is an image of the goddess Uḍachavva, there is a dated inscription which refers itself to the reign of Nityavarsha-Kottigadēva. But the date is hopelessly illegible in the ink-impression. The remainder of the record is too much damaged to be edited from the ink-impression.

grants were made on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on Sunday, the new-moon day of the month Āsvayuja of the Prajāpati saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 893 (expired); and the corresponding English date is Sunday, 22nd October, A.D. 971: on this day there was an annular eclipse of the sun, which was visible right across India.¹

Khottiga had a younger brother, who is mentioned only by the biruda of Nirupama.² As he did not succeed to the throne, he probably predeceased Khottiga. And he is referred to only as being the father of Khottiga's successor.

The successor of Khottiga was Nirupama's son Kakka II., whose name appears in the family records in the forms of Kakka and Kakkala,³ and elsewhere as Karkara⁴ and Kakkara.⁵ He had the special birudas of Amoghavarsha and Nripatuṅga; and the minor ones of Vira-Nārāyaṇa, "a very Nārāyaṇa (Vishṇu) among heroes," and Rāja-Trinētra, "a very Trinētra (Śiva) among kings." His titles were the customary ones of Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhāṭṭāraka. And his epithets were prithivīvalabha and vallabhanarēndradēva. The Kardā grant describes him as a paramamāhēśvara or most devout worshipper of the god Mahēśvara (Śiva); and it mentions Malkhēḍ as his permanent capital. The same record also claims that he conquered the Gurjaras, the Chōlas, the Hūṇas, and the Pāṇḍyas. The recorded dates that we have for him are in September, A. D. 972, and June, A. D. 973.

Of the time of Kakka II. we have two published records:—

(1) A copper-plate grant from Kardā, apparently in the Khāṇḍēṣ District,⁶ which records that, at Mānyakhēṭa, he granted to a Brāhman a village named Paṅgarikā in the Vavulatalla twelve, which was in the Uppalikā three-hundred. The grant was made on the occasion of an eclipse of the moon on Wednesday, the full-moon day of the month Āsvayuja of the Āṅgiras saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 894 (expired); and the corresponding English date is Wednesday, 25th September, A. D. 972, when there was a visible lunar eclipse.⁷

(2) A stone inscription at Guṇḍār in the Dhārwar District,⁸ which mentions the Western Gaṅga prince Permanadi-Mārasimha as his feudatory, and records some grants of land that were made on a Sunday, at the dakṣiṇāyana or summer solstice

² Prof. Kielhorn has suggested (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. II. p. 215) that there are grounds for believing that his proper name was Dhruva.

⁵ In an inscription of A. D. 1142-43 at Managōli in the Bijāpur District. In Carn. Désa Insers. Vol. I. p. 747, the transcript wrongly gives 'Kamkara.'

⁶ Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 263.

in the month Āshādha of the Śrīṃukha samvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 896 (current). Here, the corresponding English date seems to be either Sunday, 22nd June, or Tuesday, 24th June, A. D. 973.¹

Kakka II. was the last king of the Mālkhēd dynasty. In A. D. 973-74, he was overthrown by the Western Chālukya Taila II.; and the dominions of the Rāshtrakūṭas then passed into the hands of descendants of the same stock to which belonged the kings from whom they themselves had acquired them. The exact time is fixed by a verse which tells us that, having plucked up and destroyed the Rattas,—having killed a king named Muñja,—having taken the head of Pañchala in battle,—and having possessed himself of the regal dignity of the Chālukyas,—Taila II. reigned for twenty-four years, beginning with the year Śrīṃukha.² As we have already seen, the Śrīṃukha samvatsara was Śaka-Saṃvat 896 current, i.e. A. D. 973-74. And the success of Taila II. is probably to be placed soon after the end of June, A. D. 973, in which month falls apparently one of the recorded dates for Kakka II.

Indra IV.

One of the Śravana-Belgola inscriptions, indeed, discloses the fact that, after the expulsion of Kakka II. from Mālkhēd, an attempt was made by the Western Gaṅga prince Permanadi-Mārasimha to continue the sovereignty by crowning Indra IV., the grandson of Krishna III.³ This is plainly to be attributed to the close connection between the two families: Permanadi-Bātuga, the father of Mārasimha, was a brother-in-law of Krishna III.;⁴ and Indra IV. was the son of a daughter of Bātuga.⁵ As Mārasimha himself appears to have died before the month Āshādha (June-July), falling in A. D. 974, of the Bhāva samvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 896 (expired),⁶ the attempt was made between June, A. D. 973, and the same month in the following year. Indra IV. lived on for some nine years or so. But there is nothing in the Western Chālukya records or elsewhere, to shew that the attempt that was made in connection with him was even temporarily successful. And he ultimately died on the 20th March, A. D. 982.¹

As will be seen in chapter VIII. below, the Râshtrakûtas of Mâlk'hêd left an impress of their dominion in the Kanarese districts, which long survived themselves, in the Ratta chieftains of Saundatti. And a few other names are forthcoming which shew that, though the Mâlk'hêd dynasty was overthrown, the family or tribe, or other branches of it, continued to exist and did not fall altogether into obscurity. Taila II. himself married Jâkavve or Jâkaladêvi, a daughter of king Bhammaha, the Ratta, the ornament of the family of the Râshtrakûtas.² An inscription of the time of the Western Châlukya king Vikramâditya VI., dated in A. D. 1087-88, at Sitâbaldî in the Central Provinces,³ mentions, as his feudatory, the Mahâsâmanta Dhâdîbhada or Dhâdîbhada, who was born in the "great" Râshtrakûta family, and had emigrated from the town of Latalaura. And the name of the Râshtrakûta Mahâsâmantâdhipati Golhanadêva, a feudatory of the Kalachuri king Guyâkarna, is mentioned in an inscription at 'Bahuriband' in the Jabalpur District, Central Provinces, which belongs to about the first quarter of the twelfth century A. D.⁴ Also, there are two earlier references which cannot at present be allocated in detail. From the syllables śrī-râshṭra, which are extant in line 5, it seems likely that there was a notice of the Râshtrakûta family in the same part of the country, to be referred to about the eighth or ninth century A. D., in one of the inscriptions of Sivagupta, son of Harshagupta, at Sirpur in the Râypur District.⁵ And the Mahâsâmanta Bhillama II., of the Yâdava family of Sêunadêsa, whose date was about A. D. 1000, married Lasthiyavvâ or Lakshmi, the daughter of a Râshtrakûta named Jhânjha, who probably belonged to some northern offshoot of the Râshtrakûta stock, perhaps in Central India.⁶

The question depends upon whether Bhammaha is the proper name of another person, or whether it is only another birula of Kakka II.

CHAPTER IV.

THE WESTERN CHALUKYAS OF KALYANI.

Chapter IV.

The Western Chalukyas of

Of the overthrow of the Rāshtrakūtas by Taila II., we have a variety of records. The Nilgund inscription of his own time, dated in A.D. 982, claims that, by acquiring the royal fortunes of the Rāshtrakūtas, he brought the whole earth under the single umbrella of sole sovereignty. The Bhadāna grant of the Śilāhāra prince Aparājita, of A. D. 997, also belonging to his own time, says that Kakkala was overthrown by him "as a light is extinguished by a fierce wind, and of the once flourishing Ratta rule there remained only the memory."¹ The Khārēpātan grant of the Śilāhāra prince Rattarāja, of A.D. 1008, belonging to the time of his successor Iṣivabedāṅga-Satyāśraya, states that he conquered Kakkala in war, and so became king. The Kaūthēm grant of Vikramāditya V., of A. D. 1009, tells us that he "easily cut asunder, "in the field of battle, the two pillars of victory in war of Karkara, connected with the sovereignty of the family of the Rāshtrakūtas, which "verily resembled the two feet of the evil deity Kali stretched out with "vigour in the act of striding, and which were like shoots, formidable, "of compact substance, and having enmity against spiritual preceptors "for their young sprouts, of the creeper, now at length cut down after "the lapse of a long time, of the fortunes of the Rāshtrakūta family."² And the time of the event is fixed by a verse in some somewhat later records, which informs us that he plucked up and destroyed the Rattas, killed the valiant Muñja, took the head of Pañchala in battle, and possessed himself of the regal dignity of the Chālukyas, and then reigned for twenty-four years, beginning with the year Śrīmukha.³ As we have already seen, the Śrīmukha saṃvatsara was Śaka-Saṃvat 896 current, = A.D. 973-74. And the success of Taila II. is probably to be placed soon after the end of June, A. D. 973, which is the latest of the known dates for Kakka II. The way to success was doubtless paved for him by the victory of Siyaka-Harsha of Mālwa over Khoṭṭiga, the predecessor of Kakka II., and by the plundering of Mālkhēd itself which appears to have been effected either by the same king or by his successor Muñja.⁴

Ant.* Vol. XVI, p. 18.—For a description of two actually existing colossal raṇastambhas or pillars of victory in war, set up at Mandasor in Mālwa by king Yaśodharman early in the sixth century A.D., see *Ind. Chapter IV.

The Western Chalukyas of

There was thus established a dynasty, the members of which are called, in their records, Chālukyas, or occasionally, in metrical passages, Chalukyas, and are represented as direct lineal descendants of the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi. The traditional connection is shewn in the table on page 379 above. But it gives only seven generations to fill the interval of two hundred and forty years, from Vijayāditya to Taila II. This yields an average perceptibly in excess of the twenty-five years which are usually accepted as representing a Hindū generation. And there can, thus, be but little doubt, either that some steps are wanting in the pedigree here, or that Taila II. belonged to some side-branch, of the Chālukya stock, which could not in reality claim the direct lineal descent that is allotted to it: the difference of name already noted,—the invariable use, in the records of Taila II. and his successors, of the form “Chālukya,” with the long vowel ā in the first syllable, except under metrical necessity;¹ whereas this form does not once occur in the records of the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi,—is rather suggestive evidence in favour of the latter view. Where the break in the genealogy comes in, on the assumption of direct descent,—or, on the other view, who is to be looked upon as the first historical personage in the branch of the family which Taila II. raised to power,—is not certain. Ayyana I. was very possibly, as we have seen,² an authentic Chalukya prince, with a date that would well accord with the assertion that he was the grandfather of Taila II. But it may at least be taken as fairly certain that the records are correct in stating that Taila's father was Vikramāditya IV., whose wife was Bonthādēvi, a daughter of Lakshmana of the Kalachuri family of Central India. And this person is, therefore, placed at the head of the annexed table of those who may conveniently be called the Western Chālukyas of Kalyāṇi. Their capital, indeed, is not specified until the time of Sōmēśvara I.; and very possibly it was at first Mālkḥād. But Kalyāṇa or Kalyāṇapura, which is the modern Kalyāṇi in the Nizām's Dominions,³ was made the capital by

³ Lat. 17° 51', long. 77°; India Atlas, sheet No. 57,—‘Kulliannee.’—This is in accordance with the identification made by Sir Walter Elliot, which, though there may be no direct evidence in support of it, there are no grounds for questioning. For an account of the place, which shews that there are now no ancient remains at it, see Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. III. p. 23.—There has been an idea that Kalyāṇa was a place of importance in earlier times, and was in fact the capital of the Western Chalukyas of Bādāmi: in accordance with which, Mr. Rice, in translating the Vak-kalēri grant of Kirtivarman II. of A. D. 757, suggested (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 27) that the epithet Kārttikēya-parivakṣana-prāpta-kalyāṇa-paramparā, which occurs in the formal preambles of other Western Chalukya records also, might be understood as applying to the succession to (the throne of the city of) Kalyāṇa; and Mr. Sh. P. Pandit, in translating the Sālōṭgi inscription of Kṛishṇa III. of A.D. 945, rendered (Ind. Ant. Vol. I. p. 209) pravarādhmāna-parama-kalyāṇa-vijay-ādyama by “engaged in reducing the prosperous and great Kalyāṇa.” But, as already remarked (page 335 above, note 1), Kalyāṇa is nowhere mentioned in the records of the earlier Chalukya Sōmēśvara I., and is mentioned as such in one of his inscriptions, dated in A.D. 1053; and it continued to be the capital of all his successors, and of the Kālachuryas after them.

Taila II., then, overthrew the Rāshtrakūṭas,—established the Western Chālukya dynasty,—and reigned for twenty-four years, commencing with the Śrīmukha saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 896 current = A. D. 973-74. His name appears also as Tailapa, Tailapayya, Tailappa, and Nūrmāḍi-Tailā; and he had the biruda of Āhavamalla, “the wrestler in war.” His regal titles were Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭāraka; and he had the epithets of samastabhuvandśraya, śrīprithivīvallabha, Satyāśraya-kula-tilaka or “forehead-ornament or glory of the family of Satyāśraya,” and Chālukya-ābharāṇa or “ornament of the Chālukyas:” and this string of epithets and titles was uniformly used, with occasional additions, by all his successors. The Sogal inscription also styles him Bhujabala-Chakravartin, “the powerful emperor,” or “an universal emperor by the strength of his arm.” His wife was Jākavve or Jakkaladēvi, daughter of a Rāshtrakūṭa named Bhammaha.¹ Only four records of his time, distinctly naming him as the reigning sovereign, are as yet known: they are,—an inscription at Sogal in the Belgaum District,² dated in the month Āshāḍha (June-July), falling in A. D. 980, of the Vikrama saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 902 (expired), which mentions his feudatory Kārtavīrya I., of the family of the Rāṭas of Saundatti, as the lord of the Kūṇḍi country; an inscription at Saundatti in the same district,³ dated six months later in the same year, which mentions another feudatory, the Mahāśmanta Śāntivarman, of the same family, who was ruling at Saundatti;⁴ an inscription period, nor even in those of the Rāshtrakūṭa period. And the idea in question is nothing but a pure mistake.

³ Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. X. p. 204.

protection of the good," which occurs, for instance, in connection with Gaṅgapermanaḍi-Bhuvanaikavira-Udayāditya, a feudatory of the Western Châlukya king Sômesvara II. (Ind. Ant. Vol. IV. p. 209, text lines 23, 24).—There was also an expression, sukha-samkathâ-vinôdadin rājyam-gēyu, or, in Sanskrit, sukha-samkathâ-vinôdēna rājyam kṛi, which was affected specially by the more powerful *Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara*s or feudatory nobles, who, while acknowledging the authority of paramount sovereigns, evidently enjoyed a certain amount of independence, and frequently omitted, in their records, to mention, or make any allusion to, their paramount masters. This expression was plainly of intermediate purport. Mr. Rice has rendered it by "ruling the kingdom in peace and wisdom" (e.g., Mysore Inscriptions, p. 2, and note). And I have rendered it by "governing with the recreation of pleasing conversations" (e.g., Ind. Ant. Vol. V. p. 18). Now, however, I should prefer to render it by "ruling with the pleasure of an agreeable or friendly interchange of communications (with the paramount sovereign);" this seems, not only to convey the idea that is intended, but also to be as close a literal translation as is possible.—Among the feudatory nobles or princes, this expression is found, in records of the Silâhâras of Karâḍ (e.g., Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 210, text lines 15, 16), the Raṭṭas of Saundatti (e.g., Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. X. p. 268, text line 64), of the Kâdambas of Hângal (e.g., Ind. Ant. Vol. X. p. 252, text lines 31, 32), of the Kâdambas of Goa (e.g., Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. IX. p. 297, text line 17), of the Sindas of Yelburga (e.g., id. Vol. XI. p. 223, text line 40), of the Guttas of Guttal (e.g., P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 109, line 69), of the Paudyas of Nôlambavâḍi (e.g., id. No. 172, lines 32, 33), and of the Hoysaḷas of Dôrasamundra, before the time when they attained paramount sovereignty (e.g., id. No. 13, seventh side, lines 8, 9). It will not be found always where I have used the word "ruling" in connection with these princes in the pages of this account,—for the reason that in many of the records the construction renders unnecessary the use of any such expression at all; but it occurs with sufficient frequency to shew that it was the expression that would be used on any occasion on which it might be sought to define exactly their position and authority.—I have fourteen verified instances in which the same expression occurs, very exceptionally, in connection with paramount sovereigns; in the cases of Jayasîmha I., Vikramāditya VI., Bijjala, Sôvidēva, Vîra-Ballâla II., Narasîmha II., and Narasîmha III. (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. Nos. 155, 163, 164, 168, 171, 175, 186, 185, 147, 200, 233, 123, and 148; Mysore Inscriptions, pp. 146, 130, 163, 81, 139, 176, 169, 110, 7, 106, 217, 33, and 11; and Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 234, text line 52). The reason for the use of it in these cases is not apparent.—It occurs sometimes in connection with the wives of paramount sovereigns; for instance, in the case of Lakshmâdēvi, one of the queens of Vikramāditya VI. (Ind. Ant. Vol. X. p. 186, text lines 9, 10).—And it also occurs in the case of Yuvardjyas (see, for instance, page 449 below, note 10, in the case of Jayasîmha III.); and in the case of sons of paramount sovereigns, who without being formally appointed Yuvardjyas, were administering portions of the kingdom (for instance, in the case of Vishnuvardhana-Vijayāditya, son of Sômesvara I.;) (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 136; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 19).—The only instances that I have been able to trace, of the use of the whole expression, including rājyam-gēyu, in connection with any feudatory or official who was not a Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara, are in the cases of the Mahâpradhâna, Antahpura-vergaḷe, and Dandandiyaka Kēsimayya, an officer of the Kâlachurya king Âhavamalla, who was thus ruling the Banavâsi province in A.D. 1181 (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 191; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 138), and of the Dandandiyaka Armativala, a minister of Vîra-Ballâla II., who was thus ruling at Sitarâr in A.D. 1195 (Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I., No. TN. 31; the record applies the same expression to also Vîra-Ballâla himself). The term sukha-samkathâ-vinôda occurs, however,—though not with rājyam-gēyu, but with dlu, 'to govern,' and pratîpâlisu, 'to protect,'—in the cases of an exceptionally high official of Vikramāditya VI., the Mahâpradhâna, Bânasa-veggale, and Dandandiyaka Anantapâlayya, who was thus ruling the Banavâsi province and the Belvola and Puligere districts, and managing the panndya-tax of the seven-and-a-half-lâkh country, in A.D. 1102-1103; and of a subordinate of his, the Dandandiyaka Gôvindarasa, who, at the same time, was thus managing the mêlvaṭṭe-tax of the valldardvula, eradu-billole, and perjurka taxes (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. Nos. 168, 171; Mysore Inscriptions, pp. 79, 80, 139); in the case of Anantapâlayya, the use of the term is in accordance with the fact that he was also styled Mahâsântâdhipati, which was of much the same purport with Mahâmāṇḍalēśvara; in the case of Gôvindarasa, the justification for its use is not so apparent. And it occasionally occurs in connection with simply sara, S.-S. 904 expired;¹ and an inscription at Tālgund in Mysore,² dated either in Vaiśākha (April-May) or Āśvayuja (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 997, of the Hēmalambin saṃvatsara, S.-S. 919 (expired), which records that his feudatory Bhīmarasa, also called Tailapana-an̄kakāra or “the warrior or champion of Tailapa,”³ was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Sāntalige thousand, in Mysore, and the Kisukād seventy or the country round Pattadakal in the Bijāpur District. Where his capital was, is not certain; though, as suggested above, it may very possibly have been Mālkhed. But the localities named in the records mentioned above, shew that he established his sway over the whole of the southern part of the territories that had been held by the Rāshtrakūtas. The pointed and regretful way in which the Bhadāna grant of the feudatory Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Aparājita, of the Silāhāra family, issued in June, A. D. 997, and evidently within the period of his reign, speaks of his having overthrown Kakka II., indicates plainly that his supremacy was admitted in the territory of the northern branch of the Silāhāra family in the Koṅkan. And the statement in the Saṅgamnēr grant of A. D. 1000, that it was the Mahāsāmanta Bhīllama II., of the Yādava family of Sēupadēsa, who actually defeated Muñja,⁴ shews that this feudatory prince also, whose province lay in the direction of Aṅgābād, Nāsik, and Khāndēsh, recognised his suzerainty in the more northern parts of the Rāshtrakūta dominions to the east of the Western Ghats. On the other hand, he cannot have acquired any of the Gujarāt provinces: for, not only have we dates ranging from A. D. 941-42 to 996-97 for the Chaulukya king Mūlarāja of Aphilwād,⁵ whose successors, moreover, maintained the sovereignty for the next four centuries, but, also, somewhere about A. D. 975, amidst the events which attended the downfall of the Rāshtrakūtas, a Chaulukya prince named Bārappa,—evidently some connection of Mūlarāja,—seized the Lāṭa country, which remained in the possession of his family until at iru, ‘to be’; e. g., in the case of Gaṅgapermaṇḍi-Bhuvanaikavīra-Udayāditya, mentioned above, who is described as governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Sāntalige thousand, the Maṇḍali thousand, and the eighteen agrahāras, with punishment of the wicked and protection of the good, and being at the capital of Baḷligāve with the pleasure of an agreeable or friendly interchange of communications (with his paramount sovereign).—The expression, in any of its forms, does not necessarily occur in connection with all Mahāmaṇḍalēśvaras; e. g., the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Chāvundarāja is described as simply governing the Banavāsi province (Ind. Ant. Vol. IV. p. 179, text line 11).

³ As used in this and similar birūdas, an̄ka seems,—as the Kanarese affix kāra is used,—to be intended to be applied in its meaning of ‘a military show, or sham-fight; war, battle.’ But an̄kakāra may also represent the Sanskrit an̄kakāra, ‘an arithmetician;’ and there may be some such implication as that by which the prefix of the name of the Eastern Chaulukya king Gunaka-Vijayāditya III. is explained by the statement (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 102) that he was “a thorough arithmetician (an̄kakāraś śāśhṭhi).”

any rate the time of Trilôchanapâla in A.D. 1051.¹ Some of the later records assert, that, in addition to subverting the power of the Râshtrakûtas, he overcame the king of Chêdi, the Utkalas or people of Orissa, and the kings of Chôla and Nêpâla, and subjugated the whole of the Kuntala country. The alleged conquest of Nêpâl is, of course, an invention of the poets; and probably the statements about Chêdi, the Chôlas, and Orissa, are no more substantial, except in being perhaps based, in the first two cases, on some successful resistance of attempts at invasion. The subjugation of the whole of the Kuntala country, however, is a fact, which is amply borne out by the localities mentioned above, and by all the subsequent records, in some of which the Western Châlukyās are emphatically described as "the lords of Kuntala." The specific limits of this country are not yet known. But the statements in epigraphic records shew that it covered at least the whole of the Kanarese districts. On the south, it included Banavâsi in North Kanara; Balagâmve and Harihar in Mysore, and Hampe or Vijayanagara in the Bellâry District; to the north of these places, Hângal, Lakshmêshwar, Lakkuṇḍi, and Gadag, in the Dhârwar District; further to the north, Belgaum, Saundatti, Manôli, and Kônṇûr, in the Belgaum District, and Pattadakal and Aihole in the Bijâpur District; and still more to the north, Têrdâl in the Sânglî State, Bijâpur itself, and doubtless Kalyâni. And some of the principal and best-known divisions of the country were the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, the Pânûngal or Hângal five-hundred, the Puligege or Lakshmêshwar three-hundred, the Belvola three-hundred, the Kûṇḍi three-thousand, the Vêṇugrâma or Belgaum seventy, the Toragale or Torgal six-thousand, the Kelavâḍi three-hundred near Bâdâmi, the Kisukâḍ seventy, of which Pattadakal was the chief town, the Bâgadage or Bâgalkôt seventy, and the Tardavâḍi thousand, which was the country in the neighbourhood of Bijâpur.² It is to be understood, in fact, that Taila II. acquired the whole of the Râshtrakûta kingdom, with the exception of the Gujarât provinces; and in the Khârêpâṭaṇ grant of A. D. 1008, the territory that was held by his immediate successor Irivabedaṅga-Satyâśraya, is specifically called Rattapâṭi or "the country of the Rattas or Râshtrakûtas;" while in some of the Chôla records it is called the Rattapâḍi seven-and-a-half-lâkh country.³ The Muñja whom he slew, as stated in the verse that is referred to

on page 426 above, is the Paramāra king Vākpati-Muñja of Mālwa, the successor of Śīyaka-Harshā who has been mentioned in connection with the Rāshtrakūṭa king Khottiga. This event, however, is not to be made synchronous, — even if the verse in question intends it, — with the overthrow of the Rāshtrakūṭas; for we have, for Muñja, as late a date as A. D. 979.¹ It is claimed for Muñja that he conquered Taila II. no less than sixteen times,² before he met his fate at Taila's hands. And he eventually lost his life under the following circumstances. He made his final expedition into Taila's country, against the advice of his minister Rudrāditya. Crossing the Gōdāvarī, which is said to have formed the northern boundary of Taila's kingdom, he was defeated and taken captive. After a protracted imprisonment, he made a futile attempt to escape. And then, being imprisoned again, he was at first treated with great indignity, and finally was executed.³ The killing of Pañchala, also, was not really synchronous with the commencement of Taila's reign; for that person, a Western Gaṅga prince, is described, in a fragmentary record at Mulgund in the Dhārwar District, as reigning in A. D. 974 or 975 over the whole country bounded by the eastern, the western, and the southern oceans.⁴

Iṛivabedaṅga

Taila II. was succeeded, probably towards the end of A. D. 997, by his eldest son Satyāśraya, whose name appears also as Sattiga⁵ and Sattima,⁶ and who had the virūdas of Akalaṅkacharita, "of spotless behaviour," and Iṛivabedaṅga or Iṛivabedaṅga, "a wonder among those who pierce (their foes)." Of his time, we have nine records. Eight of them expressly mention him as the reigning king; and these are, — an inscription at Gadag in the Dhārwar District,⁷ dated in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1002, of the Subhākrit samvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Samvat 924 (expired),⁸ while his feudatory, the Mahāsāmanta Śōbhanaśara, was governing the Belvola three-hundred, — which was the country round Gadag, Aṇṇigere, Kurtakōti, and Nargund in Dhārwar, Hūli in Belgaum, and Kukkanūr in the Nizām's Dominions, — together with the Puligere or Lakshmēshwar three-hundred, the Kundūr five-hundred, and the Kukkanūr thirty; an inscription at Tumbige in the Bijāpur District,⁹ dated in the Krōdhin samvatsara, S. 1005; two inscriptions at Kuṭkanūr in the Nizām's Dominions and Yalawāl in Mysore,¹ the dates of which, partially illegible, may be anything from S.-S. 920 to 929; an inscription at Kannēshwar in the Dhārwar District,² dated in the Viśvāvasu saṃvatsara, S.-S. 927 (expired), = A. D. 1005-1006, while his feudatory, the Mahāsāmantā Bhimarāja, also called Tailapana-aṅkakāra, was still governing, as under Taila II., the Banavāsi, Sāntalige, and Kisukāl districts; an inscription at Hottūr in the Dhārwar District, dated, without full details, in the Playaṅga saṃvatsara, S.-S. 929 (expired), = A. D. 1007-1008;³ a copper-plate grant from Khārēpāṭa in the Ratnāgiri District,⁴ dated in Jyēṣṭhā (May-June), falling in A. D. 1008, of the Kīlaka saṃvatsara, S.-S. 930 (expired), which describes Satyāśraya himself as reigning over Rāṭapāṭi or the country of the Rattas, i. e. the Rāshtrakūṭas,⁵ and records a grant that was made by his feudatory, the Maṇḍalika Raṭṭarāja, of the southern branch of the Silāhāras of the Koṅkan; and an inscription at Munawalli in the Dhārwar District,⁶ dated in Śrāvaṇa (July-Aug.) of the same saṃvatsara, falling also in A. D. 1008. The ninth is a copper-plate grant from Saṅgammūr in the Ahmednagar District,⁷ dated in the month Bhādrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A. D. 1000, of the Śārvarin saṃvatsara, S.-S. 922 (expired): this record, containing a charter issued by the Yādava prince Bhillama II., who was then ruling the Sēupa country, does not mention Satyāśraya, or, indeed, any paramount sovereign at all; but the connection between the Yādavas of Sēupadēva and the Western Chālukyas is shewn by the statement that it was Bhillama who killed Muṇja, the enemy of Taila II.; and Bhillama can only have been ruling as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya kings with whom he was synchronous. From the Chōla records, we learn that Satyāśraya fought with the Chōla king Kō-Rājarāja-Rājakēsarivarman, who claims to have defeated him.⁸ On the other hand, the Hottūr inscription, while admitting that the Chōla king, — here called Nūrnaḍi-Chōla, and apparently named as Rājendra,⁹ — having collected a force numbering nine hundred thousand, had pillaged the whole country, had slaughtered the women, the children, and the Brāhmins, and, taking the girls to wife, had destroyed their caste, says that Satyāśraya put the Chōla to flight, and so acquired great stores of wealth and vehicles; and that, having thus conquered the southern country, he was then, in A. D. 1007-1008, reigning over the whole earth at Tāvareyaghaṭṭa or Tovareyaghaṭṭa, i. e. at the mountain-pass of Tāvare or Tovare, — which seems to be the place where the decisive battle was fought.

The next name in the table is that of Daśavarman or Yaśōvarman, the younger brother of Irivabedaṅga-Satyāśraya. His name is almost invariably given as Daśavarman; in fact, there is as yet only one instance to the contrary,—a passage in the Kaúthém grant of A. D. 1009,¹ in which it appears as Yaśóvarman; and the reason for the variation there is not apparent. His wife was Bhágyavati or Bhágaladevi.² There are no records of his time. And his name is omitted in some of the subsequent records, which take the regal succession direct from Irivabedaṅga-Satyáśraya to Vikramáditya V.³ It seems plain, therefore, that he did not reign. And none of the records state any history in connection with him.

Vikramáditya V.

The successor of Irivabedaṅga-Satyáśraya, then, was Daśavarman's eldest son Vikramáditya V., whose name appears sometimes as Vikramáditya and sometimes as simply Vikrama, and who had the biruda of Tribhuvanamalla, "the wrestler of the three worlds:" he probably succeeded to the throne in A. D. 1009. Of his reign we have four records,—a copper-plate grant from Kaúthém in the Miraj State,⁴ dated in the Saumya saṃvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 930 expired, by mistake for 931 expired or 932 current, with the mention of a lunar eclipse which falls in A. D. 1009;⁵ an inscription at Sūdi in the Dhārwar District,⁶ dated in the Sádharana saṃvatsara, S.-S. 932 (expired), = A. D. 1010-11; another at Ālūr in the Gadag tāluka of the same district,⁷ dated in the same year, while his feudatory, Iriva-Noḷambādhirāja, also called Ghateya-ankakāra, of the Pallava family, whose wife was a daughter of Irivabedaṅga-Satyáśraya, was governing the Noḷambavādi thirty-two-thousand, the Keṅgaḷi five-hundred, the Ballakunde three-

³ I said (Ind. Ant. Vol. XVI. p. 19) that there is an inscription at Ālūr in the Gadag tāluka, which, if the copy (Carn.-Désa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 38) is correct, speaks of Vikramáditya V. as the son of Satyáśraya. The record is that of A. D. 1010-11, of the reign of Vikramáditya V. And I find, from an ink-impression, that the copy is not correct. The word used is magal, 'daughter,' applying to the wife of Iriva-Noḷambādhirāja; not magam, 'son,' as given in the copy, applying to Vikramáditya V. But I find that the statement is certainly made in an inscription at Harihar (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 116; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 68), where the text (line 17) runs ene saury-śmānatan-āda Tuilapan=apatyam Sattimam tam-nripāḷana putram vibhu-Vikramam tad-anujam sand=Ayyanam, &c. And there is also an inscription at the temple of Śaṃbhu-Mahādēva at Diggāvi in the Nizām's Dominions (Carn.-Désa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 189), which seems to repeat the statement; the words, according to the transcript, are ghana-saury-āgrani-Tuila-bhādhiraja-sutam Satyáśrayam tan-nripāḷana putram vibhu-Vikramam tad-anujam sand=Ayyanam, &c.

⁵ The grant was made on the occasion of an eclipse of the moon. But the month is not stated; so the precise date cannot be determined, as, in the Saumya saṃvatsara, there were two lunar eclipses, on the 12th April, A. D. 1009, and on the 6th October following (see Von Oppelzer's Canon der Finsternisse, p. 359).—The Saumya saṃvatsara might, indeed, be coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 930 expired,—in which case there would be no mistake in the record,—by the southern Vikrama luni-solar system, if that system existed (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XVIII. p. 222). And then,—bearing in mind that the date must be later than that of the Munawāli inscription, which, coupling Kīlaka with S.-S. 930 expired according to the usual southern luni-solar system, gives a date in July-August, A. D. 1008, for Irivabedaṅga-Satyáśraya,—the eclipse might be identified with that of the 17th October, A. D. 1008. But the existence of the southern Vikrama variety of the cycle remains to be proved. And it seems, on the whole, probable that there really is a mistake in respect of the Śaka year that is given in the record.

hundred, the Kukkanûr thirty, and five towns in the Mâsiyavâdi country; and another at Galagnâth in the same district,¹ which gives a date in Bhâdrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A. D. 1011, of the Virôdhikrit samvatsara, S.-S. 933 (expired). The records do not appear to state any history in connection with him.

The next name in the table is that of Ayyaṇa II., a younger brother of Vikramâditya V. We have, however, no records that are referable to him; and he does not appear to have reigned.

The next name is that of Akkâdêvî, an elder sister of Jayasimha II., who is mentioned in several of the records, and appears to have been a personage of considerable reputation and importance. She was styled gunada-bedangi, "a marvel of virtuous qualities," and âkavâkye, "she whose speech is single and uniform;" and she is described as "a very Bhairavî in battle and in destroying hostile kings." In A. D. 1021 or 1022, she was governing the Kisukâd seventy, under Jayasimha II.² And she continued in authority under Sômêśvara I.: for we find her described in a record of A. D. 1047 as having laid siege to the fort of Gôkâge, i. e. Gôkâk in the Belgaum District,—probably to quell some local insurrection;³ in A. D. 1050 she was governing the Kisukâd seventy, the Togagare six, and the Mâsavâdi hundred-and-forty;⁴ and in A. D. 1053 she is mentioned again as governing the Kisukâd seventy, in a record which implies that the seat of her government was Vikramapura, which is the modern Arasîbîdi in the Hungund taluka, Bijâpur District.⁵ A record of A. D. 1066 mentions her as the mother of the Kâdamba Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Tōyimaḍêva, who was then ruling the Banavâsi twelve-thousand and the Pânurṅgal five-hundred.⁶ Her husband, therefore, was one of the Kâdambas of Hângal; but his name has not yet been traced.

The successor of Vikramâditya V. was his youngest brother Jayasimha II., who had the birudâ of Jagadêkamalla, "the sole wrestler in the world." His wife was Suggaladêvî, who, in the Ohannabasava-Purâṇa, where his name appears in the form of Dêsiṅga, is called Suggale and is described as converting him from Jainism to the Saiva faith.⁷ And he had a daughter, named Hâmmâ or Ayyalladêvî, who was married to the Yâdava prince Bhillama III. of Sêunadêśa.⁸ Of his reign, we have the Miraj copper-plate grant,⁹ and some two dozen inscriptions on stone,¹⁰ which give dates ranging from the month

D. 1025, and the Bhāndúp grant of the 'Silāhāra Mahāmaṇḍalésvara Chhittarāja,⁴ who in A. D. 1026 was ruling the whole of the Koṅkan; both these persons were, without doubt, vassals of Jayasinha II. The Balagāmve inscription of A. D. 1019 describes him as a moon to the water-lily that was king Bhōja, i.e. as taking away the glory of Bhōja, just as the moon causes the water-lilies that bloom in the daytime to close their flowers at night,—and as defeating the Chōlas and Chēras, and putting to flight the confederacy of Mālwa:⁵ the Bhōja who is spoken of here, is the Paramāra king of Mālwa,—the brother's son of Vākpati-Muñja,—for whom we have the date of A. D. 1021-22, and who is said to have vanquished, among others, the Karṇātas, i.e. the Western Chálukyas.⁶ Several of the other records mention Jayasinha II. as defeating the Chōla king. But none of them give details, except the Miraj charter, which records the grant of a village, in the Ede-dore two-thousand, that was made by him in A. D. 1024, on the full-moon day of the month Vaiśákha of the Raktākshin saṁvatsara, 'Saka-Saṁvat 946 (expired), when, having fought and subdued the mighty Chōla, the lord of the five Dramilas, and having appropriated all the possessions of the lords of the seven Koṅkans, his victorious camp was pitched near Kōlhāpur in the course of a campaign for conquering the northern countries.⁷ The Chōla king with whom he fought, was Rājendra-Chōladēva, otherwise called Madhurāntaka II. and Parakēsari-varman, who, in the usual manner, transfers all the successes to himself, and claims to have conquered the Idaiturai nāḍ, i.e. the Ede-dore district mentioned just above, which is to be identified with the country lying round Edatore, the head-quarters of a tāluka in Mysore,—to have penetrated as far as Banawāsi,—and even to have taken the whole of the Raṭṭapāḍi country from Jayasinha.⁸ The principal feudatories and officials of Jayasinha II. were,—a certain Chatta, Chattayya, or Chattaladēva, who seems to be Shashṭhadēva I., of the

D. 1007-1008. He may have been Yuvarāja then. But the record was put on the stone in A. family of the Kādambas of Goa;¹ the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Kundamarasa, also called Sattigana-Chatta, son of Irivabedaṅgaḍēva,² with the title of "supreme lord of Banavāsi, the best of towns," who, in A. D. 1019, at Balipura, i.e. Balagāṁve, was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Sāntalige thousand, and the Hayve five-hundred, up to the shore of the western ocean;³ the Mahāśāmantā Bhīllama III., of the Yādava family of Sēṇaḍēśa, who in A. D. 1025 was ruling his hereditary province at Sindinagara, i.e. Sinnar in the Nāsik District; the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Sēṇya and Nāgāditya, of the Sinda family, who in A. D. 1033-34 were ruling the Bāgadage country; the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Mayūravarma II., of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who in A. D. 1034-35 and 1038-39 was ruling the Pānūṅgal five-hundred; the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Tēyimaḍēva, of the same family, a son of Akkāḍēvi, who was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānūṅgal five-hundred in A. D. 1037; the Mahāśāmantā Irivabedaṅga-Mārasimha, apparently of the Maṇalūr family,⁴ and the Mahāśāmantā Jayakēśin of that family,—each of them with the title of "lord of Purigere, the best of towns,"—who in A. D. 1038-39 were holding the office of Nāḍgāmūḍu of the Purigere three-hundred; the Mahāśāmantā Eṇeyamma or Erega, of the Ratta family of Saundatti, who was ruling in A. D. 1040; and Nalamba-Pallava-Bommapayya, of the Pallava lineage, who in A. D. 1040-41 and 1042-43 was governing five towns in the Māsavāḍi country. Also, as already noted, in A. D. 1021 or 1022 his elder sister Akkāḍēvi was governing the Kisukāḍ seventy. The records do not name the capital proper of Jayasimha II. himself. But they mention, as minor capitals, Balagāṁve and Pottalakeṇe, which latter place is now represented by Daṇṇāyakana-kere in the Bellāry District,⁵ and another place, named Kolliṇpāke, which has not yet been identified.⁶

⁶ See the Bhairanmatī inscription (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 231).—No one has ever been able to tell me where the place is. But it should be a very well known, as it is the slightly differently spelt Kolliṇpāki which is mentioned in the Rājāśekhara-vilāsa, I., 53-56, as the birthplace of Rēṇukēśa, Rēṇukāchārya, or Rēvanaprabhu. According to the poem, Rēṇukēśa was born from the śa or liṅga at Kolliṇpāki, into which he was absorbed again, when he had begotten a son named Rudramuni varā, and had initiated him and given him the office of Guru. In his introduction to his edition of the Rājāśekhara-vilāsa, Gangadhar Madiwaleswar Turmari stated that Rēṇukēśa was one of the Pañchadhāryas or five preceptors who established the Liṅgāyat religion, and that he founded a maṭha or religious college at Kolliṇpāki, and gave the paṭṭadhikāra or pontiffship of it to his son, Rudramuniśvara; that in Rudramuniśvara's lineage were born Uddānagaśādhīśvara, Annadāntīśa, Rēvaṇasiddhēśvara, and Chikkavīradēva, who established a matha at Danugūr, south of Bangalore, and became the Sedmi or pontiffs of it; that in Chikkavīradēva's lineage was born the poet Shadākshari, the author of the Rājasekharavilāsa, who became the Paṭṭadasevni of the Danugūr matha about A.D. 1631; that Shadākshari died at Yeḷendūr, in Mysore, where the people set up in memory of him a linga which they worship to this day; and that his descendants are still found at Kolliṭpāki, Danugūr, and Yeḷendūr. But he did not give any information as to where Kolliṭpāki is to be looked for. — As Kolliṭpākkai, the place is also mentioned in the Chōla inscriptions (e.g., South-Ind. Inscr. Vol. I. pp. 96, 99). And an inscription of A.D. 1131 at Drāksharām (Elliot Telugu Sasanaṃs, p. 287) styles the Mahā-maṇḍalēśvara Yongirāmārga (sic) "supreme lord of Kolliṭpāki, the best of towns; lord of the six-thousand district on the south bank of the river Krishnavēni; and foundation-pillar of the sovereignty of the Chālukyas of Veṅgi." — Mr. Kittel says (Nāgaśarma's Canarese Prosody, Introd. pp. xlviii, lxxviii, note 19, lxix, note 2) that the Guru's throne of the present Rēvaṇasiddha, the disciple-descendant of Rērukēśa, is at Bālehalli, which is called in Sanskrit Kadalīpura, near Honnūr in the Maledēśa, or hill-country along the Western Ghats. And the suggestion has been made to me, that Bālehalli may be Kolliṭpāke. But I know of nothing tending to prove this. — The Kaśāktūḍi Pallava grant (see page 323 above) mentions a village named Kolliṭpākam, in the vicinity of Conjeeveram. But, whether this is the Kolliṭpāke of the other references, is doubtful.

Jayasimha II. was succeeded by his son, Sômésvara I., who had the double biruda of Trailókya-malla-Āhavamalla. His wives were, — Bāchaladēvi, who was the mother of Sômésvara II., Vikramāditya VI., and Jayasimha III., and was probably his first wife;¹ Chandalakabbe or Chandrikādēvi, who had the title of. piriyarasi or chief queen in A. D. 1047-48;² Mailaladēvi, who had the same title in A. D. 1053-54;³ and Kētaladēvi.⁴ Of his reign, we have some forty records,⁵ which give dates ranging from the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A.D. 1044, of the Tārana saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 966 (expired),⁶ to the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1068, of the Kilaka saṃvatsara, Ś.-S. 990 (expired).⁷ And they shew that his principal feudatories

It is too much damaged to be edited as a whole; but the verse which mentions Bāchaladēvi runs (from an ink-impression) — Abhinuta-vikramābharana[n = Ahava]bhalla-nripaṃge [Kā]mini-nibhey = ene saṃda peṇ () Bāchaladēve puṭṭi[da]r = ssutar = vvibhu Bhuvanaikamalla-nripaṇuṇu ripu-rāya-gharaṭṭan = unnatam Tribhuvanamalla-bhūbh[u]ja[ra]num = ujvala-kīr[tti] Noḷambadhāpanum. — The Gadag inscription of A.D. 1098 also names Bāchaladēvi as the mother of Sômésvara I. and Vikramāditya VI.

But, apparently, impressions have not been made of all the inscriptions at Narēgal. There is an inscription of the same year at the temple of Kallēśvara at Āḍūr in the Hāṅgal tāluka (ibid. p. 80); but neither the copy nor the ink-impression shews the full details of the date.

and officials were,—the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Mayūravarma II., of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who in A. D. 1045 was ruling the Kisukād seventy, the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, and the Sāntalige thousand, up to the borders of the western ocean; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Chāvundarāya, with the title of “supreme lord of Banavāsi, the best of towns,” who in A. D. 1045-46 and 1062-63, at Balligāve, i.e. Balagāṁve, was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand; Kaliyamarasa, of the Jimūtavāhana lineage and the Khachara race (apparently a branch of the Silāhāra stock), who in A. D. 1045-46 was governing the Bāsavura hundred-and-forty; the Hoysala Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vinayāditya, who in A. D. 1048, or thereabouts, was ruling the territory included between the Kōṅkan, the Bhaḍadavayal province or district, Talakād, and Sāvimale; the Mahāsamantas Kārtavīrya I. and Aṅka, of the family of the Raṭṭas of Saundatti, the latter of whom, in A. D. 1048-49, was ruling at Sugandhavarti, i.e. Saundatti, the chief town of the Kūṇḍi three-thousand; Jayakēsin I., of the family of the Kādambas of Goa, who was ruling his hereditary part of the Kōṅkan in A. D. 1052-53;¹ the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Rēvarasa, with the title of “lord of Māhishmatī, the best of towns,” and described as belonging to the family of Kārtavīrya,² who in A. D. 1054-55 was governing in the neighbourhood of Kembhāvi in the Nizām’s Dominions; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Sōyimarasa, of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who was ruling the Pāṇuṅgal five-hundred in A. D. 1067-68; and the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kīrtivarman II., of the same family, who in A. D. 1068-69 was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand. And among the records of this reign we must reckon, though it does not name the paramount sovereign, the copper-plate grant of the Silāhāra Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Mārasimha,³ who in A. D. 1058-59, at Khilīgiladurga or Kilīgiladurga, was ruling the Karād territory, undoubtedly as a feudatory of Sōmēśvara I. Sōmēśvara’s aunt, Akkādēvi, continued in authority under him: we find her mentioned in one of the Arasībīḍi inscriptions, of A. D. 1047-48, as laying siege to the fort of Gōkāge, i.e. Gōkāk in the Belgaum District,—doubtless to quell some local disturbance; and in A.D. 1050 she was still governing the Kīśukād seventy, with also the Toragare six and the Māsa-vādi hundred-and-forty. In A. D. 1053-54, his wife Mailaladēvi was holding the government of the Banavāsi twelve-thousand.¹ In the Honwād inscription of A.D. 1054, his wife Kētaladēvi is described as governing or managing the Ponnāvāda agrahāra, i.e. Honwād in the Bijāpur District, according to the tribhōg-ābhyantara-siddhi, which means that she took one-third of the revenues, the other two-thirds going, in equal shares, to the gods and the Brāhmaṇas.² In A. D. 1053, his eldest son Sômesvara II. was ruling the Belvola three-hundred and the Purigere three-hundred.³ In A. D. 1055-56, his second son Vikramāditya VI. was ruling the Gaṅgavādi ninety-six-thousand and the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, with Harikēśarin, of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, as his subordinate in charge of the latter district.⁴ In A.D. 1064, his third son Jayasimha III. was ruling the Tardavādi thousand, which was the territory lying round Bijāpur.⁵ And, in A. D. 1064 and 1066, his fourth son Vishṇuvardhana-Vijayāditya was ruling the Nōlambavādi thirty-two-thousand. It was in this reign that Kalyāṇa or Kalyāṇapura, which is the modern Kalyāṇi in the Nizām's Dominions,⁶ became the capital of the Western Chálukyas. Bilhana distinctly tells us, in his Vikramāṅkadēvacharita, that Sômesvara I. made the town, i.e. either founded it or developed it into the capital.⁷ And, in perfect accordance with this, is the fact that the very earliest epigraphic mention of the place that has been traced, is in a record of A.D. 1053,⁸ which speaks of it as the nelevīḍu

⁶ Carn.-Dēsa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 144; I quote, however, from an ink-impression. — The copy in the Carn.-Dēsa Inscr. gives, among other mistakes, the name of the camp as Pūliyaṇaṇaviḍu. Sir Walter Elliot (Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. IV. p. 13) gave it as Puḷiyappayana. And Mr. Rice (Mysore Inscriptions, p. lxiv.) turned it into Puḷiyarpatṇa, and identified the place with the modern Huliyaṇ in the Chitaldurg District, Mysore. Also, both Sir Walter Elliot and Mr. Rice took the village that was granted to be the modern Savanūr, the chief town of the Native State of the same name within the limits of the Dhārwar District. But Sivurūr has to be located in the immediate neighbourhood of Sūḍi and Pattadakal, — far away from Savanūr. The Sindavāḍi nāḍ, in which lay Puḷiyappayaṇaviḍu, either means the Kisukāḍ seventy, the Kejavāḍi three-hundred, the Bāgaṭage seventy; and the Nareyaṃgal twelve, or else it lay still more to the north-east in the direction of Raichūr.

as they grew up, Vikramāditya exhibited such marked capabilities that his father conceived the idea of appointing him Yuvarāja and passing the crown to him, to the supersession of his elder brother. The favour, however, was declined by Vikramāditya, on the grounds that it did not belong to him by right.¹ Sômesvara II. was then appointed Yuvarāja. And, with his father's permission, Vikramāditya VI. set out on a series of military expeditions. He is said to have repeatedly defeated the Chôlas and plundered Kāñchi; to have lent his assistance to the king of Málwa, who came to him for protection, to regain his kingdom; to have carried his arms as far as Bengal and Assam; to have attacked the king of Ceylon; to have destroyed the sandalwood forests of the Malaya hills; and to have slain the lord of Kérala. And, finally, the poem says, he conquered Gāngakunḍa, — elsewhere called Gaṅgaikonda-Chôlapuram and Gaṅgāpurī,² — which was a Chôla city; Veṅḡ, the capital of the Eastern Chalukyas, and Chakrakôṭa, which appears to have been a fortress in the Dhārā territory of the Paramāra kings of Málwa.³ This, however, closed the events of the reign of Sômesvara I. For, the news reached Vikramāditya on the Kṛishṇa, on his return homewards after the above achievements, that his father, having been attacked by a malignant fever, for which no remedies were found to be of any avail, had proceeded to the Tuṅgabhadra, and there, reciting his confession of the Saiva faith, had drowned himself in the sacred river. And, from Bilhana's statements that he proceeded to Kalyāni to console Sômesvara II., and that, for some time after, the two brothers lived in concord and friendship, it appears that Sômesvara II. succeeded at once to the throne, without any attempt at opposition on the part of Vikramāditya VI.

Sômesvara I. was thus succeeded by his eldest son Sômesvara II., who had the baruda of Bhuvanaikamalla, "the sole wrestler in the world." We have already seen that in A. D. 1053, during his father's time, he was governing the Belvola three-hundred and the Purige three-hundred. Of his own reign, which was apparently uneventful except for internal dissensions, we have some twenty records,⁴ which give dates ranging from the month Śrāvaṇa, (July-Aug.), falling in A. D. 1069, of the Saumya saṁvatsara, Śaka-Saṁvat 991 (expired),⁵ to the month Bhādrapada (Aug.-Sept.) falling in

Also, a record at the Jaṭiṅga-Rāmēśvara hill in the Chitaldurg District, Mysore, shews that, in spite of the dissensions between Sōmēśvara II. and his younger brothers, Jayasinha III. was entrusted with the government of apparently the Nalambavāḍi province, which he held at any rate in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1072, of the Virōdhikrit saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 993 (expired), when, the record says, he was governing at the poravāḍu or camp outside Gondavāḍi.⁵ And a record, unfortunately rather damaged,

But in both places, and elsewhere, the originals have distinctly heri (or hēri); and the dictionaries do not give any such variant of hiri.

at Niralgi in the Hāngal táluka, Dhārwar District, dated in Āśvayuja (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 1074, of the Ananda saṁvatsara, Śaka-Saṁvat 996 (expired),— which records a grant that was made, on a request preferred to Sômesvara II. at Bānkāpur by the Mahāmandalēśvara Vikramāditya and, apparently, Vishṇuvardhana-Vijayāditya,¹ by the three-hundred Mahājanas of Nirilli,— seems to shew that Vikramāditya VI. was then entrusted with the government of the Banavāsi twelve-thousand.²

As regards the termination of the reign, the epigraphic records simply say that, after Sômesvara II. had enjoyed the sovereignty for a time, he became intoxicated with pride, and neglected the sufferings of his subjects, whereupon Vikramāditya, being virtuously minded, punished or confined him, and became king ;³ and that, by the strength of his own arm, Vikramāditya seized in battle the sovereignty of Sômesvara while it was still of no long duration, and made himself emperor.⁴ And, for details, we have to turn to the Vikramāṅkadēva-charita. Bilhana tells us⁵ that, for a time, the two brothers lived in friendly fashion at Kalyāṇa ; the younger duly honouring the elder as the chief of his house and his king. Sômesvara, however, fell into evil courses, and even tried to do harm to his brother. Thereupon Vikramāditya left Kalyāṇa, taking with him all his followers, and also his younger brother, Jayasīṁha III., who, he considered, could not be safely left near the king. Sômesvara sent forces in pursuit, to bring the brothers back. But he was unsuccessful, and at last desisted from the attempt. Vikramāditya went on to the Tuṅgabhadra, on the banks of which river he rested his army for some time, with the intention of fighting the Chôla king. It appears, however, that for some unexplained reason, he deferred this project, in favour of making a triumphal progress through the southern and western parts of the kingdom ; for, the narrative goes on to say that, having spent some time in the Banavāsi province, he marched through the Malaya country,—that Jayakēśin, the lord of the Koṅkan, i.e. the first Jayakēśin in the family of the Kādambas of Goa, came to him, and brought presents,—and that the lord of Ālupa made submission, and received favours in return. It also implies that he visited Kērala, and inflicted some reverse on the king of that country. He then seems to have taken some definite action against the Chôlas. But it was stopped by the Chôla king, Rājakesarivarman, otherwise called Vira-Rājēndradēva I.,⁶ making overtures of friendship, and offering him a daughter in marriage, on the condition that he retired to the Tuṅgabhadra.¹ Vikramāditya accepted the proposals; and the marriage was duly celebrated. Shortly afterwards, however, the news reached him that his father-in-law was dead, and that the Chōla kingdom was in a state of anarchy. He then proceeded at once to Kāñchī, the Chōla capital; put down the rebellion there; and, going on to Gāṅgakūṇḍa, secured the throne for his brother-in-law, probably Parakēsarivarman, otherwise called Adhirājēndradēva.² He then marched back to the Tuṅgabhadra. But he heard, almost immediately, that his brother-in-law had lost his life in a fresh rebellion, and that Rājiga, the lord of Veṅḡ, — i.e. the Eastern Chalukya king Kulōttuṅga-Chōḍadēva I., whose original appellation was Rājēndra-Chōḍa, — had seized the throne of Kāñchī.³ He at once prepared to march against Rājiga. The latter induced Sōmēśvara II. to enter into an alliance against their mutual enemy. When Vikramāditya at length reached Rājiga's forces, Sōmēśvara's army was encamped, with hostile intentions, not far off in his rear. And in the battle which ensued, and in which Vikramāditya was victorious, Rājiga fled, and Sōmēśvara was taken prisoner. The narrative says that Vikramāditya at first intended to restore his brother to liberty and to the throne. But eventually he decided otherwise, had himself proclaimed king, and then, appointing Jayasimha III. viceroy at Banavāsi, proceeded to Kalyāṇa, and established himself there. In the events which ended thus, he appears to have received important assistance from the Yādava prince Sēunachandra II., of the Sēuṇa country, who, according to the introduction to Hēmādrī's Vṛatakhaṇḍa, saved Vikramāditya from a coalition of his enemies and placed him on the throne of Kalyāṇa.⁴ What ultimately became of Sōmēśvara II., is not known.

In these circumstances, Sōmēśvara II. was deposed and succeeded on the throne by his younger brother Vikramāditya VI., who had the biruda of Tribhuvanamalla, and whose name appears also some-

Vikramāditya VI.

¹ Probably this is the occasion which, in the Kaliṅgattu-Paranī (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XIX. p. 331, and Vol. XX. p. 281, where the Chōla king is called Abhaya) and in inscriptions of Vīra-Rājēndradēva I. (see Dr. Hultzsch's Report No. 227, dated the 30th June, 1892, pp. 3, 5) is represented as one on which the Chōlas were victorious over the Kuntalas, i.e. the Western Chalukyas, at Kūṇḍa-Saṅgama or Punal-Kūṇḍa-Saṅgama, i.e. at the junction of the Tuṅgabhadra and the Kṛishṇa. — The Tuṅgabhadra seems to have formed part of the boundary between the Chōla, and Western Chalukya kingdoms. But this can only have been for a hundred miles or so above its junction with the Kṛishṇa; since the Gaṅḡavāṇī and Nalambavāṇī provinces, which were parts of the Western Chalukya territory, lay to the south and east of the river. The boundary line probably left the Tuṅgabhadra at the point where the Hagari or Vēḍavati flows into it, and then ran south for some distance along the latter river.

times as Vikramārka, sometimes as Vikramāṅka or simply Vikrama, sometimes as Kali-Vikrama,¹ and, in the Eastern Chalukya records, as Vikkala² and Vikkila;³ he also had the appellation of Perma, Permāḍi, or Permanāḍi, which in Sanskrit records occasionally appears in the form of Paramardi. And the events described just above must have occurred towards the end of A.D. 1076. For, on the one hand, we have a date in the reign of Sômesvara II. that falls in August-September, A. D. 1076, and none after that time. And, on the other hand, the epigraphic records of the time of Vikramāditya VI. shew that the year A. D. 1076-77, the Anala or Nala saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 999 current, commencing with Chaitra śukla 1, which corresponded, approximately, to the 9th March, A. D. 1076, was reckoned as the first year of his reign.⁴ That Vikramāditya VI. was actually reigning at the commencement of this Śaka year, does not necessarily follow. But an inscription at Wadageri, in the Nizâm's Dominions,⁵ records grants that were made towards the close of the same year, on Phālguna śukla 5, corresponding to the 31st January, A.D. 1077,⁶ on account of the festival of the paṭṭabandha or coronation. This shews that he was crowned at least before the end of the year in question, A. D. 1076-77. But, whether the record fixes the coronation day, or an anniversary of it, or whether it simply registers grants that were made when the news of the coronation reached the locality, is not clear. It may be added that this record also says that Vikramāditya VI. was then reigning, not at Kalyāṇa, but at Naḍaviyuppayana-viḍu, which probably has to be located somewhere in the direction of Wadageri. When once on the throne, he had a long and uninterrupted reign of at least fifty years, extending to at any rate some date in A. D. 1126. There are several records of his fiftieth year, the Viśvāvasu saṃvatsara, which was Śaka-Saṃvat 1048 current, = A. D. 1125-26. The latest of them⁷

⁶ Prof. Kielhorn has shewn (Ind. Ant. Vol. XXII. p. 110) that the week-day given in this record does not work out correctly for the given tithi. But, as he has also said, the results are unsatisfactory with many of the dates of this period. And the records are not necessarily to be rejected as not genuine.—In the preceding year and saṃvatsara, the given tithi and week-day were connected; the tithi then began at about 10 ghaṭis, = 4 hours, on Thursday, 11th February, A.D. 1076, and included most of the daylight hours of the Thursday. And this suggests, to me, that the record may possibly, in a confused manner, refer to an anniversary festival.

registers grants that were made on Māgha śukla 7, corresponding to the 3rd January, A. D. 1126. And this is the latest date, at present known, that is fairly referable to his reign. It is of course possible that his reign may have run on into the Parābhava samvatsara, A. D. 1126-27, which would be his fifty-first year, and was the first year of his successor. But, as we have already seen, he is mentioned in A. D. 1055-56, as governing the Gaṅgavādi ninety-six-thousand and the Banavāsi twelve-thousand under his father. Even if he was then but a mere child, governing only nominally, he must have been at least seventy years old in A. D. 1126. And it seems highly unlikely that he was alive much longer after the date in January of that year, noted just above.¹

One of his first acts was to supersede the use of the 'Saka era by an era called the Chālukya-Vikrama-kāla and Chālukya-Vikrama-varsha, the first year of which was the first year of his actual reign after the deposition of Sōmēśvara II., i.e. A. D. 1076-77. As the inscriptions say,— "By his amplitude, and unaided, Tribhuvanamalla, the king Chālukya-Vikramāditya, caused all the hostile kings to bow down, and became the lord of the world. Having rubbed out the brilliant 'Saka-varsha, he, the impetuous one, the most liberal man in the world, who delighted in religion, published his own name throughout the world, under the form of the Vikrama-varsha;"² and again,— "Having said 'Why should the glory of the kings Vikramāditya and Nanda be a hindrance any longer?', he, with a loudly uttered command, abolished that (era) which has the name of 'Saka, and made that (era) which has the Chālukya counting."³ Instances have not been found, of this era having been adopted by the kings of other dynasties. But nearly all the records of his own time are thus dated, not in the 'Saka era, but in his regnal years; the names of the samvatsaras, however, shewing exactly what the corresponding 'Saka years are. And there are a few subsequent records, which shew that an attempt was made by his successor, and by feudatory governors, to preserve the use of his era.⁴

¹ The only record of the Parābhava samvatsara, known to me, which is any way connected with this question, does not refer itself to either reign (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XXII. p. 297).— There is an inscription of later date, at Kyāsānūr in the Dhārvar District, which, belonging really to the seventh year of Sōmēśvara III., nevertheless represents, Vikramāditya VI. as still reigning, and is dated in his fifty-eighth year by mistake for the fifty-seventh, the Paridhāvin samvatsara, in the month Chaitra falling in A. D. 1132. And there may be similar records elsewhere, of A. D. 1127, 1129, and 1132-33 (see Ind. Ant. Vol. XXII. p. 298). But they are, in reality, instances of an attempt that was made to continue, after the end of his reign, the use of the new era which was established by him (see note 4, below).

For the most part, however, his successors simply followed the fashion set by him, and dated their records in their own regnal years.

The records of this long reign are very numerous: Sir Walter Elliot's Collection contains about one hundred and fifty; and hardly any village of importance, containing epigraphic remains, has been visited, without at least one or two others coming to notice.¹ They give the names of no fewer than six wives,²—Sāvaladēvi, daughter of the Mahā-maṇḍalēśvara Jōgamarasa or Jōgamarāṇa, of the Sūryavamśa, who is spoken of as the lord of the Darikāḍu nāḍ and the Maṇḍalēśvara of Maṅgalavāḍa, and of his wife Tārādēvi;³ in A. D. 1077-78, or at some later time, she was managing the agrahāra of Nareyaṅgal, which her husband had given for her aṅgabhōga, i.e., by free translation, pin-money;⁴—Lakshmādēvi, who is invariably spoken of with the title of pīriy-araṣi or chief queen; she is mentioned in A. D. 1084-85, as ruling at the capital of Kalyāṇa, in A. D. 1095-96, as ruling the eighteen agrahāras and the town of Dharmāpura, i.e. Dambal, and in A. D. 1109-10 and the following year, as managing the village of Niṭṭasiṅgi; and she was still alive in A. D. 1125-26.⁵—Jakkaladēvi, daughter of Tikka, of the Kadamba stock; in A. D. 1093-94 she was managing the village of Iṅguṇige according to the tribhōg-ābhyaṅtara-siddhi.⁶—Malleyamadēvi, or Malayamatādēvi, who in A. D. 1094-95 was governing the district attached to the agrahāra of Kīriya-Kereyūr:¹ — Chandaladēvi, who also was styled piriy-arasi, and in one passage agramahāmahishī;² Bilhāṇa mentions her both as Chandaladēvi and as Chandralēkhā, and in words which shew that she was the daughter of one of the Śilāhāra princes of Karāḍ, — probably of Mārasimha;³ and she is spoken of in A. D. 1102-1103 as the mother of Jayakarṇa, and in the following year as causing certain grants to be made to the god Kēśava-dēva at the agrahāra of Ruddavāḍi:⁴ — and Mālaladēvi or Mālikā, daughter of the Sānabhōga or village-accountant Rāyaṇa, and of his wife Olajikabbe, who is mentioned in an inscription of A. D. 1113-14.⁵ And they shew that he had a daughter, Maillamahādēvi, who was married to Jayakēsin II., of the family of the Kālabhas of Goa,⁶ and seems to be identical with the daughter Mālaladēvi, — (if the copy gives the name correctly), — who is mentioned in an inscription of A. D. 1105-1103.⁷ They fully confirm Bilhāṇa's statement that, just after his accession, he appointed Jayasimha III. viceroy at Banavāsi:⁸ for, a record of A. D. 1079 states that the latter was then ruling as Yuvarāja, and had the Banavāsi twelve-thousand province in his hands;⁹ and others, of A. D. 1077, 1079, 1080, and 1081-82, describe his position in the same way, and shew that he held also the Sāntalige thousand, the Beḷvola three-hundred, the Puligere three-hundred, and the Bāsavaḷḷi thousand:¹⁰ and the fact that no indications to the same effect are to be found after A. D. 1080, corroborates Bilhāṇa's further account of how, not long after his appointment, Jayasimha rebelled, and was removed from office. They shew that Kalyāṇa continued to be the capital: but, in addition to Banavāsi and Baḷagamve, they mention, as other important was governing in the neighbourhood of Kammarawādi in the Nizām's Dominions; the Mahāśāmantādhīpati, Mahāpradhāna, Bhāṇasaveggade, Daṇḍāyaka, and Achchupannāyad-adhishthāyaka Bammārāsa, who in A. D. 1108-1109 was administering the panḍya-tax of the Nōlambavādi thirty-two-thousand; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Gaṇḍarāditya, of the Kārāḍi branch of the Silāhāra family, who was ruling his hereditary possessions in A. D. 1109-1110 and 1118-1119; the Pāṇḍya Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Tribhuvanamalla-Kāmadēva, with the title of "lord of Gōkarṇa, the best-of towns," and the designation of "ruler of the Koṅkaṇa rāṣṭra," for whom we have a date in A. D. 1112; the Mahāpradhāna, Daṇḍāyaka, and Kannāḍa-Saṁdhivigrahin or minister of peace and war for the Kanarese districts, Śrīpatiyarāsa, who in A. D. 1112-13 was governing the Belvola three-hundred and the Puligere three-hundred; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Udayāditya-Gaṅga-Permāḍi, of the Western Gaṅga family, who in the same year was governing the Baṇavāsi twelve-thousand and the Sāntalige thousand; a member of the Gutta family of Guttal, named Malla or Mallidāva, who is to be placed about A. D. 1115; the Mahāpradhāna and Daṇḍāyaka Nāgavarmayya, who was governing the Belvola three-hundred, the Purigere three-hundred, and the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, in A. D. 1115-1116 and 1117-1118; the Hoysala Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Viṣṇuvardhana, who in A. D. 1117 was ruling the Gaṅgavādi ninety-six-thousand; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Permāḍi, of the Jīmūtavāhana lineage and the Khāchara race, who was governing the Bāsavura hundred-and-forty in A. D. 1121-22; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Tribhuvanamalla-Pāṇḍyadēva, who in the same year was ruling the Nōlambavādi thirty-two-thousand; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Ācha or Āchuḡi, of the Sinda family, who in A. D. 1122-23 was ruling the Kisukāḍ seventy; and the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Jayakēśin II., of the family of the Kādambas of Goa, who in A. D. 1125-26 was ruling the Koṅkaṇa nine-hundred, the Palasige twelve-thousand, the Payve or Hayve five-hundred, and the Kavadiḍvīpa lākh-and-a-quarter. One of the most interesting of the records is the Dambaḷ inscription of A. D. 1095,¹ which records grānts made to viḥāras of Buddha and Ārya-Tārādēvi at that town, and thus shews that Buddhism still held a place in the Kanarese country as late as the end of the eleventh century A. D. A record of A. D. 1088-89 speaks of Vikramāditya VI. crossing the Narmadā, and conquering kings on the other side of that river.² And another, of A. D. 1098,³ shews that then again he was in the northern part of the kingdom, on the banks of the Narmadā.

Arasībīdi in the Bijāpur District, and to have made it another of his minor capitals.⁵ And they give the names of the following important feudatories and officials:—The Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kirtivarman II., of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who in A. D. 1076-77 and the following year was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand; the Mahāsāmāntādhipati, Mahāsēnādhipati, Mahāpradhāna, and Danḍanāyaka Barmadēva, who also in A. D. 1077-78 was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Śāntalige thousand, and the eighteen agrahāras; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Muñja, of the Sinda family, who in A. D. 1082 was governing in the neighbourhood of Tidgundi in the Bijāpur District; the Mahāsāmānta Satyadēva, with the title of “lord of Māhishmatī, the best of towns,” who in A. D. 1084-85 was governing in the neighbourhood of Gobbūr in the Nizām's Dominions; the Mahāsāmānta Kaliyammārāsa, of the Jimūtavāhana lineage and the Khachara race, who in A. D. 1085-86 was governing the Pāsavura hundred-and-forty; the Mahāsāmānta Dhāḍibhadaka or Dhāḍibhandaka, described as born in the “great” Rāshtrakūṭa lineage, who in A. D. 1087 was governing in the neighbourhood of Sitābaldī near Nāgpur, in the Central Provinces; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kannakaira II., of the Raṭṭa family, who in A. D. 1087-88 was ruling at Saundatti; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Śāntivarman II., of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who in A. D. 1088-89 was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānūṅgal five-hundred; the Pergaḍe Chaṅgaḍēvayya, who in the same year was managing the vaddāvaruḷa and other taxes of the Banavāsi twelve-thousand; the Mahāsāmāntādhipati and Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Anantadēva, of the Śilāhāra family, who was ruling in the Koṅkan in A. ¹ This title occurs here in an inscription at Baḷagāṇve ; P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 167, line 9 ; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 108. It appears to occur elsewhere, slightly transposed, as Kannaḍa-Heri-Lāḍa-samdhivigrahin, in an inscription of A. D. 1072 at Niḍunēgali in the Kōd tāluka, Dhārwar District (Carn.-Dēsa Inscr. Vol. II. p. 143 ; the transcript has Kannaḷa-Hari-Lāḍa, &c., including two mistakes). The meaning of heri or hāri, which we have previously met with in the smaller title of Heri-samdhivigrahin, is not apparent (see page 443 above, and note 3). Kannaḷa, of course, is the same as Karṇāṭa, 'the Kanarese country.' Lāḍa is a Tadbhava corruption of Lāṭa ; and, that it is used here in that way and in the sense of 'the Lāṭa country,' seems to be made clear by the fact that we meet with the title Heri-Lāḍa-Karṇāṭa-samdhivigrahin in an inscription of A. D. 1144-45 at Hāṅgal (page 458 below).

This long reign seems to have been a fairly peaceful one. There was, as already noted, trouble in connection with Jayasimha III. in the first few years of it. And Bilhaṇa tells us⁴ that, after a long time of peace, the Chôlas, — probably meaning, this time, the Eastern Chalukyas, — again became proud and insolent; that Vikramāditya's army marched on Kāñchi, and took the city; and that Vikramāditya amused himself there for some time, before returning to his capital.¹ But it does not appear that there were any other disturbances, except towards the end of the reign, about A. D. 1117, when the Hoysala Vishnuvardhana invaded Uchchangī and the Belvola country, and carried his arms successfully so far to the north as to bathe his horse in the waters of the Krishnavernā, i. e. the Krishna.² The Hoysalas, under the immediate leadership of a Dandanāyaka named Gaṅgārāja, claim to have inflicted a serious disaster, in a night attack, on the army of Vikramāditya VI. when it was in camp at Kanpegāla.³ And the records of the Sinda chieftain Āchugi II., through whose instrumentality the invasion was stopped, — stating that he pursued and prevailed against Hoysala, took Gôve, put Lakshma to flight in war, valorously followed after Pāṇḍya, dispersed at all times the Malapas, and seized upon the Konkan; that he gave Gôve and Uppinakatte to the flames; and that, like a demon, he swallowed up and vomited forth a certain Bhôja, together with his troops which had invaded his country,⁴ — imply, either that the Kādambas of Goa, the Pāṇḍyas of the Nolambavāḍi province, and the Silāhāras of Karād joined with the Hoysalas in some general conspiracy against their sovereign, or else that they took advantage of the Hoysala invasion to raise disturbances on their own account. As, however, the succession shortly afterwards duly passed to Sômêśvara III., no lasting injury can have been done to the Western Chālukya power.

The next name in the table is that of Jayasimha III., the younger brother of Vikramāditya VI. All that is known about this person has already been stated. His full designation was Trailôkyamalla-Vīra-Nolamba-Pallava-Permanāḍi-(or Permāḍi)-Jayasimha; in which, however, "Trailôkyamalla" is not a biruda of his own, but is simply due to his official connection with his father Trailôkyamalla-Āhavamalla-Sômêśvara I.: and in the Eastern Chalukya records he is mentioned as Siṅghana.⁵ In A. D. 1064-65 he was governing the Tardavāḍi thousand, the country round Bijāpur, under his father. In a record of A. D. 1072, of the time of Sômêśvara II., he is mentioned as ruling at the poravīdu or camp outside Gondavāḍi; and he seems to have been then in charge of the Nolambavāḍi thirty-two-thousand. And from A. D. 1077 to 1082, under Vikramāditya VI., he held office as

¹ It is doubtless this campaign that led to there being so many inscriptions, referring themselves to the reign of Vikramāditya VI., at Drākshārām and other places in the Telugu country, outside the ordinary limits of the Western Chālukya kingdom (see Mr. Sewell's Lists of Antiquities, Madras, Vol. I., and the transcripts in Sir Walter Elliot's other MS. Collection entitled Telugu Sasanams; also Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 281, note 39).—This occasion may also be the one on which, according to the Eastern Chalukya records, Kulōttuṅga-Chôḍaḍēva I. pursued Vikramāditya VI. from Naṅgali in Mysore to Maṇalūr on the Tuṅgabhadra (see South-Ind. Insers. Vol. II. p. 231, and Ind. Ant. Vol. XXI. pp. 282, 286).

Vishnuvardhana-

Yuvardja at Banavási, in charge of the Banavási twelve-thousand, the Sántalige thousand, the Belvola three-hundred, the Puligere three-hundred, and the Bāsavalli thousand. Then, however, he rebelled; and the authority entrusted to him was taken away.¹ His name does not appear in subsequent records. And he probably died before Vikramáditya VI. At any rate, he did not succeed to the throne.

The next name in the table is that of Vishnuvardhana-Vijayáditya, the fourth son of Sômesvara I., who in A. D. 1064 and 1066 was ruling the Nolambavádi thirty-two-thousand. This is taken from an inscription at the Jatinga-Râmésvara hill, in the Chitaldurg District, Mysore, dated in the month Vaisákha (April-May) of the Krôdhin samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 986 (expired);² and from another at Dāvāngere in Mysore, dated in Bhâdrapada (Aug.-Sept.) of the Parâbhava samvatsara, S.-S. 998 (expired).³ The former of them states that he was ruling at the nelvidu of Kapili or Kampili, which is very probably the modern Kampli,⁴ on the Tungabhadra, in the Hospeṭ tâluka of the Bellâry District. These records style him Vishnuvardhana-mahârâja-Vijayáditya; they give him the birudas of Âhavamallana-aṅkakâra, and Sâhasamalla or “the impetuous wrestler,”—the epithets of samastalôkâśraya and sarvalôkâśraya, “asylum of all mankind,”—and the title of Veṅgî-maṇḍal-êśvara or “lord of the province of Veṅgî:” they call him Chálukya-mâṇikya or “a ruby of the Chálukyas;” and they say distinctly that he was a son of Sômesvara.⁵ He appears to be also mentioned in a record of A. D. 1074 at Nîralgi, in the Hângal tâluka, Dhârwar District; in which case, he is there called Bhuvanaikamalla-Pallava-Permanadi-Vishnuvardhana-Vijayáditya.⁶ But this is the only other notice of him that I have obtained. From Bilhana failing to mention him, he seems not to have played any important part in the events of the reign of Sômesvara II. And he had nothing to do with the succession.

⁵ The terms used are maga and nandana. Elsewhere, and at a time when I knew of only the Dāvāngere record, I questioned the literal application of them in this case (Ind. Ant. Vol. XX. p. 277); my reasons being, that this person seemed to be not mentioned in any other Western Chálukya records,—(that Bilhana does not refer to him),—that the title “lord of the province of Veṅgî” and the epithet sarvalôkâśraya appeared to make it plain that, on one side at least, he was of Eastern Chalukya descent,—that no such expression as “born to” Sômesvara I. is used,—and that there is a custom in the Kanarese country, by which any kinsman in the next degree of descent may be called a son. The facts, however, noted in connection with Vikramáditya VI. and Jayasinha III. (page 440 above, notes 3,4,5), shew that certain titles, which, one would imagine, would only go by line of descent, occasionally accompanied investiture with provincial authority. And, on mature consideration, I think that the terms maga and nandana should be accepted literally. The title Veṅgî-maṇḍal-êśvara, however, which can hardly have any connection with the Nolambavádi province, may mean that his mother was an Eastern Chalukya princess.

The next name is that of Jayakarna, who was a son of Vikramāditya VI. by Chandaladēvi, and was very probably his eldest son. From an inscription at Kāligi in the Nizām's Dominions, dated in A. D. 1102,¹ another at Sindagi in the Bijāpur District, dated in A. D. 1120,² in which he appears to be styled Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara, and another at Kōṇṇûr in the Belgaum District, dated in A. D. 1121,³ which states that the Dandādhipa Chāmaṇḍa, and the Maṇḍalēśvara Sēna II. of the family of the Rattas of Saundatti, were in charge of the Kūṇḍi country under him, he seems to have been entrusted with authority in some of the more central parts of his father's dominions. But no subsequent mention of him can be traced. And he probably died before his father.

Bhūlōkamalla-
Sōmēśvara III.

The successor of Vikramāditya VI., then, was his son Sōmēśvara III., who had the biruda of Bhūlōkamalla, "the wrestler of the terrestrial world," and was also styled Sarvajña-Chakravartin, "the omniscient emperor." Of his time we have some twenty or thirty records.* They shew that the first year of his reign was the Parābhava saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1049 current, = A. D. 1126-27. But the earliest of them⁵ is dated in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.) falling in A. D. 1128, of the Kīlaka saṃvatsara, coupled with S.-S. 1051 (current), which was his third year; and thus they do not suffice to fix, within the limit of a year, the actual date of his accession. The latest of them, that seems consonant with the initial date of his successor, is dated in the month Mārgaśīra (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A. D. 1138, of his thirteenth year, the Kālayukti saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1061 current).⁶ An inscription at Balagāmve⁷ tells us that, in the month Māgha (Jan.-Feb.), falling in A. D. 1129, of the Kīlaka saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1051 current), cited as the third year of his reign, he had come to the south in the course of a digvijaya or triumphal progress, and was encamped at Hulluṇiya-tīrtha: but, with this exception, the records do not seem to mention any campaigns made by him; and his reign seems, in fact, to have been a very tranquil one. His capital, throughout the whole of it, was Kalyāṇa. The records mention, as his feudatories and officials,— the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Permādi, of the Kalachurya family, who in A. D. 1128 was governing the Tardavādi country; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Jayakēśin II., of the family of the Kādambas of Goa, who about the same time was ruling the Koṅkana nine-hundred and the Palasige twelve-thousand; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Tailapa II., of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānuṅgal five-hundred in A. D. 1129-30; a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara named Mārasimha, of unknown descent, who in A. D. 1131 was governing in the neighbourhood of Mugutkhān-Hubli in the Belgaum District; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Mayūravarma III., son of the Kādamba Tailapa II., who was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānuṅgal five-hundred, with the Sāntalige thousand, in A. D. 1131-32; another son of Tailapa II., the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Maḷlikārjuna I., who was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānuṅgal five-hundred in A. D. 1132-33, 1135-36, and 1137-38; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Gaṇḍarāditya, of the family of the Silāhāras of Karād, who was ruling his hereditary province in A. D. 1135-36 and 1136-37; the Hoysala Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Viṣṇuvardhana, who in A. D. 1137 was ruling the Gaṅgavādi, Nolaṃbavādi, and Banavāsi provinces; the Daṇḍandya Mahādēva, who was governing the Belvola three-hundred and the Puligere three-hundred in A. D. 1138-39; and Vira-Pāṇḍyadēva, who, about the same time, was ruling the Nolaṃbavādi thirty-two-thousand, from his residence at the hill-fort of Uchchaṅgīdurga. Sōmēśvara III. is represented as the author of a work named Abhilashitārthachintāmaṇi or Mānasōllāsa, dealing with polity, the administration of justice, medicine, elephants, alchemy, astrology, arms, and rhetoric, which was written in the fourth year of his reign, the Saumya samvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 1051 (expired).¹

⁶ An inscription at the temple of Sōmēśvara at Lakshmēśwar (Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. I. p. 732).—There is an inscription at Balagāmve (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 179; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 134), which purports to connect a date in Pausa, falling in A. D. 1139, of the Siddhārtha saṃvatsara (Śaka-Saṃvat 1062 current), with his reign; and another at Dāvāngere (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 139; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 16), which purports to connect in the same way a date in Pausa, falling in A. D. 1142, of the Dundubhi saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1065 current). But these records do not quote any regnal years; and, the saṃvatsaras in question being the second and fifth years of the reign of Jagadēkamalla II., the apparently intended interpretation cannot be the correct one.

Perma-Jagadēkamalla II.

Sōmēśvara III. was succeeded by his eldest son, who is best known, by his biruda, as Jagadēkamalla II.: he had, however, the appellation of Perma; and the records almost invariably style him Pratāpa-Chakravartin, "the valourous emperor."² Some fifty records of this reign are

² Some years ago, I expressed a doubt (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 140) whether Jagadēkamalla II. was really a son of Sōmēśvara III., or whether he was to be identified with Jayakarna. But an inscription at Harihar (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 120; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 57) distinctly says that this Jagadēkamalla was a son of Bhūlōkamalla, i. e. Sōmēśvara III., and that Nūrmadi-Taila III. was his younger brother. Also, an inscription at Kukkanūr in the Nizām's Dominions, at the shrine of the Nava-Siddhas in the courtyard of the temple of Mahammāyī (Carn.-Dēsa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 852) mentions him as the son of Sōmēśvara III.—His appellation of Perma is taken from another inscription at Harihar, which mentions him as king Perma, the son of Bhūlōkamalla, and gives his biruda Jagadēkamalla in the next verse (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 116; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 68; Carn.-Dēsa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 801, where, however, the transcript wrongly gives permenikūm, instead of Permanūripam). 'Perma' seems to be, as in the case of Vikramāditya VI., only a secondary appellation,—not his real proper name.—When the point is otherwise at all doubtful, the use of his title Pratāpa-Chakravartin suffices to distinguish his records from those of Jagadēkamalla-Jayasimha II., whose reign fell almost or quite exactly two cycles earlier.

now known.¹ The earliest of them is dated in the month Āshādha (June-July), falling in A.D. 1139, of his second year, the Siddhārthin saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1062 current), = A.D. 1139-40.² But they shew that the Kālayukti saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1061 current, = A.D. 1138-39, was counted as the first year of his reign.³ This is also mentioned elsewhere as the thirteenth year of Sômesvara III.; for whom we have a date in it falling in November-December, A.D. 1138.⁴ And it would seem, therefore, that Jagadêkamalla II. succeeded to the throne either quite near the end of A.D. 1138, or early in A.D. 1139, before the 3rd March, which was, approximately, the initial day of the Siddhārthin saṃvatsara. The latest of his records is dated in the month Pausa (Dec.-Jan.), falling in A.D. 1149, of his twelfth year, the 'Sukla saṃvatsara, which was Saka-Saṃvat 1072 current.⁵ An inscription of A.D. 1147, at Nargund in the Dhârwar District,⁶ mentions Kalyāna as his capital. The records mention, as some of his feudatories and officials,—the Dandandyakas Mahādêva and Pālādêva, with a date in A.D. 1139; the Mahâsāmanta Sêṇadêva, of the Yādava family of Sêṇadêsa, who was ruling his hereditary province in A.D. 1142; a Mahâmaṇḍalêsvara Kappadêvarasa, with a date in the same year, who is described as "a son of the queen-consort;"⁷ a Mahâmaṇḍalêsvara Rêvarasa, with the title of "lord of Mâhishmatîpura," and described as belonging to the Ahihaya race,⁸ who was governing in the neighbourhood of Yêtir in the Nizâm's Dominions; the Mahâpradhâna, Sêṇâdhipati, Kan-nâda-Saṃdhivigraha, and Hirya-Dandandiyaka Bammaṇayya or

He may possibly have then held some administrative post under his grandfather. But the record speaks of him as if he were himself the paramount sovereign.

⁵ An inscription at the temple of Hâvali-Hanumanta somewhere in the Hângal tâluka, Dhârwar District (Carn.-Dêsa Inscrs. Vol. I. p. 836). This is in accordance with what is plainly established by his records. And the statement in an inscription at Baḷagârhve (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 180; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 97), that the 'Sukla saṃvatsara was his thirteenth year, must be a mere mistake of the writer.—If the transcripts may be relied on, an inscription at the Paryata-Maṭha at Hârasâr in the Nizâm's Dominions (Carn.-Dêsa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 9), which takes the genealogy as far as Taila III., is dated in the twentieth year, the 'Îsvara saṃvatsara (A.D. 1157-58), of Jagadêkamalla II.; and an inscription on a vîrgal near the temple of 'Îsvara at 'Sîrgôḍ in the Hângal tâluka, (Carn.-Dêsa Inscrs. Vol. I. p. 847), which does not refer itself to any particular reign, is dated in his fiftieth year, the Plavaraṅga saṃvatsara (A.D. 1187-88). These two saṃvatsaras would really be his twentieth and fiftieth years. But I do not know of any other instance of his regnal years being used after the expiration of his reign.

D. 1144-45 was ruling the Kisukāḍ seventy, the Bāgaḍage seventy, the Kelavādi three-hundred, and the Nareyaṅgal twelve; the Mahāpradhāna, Heri-Lāṭa-samdhivigrahin, Sēnādhīpati, and Danḍandīyaka Kēśirāja or Kēśimayya, who in A. D. 1147-48 was governing the Belvola three-hundred, the Palasige twelve-thousand, and the Pānūṅgal five-hundred; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Tailaha or Tailama, of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who was ruling his hereditary province in the same year; the Danḍandīyaka Sōvidēva, who was governing the Pānūṅgal five-hundred in A. D. 1148-49; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vira-Pāṇḍyadēva, who was ruling the Nōlambavādi thirty-two-thousand in the same year; and the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Tribhuvanamalla-Jagaddēva, of the Śāntara family of Paṭṭi-Pombuchchapura, which is the modern Hombucha or Humcha in the Nagar District, Mysore, who was ruling at Sētuvina-bīḍu in A. D. 1149.² The records also mention, as a contemporary of Jagadēkamalla II., Bijjala or Bijjaṇa of the Kalachurya family, under whom Vijaya-Pāṇḍyadēva was holding the

Nolambavâli thirty-two-thousand;¹ and, as that province was a regular part of the Western Châlukya empire, Bijjala must then have been filling some high office under Jagadêkamalla II. In this reign, again,—or else towards the close of the preceding reign,—the Hoysalas and others were aggressive, and, as on the previous occasion, were repulsed by the instrumentality of the Sindas; Permâdi I., of that family, is described as vanquishing Kulasêkharânka, besieging Chatta, pursuing Jayakêsin, and seizing upon the royal power of the Hoysala who was foremost among fierce rulers of the earth, and as going to the mountain passes of the “marauder” Bittiga, i.e. the Hoysala Vishnuvardhana,—besieging Dôrasamudra,—pursuing him till he arrived at and took the city of Bêlupura,—and driving him on as far as the mountain pass of Vâhadi.²

The successor of Jagadêkamalla II. was his younger brother Taila III., whose name occurs also as Tailapa and Nûrmađi-Taila, and who had the biruda of Trailôkyamalla; he was also styled Chdhlukya-Chakravartin, “the Châlukya emperor.” He appears to have succeeded to the throne early in A.D. 1150, and near the end of the Sukla samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 1072 current; after, at any rate, Pausha sukla 11, the day of the uttarâyana-samkrânti or winter solstice, corresponding approximately to the 24th December, A.D. 1149, which is the latest date on record for Jagadêkamalla II.³ The records of this reign, as far as they have as yet come to light, are very few;⁴ and they furnish

⁴ For one which has been edited with the text, see Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XI. p. 259 (at Patâdakal; of A.D. 1163: the record describes the local prince Châvunda II., as a feudatory of Taila III.; but it is actually dated after Taila's death). but little information as to the feudatories and officials. An inscription at Harihar,¹ probably referable to A.D. 1150, states that a certain Kasapayyanāyaka was then governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand under the orders of the Kalachurya Bijjala. The Bijāpur inscription of A.D. 1151² expressly mentions Bijjala as a feudatory of Taila III.; and adds that Bijjala's subordinate, the Mahāpradhāna, Sēnddhipati, and Dandānyaka Mailārāyā was then governing the Tardavāḍi thousand, i.e. the country in the neighbourhood of Bijāpur. An inscription in the Dhārwar District³ mentions the Mahāśāmantādhīpati, Sēnddhipati, and Dandānyaka Mahādēva, as governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Purigeṭe three-hundred in A.D. 1152, directly under Taila III.; and an inscription at Balagāmve⁴ mentions the same person, but with the title of Dandānyaka only, as governing the Banavāsi province in A.D. 1155 under Bijjala, while Taila III. was still reigning,—adding the statement that Bijjala himself was then governing “all the provinces,” and that Mahādēva was Bijjala's own Dandānyaka. An inscription at Pātṇa in Khāndēsh⁵ mentions a prince named Gōvana, of the Nikumbha family, who, with his councillor Chaṅgadēva, was governing in that neighbourhood in A.D. 1153-54, doubtless under one of the Yādava feudatories of the Sēṇa country. An inscription at Kukkanūr in the Nizām's Dominions⁶ mentions a Mahāpradhāna named Ravaleyanāyaka, with a date in A.D. 1156; and, in a postscript, it calls him a Mahāpradhāna of the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Bijjala. And the Pattadakal inscription of A.D. 1163⁷ shews that the Sinda Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Chāvūṇḍa II. had been ruling the Kisukāl seventy, the Fāgadage seventy, and the Kelavāḍi three-hundred, directly under Taila III. Synchronously, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvaras Permāḍi and Vijayāditya, of the family of the Kādambas of Goa, were ruling the Palasige twelve-thousand, the Kōṅkara nine-hundred, and the Velugrāme or Belgaum seventy; the Ratta Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kārtavīrya III. was ruling the Kūṇḍi three-thousand; and the Silāhāra Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vijayāditya was ruling his hereditary territory in the neighbourhood of Karāḍ: but the records have not yet made it clear, how far these princes acknowledged the supremacy of Taila III. The Bijāpur inscription of A.D. 1151, and an inscription of A.D. 1157 at Kembhāvi in the Nizām's Taila's lifetime, have been edited, with the texts, in Ind. Ant. Vol. XI. p. 273, (at Siddapur; of A.D. 1158), and in Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. IX. p. 296 (at Golihalli; the first part of the record; of A.D. 1160). But they give no indication as to the name of the reigning sovereign; and they may perhaps be more properly referable to Bijjala's time.

Dominions,¹ mention Kalyāṇa as the capital of Taila III. But an inscription at Harasūr in the Nizām's Dominions,² dated in April, A. D. 1161, states, if we may rely on the transcript, that he was then reigning at Jayantīpura, i.e. Banavāsi in North Kanara. The full details of the date of this record are an eclipse of the sun on Monday, the new-moon day of the month Vaiśākha of the Vishu samvatsara, which is cited as the twelfth year of Taila III. The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 27th April, A. D. 1161.³ And this is the latest date that has been obtained, connected with the rule of Taila III. The latest date, however, that can be vouched for, in a record undoubtedly mentioning Taila III. as paramount sovereign, is the 26th December, A. D. 1155, furnished by an inscription at Baḷagāmve.⁴ It is probable, indeed, from the Hulgūr and Hāvēri inscriptions,⁵ that his authority, as paramount sovereign, was still recognised locally in October, A. D. 1156, and December, A. D. 1157. But the 26th December, A. D. 1155, is the latest absolutely certain date. Taila III. died certainly before the 19th January, A. D. 1163,

² At the temple of Pārśvanātha (Carn.-Désa Inser. Vol. II. p. 16; the second part of the record).—The details of the date will not work out correctly (see the next note). This, however, does not necessarily disqualify the record. And, in the year, there is nothing inconsistent with the known limit for the date of Taila III. (see further on). But I cannot help looking on the name of the capital, given in the transcript, with some distrust. It is not apparent why, at a time when much, at any rate, of the intervening territory had been appropriated by Bijjala, Banavāsi should be mentioned as the capital in connection with a grant made in a village so far away as the neighbourhood of Kalburigi. And, on the other hand, the indications are that Bijjala established himself at Banavāsi, and gradually pushed Taila's power away to the north and east. I much suspect that the Jayantipurada nelevijinoi of the transcript is a mislection of words which give the name of some biṇu or temporary camp in the vicinity of Harasūr.

³ But the week-day was Thursday. And Von Oppolzer's Canon der Finsternisse shews no eclipse for the full-moon in question.

⁵ See page 459 above, note 3.—The Hulgūr inscription consists of two parts. The first part contained a formal preamble, referring it to someone's reign. Almost the whole of the preamble, including the king's name or virūda, is broken away and lost. But the date, in the Bhāva samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1076 (expired), makes it certain that the name or virūda of Taila III. stood in the preamble. The second part contains no such preamble. But the date, Kārttika sukla 5, Bṛiḥavāra, of the Dhātu samvatsara, cited as the eighth year of Taila III., implies a recognition of Taila's authority as still existing. The tithi corresponds, approximately, to the 22nd October, A.D. 1156; for which date, however, the week-day was Monday. Bijjala is not mentioned in either part of this record. The second part of it registers grants made at Hulgūr by Chaṭṭeya, the Sunkavergade of the Hānuṃgaḷ province, and by Chaṭṭagāmunda.—The Hāvēri inscription does not actually state that Taila III. was then still reigning. But, mentioning him with the full paramount epithets and titles, it proceeds to give his lineal descent. It then mentions Bijjala, as his contemporary, but without any specific definition of the relations between them. It then mentions a feudatory of Bijjala, the Mahāpradhāna, Śrūdāhipati, and Heggade of the Banavāsi province, the Dandandayaka Kēśirāja, son of Hoḷalarāja. And it records grants made (at Hulgūr) by a subordinate of Kēśirāja, the Heggade Rudradēva. But, in the date of the grant, the samvatsara, Īśvara, is quoted as the eighth year of Taila III.; and it is not apparent why this should be done, unless Taila's authority was still current in that part of the country. The full details of the date are the winter solstice, coupled with Pausa kṛishṇa 2, 3, or perhaps 7, Monday. And the equivalent English date is, approximately, the 24th December, A.D. 1157, which, however, was a Tuesday.

Interval after

which¹ is the English equivalent of the date of the Anamkonḍ inscription of Rudradéva, in which the fact that he was then dead is mentioned; and probably in or just before A. D. 1162, which is the year in which Bijjala, having completed his usurpation of the kingdom, assumed the full paramount epithets and titles.

Taila III. left a son, Sôméśvara IV., who, however, did not immediately succeed to the throne. At some time in the course of Taila's reign,² a serious blow to the Western Chálukya power was dealt by the Kákatiya or Kákatiya prince Prôla,—father of the Rudradéva mentioned just above,—in respect of whom the Anamkonḍ inscription tells us that “in an instant he made captive in war the “glorious Tailapadéva, the ornament of the Chálukyas, who was skilled “in the practice of riding upon elephants,—whose inmost thoughts “were ever intent upon war,—and who was mounted upon an elephant “which was like a cloud (in size); and then, at once, he, who was renowned in the rite of severing the throats of his enemies, let him “go, from goodwill produced by his devotion.”³ This blow from the outside was accompanied or followed by still more serious internal troubles. The Kalachurya Mahāmaṇḍalésvara Bijjala, who has been already mentioned, appears to have been the commander-in-chief of all the forces, and practically the most powerful person in the kingdom under Taila III. And an inscription at Harihar describes him as devoted to the service of the Chálukyas, and protecting the whole of the Chálukya army.⁴ But subsequent records state that he destroyed all the Chálukya kings, and acquired the sovereignty over the whole of the Kuntala country;⁵ and, in fact, they amply prove the truth of this assertion. It is plain, then, that Bijjala abused the trust reposed in him, and used his sovereign's own armies to deprive the latter of his kingdom, or at least to prevent the accession of his son. The steps which led to this result, will be fully detailed in the next chapter, in the account of Bijjala himself. It is sufficient to state here that Bijjala took possession of part of the kingdom in A. D. 1156, and completed his usurpation in A. D. 1162. And he and his sons held the throne up to A.D. 1183.

Three of the records of this interval appear rather instructive. The Pattadakal inscription of the Sinda Mahāmaṇḍalésvara Chāvūṇḍa II.,⁶ dated in the month Jyêshtha (May-June), falling in A. D. 1163, of the Subhānu samvatsara coupled with Saka-Samvat 1084 by mistake for 1085 (expired), mentions the chieftain as a feudatory of Taila III., just as if the latter were then still alive. The Dāvāngere inscription of the Pāṇḍya Mahāmaṇḍalésvara Vijaya-Pāṇḍyadēva,¹ dated at the winter solstice, falling on the 25th December, A. D. 1165, of the Pārthiva saṃvatsara (S. S. 1088 current), quotes the saṃvatsara as the fifteenth year of Taila III. And the Aihole inscription of the Sinda princes Bijjaladēva and Vikramadēva,² dated in the Virōdhin saṃvatsara (S. S. 1092 current), = A. D. 1169-70, quotes the saṃvatsara as the ninety-fourth year of the Chālukya-Vikrama-varsha. All this looks as if the Pāṇḍya and Sinda chieftains, — and the latter in spite of an intermarriage with the Kalachuryas, — did not acquiesce in Bijjala's usurpation, but entertained hopes, from the first, of a restoration of the Chālukya sovereignty.³

At some time probably towards the end of the 'Subhakrit saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 1105 current, and in the early part of A. D. 1183, Taila's son Sōmēśvara IV., who was also called Vira-Sōmēśvara and had the biruda of Tribhuvanamalla, revived the Western Chālukya sovereignty for a short time.⁴ In A. D. 1167, Bijjala abdicated in favour of his own

⁴ As regards the period when Sōmēśvara IV. came to the front, — an inscription at the temple of Puradappa, or of Virabhadra, at Anṇigere in the Dhārwar District (Carn.-Désa Inscr. Vol. II. p. 37; verified from an ink-impression, from which I find that the transcript is wrong, in calling the saṃvatsara the third year of the reign), and the third part of an inscription at Hāli in the Belgaum District (id. Vol. I. p. 444; verified from an ink-impression), both call the Krōdhin saṃvatsara ('Saka-Saṃvat 1107 current) his second year. And this indicates the 'Sōbhakrit saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1106 current, = A. D. 1883-84, as his first year. The Anṇigere inscription is further dated at the time of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of a month which is not named; and the Hāli inscription, at the time of the winter solstice on the full-moon day of Pausa (December-January). — On the other hand, in two inscriptions on beams in the madhyaraṅga of the temple of Mānikēśvara at Lakkunḍi in the Dhārwar District (Carn.-Désa Inscr. Vol. II. pp. 27, 34; both verified from ink-impressions), the Krōdhin saṃvatsara is cited as his third year (the further details, in both these records, are Pausa śukla 5, the winter solstice, coupled in one case with the syllable ā, which seems to stand for Ādityavāra, 'Sunday,' and in the other with the full word Sōmavāra, 'Monday'). In agreement with this, — omitting dates in the Carn.-Désa Inscr., which I have not been able to verify, — a copper-plate grant in the Alienation Office of the Commissioner, Central Division, dated on Bhādrapada full-moon (I quote from the original), and another inscription at Lakkunḍi, on a slab in the ceiling of a small shrine of Gaṇapati, dated on Pausa śukla 2 and 8 (not in the Carn.-Désa Inscr.; I quote from an ink-impression), cite the Viśvāvasu saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1108 current) as his fourth year. In further agreement, an inscription at the temple of Banāśaṅkarī at Anṇigere, dated on Māgha śukla 1 (Carn.-Désa Inscr. Vol. II. p. 42; verified from an ink-impression; except that the portion containing the month, &c., has now been broken away), cites the Parābhava saṃvatsara as his fifth year; and a continuation of this record cites the Plavaṅga saṃvatsara (S. S. 1110 current) as his sixth year (here, again, the details, — Vaisākha śukla 3, Monday, as given in the Carn.-Désa Inscr. — are not now extant). And, according to all these records, the 'Subhakrit saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1105 current, = A. D. 1182-83, was counted as his first year. — The results deduced from these two sets of dates cannot be reconciled, except by supposing that Sōmēśvara IV. was in power during so small a part of the 'Subhakrit saṃvatsara son, Sômesvara or Sôvidêva. And, if tradition is to be believed, he was shortly afterwards assassinated in consequence of some wanton cruelty which he, himself a Jain, displayed, in causing two pious members of a new sect of Saivas, called Lingâyats, to be blinded or slain.¹ If this was so, the occurrence must itself have been an almost fatal blow to the newly established dynasty. At any rate, it is plain that Bijjala's sons had not the capacity which he himself possessed. This gave the opportunity for Sômesvara IV. and his adherents to come to the front. And they owed their success to a Mantrin and Danḍanāyaka or councillor and leader of the forces called Brahma, son of Kāma or Kāvapa, whose name appears in various records in also the Prākṛit forms of Bamma, Bammaṇa, Bammayya, Bammaraṣa, and Bammidêva. One record styles this person Chālukya-rājya-pratishṭhāpaka, "the establisher of the Chālukya sovereignty:"² another says plainly that the position of Sômesvara IV. was secured for him by Brahma, and adds that the latter, "a fire of death to the Kalachuryas," seized the whole earth for the purpose of making the Chālukyas lords of all the world:³ and also a Hoysala inscription mentions him as having taken away the sovereignty from the Kalachuryas, and shews that he did so by seducing the allegiance of some of the Kalachurya forces which were under the command of his own father;⁴ this is made clear partly by the statement, in the Hoysala record, that Brahma had acted in contempt of his father,⁵ and partly by a Harihar inscription,⁶ which mentions his father Kāvapa as a Danḍanāyaka that sometimes it was omitted from the reckoning.—An inscription at the temple of Śaṅkavalīṅga at Hombal in the Dhārwar District (I quote from an ink-impression) calls the Saunīya saṁvatsara (S.-S. 1112 current), = A. D. 1189-90, his third year. This is not reconcilable with any other statements; but there is nothing else suspicious about the record.

of the Kalachurya king Saṅkama, and describes him as Kalachurya-rājya-samuddharana, "the upraiser of the Kalachurya sovereignty," and by a Balagāṁve inscription of A. D. 1179, which mentions him as the commander-in-chief of all the forces¹ of Saṅkama. Further, a record of A. D. 1175² mentions this Brahma as himself a Mahā-pradhāna, Sēnddhipati, and Dandandiyaka of the Kalachurya king Sōvidēva; and it was evidently this position, which he probably continued to hold under Sōvidēva's brothers and successors, that put it in his power to effect the revolution that he accomplished. The records of this reign, again, are not very numerous.³ They style Sōmēsvara IV. Chālukya-Chakravartin, like his father, and also Chālukya-Pratāpa-Chakravartin.⁴ They indicate that he established himself first at Anṇigere in the Dhārwar District,⁵ and only subsequently secured the capital of Kalyāṇa.⁶ And they mention the following feudatories and officials,—the Mantrin and Dandandiyaka Brahma, already referred to, with actual dates in A. D. 1184 and 1185; the Dandandiyaka Tējirāja, Tējimayya, or Tējugi, who, with his assistants the Dandandiyakas Chākana and Rēvaṇa or Rēvarasa, was governing the Māsavāḍi district in A. D. 1184-85, apparently at Dharmāpura or Dambal, which is described as situated in that district; the Mahā-pradhāna Ballayyasāhani, with his Sēndpati, the Sāmanta Rāma, and his Dandandiyaka, Kēsirājayya or Kēsāvabhattaya, the Pergade of the Belvola district, for whom we have the date of A. D. 1184; the Dandandiyaka, Bhāyidēva, son of the Tējugi mentioned above, who was governing the Kūṇḍi three-thousand in A. D. 1187; a certain Barma, son of the Mahāmandalēśvara Bhūta or Āhavamalla-Bhūtiga, who, later in the same year, at Toragale, was ruling the Lōkāpura twelve, the Holalugunda thirty, the town of Doddavāḍa, the Navilugunda forty, and the Kolenūru thirty; and the Mahāmandalēśvara Kāmadēva, of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, who in A. D. 1189 was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Pānuṅgal five-and that he was a son of the Dandandiyaka Barmadēva and his wife Jakkanavve. And a comparison with note 3, page 464 above, establishes at once the identity of this Kāvaṇa with the father of Brahma or Barmarasa.

hundred, and the Huligere three-hundred. To this reign we must also refer, though it does not mention Sômesvara IV. as the reigning sovereign, another record of the Gutta family, which states that in A. D. 1188 the Mahâmanḍalêśvara Vîra-Vikramâditya II., at Guttavolal, was ruling the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, with a certain Bâsirâja as his Mahâpradhâna.

The latest date for Sômesvara IV., furnished by the Mahâmanḍalêśvara Kâmadêva's record,¹ is the day of the uttarâyana-samkrânti or winter solstice of the Saumya samvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 1111 (expired); the corresponding English date is the 25th December, A.D. 1189. What became of Sômesvara IV. after this date is not known. But inscriptions at Muttage in the Bijâpur District and at Anṇigere, dated on the same day, the winter solstice of the Saumya samvatsara, shew that king Bhillama, of the Yâdava dynasty of Dêvagiri, had by that time secured the northern and eastern portions of the Chálukya kingdom. And inscriptions at Balagâṇḍr and Gadag in the Dhârwar District, and at Balagâṇve in Mysore, dated in the months Mârgasîrsha (Nov.-Dec.) and Pausa (Dec.-Jan.) of the Paridhâvin samvatsara, 'S.-S. 1114 (expired), shew that before the end of A. D. 1192 the Hoysalas, under Vîra-Ballâla II., had made almost equal encroachments from the south; one of them, — the Gadag record,² — expressly mentioning the fact that the Hoysala king had acquired sovereignty in that neighbourhood by defeating the general Brahma. It would seem, therefore, that, before the end of A. D. 1189, when probably the Yâdavas and Hoysalas were still disputing the possession of some of the southern provinces, Sômesvara IV. had been driven back into the extreme south-west of his dominions, and that he then retained sovereign power over but little except the hereditary territory of his feudatories who belonged to the Hângal branch of the Kâdamba family. And it appears unlikely that he survived any length of time after that date. With him the dynasty of the Western Chálukyas of Kalyâni came to an end.

There are a few later records, which mention persons who are represented as belonging to the Chálukya stock. The Hoysala king Vîra-Sômesvara (about A.D. 1250) married a lady of Chálukya birth named Dêvalamahâdêvî.³ A copper-plate grant from Terwan in the Ratnâgiri District,⁴ dated in the month Pausa (Dec.-Jan.) of the Raudra samvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 1182 (expired), = A.D. 1260-61, gives the name of the Mahâmanḍalêśvara Kâṁvadêvarâya, with the title of "lord of Kalyâna, the best of towns," and records that his Mahâmâtya, the Mahâjani Kêśava, granted to a Brâhmaṇ the village of Teravâ-taka, i. e. Terwar itself; this record shews that Kāmavadēvarāya had the government of that part of the Koṅkan,—undoubtedly as a feudatory of Kṛishṇa (or of Rāmachandra) of the Dēvagiri-Yādava dynasty. An undated inscription at the temple of Mahālakshmi at Kōlhāpur,¹ probably of about the same period, gives the names of Karṇa,—his son Vētugidēva,—and the latter's son Sômadēva, whose wife was Mānikyadēvi, and who governed at Saṅgamēśvara in the Koṅkan, i. e. probably at Saṅgamēśwar, the chief town of the tāluka of the same name, about twenty miles to the north-east of Ratnāgiri. An undated grant, referable to perhaps the thirteenth or fourteenth century A.D., apparently from somewhere near Miraj in the Southern Marāṭhā Country,² gives, if it is genuine, the name of Vīra-Satyāśrayadēva, son of Gōvindarāya, who not only is called, in the same way, "lord of Kalyāṇa, the best of towns," but also is represented as actually reigning, as paramount sovereign, at that city. And a very similar grant from Bangalore,³ really belonging to the same period with the preceding, but preposterously dated in the Tārāṇa saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 366 (expired), = A. D. 444-45, and therefore still more open to question, gives the name of Vīra-Nonamba, who, in the same way, is styled "lord of Kalyāṇa, the best of towns," and is represented as reigning there as paramount sovereign. These records, however, though allotting the persons named in them to the Chālukya family, give no hint of a claim to descent from Sômesvara IV. or any of his ancestors.

THE KALACHURYAS OF KALYANI.

Chapter V.
The Kalachuryas
of Kalyāṇi.

The manner in which the Kalachuryas of Kalyāṇi acquired the sovereignty,— by Bijjala usurping it in the time of the Western Chālukya king Taila III.,— has already been stated.

As regards the origin of this family, an inscription at Harihar in Mysore, of the time of Bijjala,¹ gives the following account:— The founder of it, Kṛishṇa by name, was an incarnation, born from a Brāhmaṇ woman, of a portion of the god 'Siva.' Passing himself off as a barber, he contrived to kill, at Kālāñjara, an evil-minded king who practised cannibalism.² And thus he, "an ornament of the Kalachuri family," acquired possession of the nine-lākh Dahalā country, i.e. of the Chēdi country in Central India. Many kings of his line ruled. And at length there arose, among them, a certain Kannama. To him were born two sons, Bijjala and Sandarāja; of whom the elder, Bijjala, succeeded him in the sovereignty. To Sandarāja there were born four sons,— Amṇugi, Saṅkhavarman, Kannara, and Jōgama; of whom Amṇugi succeeded first, and was followed by Jōgama. Jōgama's son was Permādi. And to the latter was born Bijjala,— the reigning king at the time when the record was drawn up.

There are, however, other synchronous accounts, equally admissible, which differ from this. Inscriptions of the time of Bijjala's eldest son Sôvidēva, dated in A. D. 1173, at Harasûr³ and Kāligi⁴ in the Nizâm's Dominions, state that, in a line of kings which belonged to the Lunar Race, there was a certain Santama or Santasama. His son was Sagararasa. His son was Kannama. His sons were Nārāṇa and Bijja. Bijja's son was Karṇa. And the Jōgama of the other accounts is represented as the son of this Karṇa. The Kokatnûr grant, however,

⁴ At the temple of Kālinga (ibid. p. 165).— The table given by Sir Walter Elliot (Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. IV. p. 19; Madras Jour. of Lit. and Science, Vol. VII. p. 211) must have been based partly on these two records and partly on the Kukkanûr inscription of Saṅkama.— The Harihar record is not included in his Collection; and his reference to Kṛishṇa, the son of the Brāhmaṇ woman, who reigned at Kālāñjara, was probably taken from an inscription at the temple of Basavarṇa on the south of the Hubli gate at Anṇigere (Carn.-Désa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 155).

of the same king, dated in A. D. 1174,¹ and the Bêhatti grant of his youngest brother Singhaṇa, dated in A. D. 1183,² simply state that Jôgama was the son of a certain Krishna of the Kalachuri family, and say nothing about any antecedents whatever. While an inscription of Bijjala's second son, Saṅkama, dated in A. D. 1178, at Kukkanûr in the Nizâm's Dominions,³ merely says that, in the lineage of the Kalachuris, which was considered to be a portion of the god Îsvara ('Siva'), there was a king Kannama. His sons were Bijjala and Râjala. And the son of Râjala was the Jôgama of the other accounts.

It is curious that there should be such discrepancies in accounts which were written in the period itself. But such is the case. And the result is, that the first name that can be taken as authentic, is that of Jôgama. And, with this starting-point, the list of the Kalachuryas of Kalyâni stands as shewn in the table on page 471 below.

The Kalachuryas carried the suvarṇa-vṛishabha-dhvaja or banner of a golden bull, and were heralded in public by the sounds of the ḍamaruka or double-drum shaped like an hour-glass. Their lâṅghana or crest is not specifically mentioned in their records: it might be inferred to be the bull, which appears on the seals of the Kokatnûr and Bêhatti grants: but, if so, it would furnish a departure from the more usual custom, according to which the devices of the crest and the banner were different, and the crest was used on seals and coins; and it seems more likely that we have here, as in one or two other cases of this later period, an exceptional use of the device of the banner, instead of the crest, on the seals of the charters.⁴ The formal preambles of their records always style them "lord of Kâlânjara, the best of towns."⁵ This place is the modern Kâlânjar or Kâlîñjar,—a town, with a well-known hill-fort, in the Bânda District, Bundêlkhand, in the North-West Provinces; i.e. in the heart of the ancient Kalachuri territory. And, from this hereditary title, as well as from the mention of Kâlânjara and the Dahalâ country in the account given in the Harihar inscription, it is plain that, whether with or without good cause, the members of this family claimed some connection with the Kalachuri or Haihaya kings of Central India, of whom mention has already been made in connection with some of the Western Chalukya, Râshtrakûṭa, and Western Châlukya kings.⁶ But the actual point of contact is nowhere disclosed. And, as in the case of the forms Chalukya and

D. 1176, at the temple of Sômanâtha at Ingleshwar in the Bijâpur District (Carn.-Désa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 189; it is doubtful whether the original now exists), appears to represent Bijjala as a descendant of Kârtavîrya-Arjuna, who is the Sahasrabâhu-Arjuna of whom the Kalachuris of Central India claimed to be descendants.

Chālukya and Kadamba and Kādamba, the constant use of the name Kalachurya seems to imply the recognition of descent from only some side-branch of the Kalachuri stock,—not from the line that reigned in Central India.¹

In connection with Jōgama, we have no historical details. And all that we know about his son Permāḍi, whose name also appears as Paramardi, is that, in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1128, of the Kīlaka saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1051 (current), he was governing the Tardavāḍi district, in the neighbourhood of Bijāpur, as a feudatory Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara III.²

Permāḍi's son was Bijjala, whose name appears also in the forms of Bijja, Bijjana, Vijjala, and Vijjana. In the course of his career, he assumed the viruda of Tribhuvanamalla, and the designations of Bhujabala-Chakravartin,³ “the powerful emperor,” and Kalachurya-Chakravartin, “the Kalachurya emperor,” which were sometimes combined into one appellation,—Kalachurya-bhujabala-Chakravartin. And, as he ended by usurping the sovereignty, it will be interesting to trace, as far as the records enable us to do so, the steps by which he rose to such power.

The earliest reliable mention that we have of Bijjala, is in an inscription at Harihar in Mysore:⁴ the photograph does not shew the date;

¹ The only instances, that I can quote, in which ‘Kalachuri’ occurs in one of the formal preambles in prose, are in line 39 f. of the Harihar inscription, mentioned above, where we have Kalachuri-kula-kaniāla-mārtanda, instead of the customary Kalachurya, etc., and in the same expression in the Kukkanūr inscription of A. D. 1178. In metrical passages, the form occurs constantly; e.g., as ‘Kalachuri,’ in line 11 of the Harihar record,—in a variety of places in the Kukkanūr record,—in lines 5 and 10 of the Anpigeri inscription of A. D. 1184-85 which records the establishment of the power of Sōmēśvara IV. by the Dandandāyaka Brahma (Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 37; see page 464 above, note 3),—and in line 29 of the Hoysala inscription of A. D. 1192 at Gadag (Ind. Ant. Vol. II. p. 29);—and, as ‘Kalachuri,’ in lines 3, 4 of the Kokatnūr grant, and line 6 of the Bēhatti grant (here, Nāgarī characters were used; and this accounts for the different l: but ‘Kalachurya’ would have suited the metre, just as well as ‘Kalachuri’).—The transcripts in Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. usually, if not always, give ‘Kalachuriya;’ but I never met with this form in an original record.—Sir Walter Elliot himself used the forms ‘Kalabhuri’ and ‘Kalabhurya’ as much as, if not in preference to, ‘Kalachuri’ and ‘Kalachurya’ (e.g., Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. IV. pp. 15, 17, 19, 22, 32; Madras Jour. of Lit. and Science, Vol. VII. pp. 207, 209, 211, 214, 224). But this is simply due to mislection or some other mistake.—I have met with the curious form ‘Kalaturya,’ in an inscription of Bijjala, of A. D. 1166, at Maṇakatti near Shiggaon in the Dhārwar District, and in an inscription of his son Sōvidēva, of A. D. 1174, at Hulgaṛ in the same neighbourhood (I quote from ink-impressions).

⁴ P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 119; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 60.—According to Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. I. p. 667, on a stone at the burning-ground near the tank near the house of the Sarāyadavānu at Hirē-Kerūr in the Dhārwar District, there is an inscription which refers itself to the reign of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI., mentions Bijjala as a contemporary Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, and speaks of the latter's Mahā-pradhāna, the Dandandāyaka Sōḍḍaladēva. But the transcript does not shew the date, which appears to have been broken away and lost. And, as the record styles Bijjala Bhujabala-Chakravartin,—a designation which he did not assume till A. D. 1156,—I feel convinced that there must be something wrong about either the original but the record refers itself to the time of the Western Chālukya king Jagadēkamalla II., and therefore belongs to the period A. D. 1138-39 to 1149; and it may be placed approximately in A. D. 1145. This record does not expressly state that Bijjala, — to whom no titles of any kind, subordinate or otherwise, are allotted in it, — was a feudatory of Jagadēkamalla II.;¹ it simply says that, in the time of that king, there was Bijjala, whose servant Vijaya-Pāṇḍya was ruling the Nōlambavāḍi thirty-two thousand. But the mention of Jagadēkamalla II., who is plainly indicated as the reigning king, though the fact is not expressly stated by the usual formal preamble, is sufficient, with the fact that the Nōlambavāḍi province was a regular constituent part of the Western Chālukya dominions, to prove that, to some extent at least, Bijjala recognised his sovereign power.

Probably, the next record of Bijjala is to be found in another inscription at Harihar.² Here, again, the date is not available. But the record takes the Western Chālukya genealogy as far as Taila III.; and it thus indicates plainly, though here also there is no formal preamble, that he was the reigning king. It does not connect any titles with Bijjala's name; it simply says that, in the time of Taila III., there was Bijjala, whose servant Kasapayyanāyaka was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand. It is, therefore, to be placed probably quite early in the reign of Taila III.; and it may be referred to A.D. 1150. It seems to add that Bijjala was devoted to the service of the Chālukyas, and protected the whole of the Chālukya army.³ And from this it would follow that he was the commander-in-chief of all the forces.

But the first dated mention of Bijjala that is available, is contained in the Bijāpur inscription,⁴ which is dated in the month Bhādrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A. D. 1151, of the Prajāpati saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1074 current). Here, in addition to the saṁvatsara being cited as the third regnal year of Taila III., there is the formal preamble which expressly refers the record to the reign of Taila III., as paramount sovereign, reigning at Kalyāṇa. The record does or the transcript; especially as the latest possible date for Vikramāditya VI. is A. D. 1125-23, and we have the date of A. D. 1128 for Bijjala's father. — An inscription (I quote here from an ink-impression) at the temple of Kāḍadēva at Sirōl near Mudhōl in the Southern Marāṭhā Country, purports to connect Bijjala with a date in the month Chaitra (March-April) of the Ānanda saṁvatsara. The Saka year is not quoted. But Ānanda coincided with Saka-Saṁvat 1057 current (A.D. 1134-35), and with S.S. 1117 current (A.D. 1194-95). On the first occasion, it fell before any date for Bijjala that is known for certain to be authentic; and, on the latter occasion, it fell after his time. As, however, this record gives Bijjala the paramount epithets and title of saṁastabhura-nāśraya, śrīprithivīvallaḥa, and Mahārājādhirāja, it is plain that it was not written before at any rate A. D. 1162. And there are other points in it, which raise suspicions as to its genuineness. It would seem, therefore, to be a spurious record, concocted in or after A.D. 1194.

not allot any titles to Bijjala. But it distinctly mentions him as a feudatory of Taila III. And it states that the Mahāpradhāna, Sēnādhipati, and Danḍanāyaka Mailārayya, was governing the Tardavādi thousand, i.e. the country in the neighbourhood of Bijāpur, as a feudatory of Bijjala.

Chapter V
The Kalachur
of Kalyāni

So far, none of the customary feudatory or official titles appear in connection with Bijjala's name. But an inscription at Balagāṁve in Mysore,¹ dated on a day in the Yuvan saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1078 current) of which the English equivalent is probably the 26th December, A. D. 1155, styles him Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara. There is the formal preamble, expressly referring the record to the reign of Taila III., as paramount sovereign; and the saṁvatsara is cited as his sixth regnal year. The record includes the rather pregnant statement, that Bijjala was then governing "all the provinces."² And it adds that Bijjala's own Danḍanāyaka Mahadēvarasa was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand in happiness, in conjunction with the four Karṇas, i.e. writers or accountants, Pōtarasa, Chattimarasa, Padmarasa, and Sōvarasa, who were "embodiments of the mind of Bijjala."³ The title of Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, here first applied to Bijjala, appears again in records of December, A. D. 1157, at Aṇṇigere and Tālgund, and of January, A. D. 1162, at Balagāṁve. After that, it was entirely dropped.

Taila III. is mentioned again, with Bijjala, in inscriptions, dated at the winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1157, of the month Pausa of the Īśvara saṁvatsara, at Hāvēri in the Dhārvar District,⁴ where the saṁvatsara is cited as the eighth year of Taila III., and at Tālgund in Mysore,⁵ where it is coupled, not with a regnal year of either party, but with Saka-Saṁvat 1079 (expired), and in an inscription at Balagāṁve,⁶ dated at the winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1158, of the month Pausa of the Bahudhānya saṁvatsara, coupled in the same way with S.-S. 1080 (expired): the Tālgund and Balagāṁve inscriptions record the fact that the Mahāpradhāna Kēśava, Kēśarāja or Kēśimayya, son of Hoḷalarāja or Hoḷalamarasa, was then governing the Banavāsi province as a feudatory of Bijjala; and the Hāvēri inscription mentions the same official, giving him also the titles of Sēnādhipati, and Banavāsi-nāda-heggade or Heggade of the Banavāsi province. These references to Taila III., however, simply mention him as the last in the lineal succession of the Chālukya kings; and convey no distinct information as to the exact relations then existing between him and Bijjala. And the Balagāṁve inscription of December, A. D. 1155, is the latest record which expressly admits Taila III. as the paramount sovereign of Bijjala.

But the saṁkrānti in question cannot take place so late as on the last day of Māgha. There must be some mistake. And the probability is that Māgha was written by mistake for Pausa.

Shortly after the above date, Bijjala introduced a reckoning of his own, of which the first year was the Dhātu samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1079 current, = A. D. 1156-57, and assumed the viruda of Tribhuvanamalla and the designations of Bhujabala-Chakravartin and Kalachurya-Chakravartin. The earliest available record, dated in this reckoning, is an inscription at Annigere,¹ dated at the winter solstice, in December A.D. 1157, of the month Pausa of the Īśvara samvatsara (S.-S. 1080 current), which is here cited as the second year of Bijjala. This record, which exhibits the viruda of Tribhuvanamalla and the designation of Bhujabala-Chakravartin, gives to Bijjala only the title of Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara. But it mentions him, with his title, viruda, and designation, in a formal preamble, of the usual style, customarily employed only in the case of paramount sovereigns. And, though Bijjala did not assume the full paramount style till A. D. 1162, there can be no doubt that in A. D. 1156 he threw off his allegiance to Taila III., and set himself up on equal terms with that king in part of the latter's dominions. It may be added here that the first instance, among available records, in which the designation Kalachurya-Chakravartin appears, is an inscription at Hāli in the Belgaum District,² dated in the month Śrāvaṇa (July-Aug.), falling in A. D. 1162, of the Chitrabhānu samvatsara (S.-S. 1085 current), cited as the seventh year of Bijjala. The combined designation Kalachurya-bhujabala-Chakravartin is met with earlier, in an inscription at Baḷagāṁve,³ dated probably in Bhādrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A. D. 1158, of the Bahudhānya samvatsara (S.-S. 1081 current), cited as Bijjala's third year.

The records next disclose an occasional use of one of the paramount titles, Mahārājādhirāja, in the place of the feudatory title Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, which, however, as already noted, did not yet fall entirely into abeyance. This new title is first met with in the Hāvēri inscription of December, A.D. 1157; and it is the more noticeable there, because the record also gives the full paramount titles to Taila III., and is dated in one of his regnal years. It appears also in the Baḷagāṁve inscription of December, A. D. 1158; and in one or two other records, the dates of which are not determinable.

And finally, in A. D. 1162 Bijjala assumed the full paramount epithets and titles of śaṁastabhuvandśraya, śrīprithivīvallabha, Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhāṭṭāraka. The period when this step was taken is determined by inscriptions at Bala-

But I have not found an ink-impression of it in the bundle from Annigere.—The regnal years of Bijjala, cited in such of the subsequent records as are dated in that way, are all in agreement, as these two are, with the computation of the Dhātu samvatsara as his first year.

gāmve¹ and Hūli.² In the former,— which is dated at the time of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Pausa, corresponding to the 17th January, A. D. 1162,³ of the Vishu samvatsara (S.-S. 1084 current), cited as the sixth year of Bijjala,— though no mention is made of Taila III., the feudatory title of Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara is applied to Bijjala. While, in the latter,— which is dated at the winter solstice on Monday, Pausa kṛishṇa 2, corresponding probably to the 24th December, A. D. 1162,⁴ of the Chitrabhānu samvatsara, coupled with S.-S. 1084 (expired),— he has all the paramount titles mentioned above, with the exception of Paramabhṭāraka.⁵ This Balagāmve inscription further tells us that Bijjala had then encamped at that town, in the course of a progress which was made to secure the southern country. From a combination of all these hints, it is evident that it was at this juncture, in A. D. 1162, that Bijjala completed the usurpation which he had been contemplating, and annexed to himself all the Western Chālukya dominions. And in this final step he appears to have received material assistance from the 'Silāhāra prince Vijayāditya of Karād; for, a 'Silāhāra record of A. D. 1191 asserts that it was through the friendship of Vijayāditya that Bijjala attained the position of Chakravartin or emperor.⁶

Other records of Bijjala mention, as feudatories and officials,—the Dandandiyaka 'Sridhara, with dates in A. D. 1157 and 1162, who apparently had the government of the territory in the neighbourhood of Anṇigere: the Dandandiyaka Banmarasa, son of Muñjaladēva of the Sagara lineage, who in A. D. 1161-62 was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand with the approval of his relative Kasapayyanāyaka, who has already been mentioned;⁷ the Mahāpradhāna, Sēnādhipati, and Adhikārin of the Belvola district, the Dandandiyaka Ammaṇa, with the date of A. ⁴ The samkrānti, however, appears to have taken place on the Tuesday, 25th December.

family of Saundatti, who are mentioned in a record of A. D. 1165¹ which says that Bijjala, having subdued all kings, was then reigning over the whole world with the one umbrella of sole sovereignty; a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara of the Sinda family, named Īśvara, with the hereditary title of "lord of Karahāṭa, the best of towns," who in the same year was governing, at Halavūr or Hallavūr, several small districts in the Banavāsi and Sāntalige provinces; the Mahāpradhāna, Sēṇādhipati; and Heggaḍe of the Hānūṅgal district, the Daṇḍandāyaka Siddhapayya, who was governing the Hānūṅgal five-hundred in the same year; and the Mahāsāmanta Kaliyammaraśa, of the Jimūtavāhana lineage and the Khachara race, with a date in A. D. 1167. Slightly subsequent records shew that, during the whole of Bijjala's time, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvaras Permāḍi and Vijayāditya II., of the family of the Kādambas of Goa, were ruling their possessions, the Koṅkaṇa nine-hundred and the Palasige twelve-thousand; but the records do not make it clear that these powerful chieftains acknowledged the sovereignty of Bijjala over their territory. Inscriptions dated in the months Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.) and Pauśa (Dec.-Jan.), falling in A. D. 1165, of the Pārthiva saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1088 current), cited in one case as Bijjala's tenth year,² state that he was then reigning at Kalyāṇa, i. e. Kalyāṇi in the Nizām's Dominions,³ which had previously been the Western Chālukya capital. And finally, an inscription at Bālagāmve,⁴ dated at the time of an eclipse of the moon and a saṃkrānti on Sunday, the full-moon day of the month Vaiśākha of the Sarvadhārin saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1091 current), corresponding, probably, to the 24th April, A.D. 1168, says that, while still happily reigning over the whole earth with un-Insers.* No. 185; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 109. — As regards the date, the Vṛishabha-saṃkrānti, or passage of the sun into Taurus, took place on the day given by me; and the full-moon occurred on the same or the preceding day. The week-day, however, was Wednesday, for the saṃkrānti. And Von Oppolzer's Canon der Finsternisse shews no eclipse for this full-moon. — In the preceding month Chaitra, the Mēsha-saṃkrānti, or passage of the sun into Aries, took place on the forenoon of Sunday, 24th March. And the Canon shews an eclipse of the moon on the Monday. But, as the saṃkrānti and eclipse do not both come to the Sunday, there do not appear sufficient grounds for assuming that Vaiśākha is a mistake for Chaitra. In this record, the Sarvadhārin saṃvatsara is cited as the sixteenth of the Kalachurya years. The transcript in Carn.-Dēsa Insers. indeed, substitutes "second" for "sixteenth." But this was done simply because the saṃvatsara in question was the second year of Bijjala's son Sōmēśvara. And the photograph shews the reading of the original quite clearly and unmistakably, — śrīmat-Kalachurya-varshada 16neya Sarvadhāri-saṃvatsarada, &c. This would point to another Kalachurya reckoning, of which the first year would be the Śrīmukha saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1076 current, = A. D. 1153-54, — earlier by three years than the commencement of Bijjala's reckoning. But I have not met with any other date in accordance with such a reckoning. I cannot suggest any historical starting-point for it. And it seems, on the whole, probable that simply a mistake was made, in writing or engraving 16neya instead of 13neya.

divided lordship and with the single umbrella of sole sovereignty, Bijjala transferred the burden of government to his dear or favourite son Sôvidêva, who was reigning at the time when this record was drawn up. The latest known date for Bijjala is the new-moon day of the month Ashâṭha corresponding approximately to the 19th July, A. D. 1167, of the Sarvâjit saṃvatsara (S. S. 1090 current), cited as his twelfth year.¹ The subsequent records shew that the Sarvâjit saṃvatsara was reckoned as the first year of Sôvidêva. And the abdication of Bijjala is, accordingly, to be placed in A. D. 1167, at any time after the 19th July.

In addition to Sôvidêva, in whose favour he abdicated, Bijjala left three other sons, Saṅkama Âhavamalla and Siṅghana, who also succeeded to the throne. And inscriptions of A. D. 1173 and 1180 at Rôṇ² and Sûdî³ in the Dhârvar District, tell us that by a wife named Êcha⁴adêvi—who was probably not the mother of Sôvidêva and the others of that group,—he had a son Vajradêva, and a daughter, Kîrîyâdêvi, who was married to the Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Châvunja II., of the Siṇda family of Yelbarga.⁴

The period to which Bijjala belonged was remarkable for a revival of the worship of Śiva, or for a fresh impetus to the Śaiva faith with elaborated and improved rites and practices, which culminated in the establishment of a new sect of Śivabhaktas or worshippers of Śiva, called technically Vîra-Śaivas, i. e. “brave, fierce, or strict Śaivas,” or “Śaiva champions,” and popularly Lîṅgâvats or Lîṅgawants, i. e. “those who have the lîṅga or phallic emblem.” The Lîṅgâvats—(using the appellation by which all average members of the sect would describe themselves)—are outwardly distinguished from the ordinary Śaivas by the practice of carrying about with them a miniature lîṅga, usually in a silver box suspended from the neck and hanging about the waist. And the chief characteristics of their faith and practices are, adoration of the lîṅga and of Śiva's bull Nandi, hostility to Brâhmanas, disbelief in the transmigration of the soul, contempt for child-marriage, and approval and habitual practice of the remarriage of widows. They are found chiefly in the Kanarese country; their vernacular is Kanarese; and it is due almost entirely to them that this beautiful, highly polished, and powerful language has been preserved, in later times, amidst the constant inroads of Marâṭhas from the north. They now constitute about thirty-five per cent of the total Hindû population in the Belgaum, Bijâpur, and Dhârvar Districts.⁵ In Mysore and the Kōlhāpur State, they number about ten per cent. of the Hindū population. And they are also found, but in smaller proportions, in the districts of Poona, Shōlāpur, Sātārā, and North Kanara. Elsewhere, they are constantly met with; but as the result of the migration of isolated families, mostly in connection with trade and manufactures. In the Bijāpur and Dhārwar Districts, and possibly in the neighbouring parts of the Nizām's Dominions and Mysore, the sect appears to be still steadily gaining ground. And an interesting internal movement was observable in 1891, when large numbers of the members of it claimed to have themselves entered in the census returns under the designation of Vīra-Saivas, in preference to that of Līṅgāyats, with which they had been content on previous similar occasions.

According to the tradition of the Līṅgāyats themselves, as embodied in their principal sacred writings, the Basava-Purāṇa and Channabasava-Purāṇa,¹ the establishment of the new sect, and certain events, connected with it, which ended in the assassination of Bijjala, were as follows:—

To a certain Mādirāja and his wife Madalāmbikā, pious Saivas of the Brāhmaṇ caste, and residents of a place named Bāgewāḍi which is usually supposed to be the subdivisional town of that name in the Bijāpur District, there was born a son, who, being an incarnation of Śiva's bull Nandi, sent to earth to revive the declining Saiva rites, was named Basava.² When the usual time of investiture had arrived, Basava, then eight years of age, having meanwhile acquired much knowledge of the Saiva scriptures, refused to be invested with the sacred Brāhmaṇical thread; declaring himself a special worshipper of Śiva, and stating that he had come to destroy the distinctions of caste. This refusal, with his singular wisdom and piety, attracted the favourable notice of his uncle Baladēva, "prime minister"³ of Bijjala, who had come to be present at the ceremony; and Baladēva gave him his daughter Gaṅgādēvī or Gaṅgāmbā in marriage.⁴ The Brāhmaṇs, however, began to persecute Basava, on account of the novel practices propounded by him. And he consequently left his native town, and went to a village named 'Kappadi,' where he spent his early years, receiving instruction there from the god Śiva, in the form of the local idol Saṅgamēśvara.⁵

Meanwhile, his uncle Baladēva died. At the advice of the deceased minister's relatives, Bijjala decided on securing the services of Basava, whose ability and virtues had now become publicly known. After ¹ Abstract translations of these two works, by the Rev. G. Würth, have been published in the Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. VIII. pp. 65-97 and 98-221, from which I quote.

² loc. cit. p. 67.—The word basava is treated as a corruption of the Sanskrit viśvabha, 'a bull,' in its special designation of Nandi, the bull on which Śiva rides.—From Wilson's Descriptive Catalogue of the Mackenzie Collection, p. 305, it would appear that some versions of the Basava-Purāṇa substitute, for Bāgewāḍi, Inḷēśwar, which is a village in the same neighbourhood.

some demur, Basava accepted the office; having the hope that the influence attached to the post would help him in propagating his peculiar tenets. And, accompanied by his elder sister Nāgalāmbikā, he proceeded from 'Kappadi' to Kalyāṇa, where he was welcomed with deference by the king, and was installed as prime minister, commander-in-chief, and treasurer;—second in power to only the king himself;¹ and the king, in order to bind him as closely as possible to himself, gave him his younger sister Nīlālôchanā to wife.²

Somewhere about this time, from Basava's unmarried elder sister Nāgalāmbikā, who was an incarnation of the intelligence of the goddess Pārvatī, there was born, by the working of the spirit of Śiva, a son, who was an incarnation of Śiva's son Śaṣṇmukha or Kārttikēya, the god of war.³ Because, the Channabasava-Purāṇa says, he was more beautiful than Basava in many respects, he was named Channabasava, i.e. "the beautiful Basava."⁴ And he perhaps played a more important part than even Basava himself in the propagation of the tenets of the new sect; for, Basava is represented as receiving from him instruction on important points connected with it.⁵

The two Purāṇas are occupied, for the most part, with doctrinal expositions, recitals of mythology, praises of previous Śaiva saints, and accounts of miracles worked by Basava. And it is only quite at the end of each of them, that we come again on any historical matter. They shew, however, that, with the influence that his official position gave the uncle, Basava and his nephew propagated with great energy and activity their doctrines, which included the persecution and extermination of all persons,—and especially the Jains,—whose creed differed from that of the Līṅgāyats.⁶ Coupled with the lavish expenditure incurred by Basava, from the public coffers, on the support of the Jangams or Līṅgāyat priests, the proceedings naturally aroused in Bijjala, who was of the Jain faith,⁷ feelings of uneasiness and distrust, which appear to have been fanned from time to time by a rival minister named Mañchanṇa, in spite of the latter being himself, in secret, a Vīra-Śaiva.⁸ And at length an event occurred, which ended in the assassination of Bijjala and the death of Basava.

At Kalyāṇa, there were two specially pious Līṅgāyats, named 'Halleyaga' and 'Madhuveyya,' whom Bijjala, in mere wantonness, caused to be blinded. Thereupon, says the Basava-Purāṇa,⁹ Basava,—himself leaving Kalyāṇa for a place named 'Kudali-Saṅgamēśvara,'—deputed one of his followers, Jagaddēva, to slay the king. And Jagaddēva, with two unnamed friends, succeeded in making his way into the palace and accomplishing his errand,—stabbing the king even in the midst of his court. Civil war ensued. And, the news reaching Basava as he was journeying, he hastened on his way, and, reaching 'Kudali-Saṅgamēśvara,' was there absorbed into the god;¹ while Channabasava fled to Uḷavi, in North Kanara, where he found refuge in a cave.

The Channabasava-Purāṇa gives a somewhat different account.² It places first the death of Basava, who, it says, was absorbed in Saṅgamēśvara in the month Phālguna, falling in A. D. 785, of the Raktākalin samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 707 (current);³ and the only reason that it assigns, is, that the news had reached Basava that a certain Prabhu, who was an incarnation of Śiva,⁴ had left Kalyāṇa, and had been absorbed into Śiva in a plantain-tree at Śrīśaila. On the death of Basava, Bijjala appointed Channabasava to the office that had been held by his uncle. After this, the king caused the pious 'Halleija' and 'Madhuveja' to be tied to a rope and dragged about the ground till they died. In revenge for this, Bijjala was slain by two torch-bearers, named Jagaddēva and Kommaṇṇa. Then Channabasava, who had meantime sent away many Liṅgāyats to Uḷavi under the pretext of celebrating a feast in honour of the god Saṅgamēśvara (? Saṅgamēśvara), gathered together his horses and men, and left Kalyāṇa to follow and join them. The "son-in-law" of Bijjala started in pursuit. And a battle ensued, in which the pursuers were destroyed, and the king was taken captive. At the advice of Nāgalāmbikā, however, Channabasava restored the slain army to life; and, having impressed upon the king that he should not persecute the Liṅgāyats, as his predecessor had done, but should walk in righteousness, he anointed him, and sent him back to govern his country.⁵

¹ According to Sir Walter Elliot (Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. IV. p. 22, note; and Madras Jour. of Lit. and Science, Vol. VII. p. 214, note), the place of Basava's absorption is said to be Saṅgam, in the Hungund tālukā, Bijjapur district, at the junction of the Kṛishṇa and the Malparbhā, where, he added, a depression in the līṅga at the temple of Saṅgamēśvara is still pointed out as the exact spot into which Basava entered. I am not prepared to deny the correctness of these statements. Still, as regards the true identification of the place, the prefix 'Kudali' seems to me to point rather to the historically much more important (see, e.g., page 445 above note 1) Kūḍal-Saṅgam, at the junction of the Kṛishṇa and the Tungabhadra.

⁵ The Purāṇa ends with various other prophecies, not connected with the present subject, to the effect that the king, thus anointed, should reign for sixty years from the death of Basava; that then, at a time when the Hoysala kingdom was flourishing, the Turks, — (the original probably has 'Turushkas), — led by the giant Hīrāmbara, born among them by the blessing of Śiva, should come and vanquish Bijjala, destroy Kalyāṇa, kill cattle in the temple of Śiva, erect a mosque there, and build the town of Kalburgi; that the kings of Aṅgudi should build the town of Vijayanagara, near Hampe; that Hīrāmbara and his house should reign over the land for seven hundred and seventy years; that then there should arise a king named Vasantarāya, who would drive the Turks out of the country and restore Kalyāṇa; that, all the Śaiva saints coming to life again, Channabasava should become the prime minister of this king, and Basava the commander of his forces; and that thus the Liṅgāyat religion should be re-established and greatly increased. — This Purāṇa was written in A. D. 1685 (loc. cit. p. 221). And these "prophecies" are, of course, nothing but confused reminiscences of intervening history.

The Jain account, as given in the Bijjaladyacharitra,¹ puts things very differently. Basava's influence with the king is attributed to the fact that he had a very beautiful sister, whom the king took as a concubine. And the end of Bijjala and Basava is related thus:—Bijjala had marched against and subdued the Kôihâpur chief, i.e. the Siâhâra Mahâmandâlêsvara, who must have committed some act of rebellion. During a halt on the way back to Kalyâna, a Jaṅgam arrived, sent by Basava, and disguised as a Jain, and presented the king with a poisoned fruit, the mere smell of which caused his death. He had time, however, before dying, to tell his son Immaḍi-Bijjala, i.e. "the second Bijjala,"² that it was Basava who had sent the fruit and to enjoin him to put Basava to death. Immaḍi-Bijjala accordingly ordered that Basava should be apprehended, and that all the Jaṅgams, wherever seized, should be executed. And, on hearing this, Basava threw himself into a well, and died; while his wife "Nîânâ" poisoned herself. Channabasava, however, after Immaḍi-Bijjala's resentment was allayed, presented his uncle's treasures to the king, and was admitted to favour and to a ministerial office at court.³

Such are the traditional accounts. There are, however, no apparent reasons for attributing, either to the Lingâyat Purâṇas, or to the Jain poem, any greater historical accuracy than other Hindû works of the same class have been found to possess. And, on the contrary, there are fair grounds for questioning the correctness of the narratives given by them. The Lingâyat and Jain accounts differ very markedly; to a far greater extent than can be accounted for on simply the supposition of a representation of true facts from different sectarian points of view. In respect of the circumstances immediately attending the deaths of Bijjala and Basava, even the Lingâyat Purâṇas are not at all in accordance with each other. The Channabasava-Purâṇa allots to these events the absurd date of A. D. 785, which is too early by close upon four centuries. Even the Jain poem appears to place them,⁴ not only twelve years before the time, in A.D. 1167, when Bijjala still alive, abdicated in favour of his eldest son, but also even before the time, in A. D. 1156, when Bijjala established himself as king. No epigraphic mention of Basava and Channabasava has been obtained; which is peculiar, if they really held the high office that is allotted to them by tradition. And finally, in the only epigraphic record which has come to notice, containing an allusion of any kind to the revival of the Saiva faith and rites, the indication is that it was a Brâhmaṇ named Ekântada-Râmayya, to whom the movement owed its origin.

³ Sir Walter Elliot has said that Basava's sister, who became the king's mistress, was named Padmavati; that it was at Uḷavi that Basava drowned himself; and that these events occurred, according to the Jain poem, in Kaliyuga-Saṁvat 4255 (expired), = Saka-Saṁvat 1077 (current), = A.D. 1154-55 (i.e., before even the time when Bijjala commenced his independent career). But I have not been able to find the authority for these statements.

⁴ See the preceding note.

Chapter V.
The Kalachuryas
of Kalyāṇi.

The record in question is an undated inscription, of the time of the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Kāmadēva (about A. D. 1181 to 1203), of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, at Ablūr in the Dhārwar District.¹ And it gives the following narrative, which, if we discount the supernatural agency and the miracle, is reasonable and verisimilar enough:—

Among the Brāhmanas at a town named Alande in the Kuntala country, where there was a temple of the god 'Siva under the name of Sōmanātha, there was one named Purushōttamabhaṭṭa, of the Vatsa or 'Srivatsa gōtra, well versed in all the Vēdas and Vēdāṅgas. His wife was Padmāmbike. He and she lived together for some time, without having any offspring. And Purushōttamabhaṭṭa began to do special worship to 'Siva, in order to obtain a son. One day, when 'Siva, with Pārvatī, Brahman, Vishnu, and Iḍra, and a countless host of his Gaṇas or attendants, was in public assembly on the mountain Kailāsa, a leader of the Gaṇas, named Nārada, stood out and represented that, while Ōhila, Dāsa, Chenna, Siriyāla, Halāyudha, Bāṇa, Udbhaṭa, Malayēśvara who came to Kailāsa in human form, Kēsavarāja,² and countless other Gaṇas, resigning the happiness of earthly life, had been dwelling in Kailāsa, engaged in the worship of 'Siva, an opportunity had arisen for the Jains and Buddhists to become predominant and aggressive. Thereupon 'Siva commanded his son or attendant Vīrabhadra to make a portion of himself incarnate, in the person of a man who should restrain these hostile rites. And Vīrabhadra appeared to Purushōttamabhaṭṭa in a dream, in the guise of a hermit, and announced to him that he should have a son, who was to be called Rāma, and who should discomfit all those, in the dakṣhiṇāpatha or Dekkan, who had gone astray into the paths of the Jains. In due course, a son was born to Purushōttamabhaṭṭa. According to the god's command, he was named Rāma. In conformity with his divine origin, he was taught to practise the 'Saiva rites, with a view to ultimate absorption into 'Siva. And, by the exclusiveness and intensity of his devotion to 'Siva, he acquired the name of Ēkāntada-Rāmayya or "the single-minded Rāmayya." At various sacred 'Saiva sites, with speech, body, and mind entirely given up to 'Siva, he worshipped all the Sōmanāthas of the south. And at length he did worship at the shrine of Sōmanātha at Huligere, i.e. at Lakshmēśwar in the Dhārwar District. There the god appeared in person to him, and gave him the command to go to Ablūr,—to take up his abode there,—to enter fearlessly into controversy with the Jains,—and to defeat them by wagering his head. Accordingly, he established himself at Ablūr, and continued to practise ascetism at a place there known as the site of the god Brahmēśvara. One day, the Jains, led by one of the village-headmen named Saṅkagāvunda, assembled, and began to persistently sing the praises of Jina, as the sole god, in the vicinity of the image of 'Siva which he worshipped. He remonstrated; maintaining that no other god deserved to be praised in the neighbourhood of 'Siva. And, on their refusing to desist, he then began to sing the praises of 'Siva, as the creator, the preserver, and the destroyer, and as the god whose essence pervades the whole universe. The Jains then challenged him to decapitate himself and offer his head to 'Siva, in the presence of all the people; promising that, if his head should be restored to him, they would admit that 'Siva was indeed the one god, and Ēkāntada-Rāmayya his true disciple. And, being asked to wager something against his head, they further bound themselves by a writing on a palmyra leaf, to demolish their Jina and set up an image of 'Siva, in the event of his success. Then, singing the praises of 'Siva, Ēkāntada-Rāmayya cut off his own head with a scimitar, and laid it at the feet of his god. On the seventh day, it was found by all the people that Ēkāntada-Rāmayya's head was restored to him, without a scar. The Jains, however, failed to keep their word. And so he himself, in spite of their guards, their horses, their chieftains, and the troops that they sent against him, broke off the head of their Jina, and presented it as an offering to his own god, and, as is gathered from subsequent parts of the record, set up an image of 'Siva, under the name of Vīra-Sōmanātha, at Aḷlūr, and built a temple for it, "as large," the record says, "as a mountain."¹ The Jains went and complained to Bijjala, who became much enraged, and sent for Ēkāntada-Rāmayya, and questioned him as to why he had committed so gross an outrage on the Jains. Thereupon Ēkāntada-Rāmayya produced the writing on the palmyra leaf, which he asked Bijjala to deposit in his treasury, and offered that, if the Jains would wager their seven-hundred temples, including the Ānesejjeya-basadi,² he would repeat the feat; and he undertook even to allow his opponents to burn his head, and still to recover it. Wishing to see the spectacle, Bijjala called all the learned men of the Jain temples together, and bade them wager their temples, repeating the conditions on a palmyra leaf. The Jains, however, would not face the test again. So Bijjala, laughing at them, dismissed them with the advice that thenceforth they should live peaceably with their neighbours, and gave Ēkāntada-Rāmayya, in public assembly, a jayapatra or certificate of success. Also, pleased with the unsurpassed daring with which Ēkāntada-Rāmayya had displayed his devotion to 'Siva, he laved Rāmayya's feet, and granted to the temple of Vīra-Sōmanātha a village named Gōgāve in the Sattaliḡe seventy in the Banāvasi twelve-thousand.³ Subsequently, the record says, when the Western Chālukya king

³ Ēkāntada-Rāmayya is mentioned, with the story of his cutting off his head, in the Channabasava-Purāṇa (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. VIII. p. 198). But the controversy, in the course of which he cut off his head, is there attributed to a Jain having entered a 'Saiva temple without removing his shoes; and the occurrence is located at Kalyāṇa, where, it is said, Rāmayya had gone in order to see Bijjala, whose fame had spread in all directions.

Chapter V.
The Kalachuryas

Sômēśvara IV. and his commander-in-chief Brahma were at Seleyahalli-koppa, a public assembly was held, in which recital was made of the merits of ancient and recent Śaiva saints. The story of Ēkāntada-Rāmayya being told, Sômēśvara IV. wrote a letter summoning him into his own presence at his palace, and laved his feet, and granted to the same temple a village in the Nāgarakhaṇḍa seventy in the Banavāsī twelve-thousand. And finally, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kānadva went and saw the temple, heard all the story, summoned Ēkāntada-Rāmayya to Hāṅgal, and there laved his feet and granted to the temple a village named Mallavalli, near Muṇḍagōḍ, in the Hosanāl seventy in the Pānuṅgal five-hundred.

In this account, there is nothing inconsistent with the possibility of the revival of the Śaiva religion having been largely helped on, and of the establishment of the Lingāyat sect having been actually effected, by persons named Basava and Channabasava; and even of Bijjala having been assassinated, after his abdication, in connection with some political opposition to the movement, which he may have instigated or favoured.¹ But the narrative plainly indicates a totally different person, Ēkāntada-Rāmayya, as the originator of the movement. And, as the record describes Bijjala as simply a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara when he made his grant to the temple, the event has to be placed in the time of Taila III., before A.D. 1162, when Bijjala completed his usurpation of the sovereignty.

Sômēśvara-Sôvidēva.

As we have already seen, in A.D. 1167 Bijjala abdicated in favour of his eldest son Sômēśvara, who, to distinguish him from the Western Chālukya king of the same name who was almost contemporaneous with him, will be most conveniently spoken of by that form of his name, viz. Sôvidēva, which occurs most frequently in the records of his time.² He had the virudas of Bhujabalamalla, "the powerful wrestler," and Rāya-Murāri, "a very Vishṇu among kings."³ He used the paramount epithets and titles of samastabhuvandśraja, śrīprithivīvallabha, Mahārājādhirāja, and *Iavamēśvara*⁴; and he was also styled Kalachurya-Chakravartin and Kalachurya-bhujabala Chakravartin. His wife, or one of his wives, was Sāvalad⁵vi, who is described, not only as highly skilled in music and dancing, but also as displaying her accomplishments in public,—a performance, which the less generous Hindū customs of the present day would render impossible.¹ The records shew that the Sarvajit saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 1090 current, = A. D. 1167-68, was counted as the first year of his reign.² One of them, dated in the month Chaitra (March April), falling in A. D. 1172, of the Nandana saṃvatsara, 'S.-S. 1094 (expired),³ states that he was then reigning at Kalyāṇa, which undoubtedly was in his possession. But he had also a seat of government at a place named Modeganūr, or Modeganūra-Kuppade, which has to be looked for somewhere in the Nizām's Dominions.⁴ The records do not disclose any historical events.⁵ But they mention, as feudatories and officials,—the Mahāsāmanta, Sēn-ādi-bāhattara-niyōg-ādhipati, Mahāpradhāna, Sarvādhipārin, Mahāpasāyita, and Dandānyaka Bolikeya-Kēsimayya, who is said, in a record of A. D. 1168, to have been governing the Tardavādi thousand, the Hānūṅgal five-hundred, and the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, for a long time, and for whom we have also dates in A.D. 1169, 1170, and 1172, in records which further describe him as Heggade of the Banavāsi province and the Huligere district, Sunka-pannāyad-adhipati, and Kannada-Heri-Lāla-samdhivigrahin; Bijjala and Vikrama, sons of the Sinda Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Chāvūṇḍa II., and nephews of Śōvidēva himself, who in A.D. 1169-70 were ruling the Kisukād seventy, the Bāgadage seventy, and the Keḷavādi three-hundred; the Dandānyaka Tējūrāja, Adhipārin of the Belvola district and Bāhattara-niyōg-ādhipati, with the date of A.D. 1170; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Śvara, of the Sinda family, with the title of "lord of

³ The latter of these occurs in almost every record. The former is met with in an inscription of A.D. 1170 at the temple of Mallikārjuna at Kukkaṇḍr in the Nizām's Dominions (Carn-Dēsa Insers. Vol. II. p. 138), and in the Kālgi inscription of A.D. 1173 (ibid. p. 165.)

(3) An inscription at Narsāpur, in either the Gadag or the Kōḍ tāluka of the same district (*P. S. and O.-C. And (5) an inscription at the temple of Gōpālasvāmin at Chikka-Muddanūr, in the Nizām's Dominions, which is represented in the Carn.-Dēsa Insers. Vol. II. p. 136, as being dated in his third year, the Virōdhin saṃvatsara, is in reality dated, as plainly as could possibly be—(I quote from an ink-impression),—in Śrīvina of the Manmatha saṃvatsara, ('S.-S. 1098 current), which is cited as his ninth year.

Karabhāta, the best of towns," who in A.D. 1172 was governing at Hallavûr; the Dandandiyaka Vāsudēva, son of the Kēsimayya mentioned above, with the same date, A.D. 1172; the Mahāpradhāna, Sēnādhipati, Bāhattara-niyōg-ādhipati, and Hiriyā-Dandandiyaka Mādhavayya, with the date of A.D. 1173; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Rāmadēvarasa, "lord of Koppaṇa, the best of towns," and belonging to the lineage of Nācharāja, with the same date; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Gōṅkarasa, of the Bāṇa race, son of Udayāditya-Vīra-Kālarasa who was the son of Vīra-Gōṅkarasa, with the same date; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Sōvidēvarasa, doubtless of the family of the Kādambas of Hāṅgal, and his Pradhāna, the Haṭṭabōva Ācharasa, with the same date, A.D. 1173; a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara of the Kādamba stock, apparently named Pāṇḍyadēvarasa, with the date of A.D. 1174; the Dandandiyaka Mahēśvaradēvarasa, the Dandandiyaka Māyidēvarasa, Suṅkaveggade of the Belvola and Huligere districts, and Indrakēśidēvarasa, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara of the Huligere district, with the same date; the Mahāpradhāna, Sēnādhipati, and Dandandiyaka, the kumāra Bammidēvarasa, with the date of A.D. 1175;¹ and the Dandandiyaka Sōmadēva, son of the Mahāpradhāna, Sēnādhipati, and Dandandiyaka Ammanayya, with the date of A.D. 1176. Also contemporaneous records shew that in A.D. 1169 and 1170 the Pāṇḍya Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vijaya-Pāṇḍyadēva, "lord of Kāñchi, the best of towns," was ruling the Nōlambavādi thirty-two-thousand at Uchchangī;² and that, during part of Sōvidēva's reign, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvaras Permādi and Vijayāditya, of the family of the Kādambas of Gōa, and, after them, Vijayāditya's son Jayakēśin III., for the rest of the reign, were ruling the Kōṅkara nine-hundred and the Palasige twelve-thousand: but it is doubtful whether the Kalachurya sovereignty was acknowledged by these powerful feudatories in such outlying parts of the kingdom. The latest date on record for Sōvidēva is the full-moon day of the month Māgha of the Durmukha samvatsara (Saka-Samvāt 1099 current), which is cited as his tenth year. The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 16th January, A.D. 1177.

Sōvidēva was succeeded by his younger brother Saṅkama, who had the biruda of Niśsaṅkamalla, "the wrestler, free from apprehension."³ The records give him the same paramount epithets and titles that are allotted to Sōvidēva. And he was styled Kalachurya-Chakravartin and Kalachurya-bhujabala-Chakravartin, like his predecessors, and also Niśsaṅkamalla-Chakravartin. The earliest date actually connected with his name, is the new-moon day of Bhādrapada of the Vilambin samvatsara, Saka-Samvāt 1100 (expired), corresponding to the 13th September, A.D. 1178.⁴ But his accession to the throne was probably in A.D. 1177. And there are indications that he was associated in the sovereignty, with Sôvidêva, from some time in A.D. 1176.¹ An inscription at Harihar, the date of which is illegible,² mentions Kalyâna as the capital of Saṅkama. And the Kukkanûr inscription of A.D. 1178 shews that he, also, had a second seat of government at Modeganûr. The records of his reign³ mention, as feudatories and officials,—the Mahâpradhâna, Lâlakhandeyakâra-adhishthâyaka, and Dandandâyaka Lakhmîdêvayya, with the date of A. D. 1178; the Dandandâyaka Kâvaṇa or Kâvaṇayya, “the upraiser of the sovereignty of the Kalachuryas,” and the commander-in-chief of all the forces, who is mentioned in the Harihar inscription as having come to the Banavâsi province after having conquered the southern country, and in the Balagâmve inscription of A. D. 1179 as having come to that place in the course of a pleasure-trip to the southern provinces, which he had made in company with the Piriya-Dandandâyaka Lakmîdêva, the Bâhattara-niyôg-adhishthâyaka Chandugîdêva, the Dandandâyaka Rêchanayya, and the Sarvâdhikârin and Dandandâyaka Sôvaṇayya; * the Mahâpradhâna, Sêṇâdhipati, Banavâsi-nâḍa-hergaḍe, and Dandandâyaka Kêśirâjyaya, with the date of A.D. 1179, who is elsewhere mentioned as governing the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, at Balagâmve, in conjunction with the Mahâpradhânas Kâvaṇa and Sômaṇa; the Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Sampakarasa, ¹ The succession is said to have been immediate, without any interval (tat-samanantaradoḥ; Ind. Ant. Vol. V. p. 46, text line 13). And some of the records tend to make his reckoning overlap with that of Sôvidêva. Thus, an inscription on a pillar near a well at Yêr in the Nizâm's Dominions (Carn.-Désa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 216; verified from an ink-impression) is dated in Âśvina of the Vikârin samvatsara (Saka Samvat 1102 current), and cites the samvatsara as his fourth year. In agreement with this, an inscription on the premises of the Pâjârî Mahâdêvappa of the temple of Trikuṭêśvara at Gadag in the Dhârwar District (ibid. p. 237; verified from an ink-impression), dated in Mârgaśīrsha of the Śarvarin samvatsara (S.-S. 1103 current), cites this samvatsara as his fifth year. And these two records point to the Durmukha samvatsara, S.-S. 1099 current, = A.D. 1176-77, — (or, at least, to the remnant of it, in A.D. 1177, after the latest date that is on record for Sôvidêva),— being reckoned as his first year. On the other hand, an inscription at Balagâmve (P. S. and O.-C. Inscriptions, No. 183, the second part; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 152), dated in Chaitra of the Vikârin samvatsara, cites Vikârin as his third year; which would make the Hêmalambin samvatsara, S.-S. 1100 current, = A.D. 1177-78, the first year of his reckoning. But another Balagâmve inscription (P. S. and O.-C. Inscriptions No. 189, the first part; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 75; Ind. Ant. Vol. V. p. 45), dated in Vaiśākha of the same samvatsara Vikârin, cites it as his fifth year; and this indicates, for his first year, the Manmatha samvatsara S.-S. 1093 current, = A.D. 1175-76, which was the ninth year, and not even the last year, of Sôvidêva. These are the only instances for which I can vouch. And the entries in the Carn.-Désa Inscrs. some of which are in agreement with the reckoning of the Durmukha samvatsara as the first year, while others differ far more than even the two dates quoted just above, cannot be relied on either way: for, e.g., in the case of the Balagâmve inscription which really cites Vikârin as the fifth year, the transcript (op. cit. Vol. II. p. 217) represents it as citing that samvatsara as the fourth year; an inscription at the temple of Basavaṇṇa at Hagaritigi in the Nizâm's Dominions (ibid. p. 57) is represented as citing the Vikritin samvatsara (S.-S. 1093 current) as the third year of Saṅkama, though, in reality, it did not fall within his time at all; and another inscription at Hagaritigi, on the premises of Pawâdeppa (ibid. p. 58) is represented as citing the Vikârin samvatsara as his twelfth year.

² Inscriptions at Dāvāngere and Harihar (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. Nos. 141, 118; Mysore Inscriptions, pp. 23, 51).

evidently belonging to the Gutta family of Guttal, with the date of A.D. 1179; the Hoysala Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Ballāḷa II., who, in A.D. 1179, joined with his piriy-arasi or senior wife Rēmādēvī in making a grant to the god Hariharēśvara at Kaulūr in the Nizām's Dominions; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvaras, of some unknown family, Hariharadēvarasa and his son Mallidēvarasa, with the date of A.D. 1180 for the latter of them; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vikrama, of the Sinda family of Yelburga, who in the same year was ruling the Kisukād seventy; and the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Gōṅkarasa, with the date of A.D. 1180. The latest date on record for Saṅkama, is the day of the winter solstice in the month Pausha of the Sārvarin saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1103 current), cited probably as his fifth year;¹ the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 24th December, A.D. 1180.

Saṅkama was followed, probably in A.D. 1181, by a younger brother, whose proper name is not disclosed by the records, and who is only known, by one of his birudas, as Āhavamalla. He also had the biruda of Vīra-Nārāyaṇa. The records give to him, again, the same paramount epithets and titles which are allotted to Saṅkama; and perhaps also that of Paramabhaṭṭāraka. And, like his predecessors, he was also styled Kalachurya-Chakravartin, and Kalachurya-bhujabala-Chakravartin. The earliest date actually on record for him is in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A.D. 1180, of the Sārvarin saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1103 current).² The saṁvatsara is cited as a year of Āhavamalla himself.³ But the date falls before the latest date on record for Saṅkama. And other records shew that the first year of Āhavamalla's reckoning was the Vikārin saṁvatsara, S.-S. 1102 current, = A.D. 1179-80.⁴ And this tends to shew that Āhavamalla was associated in the sovereignty, with Saṅkama, from some time in A.D. 1179, and possibly, with some other indications; that in that year the two brothers divided the kingdom between them,—Saṅkama retaining the northern and eastern portions, and Āhavamalla receiving the country more to the south.¹ The records do not mention Āhavamalla's capital; but there seems no reason for thinking that he did not hold Kalyāna after his predecessor. They mention, as feudatories and officials,— the Mahāpradhāna, Antahpura-vergaḍe, and Mahāpasāyita, the Danḍanāyaka Kēsimayya, who was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, at Baḷagāṁve, in A. D. 1181, and in respect of whom a later record, of the same year, tells us that Āhavamalla, bidding him govern the region of the south in peace and quiet, gave him the Banavāsi province, and that he ruled it, including the Hayve, Sāntalige, and Edeḍore districts;² the Danḍanāyaka Chandugidēva, who is mentioned in the same record, of A. D. 1181, as having burned the territory of Vijayāditya, i.e. Vijayāditya II. of the family of the Kādambas of Goa, and taken the kingdoms of the Chōla and the Hoysala; the Danḍanāyaka Lakshmana, Rēchaṇa, and Kāvaṇa, mentioned in the same record; the Mahāpradhāna, Bāhattara-niyōgādhipati, and Danḍanāyaka Hiriya-Sōvaṇayya, and the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vira-Gōṅkarasa and Mallidēvarasa, with the same date; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Jōyidēva I., of the Gutta family, with the same date; and the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vira-Vikramāditya II., son of Jōyidēva, with the date of A. D. 1182. The latest date on record for Āhavamalla is Bhādrapada kṛishṇa 13 of the Sōbhakrit saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1106 current).³ The corresponding English date is, approximately, the 17th September, A. D. 1183. And the date on record for his successor shews that his reign must have terminated almost immediately afterwards.

³ But here, as in one or two other records of this reign, the actual number of the year is omitted,—unless a certain indistinct work may be read as “two,”—though the syllables neya show that the intention was to give it.

Āhavamalla was succeeded, in A. D. 1183, by his younger brother Singhana, of whom only one record has come to light,— the copper-plate charter from Bēhaṭṭi in the Dhārwar District,* recording the grant, by Singhana, of the village of Kukkanūr in the Nizām's Dominions, — which is dated on the new-moon day of the month Āśvina of the Sōbhakrit saṁvatsara, Saka-Saṁvat 1105 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 18th October, A. D. 1183. This record gives Singhana the paramount title of Mahārājādhirāja, which shews that he actually ascended the throne. But we know nothing further about him. He was the last of his line. And in the same year, A. D. 1183, and probably in the early part of it, the sovereignty was restored, by the Danḍanāyaka Brahma or Barmarasa, to the Western Chālukyas, in the person of Sōmēśvara IV.

³ From an inscription at Baḷagāṁve (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 193; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 184).—I have read the details as Phālguna śukla 5. The copy which I now have of the photograph, does not enable me to check the reading either way. And I now adopt Mr. Rice's reading, which seems more probably correct.—Both Mr. Rice and myself found the saṁvatsara to be cited as the eighth year of Āhavamalla. But there must be some mistake about this. It is, indeed, in accordance with the transcripts in Carn.-Désa Inscrs., which represent Plava as the sixth year, and Sōbhakrit as the seventh. But those transcripts are themselves undeniably wrong on that point (see page 488 above, note 4).

CHAPTER VI.

THE HOYSALAS OF DORASAMUDRA.

Chapter VI.

The Hoysalas of

The Hoysalas, whose family name appears in the various forms of Poysala, Poysana, Hoysala, and Hoysana, claimed, like the Râshtra-kûtas and various other great families, to belong to the lineage of Yadu, in the Sômavamśa or Lunar Race. On the basis of this claim, they usually styled themselves Yâdava-kul-âmbara-dyumanî, "suns in the sky which is the family of the Yâdavas." And, in connection with Dvâravatî, Dvâravatî, or Dvârakâ,—the modern Dwârkâ, at the western extremity of Kâthiâwâd,—which was the legendary capital of Krishna, who was an incarnation of the god Vishnu, born in the same lineage, they assumed the hereditary title of Dvârâvatî-puravar-âdhîśvara, "supreme lord of Dvârâvatî, the best of towns." Their Purânic genealogy, which is presented first in a record of A. D. 1117,¹ was probably devised in the time of Vishnuvardhana, who brought the family prominently to the front. And, in connection with it, the origin of the family-name is explained as follows:²—In the lineage of Yadu, there was born a certain Sala. In company with a Jain ascetic, who was versed in all the science of incantation, he was worshipping the goddess Padmâvatî of Sasâkapura, with a view to bringing her into their power, and so acquiring sovereignty for Sala.³ A tiger sprang out, threatening to interrupt and spoil the efficacy of their rites. On the appeal of the ascetic, who cried out "poy, Sala,—slay, O Sala!" Sala slew the tiger. And, from this exclamation and the slaughter of the tiger, he and his descendants acquired the name of Poysala, and the crest or banner, or both, bearing the representation of a tiger.⁴ Also,⁵ because, when the goddess conferred her boon, the season of spring was at the height of its beauty, Sala gave her the name of Vâsantikâdevî, and continued to worship her under that appellation, by which she is mentioned in various other records as the family-goddess.¹

Such is the myth that is presented in the records. But no attempt is made to give the lineal descent from Sala to the historical members of the family. He is, doubtless, nothing but an eponymous hero, whose existence was invented, when the pedigree was being manufactured, simply to explain a somewhat peculiar name. And the historical genealogy stands as shewn in the table on page 493 below. The town with which the historical authority of the Hoysalas was first connected, — in the case of Ballāla I., by a later record; but by contemporaneous records in the case of Vishṇuvardhana, — is Velāpura or Belāpura,² which is the modern Belūr, the chief town of the Belūr tāluka in the Hassan District, Mysore.³ But in the time of Vishṇuvardhana the seat of government was moved to Dorasamudra,⁴ which is the modern Halēbīd, about ten miles east by north from Belūr. From the story about Sala and the Jain ascetic, from the statement that Vinayāditya owed his rise to power to a Jain teacher named Śāntidēva, from the mention of Vishṇuvardhana's wife, Śāntaladēvī, as a lay disciple of a Jain teacher named Prabhāchandra, and from the specification of his minister Gaṅgarāja, and of Hulla, a minister of Narasiṃha I., as two out of three very special promoters of the Jain faith, it is plain that the Hoysalas were originally Jains by religion. But it is said that they were subsequently converted to the Vaishṇava faith.⁵ And this is borne out by the assertion that Vira-Ballāla II. acquired the sovereignty by the favour of the god Nārāyaṇa or Vijaya-Nārāyaṇa; and by the description of Polālva, a minister of the same king and of Narasiṃha II., as an eminent leader among the Vaishṇavas.

The earliest mention of Hoysalas is to be found in an inscription at Kaliyūr in the Tirumakūḍu-Narasipur tāluka of the Mysore District,⁶ dated in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1006, of the Parābhava saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 929 (current); the record appears to mention a certain Apramēya, "lord of the Kotta maṇḍala," an officer of the Chōla king Rājārājadēva, and to tell us that he defeated a Hoysala minister named Nāganna, and pursued or repulsed the Hoysalas in war. But the first historical person in the family of Dorasamudra, — beyond whom the records do not carry back the pedigree, — is the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vinayāditya, whose wife was ² The name appears also as Belupura; but apparently only for metrical convenience (e.g., Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XI. p. 240, text line 21).

³ Lat. 13° 9'; long. 75° 54'.

⁴ This name occasionally appears as Dhōrasamudra, with the aspirated dh (e.g., P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 123, line 47, and No. 148, line 12; and Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XI. p. 240, text line 21). Which form is the more correct one, depends upon whether the first component of the name represents dvāra or dhrva. — It would seem that the form Dvārasamudra sometimes occurs. But I cannot quote an actual instance of it just now.

Chapter VI.

The Hoysālas of

Keleyabbe or Keleyaladēvi. He is represented as having been born at Śaśapura, i.e. the Śaśakapura or Śaśakapurī which is mentioned in the myth about Śaśa. And he is said to have owed his rise to power to service done to a Jain teacher named Śāntidēva.¹ No records actually referable to his own time have come to light. But a date is furnished for him by an inscription at Sindigere in Mysore,² which, written in A. D. 1137, states that, as Mahāmandalēśvara, he ruled all the territory included between the Koṅkaṇ, the Bhādadavayal province or district, Talakāḍ, and Sāvimala; and that on Phālguna śukla 3 of the Sarvajit samvatsara, apparently coupled, and, if so, by mistake, with Śaka-Samvat 961, in his presence, his wife gave a girl named Adekavve in marriage to the Dandandya Mariyāne, and conferred on the latter the lordship of Sindigere in the Āsandi district or province. The corresponding English date appears to be, approximately, the 20th February, A. D. 1048.³ The discrepancy between the samvatsara and the Śaka year of course detracts somewhat from the value of the date, which must have been taken from some family archive. But the date is a perfectly possible one. The record may, therefore, be accepted, as fixing the period of Vinayāditya with sufficient closeness. And, at the time established by it, he must have been a feudatory of the then reigning Chōla king. The same record would give him the biruda of Tribhuvanamalla; but this seems to be only borrowed from the fact that that biruda did belong to Viṣṇuvardhana and his son and grandson. So, also, the description of the boundaries of the territory which, it says, Vinayāditya governed, appears to be largely borrowed from the boundaries of the territory which was first acquired in full by Viṣṇuvardhana.

Ereyāṅga.

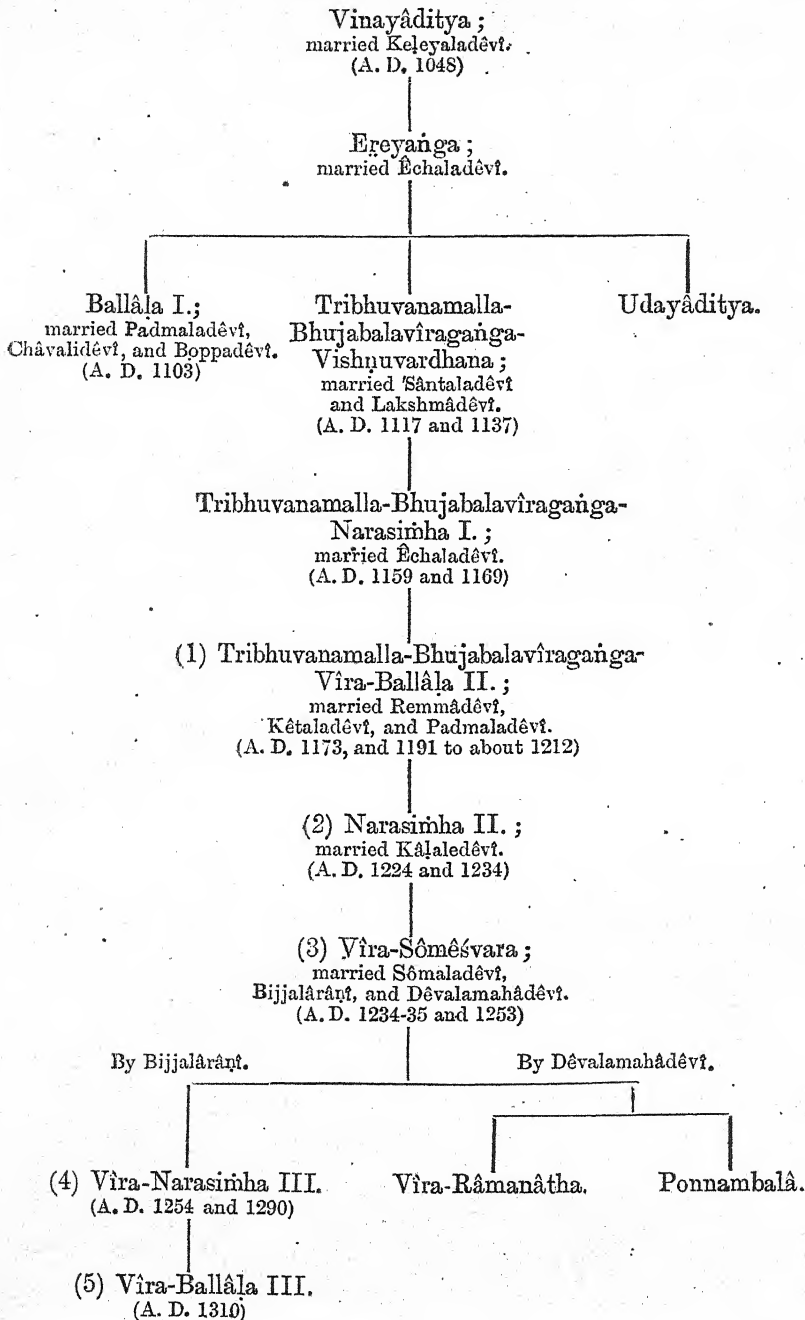

The son of Vinayāditya and Keleyabbe was Ereyāṅga, whose wife was Ēchaladēvi.⁴ The Sindigere inscription of A. D. 1137 would give him the biruda of Vīra-Gaṅga; but this seems to be only borrowed from one of the birudas of Viṣṇuvardhana. No records of his time have come to light. But, that he succeeded his father in the government, and was a feudatory of either Sōmēśvara I., Sōmēśvara II.,

³ I take the samvatsara to be stated correctly; and I adjust the Śaka year to it by the southern luni-solar system, according to which it coincided with Śaka-Samvat 969 expired or 970 current. By the mean-sign system, Sarvajit coincided with Ś.S. 967, partly as a current and partly as an expired year. It seems, therefore, just possible that the original has not been read correctly. But, on the other hand, the habitual use of the mean-sign system had ceased before this time, in Southern India.—Another date for Vinayāditya is perhaps given by the Nirgunda inscription (Mysore Inscriptions, p. 307), which connects with the name of Viṣṇuvardhana the Anala or Nala samvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Samvat 987 by mistake for 998 expired or 999 current. The date is an impossible one for Viṣṇuvardhana. But it has somewhat the appearance of a correct date for Vinayāditya, mistakenly quoted in connection with his grandson.

or Vikramāditya VI., is indicated by the statement that he was "the strong staff of the arm of the Chālukya king."¹ Later records say that, in a conquest of the north, he took Dhārā, the stronghold of the lords of Mālava, which had been made prosperous by king Bhōja;¹ and that he burnt that town, struck fear into the camp or city of the Chōlas, laid waste Chakragotta, and broke the power of Kalinga.² This is possible, if he was employed as a general by the Western Chālukya sovereign; but it is equally likely that the statement is simply an invention of poets.

Ballāla I.

By his wife Ēchaladēvi, Ereyānga had three sons,—Ballāla I., Vishnuvardhana, and Udayāditya. Of the eldest of them, Ballāla I., the Sindigere inscription of A. D. 1137³ tells us that he ruled at Bēlāpura, i.e. Bēlūr; that he wedded three sisters, Padmaladēvi, Chāvalidēvi, and Boppadēvi, who were daughters of a second Danḍa-nāyaka Mariyāne, and were highly accomplished in the sciences, and in singing and dancing;⁴ and that, as a marriage-gift, he conferred the lordship of Sindigere on the second Mariyāne, on Kārttika śukla 10 of the Svabhānu saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1025 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 13th October, A. D. 1103. And the Gadag inscription of A. D. 1192 tells us that he overthrew a certain Jagaddēva,⁵ who may be an ancestor of, or possibly even identical with, the Śāntara prince Jagaddēva of Patti-Pombuchchapura, who has been mentioned in connection with the Western Chālukya kings Perma-Jagadēkamalla II. and Taila III.

Vishnuvardhana.

Ballāla I. was followed by his younger brother, the Mahāmaṇḍa-lēśvara Vishnuvardhana, whose name appears also in the forms of Vishnu, Bittidēva, and Bittiga,⁶ and who had the special virudas of Tribhuvanamalla and Bhujabala-Vīra-Gaṅga, and some others, derived from his conquests, such as Talakāḍu-gonda, and Kāñchī-gonda, “the taker of Talakāḍu and Kāñchī.” One of his wives was Śāntaladēvi, daughter of the Piriya-perṇade Mārasingayya: in the Bēlūr record of A. D. 1117, she is described as the piriy-arasi or “senior queen,” and paṭṭa-mahādēvi or “crowned queen-consort;” another record states that she was “perfect in song, music, and dancing;”⁷ she was a lay disciple of the Jain teacher Prabhāchandrasiddhāntadēva; and she died on Chaitra śukla 5 of the Virōdhikrit saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1053 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 6th March, A. D. 1131.⁸ Another was Lakshmādēvi⁹ or Lakumādēvi,¹⁰ who was the mother of Narasimha I. And the relations between them seem to have been not very comfortable: for, Śāntaladēvi was styled *savati-gandhakasti*¹¹ and udvṛitta-savati-gandhavāṇe,¹² “a rutting elephant towards ill-mannered co-wives ;” and the name was perpetuated by the Jain temple named Savati-gandhavâraṇa-Jinâlaya and Savati-gandhahasti-basadi which she built at ‘Sraṇa-Belgola.’¹ The earliest authentic date for Vishṇuvardhana is Chaitra śukla 5 of the Hēmalambin saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1039 (expired), corresponding, approximately, to the 10th March, A. D. 1117, which is furnished by a copper-plate grant, of his own time, from Bêlūr in Mysore.² The latest is Pausa śukla 10, the day of the uttarāyana-samkrānti or winter solstice, of the Pingala saṃvatsara, Ś.-S. 1060 (current), corresponding, approximately, to the 24th December, A. D. 1137, which is furnished by the Sindigere inscription also of his own time.³ The Bêlūr grant tells us that he first acquired the wealth of the Hoysala rule or dominions;⁴ that, pushing on so far as to take Talakād,⁵ he was the first to promote the race of Yadu to the rule or dominions of the Gaṅgas ; and that he burnt the capital city of the Gaṅgas. The meaning of this is, that he first brought his family into a really prominent position, by acquiring the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand province, which seems to have been then in the possession of the Chōla king, being ruled for him by feudatories, of whom three are mentioned by the names of Adiyama or Iḍiyama, Dāmōdara, and Narasiṃha or Narasiṃhavarman. And other records⁶ shew that this was accomplished by the agency of a Mahā-pradhāna and Dandandya named Gaṅgarāja, who plainly himself belonged to the Gaṅga stock, and that the conclusive battle was fought at Talakād. As regards the general conquests that are attributed to Vishṇuvardhana, the same record claims that in A. D. 1117 he had defeated the Pandyas (evidently of Nolambavāḍi), conquered the Tulu kings, destroyed the power of Jagaddēva,⁷ overthrown a prince named Narasiṃha (a feudatory of the Chōla king), subdued the Kala, Cheṅgiri,⁸ and Mala kings (apparently, the chiefs of the Malepas or Malapas, who were the people of the Malenāḍi or the territory along the Western

D. 1076, of the Anala or Nala saṃvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 987 by mistake for 998 (expired). But this is rendered impossible by, among other considerations, the intervening date of A. D. 1103 for Ballāla I. And, as I have already said (page 492 above, note 3), it seems to be very possibly a true date for his grandfather Vinayāditya, mistakenly quoted in connection with himself.

⁸ Mr. Rice here gives ‘Veṅgiri.’ In his Inscriptions at Sraṇa-Belgola, he gives the same form in No. 138 ; but ‘Beṅgiri’ in No. 144, and in Mysore Inscriptions, p. 308. I myself adopted, from him, these two alternative forms. But looking again at the photograph of the Sinda record at Paṭṭadakal (P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 67, line 27), where, alone, the first syllable is quite distinct, I think the name must be read ‘Cheṅgiri,’ as it was originally taken by me (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As Soc. Vol. XI. pp. 261, 270). In the earlier Kanarese characters, ch and b are sometimes very liable to confusion. But here there is a very marked difference between the ch in Cheṅgiri-Chēra-Chōla and the b in Norambavāḍi-Banavāḍe-Kaḍambale in the next line.

Ghauts), broken the power of Irumṅōla, made Talavanapura (i.e. Talakād) his own, accepted (by surrender) the Konkoṅga country, made Nolambavāḍi dependent on him, accepted the town of Kōlālapura, uprooted Kōvatūr (this, with Kōyatūr, which occurs elsewhere, is probably a shorter form of Kōyimuttūr, i.e. 'Coimbatore'), shaken the foundations of Tereyūr, passed over Vallūr, caused the town of Kāñchī to tremble, and punished the Malapas. A record of A. D. 1123¹ states that he had subjugated the Gaṅgavāḍi province by reducing fortresses of the three kinds,— on the plains, on hills, and surrounded by water, — at Talakād, Nilagiri, Koṅgu, Naṅgali, Kōlāla, Tereyūr, Kōyatūr, Koṅgali, Uchchangī, Taleyūr, Pombuchcha, Vandhāsūrachauka, and Baleypattana.² A record of A. D. 1131³ claims that he was the sole preserver of the rule of Patti-Perumāla; that he burnt up Chakragoṭṭa; that he was like a fierce forest-fire to the territory of the Toṇḍa chieftains (i.e. the Pallavas); that he took Hānuṁgal; that he slew the Koṅgas; that he drove out Heñjeṛu; that he plundered Sāvimala; that he laid waste the ghauts; that he dragged (as captives) the Tuḷvas; that he was a terror to Gōyindavāḍi;⁴ that he pillaged Rāyarāyapura, i.e. Talakād, so renamed after the Chōḷa king Rājarāja;⁵ and that he made the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand obedient to his commands as far as Lökkigunḍi, which is Lakkunḍi near Gadag, in the Dhārvar District.⁶ Another record⁷ claims that he acquired the whole of the Male and Tuḷu countries; that Kumāranāḍu as well as Talakād, fell into his hands on his merely making preparations to march against them; that Kāñchī obeyed his commands; that the Koṅga kings gave up their elephants to him; that he destroyed the pride of the Chōḷa, Pāṇḍya, and Kēraḷa kings, and slew the Andhra king; that, like a gale, he dispersed the clouds which were the Lāta and Varāta kings;⁸ that he was like a forest fire to the Kadamba heroes; that he was the lord of Gaṇḍagiri; and that he was like a gale to the cloud which was Jayakēśin (the second of that name in the family of the Kādambas of Goa): and it enumerates the provinces and districts which he had seized, as Talakād, Koṅgu, Naṅgali,

² Before Talakād, the translation mentions 'Chakragoṭṭi.' But it seems that there must be some mistake about this. The word can hardly denote any place except Chakragoṭṭa, which, being in Mālwa, can have had nothing to do with the subjugation of the Gaṅgavāḍi province. And (though it is true there are other omissions also) no such name appears in the very similar enumeration which is given, e.g., in No. 144 of the same series of inscriptions.

Gaṅgavāḍi, Nalambavāḍi, Māsavāḍi, Huligere, Halasige, Banavāsi, and Hānūṅgal. Another record¹ adds, to the list of his conquests, Sīṅgamale, Rodda, Kollagiri,² Ballare, Polalu (probably Hoḷal in the Bellāry District), Baṅkāpur (in Dhārwar), Rājēndrapura, the Bayalu nāḍi, and the Belvola country, with Lökkigunḍi, as far as the river Kṛṣṇa. And the Sindigere inscription of A. D. 1137³ further claims that he squeezed, as if he held it in his hand, the southern Madhurapura, and that, by means of his general, he burnt Jananāthapura, i.e. Māyilāṅgai, the modern Mālingi, opposite Talakāḍ, on the other side of the river.⁴ A later record, of A. D. 1159-60,⁵ states that, with the dust of his army of foot-soldiers, he made muddy the waters of the Malaprahāriṇī, which is the modern Malaprabhā or Malparbhā, flowing through the south of the Belgaum District and along the north of the Nawalgund and Rōṇ tālukas of Dhārwar; and that, from east to west, he acquired by his sword the whole of the territory that was bounded on the north by the Kṛṣṇavēṇī, i.e. the Kṛṣṇa, into which the Malparbhā flows at Kapila-Sāṅgam in the Bijāpur District. And another later record, of A. D. 1192,⁶ says much the same thing, in stating that he invaded all the territory from his own abode up to the Belvola country, and washed his horse in the Kṛṣṇavēṇī; and it adds that, recognising that, among all princes, the Hoysala was the most impracticable to deal with, Permāli, i.e. the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI., treated Viṣṇuvardhana with just the same respectful behaviour which Viṣṇuvardhana displayed towards himself. When he thus carried his arms as far as the Kṛṣṇa, he seems to have been in conflict, not so much with Vikramāditya VI. himself, who is recognised in the records as his paramount sovereign, as with the Sinda feudatories of the Western Chālukya king. And, though he may really have penetrated as far as the Kṛṣṇa, still his expedition does not seem to have been quite as successful as the records of his own family claim: for, the Sinda records maintain that, at the request or command of Vikramāditya VI., Āchugi II. pursued and prevailed against the Hoysalas; and also that Permādi I. went to the mountain passes of the "marauder" Bittiga,—besieged Dōrasamudra,—pursued him till he arrived at and took his city of Bēlupura,—drove him on further to the mountain pass of Vāhādi,—and thus seized upon his royal power.⁷ Some of the successes attributed to Viṣṇuvardhana are undoubtedly fictitious or hyperbolical: for instance, it is impossible,—unless he may have been employed, on distant expeditions, as a general of Vikramāditya VI.,—that he can have had anything to do with Chakragotta in Mālwa, and with the Lāta province in Gujarāt; it is not likely that he ever really went as far to the east as Vallûr and Kāñchî; his biruda of "taker of Kāñchî" is doubtless based upon nothing but the local defeat of the Chôla feudatories Adiyama or Idiyama, Narasimha, and Dāmôdara; and it is not probable that he held, for any appreciable length of time, any of the possessions of the Kādambas of Goa, or even of the Hāngal branch of that family. But there appear no reasons for refusing to accept the successes that are claimed for him in the Gaṅgavāḍi province, and in connection with places which can be identified and located in that neighbourhood. The only title connected with his name is that of Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara; and his feudatory position, first under Vikramāditya VI. and then under Sômēśvara III., is made clear, not only by this, but also by the description of him, in the Sindigere inscription of A. D. 1137, as Chālukya-maṇi-maṇḍalika-chūdāmaṇi or "crest-jewel among the feudatory chieftains of the jewel of the Chālukyas,"—by the use, in the same record, of the feudal expression tat-pādapadm-ōpajīvin, "subsisting like a bee on the water-lilies which are the feet (of the paramount sovereign),"—and by the formal preambles of the same record and of one of the Sravapa-Belgola inscriptions,¹ which distinctly mention Vikramāditya VI. as the paramount sovereign. At the same time, the terms which were used in speaking of his rule indicate plainly, not only that, like the Silāhāras of the Koṅkan and of Karād, the Rattas of Saundatti, the Kādambas of Hāngal and of Goa, the Sindas of Yelburga, and the Guttas of Guttal, the Hoysālas belonged to the class of the more powerful Mahāmāṇḍalēśvaras who enjoyed a certain amount of independence and exercised much freedom of action, but also that Vishṇuvardhana himself aimed at, and probably even enjoyed, still greater power than was conceded to his peers; for, while most of his records shew simply the use of the technical expression of intermediate rank and authority, belonging properly to him and to the princes of the other families mentioned above,² a few of them disclose the fact that, even though he did not assume any higher title than that of Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara, he occasionally described his authority by the technical expression of paramount sovereignty.³ The records usually describe him as ruling over the Gaṅgavāḍi ninety-six-thousand province,⁴ the boundaries of which seem to be defined by the Bêlûr record of A. D. 1117, which says that then, at Vêlâpura, after having established the Hoysala power by marching to Talakâḍ and burning the capital city of the Gaṅgas and acquiring their possessions, he was ruling all the territory included between the lower ghaut of Naṅgali on the east, Koṅgu, Chêra, and Anamale on the south, the Bârakanûr pass through the ghauts to the Koṅkan on the west, and Sâvimale on the north.¹ And a record of A. D. 1127² states that he was then ruling that province at Yâdavapura, which, Mr. Rice says, is the modern Mēlukôte, in Mysore. But a record of A. D. 1132³ claims that he was then ruling, at Dôrasamudra, over the Gaṅgavâdi ninety-six-thousand, the Nôlambavâdi thirty-two-thousand, the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, and the Hânunṅal five-hundred. And the Sindigere inscription of A. D. 1137 states that then, at Dôrasamudra, he was still ruling the Nôlambavâdi and Banavâsi provinces, in addition to the Gaṅgavâdi territory. And one of the Sinda records⁴ incidentally enumerates the countries, over which he had ruled, as Chengiri, Chêra, Chôla, Malaya, Male, the seven Tuḷus, Kolla, Pallava, Koṅgu, Nôlambavâdi, Banavâsi, Kaḍambale, and Hayve. A most valuable servant to him appears to have been the Mahâpradhâna and Dandandiyakâ or Hiriyâ-Dandandiyakâ Gaṅgarâja, of the Gaṅga family, already mentioned as the person through whose agency he acquired the Gaṅgavâdi province.⁵ This officer is mentioned as one of three special promoters of the Jain religion,—the other two being Râya, a minister of the Western Gaṅga king Râchamalla, and Huḷla, a minister of Vishṇuvardhana's son Narasiṃha I.⁶ And we are also told that he restored the ruined Jain temples of the Gaṅgavâdi province,⁷ which had possibly been laid waste at the time when the Chôlas invaded the Belvola country, and destroyed the Jain temples there, in the reign of the Western Châlukya king Sômesvara I. He is constantly mentioned in terms which describe him as the chief support of Vishṇuvardhana's rule.⁸ It was he who, in securing the ancient possessions of the Gaṅgas for Vishṇuvardhana, by ousting the Tigulas or Tamil people who then held them,—i. e. the imported followers of the Chôla invaders,—defeated Adiyama or Idiyama, a feudatory of the Chôla, who, when encamped at Talakâd, refused to give up quietly the territory which the Chôla king had entrusted to him.⁹ It was he, again, who actually put to flight Dâmôdara and Narasiṃhavarman, and all the other feudatories of the Chôla above the ghauts, and thus made the country subject to the sole authority of Vishṇuvardhana; in recognition of which, the latter gave him the district or town of Gôvinda-vâdi and the village of Tippûr.¹ And he appears to have on one occasion, in or just before A.D. 1118, led a successful night attack against the forces of Vikramâditya VI. himself, when they were encamped, under the command of twelve feudal chiefs, at a place named Kannegâl; in recognition of which Vishṇuvardhana presented him with the village of Parama, on the north-east of Sravaṇa-Belgola.²

The next name on the list is that of Udayâditya, the younger brother of Vishṇuvardhana. He is, however, only mentioned as one of the sons of Eṇyaṅga.³ No historical facts are stated in connection with him. And it seems altogether unlikely that he had any part in the government of the Hoysala territory.

Narasimha I.

Vishṇuvardhana, then, was followed by his son, the Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Narasimha I., whose name appears also in the forms of Nrisimha and Nârasimha. He, again, had the special birudas of Tribhuvanamalla and Bhujabala-Vîra-Gaṅga; and he was also styled Pratâpa-Hoysala. His wife, from whom Vîra-Ballâla II. was born, was Êchaladêvi.⁴ That he actually succeeded, as Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara, to the government of the Hoysala territory, is shewn by one of the Sravaṇa-Belgola records, which states that he ruled over the dakshina-mahî-maṇḍala or "territory or province of the southern land,"⁵—meaning probably all the country to the south of the Wardâ and of the Tuṅgabhadra after the confluence of the Wardâ with it.⁶ Dates for him in A. D. 1127 and 1135, during his father's lifetime, are furnished for him by inscriptions at Tippûr and Bannûr.⁷ But the earliest date for him as Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara is contained in one of the Sravaṇa-Belgola records,⁸

⁸ op.cit. No. 138. — Mr. Rice has found another date for him, in A. D. 1171, from Inscriptions at Sravaṇa-Belgola, No. 81 (see the Intro. p. 54). But the Narasimha and is in the month Pausa, falling in December, A. D. 1159, of the Pramâlin samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 1081 (expired). A later date for him, probably in the month Vaisâkha (April-May), falling in A. D. 1169, of Saka-Samvat 1091 (expired) is furnished by an inscription at Sattûru.¹ The earlier of these dates falls in the period when the possession of the Western Châlukya kingdom was in dispute between Taila III. and Bijjala; and it is very likely that the Hoysala prince was then practically independent: the later date falls in the reign of Bijjala's son Sôvidêva. He is said to have carried his standards as far north as the peaks of Dêvagiri,² which is possible, if he was employed as a general, under one of the Western Châlukya or the Kalachurya kings, against the then growing power of the Yâdavas of Sênpadêsa; but the statement remains to be verified. And he is described as "as the taker of Talakâd, Kongu, Naingali, Nolambavâdi, Banavâsi, and Hânurâgal;"³ this, however, plainly rests entirely upon the successes of his father, as the records indicate nothing necessitating a fresh reduction of those places by Narasimha himself.⁴ An important officer under him was the Mahâpradhâna, Sarvâdhikârin, Hiriya-Bhândâri, and Dandandâyaka, Hulla, Hullapa or Hullanayya,⁵ who has been already mentioned⁶ as one of three special promoters of the Jain religion. Another record mentions the Mahâpradhâna, Sarvâdhikârin, and Sênâdhipati, the Dandânayaka Lakmaya, with the date of A. D. 1169.

Narasimha I. was followed by his son Ballâla II., more usually called Vira-Ballâla, who at first was a Mahâmandalêsvara like his ancestors, but afterwards established himself as an independent king. He, again, had the special virudas of Tribhuvanamalla and Bhujabala-Vira-Gaṅga. And from the commencement of his career he was called Pratâpa-Hoysala and Yâdava-Nârâyana. An inscription at Kaulûr, near Koppal in the Nizâm's Dominions,⁷ mentions, as his piriy-arasi or senior wife, a certain Remmâdêvî, who, partly because of her name, and partly because the record speaks of the Mâsavâdi district, in which Kaulûr was situated, as her own (native) district, probably belonged to the family of the Pemmâdi or Hemmâlidêva, prince of Mâsavâdi, who is mentioned in a Sravâṇa-Belgoḷa inscription of A. D. 1181, and in the Hirê-Wadawattî inscription of A. D. 1218 which is noticed at the end of this account of Vira-Ballâla II.:⁸ it records that, in the month mentioned there is styled Pratâpa-Chakravartin. Therefore, he must be Narasimha II.; and the Khara samvatsara, which is quoted, must be Saka-Samvat 1154 current, = A. D. 1231-32.

Chapter VI.

Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A. D. 1179, of the Vikârin saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1102 current), he and Remmâdevî joined in making a grant of land at Kaulûr, in the Māsavâdi district, to the temple in which the record stands; and, the saṃvatsara being cited as the fourth year of the Kaḷachufya king Saṅkama, it shews that Saṅkama was the recognised sovereign of Vira-Ballāla, whom it styles Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara. And an inscription of A. D. 1203, at Alawaṇḍi, in the same neighbourhood,¹ mentions another piriy-arasi, also styled paṭṭa-mahādēvi, named Kētaladēvi, who made an allotment to a local god, out of the hejjuṅka-tax of the Masavâdi district, and thus seems to have been some connection of the other wife, Remmâdevî; and, perhaps a son, born from her, named Billayya. But the son who succeeded him, Narasiṃha II., was born from a wife named Padmaladēvi.² The earliest date for Vira-Ballāla II. is supplied by an inscription at Bujagaṇḍana-pura in Mysore,³ which mentions him as a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, ruling at Dōrasamudra in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1173, of the Vijaya saṃvatsara, coupled with Saka-Saṃvat 1094 by mistake for 1095 (expired). And one of the Sravana-Belgola inscriptions⁴ mentions him as a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara ruling the dakṣiṇa-maṇḍala or "southern territory," with a date in the month Pausha, falling in December, A. D. 1181, of the Plava saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1104 (current). To the earlier period of his career belongs also the statement in the Nīrgunda inscription, that, as Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, he ruled over the Gaṅgavâḍi ninety-six-thousand at Dōrasamudra.⁵ Within the next ten years, however, he accomplished a very great change in his position. From his Gadag inscription of A. D. 1192,⁶ and from another record of his time, dated in A. D. 1202, at Annigere,⁷ we learn that, pushing on to the north of the Dhīrwār District, he defeated Brahma, the general of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara IV., Bhīllama, the Yādava king of Dēvagiri, and a certain Jaitrasīṃha, who may perhaps be, as was originally thought, Jaitagi I., the son of Bhīllama, but seems now more likely to be a minister of Bhīllama who is mentioned as Jaitasimha in a record at Gadag of A. D. 1191;¹ and that thus, according to the claim that is made for him in these records, by the favour of the god Nâ-âyaṇa he acquired the supremacy over the Kuntala country, and the universal sovereignty of the Western Châlukyās. This must have happened soon after June, A. D. 1191, when, as the record of that date at Gadag² shews, the country in that neighbourhood was in Bhillama's possession. He then, as is shewn by his own Gadag inscription and subsequent records, assumed the paramount epithets and titles of saṁastabhucandśraya, śrīprithirīvalluḥa, Mahārājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaṭṭāraka, and the style of Pratāpa-Chakravartin, Bhujabala-Chakravartin, Bhujabalapratāpa-Chakravartin, Hoysala-Chakravartin, Bhujabalapratāpa-Hoysala-Chakravartin, and Yādava-Chakravartin.³ And he established a reckoning of his own, running from the first year of his reign as paramount sovereign, which, the records shew, was the Virōdhikṛit saṁvatsara, 'Saka-Saṁvat 1114 current, = A. D. 1191-92.⁴ This position he maintained; and it was enjoyed also, though with a more limited extent of territory, by his successors. But he certainly did not acquire the whole of the Kuntala country, and the entire possessions that had belonged to the Western Châlukyās: the northern boundary of the Hoysala kingdom, thus established, was evidently the Malparbhā river, and the Kṛishṇa from the point where the Malparbhā joins it: for, the records of Vīra-Ballāla, in that neighbourhood, are found at Anṇigere in the Nawalgund tāluka, Narēgal in the Rōṇ tāluka, and Balagānūr, Gadag, Mulgund, Méyuṇḍi, and Nāgāvi, in the Gadag tāluka, of the Dhārwar District, and nowhere on the north of the rivers mentioned; while, on the north of those rivers, inscriptions of the Dēvagiri-Yādava kings Bhillama and Jaitugi I., the dates of which fall during the reign of Vīra-Ballāla II., exist, or were extant some fifty years ago, at Bhairwādgi and Managōli in the Bāgewādi tāluka, and Hippargi in the Sindagi tāluka, of the Bijāpur District, and at

⁴ The following instances are in accordance with this:—(1) In an inscription at the temple of Gachchina-Basappa at Anṇigere in the Dhārwar District (Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 289; verified from an ink-impression), the Piṅgala saṁvatsara ('Saka-Saṁvat 1120 current) is cited as his seventh year; the month is Mārgaśīrsha. (2) In the inscription, mentioned above, at the temple of Amṛitēśvara at Anṇigere (ibid. p. 301; verified from an ink-impression), the Dundubhi saṁvatsara ('S.-S. 1125 current) is cited as his twelfth year; the month is Jyēsthā. (3) In an inscription at Balagānūve in Mysore (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 197; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 137), the Krōdhana saṁvatsara ('S.-S. 1128 current) is cited as his fifteenth year; the month is Chaitra. (4) In another inscription at Balagānūve (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 198; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 137), the Prabhava saṁvatsara ('S.-S. 1130 current) is cited as his seventeenth year; the month is Kārttika. And (5) in an inscription at the temple of Mahābalēśvara at Nāgāvi in the Dhārwar District (Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 334), the Prajāpati saṁvatsara ('S.-S. 1134 current) is cited as his twenty-first year; the month is Kārttika.—I expect that the majority of his dates will be found to be in accordance with the above. But two instances to the contrary are known to me. In an inscription

Bijāpur itself. That Bhillama had held, as was only to be expected, the country south of the Malparbhā and the Kṛishṇa, as well as the northern provinces, is shewn by an inscription of A. D. 1189, the third year of his reign, at Anūgere, and by his Gadag inscription of June, A. D. 1191. Vīra-Ballāla must have been, nominally at least, then a feudatory of Bhillama. But his defeat of the Western Chālukya general Brahma must have taken before that date. And it was doubtless that success that put him in a position to measure his strength against that of Bhillama himself. The final decisive battle between the Hoysalas and the Yādavas, which must be placed soon after June, A. D. 1191, is located in the neighbourhood of Gadag by the Anūgere inscription of A. D. 1202, which, describing Vīra-Ballāla as "a submarine fire in the ocean which was the army of Bhillama," tells us that, though Bhillama held himself to be unconquerable on account of his great array of elephants and horses and foot-soldiers, Vīra-Ballāla pursued him from Soratūr (twelve miles south of Gadag) to Lokkiguṇḍi (Lakkuguṇḍi, six miles east of Gadag), and there destroyed his forces. The record seems also to state that Bhillama himself was killed on this occasion; and, as the Virōdhikrit samvatsara, A. D. 1191-92, was the first year of the reign of Jaitugi I. on the north of the boundary line, as well as of Vīra-Ballāla on the south of it, it appears not unlikely that such was really the case. A reference to the same battle is made in a Harihar inscription of A. D. 1224, of the time of Narasimha II.,¹ which claims that the army of the Sēuṇa king,² consisting of two hundred thousand men with twelve thousand cavalry, was pursued by Vīra-Ballāla from Soratūr to the banks of the Kṛishṇavēṇi, and was there destroyed. This latter record adds that, in the same campaign, when, after the pursuit, he had halted and reformed his forces, Vīra-Ballāla II. reduced all the forts between Soratūr, Erambarage (Yelburga, in the Nizām's Dominions), Kuṛugōḍ (near Bellāry), Gutti (about fifty miles east of Bellāry), Bellittage (possibly 'Belatti' or 'Belhuttee,' near Lakshmēshwar, close to which is the hill-fort of Śrīmantagad), Rattapalli (Rattēhalli, in the Kōḍ tāluka), and "the proud" Virātana-kōṭe (Hāngal). And an inspection of the map will shew that the possession of these strongholds made his power at the temple of Veṅkātaramaya at Mēyurḍi in the Dhārwar District (Carn. Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. II. p. 284), the Anala or Nala samvatsara (S.-S. 1119 current) is cited, not as his sixth year as given in the transcript (to make it accord with the other dates), but, as I find from the ink-impression, as his fifth year; the month is Vaiśākha. And, in another of the Baḷagāṇve records (P. S. and O.-C. Inscrs. No. 195; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 162), the Dundubhi samvatsara (S.-S. 1125 current; really his twelfth year) is cited as his eleventh year; the month is Chaitra. These two instances require the Paridhāvin samvatsara, S.-S. 1115 current, as his first year.

secure over all the southern part, north of Mysore itself, of the dominions which had passed from the Kalachuryas to the last Western Chálukya king Sômêśvara IV., and from the latter to Bhíllama of Dêvagiri. When the Gadag inscription of A. D. 1192 was written, Vîra-Ballála's vijaya-skandhâvâra or victorious camp was still at Lakkundi. And a Balagámve inscription, dated slightly later in the same year,¹ speaks of that same town as the nelerîdu or capital, at which, having accomplished his victories in the north, he was then reigning. It was probably early in A. D. 1193 that he started on the tour in the course of which the forts in question were reduced. A record of A. D. 1195² mentions him as then reigning at Erambarageyakuppa; evidently in the course of this campaign. And the campaign was doubtless brought to an end in the month Āśvina (Sept.-Oct.) falling in A. D. 1196, of the Anala samvatsara, (Śaka-Samvat 1119 current), when, encamped at the Ānekere tank at Hāngal, he laid siege to the latter town.³ Another record, of his own time, states that he held the umbrella of southern sovereignty through the favour of the god Vijaya-Nārāyaṇa; that he took Uchchangī; and that, when the Pāṇḍya (of Nōlambavādi, where Uchchangī was situated) threw himself on his mercy, he restored him his kingdom:⁴ and, coupling this with a statement in one of the Sravaṇa-Belgōla records,⁵ it would seem that, during his absence on the campaign mentioned above, one of the Pāṇḍya chieftains of the Nōlambavādi province, named Kāmadêva, rebelled, and had to be forcibly reduced to submission. But, with this exception, his reign appears to have been free from internal troubles. Some of the records, indeed, describe him as "the taker of Talakāl, Kōngu, Nāngali, Nōlambavādi, Banavāsi, and Hānuṅgal," — to which list others add Gaṅgavādi, Lokkigundi, Kummata, and Erambarage; but it is plain that, as in the case of Narasiṃha I., this is derived mostly from the achievements of Viṣṇuvardhana. The records mention, as his feudatories and officials,—the Mahāpradhāna, Sarvādhikārin, and Dandandīyaka Bittimayya, with the date of A. D. 1175; the Mahāpradhāna and Dandandīyaka Gadada-Siṅgayya, with the date of A. D. 1184; the Mahāpradhāna, Sarvādhikārin, and Dandandīyaka Eṇṇayya or Eṇṇa, who in December, A. D. 1192, was in charge of the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Sāntalige thousand; the Mahāpradhāna, Sarvādhikārin, and Hirīya-Bhaṇḍāri Hullayya, who had also held office under Narasiṃha I.; the Mahāpradhāna, Sarvādhikārin, and Paramaviśvāsin, or most confidential agent, the Dandandīyaka Armatala, of Kūrūr, who is described as ruling⁶ over the Tāraṇāḍ, Hadināḍ, and Kunāḍ districts, at Sātārūr, in A. D. 1195;

the Kādamba Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kāmadēva, who was ruling at Hānumgal in A. D. 1196; the Mahāpradhāna and Danḍandāyaka, the kumḍra or junior Lakshma, Lakshmidhara, or Lakhmīdēva, with the date of A. D. 1197; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Rāyadēvarasa, "lord of Āṣaṭimayūrapura, the best of towns," who, having become a minister, was governing at Hallaharada-koppa in A. D. 1199; the Samasta-bāhattara-niyōgādhipati and Danḍandāyaka Amṛtēśvara, with the date of A. D. 1202; the Mahāpradhāna and Danḍandāyaka Mallāya, with the date of A. D. 1203; the Danḍandāyaka Kamathada-Mallīṣeṭṭi, who, in the same year, was governing the Sāntalige seventy¹ and the Nāgarakhaṇḍa seventy in the Banavāsi province; a certain Mādhavayya, who was governing the Belvola three hundred in A. D. 1207; and the Danḍandāyaka Ballayya, who was in charge of the royal city of Annigere in A. D. 1208. Also, the Harihar inscription of the time of Narasiṃha II., dated in A. D. 1224, mentions a Mahāpradhāna and Danḍandāyaka Polāḷa, who, it says, was a minister of Vīra-Ballāḷa II. as well as of Narasiṃha II., and who probably had much to do with the successes that were achieved by the first of his two masters. The latest date on record for Vīra-Ballāḷa II. is the full-moon day of the month Kārttika of the Prajāpati samvatsara, cited as his twenty-first year.² The year is Śaka-Samvat 1134 current. And the corresponding English date is, approximately, the 23rd October, A. D. 1211. It is probable that he died soon after this date. For, an inscription at Gadag, dated early in A. D. 1213,³ shews that the Dēvagiri-Yādava king Siṅghana had then recovered some at least of the territory south of the Malparbhā and the Kṛishṇa.

Narasiṃha II.

Vīra-Ballāḷa II. was succeeded by his son Narasiṃha II., who maintained the position of an independent king, but plainly lost most, if not all, of the territory north of the Wardā and the Tuṅgabhadra.

² From the Nāgavi inscription (see page 503 above, note 4, No. 5).—The Ballāḷa, who married Tulavaladēvi, daughter of the Gutta prince Vīra-Vikramāditya II., mentioned in P. S. and O. C. Inscr. No. 231,—which record is dated in Chaitra, falling in A. D. 1213, of the Śrīmukha samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1136 (current), and is, I have now ascertained, at Haralāhalli in the Dhārwar District, and not at Halēbīḷ,—is not the Hoysala king, but a son of a feudatory chief named Siṃha, Siṅga, or Siṅgidēva, lord of the Sāntaḷi maṇḍala, and belonging to the Śūryavaṃśa or Solar Race.—The name Ballāḷa seems to have become of rather favourite use during this period. And it occurs in the Māsavādi family itself, which has been mentioned on page 501 above. I take this from the inscription at the temple of Sōmēśvara at Hirē-Waḍawaṭṭi near Lakshmēshwar, which gives the following account (quoted from an ink-impression):—Among the lords of the Māsavādi vishaya, born in the Yādava family, there was Pemmāḍi. His son was Kuppa, whose wife was Remmāḍēvi. Their son was Ballāḷa, who married Lakshmi, Lakmāḍēvi, Lakhmāḍēvi, or Lakhmalāḍēvi. And their sons were Sōmēśvara or Sōyidēva, and Virūpāksha. The record registers grants that were made, in the Māsavādi hundred-and-forty, by the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Ballāḷadēva, his prīty-arasi Lakmāḍēvi, and their son Sōmēśvara, to the gods Ballāḷēśvara, Remmēśvara, and Kēśavadēva, of Vodaḍaṭṭi, in the month Vaiśākha, falling in A. D. 1218, of the Bahudhānya samvatsara (Śaka-Samvat 1141 current), wrongly cited as the nineteenth, instead of the ninth, year of the Dēvagiri-Yādava king Siṅghana II.

His name, again, appears also as Nârasimha and Nṛisimha. And a later record, of his son's time,¹ tells us that his wife, the mother of Sômêśvara, was Kâlaledêvî. Of this reign we have at present only three records. One is an inscription at Harihar in Mysore,² dated in the month Mâgha (Jan.-Feb.), falling in A. D. 1224, of the Svabhânu samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1145 (expired). The second is an inscription at Śravaṇa-Belgola,³ dated at the time of the winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1231, of the Khara samvatsara (S.-S. 1154 current). And the third is an inscription at Basarâl,⁴ dated in Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A. D. 1231, of the Jaya samvatsara, S.-S. 1157 (current). The Harihar and Śravaṇa-Belgola records give him the paramount epithets and titles of samastabhuvandśraya, śrîprithivîvallabha, Mahârajâdhirâja, and Paramêśvara; but the Basarâl inscription styles him Mahânanḍalêśvara. The Śravaṇa-Belgola record styles him Pratâpa-Chakravartin; and the Basarâl record, Niśāṅkpratâpa-Chakravartin. The Harihar and Basarâl records mention Dôrasamudra as his capital. In the Harihar and Śravaṇa-Belgola records, he is called "the uprooter of the Makara or Magara kingdom or sovereignty," and "the establisher of the Chôla kingdom or sovereignty;" and the Basarâl record claims that the valour of his arm broke the pride of the Sêvûṇa king. The Harihar record claims also that he was the king of the Male kings; that, like a thunderbolt, he cleft open the rock that was the Pândya king; and that he was a very Janârdana (Vishṇu) in destroying the demon Kaitabha in the form of the Kâḍava king. The same record mentions, as a person of considerable importance, the Mahâpradhâna and *Dandandya*ka Polâlva, the son of a certain Attirâja or Attarasa, born at Nâraṇapura in the Andhra country; it styles him Vaiśṇava-Chakravartin, or, freely, "an eminent leader among the Vaishṇavas;" it says that he was a minister of both Vira-Ballâla II. and Narasimha II., and that none others protected the Hoysala sovereignty as he did; and it records that he built the great temple at which the inscription is. And the Basarâl inscription mentions a hereditary minister, the *Dandandya*ka Harihara, of Adḍâyida, who, it says, was the person who actually defeated the Sêvûṇa troops when they had laid siege to some place in the Hoysala territory.

Narasimha II. was succeeded by his son Sômêśvara, whose name appears also as simply Sôma, and as Sôvidêva, and who was usually called Vira-Sômêśvara. Of his time, we have nine records. The earliest of them would appear to be an inscription at Badanâlû,⁵ which purports to say that he was reigning at Kannanûr, in the Chôla kingdom,—identified by Dr. Hultzsch with the village of that name five miles north of Srīraṅgam in the Trichinopoly District, Madras Presidency,¹ — in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1128, of the Sarvadhārin samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1151 (current). But this date, as also that of another record² which appears to say that he was reigning at Dōrasamudra in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1233, of the Hēmalambin samvatsara (S.-S. 1160 current), overlaps the latest date for his father. And the earliest consistent date for him is furnished by an inscription at Jōḍi-Basavanapura,³ which says that, having taken the Chōla kingdom, he was reigning there in the Vikārin samvatsara, S.-S. 1161 (expired), = A. D. 1139-40. Kaṇṇanūr is again mentioned as his capital in a record of A. D. 1250 at Rāyasettipura;⁴ and a copper-plate grant, now in the Bangalore Museum,⁵ which is dated in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1253, of the Paridhāvin samvatsara, S.-S. 1175 (current), mentions the same place by the name of Vikramapura,⁶ and speaks of it as “the great capital, which had been built, in order to amuse his mind, in the Chōla country, which he had conquered by the power of his arm.” The latest date for him is furnished by an inscription at Arakere,⁷ dated in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1254, of the Ānanda samvatsara (S.-S. 1177 current); and this record, citing the samvatsara as his twenty-first year, shews that the first year of his reign was the Jaya samvatsara, S.-S. 1157 current, = A. D. 1234-35. The records give him all the paramount titles,⁸ and style him Pratāpa-Chakravartin and Nīśaṅkapratāpa-Chakravartin. The copper-plate charter mentions Sōmaladēvī, daughter of Vittarasa, as his patnī-mahishī or crowned queen. But he had also a mahishī or queen named Vijjalā, Bijjalā, or Bijjalārāṇī, from whom his son and successor Narasiṃha III. was born.⁹ The Pāṇḍya records tell us that Srīraṅgam was taken from Sōmēśvara by the Pāṇḍya king Jaṭavarman, otherwise called Sundara-Pāṇḍyadēva;¹⁰ and also disclose the fact that he had another wife, of the Chālukya stock, named Dēvalamahādēvī, who bore him a son named Vīra-Rāmanātha, and a daughter named Ponnambalā;¹¹ Vīra-Rāmanātha appears to have held local authority under the Pāṇḍyas. The record of A. D. 1233 mentions, as a minister of Vīra-Sōmēśvara, the Mahāpradhāna and Paramaviśēśin, the Dandandayaka Harihara, who had previously held office under Narasiṃha II.; and it speaks of Vīra-Sōmēśvara as having fought against the “famous” Kṛṣṇa-Kandhara, i. e. the Yādava king Kṛṣṇa of Dēvagiri.

Vīra-Narasimha II.

Sōmēśvara was succeeded by his son Narasimha III., also called Vīra-Narasimha, whose name, again, appears also in the forms of Nārasimha, Nṛisimha, and Nārasinga. Of his time we have twelve records, all from Mysore. The earliest date for him is furnished by a copper-plate grant from Bêlûr,¹ and is in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1254, of the Ānanda saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1177 current). The latest is furnished by an inscription at Mālingi,² and is in the month Mārgasīra (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A. D. 1290, of the Vikṛiti saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1212 expired. The records give him the customary paramount epithets and titles, and style him Pratāpa-Chakravartin, and Niṣaṅkapatāpa-Chakravartin. And they represent him as reigning at Dōrasamudra. They mention a Mahāpradhāna and Dandandya named Perumālēdēva, also called Rānttarāya and Javanike-Nārāyaṇa, with dates in A. D. 1261, 1286, and 1290, who is said to have conquered and slain a king named Ratnapāla; and a minister named Chikka-Kēṭayya, who is said, in a record of A. D. 1277-78, to have just returned from a successful expedition with the army of the "eastern kingdom." But, with these exceptions, they disclose no history. One of the Bêlûr grants of A. D. 1279,³ makes local provision for, amongst other things, "the tax which had to be paid to the Turashkas," i.e. the Musalmān kings of Delhi, "by all people from the Kanarese country residing at Benares."

Vīra-Ballāla III.

Narasimha III. was succeeded by his son Ballāla or Vīra-Ballāla III. Of this reign, we have some eleven or twelve records; similarly, all from Mysore. The earliest of them is an inscription at Hemmaragāl,⁴ which furnishes for him a date in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1292, of the Khara saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 1213 (expired). And the latest unquestionable one is an inscription at Tigadahalli,⁵ which is dated in the month Mārgasīra (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A. D. 1137, of the Īśvara saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1260 (expired). The records give him all the customary paramount epithets and titles, and style him Pratāpa-Chakravartin; and they mention Dōrasamudra as his capital in A. D. 1310, 1316, and 1336. But it seems unlikely that he exercised much sovereign power after A. D. 1310. As will be seen in the next chapter, Allā-ud-dīn, the second of the Khiljī emperors of Delhi, had then already invaded the Dekkan, and had commenced and almost completed the conquest of the Yādavas of Dēvagiri. As yet, the Hoysalas had remained free from attack. But, in A. D. 1310, Allā-ud-dīn sent an army, under Malik Kāfur and Khwājā Hājī, to reduce Dōrasamudra. Leaving part of their forces at Paithan on the Gōdāvarī, Malik Kāfur and Khwājā Hājī continued their march to the south,—entered and laid waste the Hoysala kingdom,—engaged, defeated, and captured Vīra-Ballāla III.,—and took and despoiled his capital.¹ The complete subjugation of the Hoysala kingdom, and the annexation of it to the empire of Delhi, were not effected till A. D. 1327, in the reign of Muhammad Tughlak.² Meanwhile, it would appear, after his defeat and capture in A. D. 1310, Vîra-Ballâla III. was liberated, and continued, for a short time longer, the semblance of a reign, at the original capital of Bêlûr, rather than at Dôrasamudra; and it seems that, after the events of A. D. 1327, when Dôrasamudra is said to have been entirely demolished by the Musalmâns, he retired to Tonḍanûr,—the modern Tonḍûr near Seringapatam,—which continued to be the seat of an enfeebled power for about fifty years more under him and some successor.³ The power of the Hoysalas as a dynasty, however, was practically extinguished in A. D. 1310.

D. 1338, Bâhâ-ud-dîn, more commonly known by his original name of 'Koorhasip,' rebelled against his uncle, Muhammad Tughlak, and, being defeated, deserted his government of Sâgar, and fled to the Hoysala court; and that he was given up to the king by the then representative of the family, whom Ferishta calls Ballâlâdêva.

CHAPTER VII.

THE YADAVAS OF DEVAGIRI.

The Yādava kings of Dēvagiri were descended from a line of feudatory nobles, some of the members of which have already been mentioned in connection with the Rāshtrakūṭa and Western Chālukya kings. Their claim to be "Yādavas" probably rests on nothing but their Purāṇic genealogy, which appears first in a record of A. D. 1000, and must have been devised during the preceding century. And, since their original territory was called the Sēuṇa country, and the expression "the Sēuṇa king" is actually used to denote the first king Bhīllama,¹ and he is also described as rendering highly prosperous the rule of the family of "the Sēvaṇa (i.e. Sēuṇa) kings,"² they would undoubtedly be more correctly called Sēuṇas. But they were known as Yādavas to the Musalmān historians. So, also, the Hindū Pratāparudriya speaks of them as the Yālava kings of Sēvaṇa, i.e. of the Sēuṇa country.³ And the name has become so thoroughly well established, that it seems both unnecessary and undesirable to now set it aside in favour of simply a more technically correct appellation.

The early history of the family is to be found partly in epigraphic records, and partly in the introduction to Hēmādri's Vrata-khaṇḍa.⁴ The Purāṇic genealogy is perhaps given most fully by Hēmādri. Among epigraphic records, it is found first in the Saṅgamnēr copper-plate grant of the Mahāsāmānta Bhīllama II., dated in A. D. 1000,⁵ and finally in the Paiṭhaṇ grant of king Rāmachandra, dated in A. D. 1272.⁶ And the essence of it is as follows:—In the beginning of things, there was the god Viṣṇu; in connection with whom, the Yālavas claimed to belong to the Viṣṇuvarṇśa or race of Viṣṇu.⁷ From the water-lily that grew from Viṣṇu's navel, there sprang the god Brahman. His son was Atri. And his was Sōma, Chandra, or Indu, the Moon;⁸ whence the Yādavas belonged also to the Sômaṃśa or Lunar Race. The descent is then taken through various persons, until we come to Yadu, the founder of the Yādavaṃśa, or race of Yadu, in the Lunar Race. Hêmâdri, who professes to give an absolutely complete pedigree, then proceeds to name all the descendants of Yadu in the line to which the Yādavas of Dēvagiri belonged. The epigraphic records, however, do not aim at such completeness; and simply say that in the lineage of Yadu there was born that particular person with which each of them commences the genealogy.

Subâhu.

Coming to historical, or supposed historical, times, Hêmâdri says that there was a king named Sutâhu, who had four sons, among whom he divided the earth. This person, however, is not mentioned in any of the epigraphic records that have come to light.

Driḍhaprahâra.

According to Hêmâdri, the second son of Subâhu—(the others are not named)—was Driḍhaprahâra, who received, as his portion, the “southern land,” and established himself at a city named Śrīnagara. This person is mentioned in the Bassein grant of A. D. 1069,¹ which, however, says that he came from the city of Dvârâvatî, and implies that his capital was a town named Chandrâdityapura; as suggested by Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrajî,² this name is very possibly intended to denote the modern Chândôr in the Nâsik District. From an extract given by the Pandit, it seems that Driḍhaprahâra is mentioned in the Nâśakukalpa of Jinaprabhusûri.³

Sēṇachandra I.

According to the Vratākhaṇḍa and the Bassein grant of A. D. 1069, the son of Driḍhaprahâra was Sēṇachandra I., who is said to have founded a town named Sēṇapura.⁴ This person is the first member of the family who is mentioned in the Saṅgammêr grant of A. D. 1000, and in the Kalas-Budrûkh grant of A. D. 1025.⁵ And the former record says that he named both his territory and the people of it after himself,—a statement which will now be recognised as of importance in connection with the true appellation of his descendants. So, also, Hêmâdri says, more plainly, that, from his name, the territory was named Sēṇadêśa. And this appellation of it occurs in the Paithan grant of A. D. 1272.⁶

Dhâḍiyappa.

The son of Sēṇachandra I. was Dhâḍiyappa, according to the Kalas-Budrûkh grant, and probably the Saṅgammêr grant; Dhâḍiyasa, according to the MS. of the Vratākhaṇḍa; and Dvâḍiyappa, according to the Bassein grant of A. D. 1069: doubtless, the first of these three forms of his name is the correct one. The Bassein grant probably says¹ that he was born at Sindinêra, which, as pointed out by Pandit Bhagwanlal Indraji,² is the modern Sinnar, the chief town of the Sinnar tâluka in the Nâsik District.

⁴ ibid. p. 121.—Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrajî rendered the verse as saying that he “founded the town of Sēṇapura in the good Sindinêra.” But this seems rather wanting in sense; Sindinêra itself being, not a country, but a town,—the modern Sinnar in the Nâsik District. And the text appears, to me, rather intended to state that it was at Sindinêra that Sēṇachandra’s son was born.

Dhâdiyappa's son was Bhillama I. No historical facts are stated in connection with this person.

The son of Bhillama I. was Râja, according to the Saṅgamnêr, Bassein, and Kalas-Budrûkh grants, and Râjagi, according to the Vratākhaṇḍa.³ In connection with him, again, no historical facts are stated.

The son of Râja or Râjagi was a person whose name was Bâdagi according to Hêmâdri,—Vandiga according to the Saṅgamnêr grant,—and Vaddiga according to the Kalas-Budrûkh and Bassein grants; on the analogy of the name of one of the Râshtrakûta kings, the last seems to be the correct form. The Saṅgamnêr record states that he married Voddiyavva, daughter of a person named Dhôrappa, whom Prof. Kielhorn has proposed to identify with the Râshtrakûta king Dhruva.

According to Hêmâdri, the son of Vaddiga was a person whose name was Dhâdiyama according to the manuscripts, but whom Dr. Bhandarkar has preferred to look upon as more probably called Dhâdiyasa. He is not mentioned in the Saṅgamnêr, Kalas-Budrûkh, and Bassein grants.

According to the three copper-plate records, Vaddiga was succeeded by Bhillama II., who, however, according to Hêmâdri, came next after the Dhâdiyama mentioned just above: his precise relationship with his predecessor is not specified; the text, in each case, may mean either that he was born from Vaddiga (according to the copper-plate records) or from Dhâdiyama (according to Hêmâdri), or, equally well, that he simply came next in order after one or other of those two persons, and not necessarily that he was the son of either of them. The Kalas-Budrûkh record tells us that his wife was Lakshmi, and that she illumined both the Yâdava and the Râshtrakûta families; and the Bassein grant, speaking of her by the Prâkrit name of Lachchhiyavvâ, mentions her as a daughter of a person named Jhañjha, and as belonging to the Râshtrakûta lineage.⁴ The Saṅgamnêr grant, from the Ahmednagar District,⁵ is a record of Bhillama II. himself. It styles

him a Mahāśāmantā,—mentions him as a pious worshipper of the god Bhava (Śiva),—gives him the hereditary title of “supreme lord of the town of Dvārāvātī,” and describes him as born in the race of Viṣṇu,—and records that he granted to Brāhmaṇs a village situated just on the west of the modern Saṅgamnēr. The grant was made on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on the new-moon day of the month Bhādrapada of the Śārvarin saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 922 (expired). The English date would be the 2nd August, A.D. 1000, for the pūrṇimānta Bhādrapada, and the 31st August, for the amānta Bhādrapada; but there was no eclipse on either of these days. Coupled with his feudatory title, the date shews that Bhīllama II. was a vassal of the Western Chālukya king Iṛivabedaṅga-Satyāśraya.

Vēśū.

The son of Bhīllama II. was Vēśū according to the Kalas-Budrūkh grant,—Vēśugi according to Hēmādri,—and probably Vēśūka according to the Bassein grant.¹ And the latter record tells us that his wife was Nāyiladēvi or Nāyaladēvi, the daughter of a chieftain named Gōgi, who may probably be identified with Goggi, son of the Chaulukya Bārappa of the Lāṭa country.²

Arjuna, and Rāja.

Hēmādri places after Vēśū a person named Arjuna, and after the latter a person named Rāja. But these names are not mentioned in the copper-plate records.

Bhīllama III.

The Kalas-Budrūkh and Bassein grants tell us that the son of Vēśū was Bhīllama III. The former also tells us that his capital was Sindinagara, which is identical with the Sindinēra mentioned above in connection with Dhādiyappa, i.e. with Sinnar in the Nāsik District. And the latter says that his wife was Hāmmā or Avvalladēvi, daughter of Jayasimha II. and sister of Āhavamalla-Sōmēśvara I. of the Western Chālukya dynasty. The Kalas-Budrūkh charter, from the Ahmadnagar District,³ is a record of Bhīllama III. himself. It gives him the biruda of Yādava-Nārāyaṇa. It styles him a Mahāśāmantā, and describes him as born in the lineage of Viṣṇu. And it records that he granted the village of Kalas-Budrūkh itself to some Brāhmaṇs. The grant was made on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun in the month Kārttika of the Krōdhana saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 948 (current). And the corresponding English date is the 23rd November, A. D. 1025; on which day there was an annular eclipse of the sun, ² Ind. Ant. Vol. XII. p. 203, where the name is wrongly given as Goṅgi; this person was the great-grandfather of Trilōchanapāla, for whom the same record furnishes the date of A. D. 1051, and the father of Kīrttirāja, for whom another record furnishes the date of A. D. 1017-18 or 1018-19.—The expression in the printed text of the Bassein grant is Chāluky-ānvaya-maṇḍalika-tilaka; but there must be a mistake, whether of the original or otherwise, for Chauluky-ānvaya, &c.—Dr. Bhandarkar (loc. cit. p. 77, and note 4) considered that these words make Gōgi or Goggi, not himself a Chālukya (Chaulukya) chieftain, but a feudatory of some member of that family, and proposed to identify him with Goggi, the brother of the Śilāhāra prince Jhaṭṭha. But, whatever the grammatical possibilities may be, the words, on the analogy of all similar expressions in epigraphic records, unavoidably stamp this Gōgi or Goggi as himself a Chālukya (Chaulukya). And further, as the Śilāhāra prince Goggi stands two generations before A. D. 997 (see chapter VIII. below), his date is too early for the proposed identification.

visible in India.¹ This date, coupled with his feudatory title, shews that Bhillama III. was a vassal of the Western Châlukya king Jayasimha II.

Chapter VII.

The Yādavas
of Dēvagiri.

According to Hêmâdri, Bhillama III. was succeeded by Vādugi; Vādugi, by Vēsugi; and the latter, by another Bhillama, the fourth of that name. These names, however, do not occur in the Bassein grant, which is the only epigraphic authority for the period immediately after Bhillama III.

Vādugi, Vēsugi, &
Bhillama IV.

Next after Bhillama III., but without any attempt to define the exact relationship, the Bassein grant mentions Sēunachandra II.,² who by Hêmâdri is called simply Sēuṇa and is placed after Bhillama IV. The charter further tells us that, just as the three worlds were raised from the ocean by the god Vishṇu in his incarnation as a boar, so, after the death of Bhillama, Sēunachandra II. conquered all the kings and lifted up the sovereignty, with its dignity; and the text conveys the impression that the Yādavas underwent some deprivation of their rank and authority after the time of Bhillama III., and that their position was eventually regained by Sēunachandra II. Hêmâdri adds that he saved Paramardidēva, i.e. the Western Châlukya king Vikramāditya VI., from a coalition of his enemies, and that he established that "light or glory of the Châlukya family" in the sovereignty of Kalyāṇa. The Bassein charter,³ from the Thâṇa District, is a record of Sēunachandra II. himself. It styles him a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara. And it registers the fact that in the month Śrāvaṇa (July-Aug.), falling in A. D. 1069, of the Saumya saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 991 (expired), he granted to his royal family-priest Sarvadēvācharya, who was versed in all the Śaiva precepts, a village named Chiñchuli, which may be identified, as was done by Pandit Bhagwanlal Indrajī,⁴ with the modern Chiñchôli, about ten miles south-east of Nâsik and eight miles north-west of Sinnar. Coupled with his subordinate title, the date of this record shews that Sēunachandra II. was a feudatory of the Western Châlukya king Sômesvara II. Another record of his time is an inscription at Wâghlî in Khândēsh,⁵ dated somewhat earlier, in the month Āshâdha (June-July), in the same year, recording a grant by Sēunachandra II. himself, and others by a subordinate of his named Gôvindarâja, of the Maurya family, belonging to a long lineage which traced back its origin to the city of Valabhî in Surâshtra or Kâthiâwâd.⁶ It seems possible that Sēunachandra II. is the Sēvaṇa whom a Gadag inscription of A. D. 1191⁷ speaks of as the first ancestor, therein mentioned, of the then reigning king Bhillama.

Sēunachandra II.

The only other epigraphic record, bearing on the earlier history of the family, is an inscription at Añjanêrî in the Nâsik District,⁸ which gives us the name of the Mahāsāmanta Sēunadēva.¹ It allots to him the biruda of Yādava-Nārāyaṇa; and it styles him "supreme lord of the town of Dvārāvātī," and describes him as born in the race of Viṣṇu, and as a very sun to cause to burst open the bud of the water-lily that was the Yādava family. And it records a grant made by him in the month Jyēṣṭha (May-June), falling in A.D. 1142, of the Dundubhi samvatsara, coupled with Śaka-Saṁvat 1063 by mistake for 1064 (expired).² This record contains no genealogical information. But we can hardly doubt that this person, Sēunadēva, was a descendant, or a collateral relative, of Sēunachandra II. And his date, coupled with his subordinate title, shews that he was a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Perma-Jagadēkamalla II.

Sēunādēva is not mentioned by Hēmādri, who places the following names after that of Sēuna or Sēunachandra II. That person, he says, was succeeded by Parammadēva; and the latter, by his younger brother Sīmhīrāja, who is said to have brought an elephant named Karpūratilaka from a town called Lañjīpura or Trañjīpura.³ Sīmhīrāja was succeeded by Mallugi, who is alleged to have taken from his enemies a city named Parnakhēta, and to have captured a troop of elephants belonging to the king of Utkala, i.e. Orissa. Mallugi was succeeded by his son Amaragāṅgēya.⁴ This person was succeeded by Gōvindarāja. The latter was succeeded by Amaramallagi, another son of Mallugi. And Amaramallagi was succeeded by Kāliya-Ballāla. The succession is said to have then gone from this person to his paternal uncle Bhīllama, in preference to his own sons. And the names given by Hēmādri, immediately after this, shew that this person is the Bhīllama who will be mentioned more fully just below,—the first paramount king in the family.

It is rather curious that a leading discrepancy occurs at this point,—just before the introduction of Bhīllama, and in connection with his parentage. Hēmādri leads us to infer that his father was Mallugi, the son of Sīmhīrāja; no other paternal uncle of Kāliya-Ballāla being mentioned by him. And his father is distinctly named as Mallugi in an undated record, of the period A.D. 1210 to 1247, at Ānawattī in Mysore,⁵ and in the Haralahaḷḷi grant of A.D. 1238;⁶ and it seems to be implied by the Paithāṇ grant of A.D. 1272, which adds that Mallugi's father was Sīnghaṇa,—evidently identical with Hēmādri's

⁴ The Haralahaḷḷi grant of A.D. 1238 places a person of this name at some indefinite position among the ancestors of Mallugi (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XV, p. 386, text line 7).

It does not give the name of Mallugi's father. — In the transcription, the name of Mallugi himself is written 'Vellugi'; how the mistake occurred, is obvious to any one acquainted with the Kanarese characters of the period.

The Yādavas of

Simhiraṇa,—who, it says, subdued the king of Karnaṭa, punished the Pāṇdyas, and repulsed the leader of the Gurjaras.¹ These statements seem, at first sight, fairly conclusive. Nevertheless, a record of A. D. 1191, of the time of Bhīllama himself,² tells us that his father was Karna: it says that there was a certain Sēvaṇa; that Sēvaṇa's son was Mallugi; that Mallugi had two sons, Amaragaṅga and Karna; and that Karna was the father of the then reigning king, Bhīllama. We can hardly avoid holding, with Prof. Kielhorn, that this statement regarding the parentage of Bhīllama must be accepted; for it is difficult to believe that the author of the record could be mistaken in respect of the name of the father of the sovereign whose grant he was registering. And,—though it is not easy to make them fit in with Hēmadri's account, unless we assume that the name of Sēvaṇa or Sēuṇa was turned into Simhiraṇa or Singhana by some copyist or through some other mistake,—there is also no apparent reason why the other names, immediately preceding that of Karna, should be rejected. Accordingly, this record being followed in preference to the others, the table of the Yādavas of Dēvagiri will now stand as given on page 519 below. The kings of this dynasty had, like the Hoysalas of Dōrasamudra, the hereditary title of Dvārāvati-puravar-ādhiśvara, or “supreme lord of Dvārāvati, the best of towns,”³ with reference to Dvārāvati, Dvārāvātī, or Dvārakā,—the modern Dwārka in Kāthiāwād,—the city of Kṛishṇa, the incarnation of Viṣṇu; the birudas, evidently borne by all them, of Yādava-Nārāyaṇa, “a very Nārāyaṇa (Viṣṇu) among the Yādavas,”⁴ and Rāya-Nārāyaṇa, “a very Nārāyaṇa among kings;”⁵ and the epithet of Viṣṇu-vaśīś-ōdbhava, “born in the race of Viṣṇu:”⁶ and they carried the suvarṇa-Garuda-dhvaja or banner of a golden Garuḍa,⁷ which device also appears, instead of a separate crest, on the seals of their charters, sometimes alone,⁸ and sometimes in conjunction with a representation of the monkey god Hanumat,⁹ which appears alone in one instance,¹⁰ and may perhaps have been their lāñchhana or crest.

As already indicated, the names of Sēvaṇa, Mallugi, Amaragaṅga, and Karna, are taken from an inscription of A. D. 1191, at Gadag, of the time of Karna's son Bhīllama. The record states no historical facts in connection with any of them. Sēvaṇa may possibly be identical with the Sēupachandra II. of the Bassein and Wāghlī records, for whom we have the date of A. D. 1069.

The first paramount sovereign in this family was Karna's son Bhillama, who, in one of the Hoysala records, is called "the Sēupa king."¹ Of his time, we have three certain records. Two are stone inscriptions, at Muttagi in the Bijāpur District,² and at Annigere in Dhārwar :³ they are both dated on the occasion of the winter solstice, falling in December, A. D. 1189, of the Saūmya saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1111 expired) ; and, citing that saṁvatsara as the third year of his reign, they fix the Plavaṅga saṁvatsara, S.-S. 1110 current, = A.D. 1187-88, as his first year, and place his attainment of the sovereign power probably in A.D. 1187. The third is an inscription at Gadag in the Dhārwar District,⁴ dated on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun on Sunday, the new-moon day of the month Jyēshtha of the Virōdhikrit saṁvatsara, S.-S. 1113 (expired) : the corresponding English date is Sunday, 23rd June, A. D. 1191, when there was a solar eclipse, visible in India ; and this is the latest reliable date that we have for Bhillama.⁵ These records give him the paramount epithets and titles of samastabhuvandśraya, śrīprithivīvallabha, Mahārājādhirājā, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhattachāraka,⁶ and the style of Pratāpa-Chakravartin. Prior to A. D. 1187, he must have been a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara IV., from whom, in the last year or two of his reign,—with which his own reign overlapped,—he wrested the northern and eastern portions of the Chālukya kingdom. The Annigere inscription claims that then, in December, A. D. 1189, "he had become the beloved of the goddess of sovereignty of the Karnaṭa country, and was reigning

⁵ The Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. includes (Vol. II. p. 361) the text of an inscription in front of the temple of Basappa at Bhairwāḍige in the Bijāpur District, which, according to the transcription, refers itself to the reign of Bhillama, and is dated on the occasion of the winter solstice, falling in December, A. D. 1191, of the same saṁvatsara, Virōdhikrit coupled with Saka-Saṁvat 1114 (current). The date is a possible one ; but not altogether probable, because that saṁvatsara was the first year of the reign of Bhillama's son and successor Jaitugi I., and the date is rather a late one in it. This record seems to be not now extant ; at any rate, my men did not secure an ink-impression of it.—It also includes (ibid. p. 362) the text of an inscription in the temple of Išvara at Dēvara-Hippargi in the Sindagi tāluka of the same district, which, also, according to the transcription, refers itself to the reign of Bhillama, and is dated on the occasion of the Kanyā-saṁkrānti, or passage of the sun into Virgo, on Monday, the eighth tithi of the dark fortnight of Bhādrapada of the Paridhāvin saṁvatsara, S.-S. 1115 (current). Here, the approximate English date for the tithi is Monday, 31st August, A.D. 1192 ; the saṁkrānti having occurred on the preceding Thursday. This falls in the second year of Jaitugi I. And I think that there must be some mistake in the transcription, either in respect of the mention of Bhillama as the reigning king, or in connection with the saṁvatsara and the Saka year. So much of the surface of the stone has been worn away, by constant smearing and rubbing in worshipping it, that a legible ink-impression can probably not be made now. And, when I was at Dēvara-Hippargi, the date had not attracted my attention ; and so I made no attempt to read it on the original stone, if it can be read there.

over the whole kingdom." But the Gadag inscription, of June, A. D. 1191, stating that his victorious camp was then at Hêrûr,—i. e., probably, Bêlûr in the Bijâpur District, about thirty miles north by east from Gadag,¹—indicates that at that time he was still engaged in a campaign in the direction of the south. And passages in the records of his grandson Singhana, shew pretty plainly that,—in addition to the Hoysalas and the Pândyas of Guttî in the Nolambavâdî country,—the Raṭṭas of Saundatti, the Silâhâras of Karâḍ, and the Kâdambas of Hângal and of Goa, did not recognise the sovereignty either of Bhillama or of his son, and, consequently, that a good deal of the central and western portion of the Western Châlukya kingdom remained unsubdued. Bhillama subsequently lost the southern provinces to the Hoysala king Vîra-Ballâla II., who extended his own kingdom up to a boundary constituted by the Malparbhâ and the Kṛishṇa, from the point where the Malparbhâ joins it.² And he seems to have been killed in the decisive battle between the Yādavas and the Hoysalas, which was fought in the neighbourhood of Soratūr and Lakkundi near Gadag,¹ and is to be placed at some time in the latter half of A. D. 1191. In addition to mentioning his acquisition of the sovereignty of Kalyāṇa, i. e. of the Western Chālukyas, and his successful opposition, at first, to the Hoysala king, Hēmādri seems to say² that Bhillama captured a town called Śrīvardhana from a king named Aṃsalā,—that he vanquished in battle the king of Pratyāṇḍaka,—and that he put to death the ruler, named Vajrin, of Maṅgalavēṣh-taka, which place Dr. Bhandarkar has identified, doubtless correctly, with Maṅgalvêdhēm, between the Shōlāpur and Bijāpur Districts. And Hēmādri also says that he founded the city of Dēvagiri in the Sēṇa country,³ which is the modern Daulatābād, near Aurangābād, in the Nizām's Dominions.⁴ The truth of this assertion about the founding of Dēvagiri is quite possible: but the earliest epigraphic reference to the city is in a record of A. D. 1210, in which it is mentioned as the capital at which Bhillama's grandson Singhana was reigning; and the Muttagi inscription of December, A. D. 1189, says that Bhillama was then reigning at a place named Tenevalāge.⁵ The same record incidentally describes him as a wrestler against the Mālavas, and a goad to the elephants that were the Gurjaras. And a record of his grandson's time, belonging to A. D. 1222, claims that he defeated the Lātas, as well as the Gurjaras and the Karnāta king.⁶ The Muttagi inscription, of A. D. 1189, mentions, as officials of his, the Mahāpradhāna, Bāhattara-niyōgādhipati, Paṭṭasāhanādhipati, and Sēnāpati Peyiya-Sāhani, and a certain Malleya-Sāhani, who joined with the former in making the grant that is registered in the record. The Anṇigere inscription, of the same date, mentions, as a feudatory, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Bāchana or Bāchidēva, apparently also called Bhāskara, who was governing the Belvola district, of which, it says, Anṇigere was the royal city or chief town. And the Gadag inscription, of June, A. D. 1191, mentions a Mantrin or counsellor named Jaitasiṃha, at whose request Bhillama granted the village of Hiriya-Handigōl, in the Belvola three-hundred, to the temple of the god Triakṣēśvara at Gadag: this person is probably the Jaitrasimha, "the right arm, as it were, of Bhillama," by destroying whom, the Hoysala inscription of A. D. 1192 at Gadag says, Vīra-Ballāla II. acquired the lordship of the country of Kuntala.⁷ Another record of this period mentions the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Vikramāditya II., of the Gutta family, as ruling the Banavāsi province, towards the end of A. D. 1191, at his own capital of Guttavolal: this record does not refer to any paramount sovereign; and the Gutta prince may have acknowledged either Bhillama or his son Jaitugi I., or the Hoysala king Vira-Ballāla II., as his master, or he may have been practically independent, pending the issue of the contest between the Yādavas of Dēvagiri and the Hoysalas for the southern provinces.

Bhillama was succeeded in the sovereignty, probably in the latter half of A.D. 1191, by his son Jaitugi I., also called Jaitapāla and Jaitrapāla.¹ Of his time, we have three certain records, which mention him as the reigning king.² One is a stone inscription at Bijāpur,³ dated in the month Pausa, on a tithi falling in December, A.D. 1196, of the Anala or Nala samvatsara (Saka-Samvat 1118 expired); it cites the samvatsara as the sixth year of his reign, and thus fixes the Virōdhikrit samvatsara, S.-S. 1114 current, = A.D. 1191-92, as his first year. Another is an undated stone inscription at Managōli in the same district.⁴ And the third is a stone inscription at Dēūr in the same district:⁵ it was dated; but the date seems to be now illegible. The Bijāpur and Dēūr records style him Pratāpa-Chakravartin; and the Managōli record gives him the paramount epithets of samastabhuvāndaraya and śrīprithivīval-labha.⁶ The Bijāpur record mentions an officer of his, the Mahāpradhāna and Sēndapati, the Dandandiyaka Saṁkara, who then, in A.D. 1196, was governing the Tardavādi thousand. The Dēvara-Hippargi inscription, which may or may not belong to his time,⁷ gives the name of a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Goṇamarasa, who had preceded Saṁkara in the charge of that district and was governing it in A.D. 1192. An inscription of his son's time, written about A.D. 1222, mentions two brothers, Sōidēva and Hēmādidēva, of the Nikumbha family, who in A.D. 1207 were governing a district containing sixteen hundred villages in the neighbourhood of Pātṇa in Khāndēsh,⁸ and must have been feudatories of Jaitugi I.; and it also tells us that Jaitugi appointed Lakshmīdhara, son of the well-known astronomer Bhāskarāchārya, to the post of chief paṇḍit in his service. And a later record of his son's time, of A.D. 1240,⁹ mentions a Mahāpradhāna and Bāhattara-niyōg-ādhipati named Pārisaṣeṭṭi,—then holding, under Singhaṇa, the office of Sarvādhikārin or general manager of the

Hagarattage three-hundred,— who, it says, had done something, probably by quelling local opposition, to effect the development of the sovereignty of Jaitugi I. The Pāṇa record, of about A. D. 1222, and some later records, claim that Jaitugi I. defeated the Andhras. Hēmādri says that, in the battle-field, he “performed a human sacrifice by immolating a victim in the shape of the fierce Rudra, the lord of the Tailaṅgas,”¹ i. e. the king of the Andhra, Trikalīṅga, or Tēluṅga country; this person must be the Kākatiya king Rudradēva, for whom the Anamkoṇḍ inscription² furnishes the date of A. D. 1163. And the Paithan grant of A. D. 1272, mentioning the same matter, in the statement that he slew the king of Trikalīṅga and seized the whole of his kingdom, adds that he took Gaṇapati out of prison and made him lord of his country;³ this person, Gaṇapati, is Rudradēva's nephew, for whom we have the later date of A. D. 1250-51.⁴

Jaitugi I. was succeeded, probably in A. D. 1210, by his son Singhāṇa, whose name appears also as Simha, Simhala, and Simhāṇa. Of his reign, some fifty records are now known.⁵ The earliest of them, at Ingali in the Nizām's Dominions,⁶ is dated in the month Āśvina (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 1210, of the Pramôḍṭa saṃvatsara, ‘Saka-Saṃvat 1132 (expired)’; and the latest is the Kadakol inscription, from the Dhârwar District,⁷ dated in the month Mârgaśira (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A. D. 1246, of the Parābhava saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1169 current), which is quoted as the thirty-seventh year of his reign. This latter record indicates the Pramôḍṭa saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1133 current, = A. D. 1210-11, as his first regnal year; and, taken in connection with the actual date of the Ingali inscription, this would place the commencement of his reign in A. D. 1210; on or before Āśvina śukla 13, corresponding, approximately, to the 3rd October.⁸ His records are found at various places in the Khândêśh,

⁸ There appear to be seventeen other records which agree in indicating the Pramôḍṭa saṃvatsara as the first year of his reign; viz., inscriptions at Kurtakôti (Carn.-Dêsa Insers. Vol. I. p. 655; below an undated record of the Western Châlukya king Vikramāditya VI.), Kuppattur (id. Vol. II. pp. 387, 414), Ablur (ibid. p. 388), Chikka-Kerûr (p. 390), Muḡund (pp. 396, 397), Kallukeri (pp. 398, 413), Saṅgûr (p. 411), Gobbûr (p. 412), Tilawallī (p. 415), Hagaritige (p. 437), Sātēnhallī (p. 440), Yaḷawāl (p. 443), Hosahallī (p. 444), and Kaulûr (p. 447); but I have not been able to verify them. The months of the records which agree, or appear to agree, with this result, run all through the year, from Chaitra to Phālguna.—Differing from it, there is an inscrip-

Bijāpur, Belgaum, and Dhārwar Districts, from Bahāl and Pātna on the north to Rattēhalli in the extreme south,— at Kōlhāpur, and in its neighbourhood,— at Ambā, Chikka-Muddanūr, Gobbūr, Hagaritige, and Ingālī, in the Nizām's Dominions,— and at Ānawattī, Bulagānve, Kuppattūr, and Yalawāl, in Mysore; and it is thus plain that he eventually established his sway over the whole of the Western Chālukya kingdom. They give him the full paramount epithets and titles, including Paramabhaṭṭāraka;¹ and they style him Pratāpa-Chakravartin, and occasionally Praudhāpratāpa-Chakravartin,² and Bhujabala-pratāpa-Chakravartin,³ and perhaps also Yādava-Chakravartin. The Ingālī inscription of October, A. D. 1210, says that he was then reigning at Dēvagiri, and so also the Manōlī inscription of A. D. 1222; the Khēdrāpur inscription of A. D. 1213 speaks of Dēvagiri as the place where he was established; and an inscription of A. D. 1216-17, at Yalawāl in Mysore,⁴ states that the same town headed a list of eighty-four fortresses. And the records mention, as feudatories and officials,—the Mahāpradhāna Nārāyaṇa-Lakshmīdēva, who was the Dandandya for the dākshīṇa-mahā or southern part of the kingdom and was governing "many districts," and the Mahāmandalēśvara Vira-Bijjarasa, son of Ānegaḍēva, with the hereditary title of "supreme lord of Māhishmatī, the best of towns,"— both with the date of October, A. D. 1210; a member of the Jīmūtavāhana lineage and the Khachara race, named Mallidēva; the Mahāpradhāna, Sarvādhikārin, and Mahāparamaviśvāsīn or most confidential agent Māyīdēvapandita, under whom, in A. D. 1215, a certain Hemmēyanāyaka was Sunkādhikārin of the Banavāsi province, and who was himself governing the Halasige twelve-thousand in A. D. 1226; the Mahāmandalēśvara Ballāladēva, of the Māsavāḍi country, with the date of A. D. 1218;⁵ the Dandandya and Sarvādhikārin Jagadala-Purushōttama, who appears to have been governing the Toragale six-thousand, and his younger brother, the Dandandya Jōgadēva, with the date of A. D. 1222; the Dandandya Vichāṇa, Bīcha, Bīchidēva, or Bīchirāya, who was the viceroy for the southern tion at the temple of Kalamēśvara at Gudigere, within the limits of the Dhārwar District, which (I quote from an ink-impression) mentions the Īśvara saṃvatsara (Śaka-Saṃvat 1140 current), with a date in the month Śrāvāṇa (July-Aug.), as his seventh year. And this would make the Prajāpati saṃvatsara, Ś.-S. 1134 current, = A. D. 1211-12, his first year.— I have come across two altogether anomalous instances (I quote them from ink-impressions). The inscription at the temple of Sōmēśvara at Hirē-Waḍawattī near Lakshmēśwar (see page 506 above, note 2), and an inscription at the temple of Gōpālasvāmin at Chikka-Muddanūr in the Nizām's Dominions, both quote the Bahudhānya saṃvatsara, Ś.-S. 1141 current, = A. D. 1218-19, as his nineteenth, instead of his ninth year; the month is Vaiśākha in the former record, and Jyēsthā in the latter. This difference of ten years seems altogether unexplainable, except on the supposition of pure mistake: and, how such a mistake should occur in the first decade of his reign, itself seems impossible to understand; unless, indeed, the reckoning runs in these two cases from an appointment of Siṅghaṇa as Yuvarāja.

part of the kingdom,—a subordinate of his, the Dandandya Chikka-dēva,—and the Mahāmandalēśvara Jōyidēva II., of the Gutta family,—with the date of A. D. 1238; a minister named Rāmadēva or Rāmarāja, with the date of A. D. 1240, apparently in charge of the territory in the neighbourhood of Ambā near Aurangābād; the Mahāpradhāna and Bāhattara-niyōg-ādhipati Pārisaśetti, who in the same year was Sarvādhipati of the Hagarattage three-hundred; the Mahāmandalēśvara Lakshmīpālādēvarasa, who in A. D. 1241 was governing the Nāgarakhanda district; and the Mahāpradhāna and Bāhattara-niyōg-ādhipati, the Sēnāpati Bāchirāja, who, in May-June, A. D. 1247, was in charge of all the Karnāṭaka provinces, and was stationed at Pulikaranagara, i.e. Lakshmēshwar. An inscription of A. D. 1213 at Gadag, coupled with the statement in the Paithan grant that he overthrew “Ballāla,” shews that, even before the end of the reign of Vira-Ballāla II., Singhana succeeded in wresting back from the Hoysalas some of the territory that lay south of the Malparbhā and the Krishna. And a record of A. D. 1215 at Balagānve shews still greater success, in the same direction, within the next two years. Meanwhile, the Banavāsi province was still held by the Gutta Mahāmandalēśvara Vira-Vikramāditya II., whom a record of A. D. 1213 mentions as then ruling that territory at his capital of Guttavolal, and who may, as on a previous occasion, have been practically independent, pending the issue of the contest between Singhana and the Hoysalas of Dōrasamudra. The Khēdrāpur inscription of A. D. 1213, and one of A. D. 1218-19 at Kōlhāpur, shew that Singhana very speedily subjugated the Silāhāra territory also,—subduing Bhōja II., the last member of the Karād branch of that family.¹ And the subjugation of the central, western, and south-western portions of what had been the Western Chālukya dominions, was effected by the Dandandya Vichana,—his viceroy for the southern part of the kingdom,—who reduced the Rattas of Saundatti, and the Kādambas of the Konkan, i.e. of Goa:² this officer was also employed, more to the south and south-east, against the Hoysalas, and the Pāṇdyas of Gutti, in the Nalambavādi province, which is now the chief town of the Anantapur District, Madras Presidency;³ and he claims to have carried his invasion so far as to set up a pillar of victory in the neighbourhood of the river Kāvēri.⁴ The references to Singhana's success against the Hoysalas, whose dynasty was the principal rival of his own, are naturally rather numerous. Other passages describe him as a goad to the elephants that were the Gurjaras, a wrestler against the Mālavas, an uprooter of the water-lily that was the head of the Tēluṅga king, and, subsequently, an establisher of the Tēluṅga king,¹— as destroying the elephants of Jājalla-dēva,²— as defeating the kings of Mathurā and Kāśī, and the Hammīras, i.e. the Musalmāns,— as conquering the Gaula and Chōla kings,— and as overthrowing the Andhra king, and Kakkalla,³ and the lord of Bhambhāgiri, and Arjuna.⁴ Hēmādri, referring to his success against the Mālavas, in the statement that with his troops of horses he besieged or obstructed the ruler of the Dhārā territory, adds the name of Lakshmīdhara, “the lion of Bhaṅgārīka,” to the list of kings defeated by him. And one of the records claims, hyperbolically, that he enforced obedience to his commands from the kings of Mālava, Chēra, Chōla; and Magadha, the Gurjaras and the Pāṇdyas, the people of Lāla (i.e. Lāṭa) and Nēpāl, the Turashkas (i.e. the Musalmāns), the Barbarigas, the Kēralas, and the Pallavas, and the rulers of Aṅga, Veṅgī, Pāñchāla, Kālīnga, and Sind, and thus reigned over the whole of India. As regards his alleged achievements in the north, it is a fact that he did invade the Gurjara country, or Gujarāt, on more than one occasion.⁵ One expedition appears to have been led by a Brāhmaṇa general named Khōlēsvara. This was in the time of Lavaṇaprasāda, and his son Vīradhavaḷa, Rāndas of Dhōlkā, of the Vāghēlā branch of the Chaulukya family of Aphilwād, when the nominal king was Bhīma-dēva II.⁶ On this occasion, Siṅghana's forces crossed the Taptī, and, penetrating as far as the Mahī, overran and ravaged all the territory round Broach. And this campaign ended in a treaty of alliance⁷ between Siṅghana and Lavaṇaprasāda, which was concluded in April or May A.D. 1231 or 1232. Another expedition was led by Khōlēsvara's son Rāmadēva or Rāmarāja, in the time of Vīsaladēva, son of Vīradhavaḷa, while he was still Rānd of Dhōlkā, and before he appropriated the sovereignty of Aphilwād.⁸ This seems to have been about A.D. 1237-38. Rāmadēva himself was slain in battle, on the banks of the Narmadā. And, as Vīsaladēva claims to have, on some occasion, defeated Siṅghana's army,⁹ perhaps this expedition then turned back, unsuccessful. The Pāṭṇa inscription, written about A.D. 1222, furnishes some interesting literary information.¹⁰ It mentions the well-known

³ Doubtless identical with the Kakkāla of Hēmādri.

⁵ From the Ambā inscription (Archæol. Surv. West. Ind. Vol. III. p. 85); and from Sōmadēva's Kirtikaumudī, and the Lekhapañchāsikā, as quoted by Dr. Bhandarkar (Early History of the Dekkan, 1884, pp. 83-85).

⁶ The date of Bhīmadēva II. was A.D. 1178 to 1241-42 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 213). Lavaṇaprasāda, at first his feudatory, established his own independence just before A.D. 1219-20 (ibid. p. 190). Vīradhavaḷa's period was A.D. 1219-20 to about 1238-39.

⁸ Vīsaladēva's date as Rānd was about A.D. 1238-39 to 1243-44; and as king, from A.D. 1243-44 to 1261-62 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 213).

astronomer Bhāskarāchārya, and his father Mahēśvara.¹ It tells us that Bhāskarāchārya's son Lakshmīdhara was made chief paṇḍit by Jaitugi I.; and that Lakshmīdhara's son Chaṅgadēva was the chief astrologer of Singhana. And it records that Chaṅgadēva founded a college for the study of the Siddhāntasirōmaṇi and other works, written by his grandfather and other unnamed relations.

Jaitugi II.

Singhana's son was Jaitugi II., who seems to have died in his father's lifetime. He certainly did not reign. And no historical facts are stated in connection with him.

Kṛishṇa.

Singhana was succeeded, probably early in A.D. 1247, by his grandson Kṛishṇa, whose name appears also in the Prākṛit forms of Kanhara, Kanhāra, Kandhara, and Kandhāra.² The Bēhatti grant, from the Dhārwar District,³ dated on the new-moon day of the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1253, of the Pramādin saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1175, wrongly described as current instead of expired, says that that day fell in his seventh year; and this indicates the Plavaṅga saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1170 current, = A.D. 1247-48, as his first year. On the other hand, an inscription at Hulgūr, in the same district,⁴ represents the full-moon day of Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A.D. 1255, of the Ānanda saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1177 current), as being in his ninth year; and this would point to the Parābhava saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1169 current, = A.D. 1246-47, as his first year. But at any rate the whole of the Parābhava saṃvatsara did not belong to his reign; for it is cited, with a date in November-December, A.D. 1246, as the thirty-seventh year of Singhana.⁵ And possibly the explanation is that Kṛishṇa succeeded nearly at the end of that saṃvatsara, in the first three months of A.D. 1247; and that, consequently, the Plavaṅga saṃvatsara was more usually reckoned as the first year of his reign. In addition to the Bēhatti and Hulgūr records, others have been obtained at Bendigeri,⁶ Chikka-Bāgewādi,⁷ Mamdāpur, and Manōji,⁸ in the Belgaum District, and at Chaudadāmpur, Gadag, Hāvina-Sigallī, Kallukeri, and Nāgavi, in Dhārwar. And, coupled with the statements in the Manōji and Bēhatti records that he reigned and held his court at Dēvagiri, the localities suffice to shew that he kept together the kingdom to which he had succeeded. The earliest of the records is the Chikka-Bāgewādi grant, dated in the month Āshāḍha (June-July), falling in A.D. 1249, of the Saumya saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1171 expired; the latest is an inscription at Chaudādāmpur,¹ dated in Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1259, of the Siddhārthin, saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1182 current). The Bēhatti grant gives him all the paramount epithets and titles, except saṃastabhuvanāśraya; and the records shew generally that he was styled, successively, Pratāpa-Chakravartin, Bhujabalapratāpa-Chakravartin, and Bhujabalapraudhapratāpa-Chakravartin. They mention, as officials, an Amātya or minister and Sarvadēśādihikārin named Malla or Malliṣeṭṭi,—an elder brother of the Vīṣṇa who has been mentioned in connection with Siṅghaṇa,—who, in A.D. 1249, when residing at Mudgal in the Nizām's Dominions, granted the village called Santeya-Bāgevādi, i.e. the modern Hirē-Bāgewādi in the Huvvalli or Mugutkhān-Hubli twelve in the Kuhunḍi country, which was one of the provinces subject to him, and in the same year granted the village of Tāmbrapurī in the Vēṇugrāma or Belgaum country; the Rāyārājaguru or royal preceptor Sōmēśvaradēva, with the date of A.D. 1251; and Malliṣeṭṭi's son, the Mahāmātya and Mahāpradhāna Chaundiṣeṭṭi or Chaundarāja, who obtained the Chikka-Bāgewādi and Bendigeri charters which register the above two grants, and who himself in A.D. 1253 visited Kukkanūr in the Nizām's Dominions, in the course of a victorious progress through the country, and granted that town, the chief town of a circle of thirty villages in the Bēlvola country. They contain vague expressions which claim successes for Kṛishṇa against the Mālavas, the Gurjaras, and the Chōḷas, and in the Kōṅkan; they say that he destroyed Tripura, which seems to be the modern Tēwar near Jabalpur, the capital of the Kalachuris of Central India; and they call him, like Siṅghaṇa, "an establisher of the Tēluṅga king:" but otherwise they do not disclose any historical facts.

Kṛishṇa was succeeded, in A.D. 1260, by his younger brother Mahādēva, also called Vīra-Mahādēva. Of this reign, eighteen records are now known,—at Renadāl near Kōlhāpur, and at Kōlhāpur itself; at Paṇḍharpur in the Shōlāpur District;² at Inḡlēshwar in the Bijāpur District; at Ālūr, Chaudādāmpur, Hulḡūr, Kallukeri, Mēdūr, Pura, and Saṅḡūr, in Dhārwar; and at Kuligeri and Yāḷige, in the Nizām's Dominions. One of the Chaudādāmpur inscriptions,³ dated in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A. D. 1262, of the Dundubhi saṃvatsara (Śaka-Saṃvat 1185 current), cites the saṃvatsara as the third year of his reign, and thus establishes the Raudra saṃvatsara, S.-S 1183 current, = A. D. 1260-61, as his first year:⁴ and, there being nothing in the dates of his predecessor opposed to the assumption, we may take it that his accession was in the first part of the saṁvatsara, in A. D. 1260. The earliest of the records is the Renadāl inscription,¹ which is dated vaguely in the Durmati saṁvatsara, Śaka-Saṁvat 1183 (expired), = A. D. 1261-62, without any mention of the month, &c. The latest of them is the Kallukeri inscription,² dated in the month Jyēsthā (May-June), falling in A. D. 1270, of the Pramôdūta saṁvatsara (S.-S. 1193 current), cited as his eleventh year. But an inscription of his successor's time, at Dāvāngere in Mysore,³ quoting vaguely the Prajāpati saṁvatsara (S.-S. 1194 current), = A. D. 1271-72, seems to connect him with a date in that year,—probably in the early part of it. The Ingleshwar and Kuligeri inscriptions, dated in A. D. 1265, mention Dēvagiri as his capital; and the latter of them gives him all the paramount epithets and titles: others of the records style him Praudhāpradhāna-Chakravartin, Bhujabalapratāpa-Chakravartin, and Bhujabalapradhāna-Chakravartin. The Paithān grant of his successor, dated in A. D. 1272, claims that he overthrew Viśala,⁴ i.e. the Chaulukya king Viśaladēva of Aṇhilvād.⁵ And Hēmadri claims for him successes against also the kings of the Tailāṅga, Karṇāṭa, and Lāta countries, and against a certain Sōma or Sōmēśvara in the Koṅkaṇ, possibly a member of the northern Koṅkaṇ branch of the Silāhāra family,⁶ who must have broken out into some act of rebellion against his sovereign. The records mention, as feudatories and officials,—the Gutta Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Gutta III, who was ruling at Guttavolal, with dates in A. D. 1261, 1262, and 1265; the Mahāpradhāna Dēvarāja, who in A. D. 1264 was governing the southern part of the kingdom; the Mahāpradhāna and Sarvādhikarin Toragaleya-Dēvarasa,—in all probability identical with the preceding,—with dates in the same and the next years; the Mahāpradhāna Sīṅgayya-Dēvanāyaka, with the date of A. D. 1264; a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara of the Hagarattage district named Gaṇapati-dēvarasa, with the date of A. D. 1265; the Mahāpradhāna and Sarvādhikarin Tipparasa, with the date of A. D. 1269; and the Mahāpradhāna and Sarvādhikarin Viṭṭarasa, with the date of A. D. 1270. And Hēmadri himself was one of his Mantrins or counsellors.⁷ It appears that this person was a zealous builder of temples; and that the Hēmaṇḍantī style of architecture, of which there are so many instances in the Dekkan districts and the Nizām's Dominions, owes its name to him.⁸

Amiṇa.

Mahādēva's son Amiṇa is mentioned in only the Paithān grant of A. D. 1272.⁹ As the record describes Rāmachandra as forcibly wresting the kingdom from him, he seems to have made an attempt to succeed his father, but to have failed in it.

The succession accordingly went to Kṛṣṇa's son Rāmachandra, also called Vīra-Rāmachandra, Rāmadēva, and sometimes simply Rāma, the date of whose accession may be placed in A. D. 1271. Of his time we now have twenty-three records,—copper-plate grants from Paithan in the Nizām's Dominions, and from Thāna; and stone inscriptions at Kōlhāpur and Sidnūrle, at Benkankond, Chaudadāmpur, Kāginelli, Kargudari, Kyāsanūr, Lakshmēshwar, Nāgāvi, Narēgal (in both the Hāngal and the Rōn tālukas), Rattēhalli, Shiggaon, and Sīrūr (Gadag tāluka) in the Dhārwar District, and at Balagāmve, Ballēshwar, Dāvāngere, Harihar, and Sorab in Mysore. The earliest of them, with a specific date, is the Paithan grant,¹ which is dated on Māgha śukla 12, corresponding approximately to the 13th January, A. D. 1272, of the Prajāpati samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1193 (expired). An inscription at Narēgal in the Hāngal tāluka, Dhārwar District,² cites the Śrīmukha samvatsara (S.-S. 1196 current),=A. D. 1273-74, with a date in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), as his third year; and thus indicates the Prajāpati samvatsara, S.-S. 1194 current,=A. D. 1271-72, as his first year. Various other records are in accordance with this.³ And, there being nothing in his predecessor's dates opposed to the assumption, we may take it that his accession was in the first part of the samvatsara, in A. D. 1271. The latest of his records is the Rattēhalli inscription,⁴ which gives a date in the month Āślāḍha (June-July), falling in A. D. 1298, of the Vilambin samvatsara (S.-S. 1221. current). But later dates are furnished for him by the Musalmān chronicler, as noted further on. The records give him all the paramount epithets and titles, and style him Praudhapratāpa-Chakravartin, Bhujabalapraudhapratāpa-Chakravartin, and Yādava-Chakravartin. They mention, as feudatories and officials,—the Mahāpradhāna Achyutanāyaka, who in A. D. 1272 was governing the Sāsati district, i.e. Sālsette, in the Koṅkan; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara and Maneya-samastusaingādhīpati, or commander of all the household troops, Sāluva-Tikkamadēva, with dates in A. D. 1277 to 1280; the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Bandanīkeya-Sōyidēva, with the date of A. D. 1282; a certain Kṛṣṇadēva, who was governing the whole of the Konkan in A. D. 1289 ; and the Pradhāna Mallidēva, who was governing the Huligere three-hundred in A. D. 1295-96. And Hēmādri continued in office as a minister under Rāmachandra, — holding specifically the post of Śrīkarandhipa or superintendent of the business connected with the drawing-up of documents.¹ The Harihar inscription² describes Sāluva-Tikkamadēva as an establisher of the Kādamba king and a plunderer of the Hoysala king, and says that in March-April, A.D. 1277, he had come to Harihar on the way back from a victorious expedition, in which he had reduced the city of Dōrasamudra, and had levied tribute, especially of elephants and horses, and that, in celebration of this, he built there a temple of the god Nārāyaṇa (Vishṇu) in the name of his former master Mahādēva, and made grants to it. But, with this exception, the records do not seem to disclose any historical events. There is a literary mention of Rāmachandra, as the reigning king, in Jñānēśvara's Marāṭhī commentary on the Bhagavadgītā, completed in A. D. 1290-91 ;³ and another in a manuscript of the Nāmalingānuśāsana of Amarasimha, the writing of which was finished in June, A.D. 1297.⁴

³ The only instances not in agreement with this, that I can quote, are—(1) the Sorab inscription (P. S. and O.-C. Insers. No. 225; Mysore Inscriptions, p. 207), which quotes the Svabhānu samvatsara (Śaka-Samvat 1206 current),=A. D. 1283-84, as his twelfth year. (2) The Rattēhalli inscription (on a pillar in the temple of Kadambēśvara; Carn.-Dēsa Insers. Vol. II. p. 529), which appears to quote the Vilambin samvatsara (S.-S. 1221 current),=A. D. 1298-99, as his twenty-seventh year. These two require that the Āṅgīrasa samvatsara (S.-S. 1195 current),=A. D. 1272-73, should be taken as his first year. And (3) the Kyāsanūr inscription (I quote from an ink-impression) which cites the Nandana samvatsara (S.-S. 1215 current),=A. D. 1292-93, as his twenty-fourth year. This requires that his first year should be put back to the Śukla samvatsara, S.-S. 1192 current,=A. D. 1269-70; and this conflicts with the latest date for his predecessor Mahādēva.

Saṃkara.

The dynasty of the Yādavas of Dēvagiri practically ended with Rāmachandra. After his death, indeed, which occurred in A.D. 1309 or 1310, his son Saṃkara did enjoy some limited power. But the Dēvagiri kingdom had then fallen under the Musalmān yoke ; and Saṃkara can in no way be said to have succeeded to the sovereignty of his forefathers. For the period after A. D. 1298, no epigraphic records, throwing any light on the history of this dynasty, have as yet come to notice. Our knowledge of what occurred then, and of the leading incidents, during the previous few years, which led up to it, is derived only from the pages of the Musalmān chronicler Ferishta.⁵ And the course of events was as follows.

The downfall of the Yādavas.

In A. D. 1294, Allā-ud-dīn, — the nephew, and subsequently the successor, of Jalāl-ud-dīn or Firāz Shāh, the first of the Khiljī emperors of Delhi, and then holding the post of governor of Karrah-Mānikpur on the Ganges, near Allahābād, — with the permission of the king, collected a body of eight thousand chosen horse, and set out to invade the Dekkan. Crossing the Narmadā, which was then the northern boundary of the Dēvagiri kingdom, he proceeded by way of Ellichpur, and pressed on by forced marches till he arrived in the neighbourhood of Dēvagiri itself. Rāmachandra, or Rāmādēva, as he is called in the Musalmān chronicle, collected such forces as he could muster on the spur of the moment, and opposed the invaders at a distance of about four miles from his capital. But being defeated, he was forced to retire into the hill-fort above the city; and the city itself was easily taken, entered, and pillaged by Allâ-ud-dîn's troops. Allâ-ud-dîn having given out that his force was only the advance-guard of the emperor's army,—the neighbouring chiefs, each busy with his own preparations for defence, were prevented from coalescing with Râmachandra against the invaders; and Râmachandra, seeing that he must soon be obliged to surrender, and apprehending that the king of Delhi intended to make an entire conquest of the Dekkan, became anxious to secure peace before any other forces arrived. He accordingly offered a large amount of gold and jewels, sufficient, with the booty that Allâ-ud-dîn had already obtained, to indemnify him for the expenses of his expedition; and his proposals were accepted by Allâ-ud-dîn, who released his prisoners, and promised to quit the town on the morning of the fifteenth day from his first entrance. Meanwhile, Râmachandra's son 'Samkara, who, on the first appearance of the enemy, had retired to collect troops, advanced with a large army to within a few miles of the city. Râmachandra sent word to him that peace had been concluded. But 'Samkara, relying on the numerical superiority of his forces, disregarded the injunctions of his father, and sent a message to Allâ-ud-dîn, calling on him to restore whatever plunder he had taken, and to leave the province quietly. Thereupon, Allâ-ud-dîn left a force of a thousand horse to invest the fort and prevent a sally, and marched with the rest of his army to attack 'Samkara. A battle ensued, in which the Musalmân troops, overpowered by numbers, fell back on all sides. They were joined, however, by the force which had been left to invest the fort. And the Hindûs, prevented by the dust from discovering the numbers of this force, supposed that the king's army, of which they had heard, had arrived. A panic seized them; and they broke and fled in all directions. Allâ-ud-dîn did not think it prudent to pursue them, but returned and again invested the fort. Râmachandra now found himself to be in great difficulties; especially because a number of bags, supposed to contain grain, which had been taken into the fort for the support of the garrison, were found to contain only salt. He accordingly again commenced negotiations. And peace was ultimately concluded; the terms being that Allâ-ud-dîn should receive, on evacuating the country, "six hundred maunds of pearls, two maunds of diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and sapphires, one thousand maunds of silver, and four thousand pieces of silk, besides," says Ferishta, "a long list of other precious commodities, to which reason forbids us to give credit." Also, the cession of Ellichpur and its dependencies was demanded, in order that Allâ-ud-dîn might leave there a garrison for the collection of the revenues which were to be remitted to him at Karrah-Mânikipur. Allâ-ud-dîn, accordingly, released all his prisoners, and, on the twenty-fifth day from his first arrival before Dêvagiri, marched in triumph out of the city and proceeded on his return to Karrah.

It was shortly after these events that Allâ-ud-dîn inveigled the king, Jalâl-ud-dîn, into meeting him, with only a small retinue, at Karrah-Mânikipur. On the 19th July, A.D. 1295, Jalâl-ud-dîn was treacherously murdered there by Allā-ud-dīn's adherents. And Allā-ud-dīn then ascended the throne of Delhi.

For some years after this, the Yādavas of Dēvagiri remained unmolested. But, Rāmachandra having become irregular in the payment of his tribute, in A. D. 1306 Allā-ud-dīn placed an army of a hundred thousand horse under the command of one of his eunuchs, Malik Kāfur, and sent him to subdue the Dekkan. The expedition was reinforced on its way by the troops of Ain-ul-Mulk Mūltāni, the governor of Mālwa, and of Alaf Khān, the governor of Gujarāt; and one of the principal objects of it was to recover Dēvaladēvi, the daughter of Kauladēvi, who, on the defeat and flight of her husband, Karṇarāya of Gujarāt,¹ in A. D. 1297, had been taken into the harem of Allā-ud-dīn and had become a favourite with him. Karṇarāya, taking Dēvaladēvi with him, had fled to Bāglān, one of the districts dependent on Gujarāt and bordering on the Dēvagiri dominions.² He refused the demand of Malik Kāfur that she should be given up; and eventually, listening to overtures from Dēvagiri, he promised her, then in her thirteenth year, in marriage to Saṁkara. Shortly after this, however, Karṇarāya was attacked by a division of the army under Alaf Khān, and, being totally defeated, fled to Dēvagiri. Bhīmadēva, the brother of Saṁkara, who had conducted the negotiations for the marriage, and with only a small retinue was conveying Dēvaladēvi to Dēvagiri, was intercepted by a small body of Alaf Khān's troops. And, in the skirmish that ensued, Dēvaladēvi was captured and taken to Alaf Khān's camp. Alaf Khān straightway returned with her to Delhi; and she was soon after married to Allā-ud-dīn's eldest son, Khizr Khān.

Malik Kāfur, however, went on into the Dekkan, and, having subdued a great part of the Marāthā country, which he distributed among his officers, proceeded to the siege of Dēvagiri. Rāmachandra, being in no condition to make successful opposition, left Saṁkara in the fort, and advanced with presents to meet the conqueror, in order to obtain peace. Malik Kāfur, accordingly, drew up an account of his expedition and sent it to the king; and, some time after, he took Rāmachandra with him to Delhi, with rich presents, to pay his respects. Rāmachandra was received there with great marks of favour and distinction; and royal dignities were conferred upon him: and, not only was he restored to his government, but other districts were added to his dominions, for all of which he did homage and paid tribute to the king of Delhi. The king, on this occasion, gave him the district of Nausārī, in Gujarāt, as a personal estate, and a hundred thousand tanḱas to pay his expenses home. And, for the rest of his life, Rāmachandra did not neglect to send the annual tribute to Delhi.

In A. D. 1309, Râmachandra entertained Malik Kâfur and Khwâjâ Hâjî at Dêvagiri, where they halted on their way to subdue the king of Worahgal.

Chapter VII.

The Yâdavas

In A. D. 1310, Allâ-ud-dîn, as has been mentioned in the preceding chapter, sent Malik Kâfur and Khwâjâ Hâjî, with a large army, to reduce the Hoysalas of Dôrasamudra. Having reached Dêvagiri, they found that Râmachandra was dead; and that Samkara was not well affected to the Musalmâns. Leaving a part of his army at Paithan on the Gôdâvarî, to overawe Samkara and hold him in check, Malik Kâfur continued his march to the south, and, having effected the conquest of Dôrasamudra, where the reigning king was Ballâla III., returned to Delhi in A. D. 1311, apparently without having found any cause, for the time being, for active operations against Samkara. But Samkara subsequently withheld his tribute. Accordingly, in A. D. 1312, Malik Kâfur for the fourth time proceeded into the Dekkan, and seized Samkara and put him to death. He then laid waste Mahârâshtra and the Karnâṭaka, from Chaul¹ and Dâbhôl² on the coast, as far as Mudgal³ and Raichûr,⁴ and took up his residence at Dêvagiri, from which place he realised the tribute from the princes of Têlîngâna and the Karnâṭaka, and remitted it to Delhi.

Soon after this, however, Malik Kâfur was summoned up to Delhi; and, while he was occupied in intrigues there, Harapâla, the son-in-law of Râmachandra, stirred up the Dekkan to arms, expelled a number of the Musalmân garrisons, and asserted his power over the former territories of Dêvagiri. The intrigues at Delhi ended in the death of Allâ-ud-dîn, said to have been caused by poison administered by Malik Kâfur, on the 19th December, A. D. 1316. But, shortly after this, Malik Kâfur himself was assassinated; and Mubârik, the third son of Allâ-ud-dîn, was placed on the throne. In A. D. 1318, Mubârik himself led an army to chastise Harapâla. On the arrival of the king, Harapâla and his adherents fled. But a detachment was sent in pursuit of them. And Harapâla was captured, brought back, flayed alive, and decapitated; and his head was set up over the gate of his own capital. This completed the extinction of the last remnant of the power of the dynasty.

Up to A. D. 1338, Dêvagiri seems to have not been looked upon as a place of much importance, though it was the scene of many of the contests that ensued between the Musalmâns and the Marâthâs during the completion of the subjugation of the Dekkan. But, in that year, Muhammad Tughlak, who had ascended the throne of Delhi in A. D. 1325, visited Dêvagiri on one of his campaigns, and was so much pleased with the situation and strength of the place, and considered it to be in so much more central a position than Delhi itself, that he decided upon making it the capital of his empire. He changed its name from Dēvagiri, "the mountain of the gods," to Daulatābād, "the city of wealth," which name, ruined as the place is, it still retains. But, though he three times compelled the population of Delhi to migrate to Daulatābād, his project of making it the capital of the empire failed in the end. Its natural advantages, however, must have led to its being continued as a military post. And Ibn Batûta, an Arabian traveller from Tangiers, who visited the place about A. D. 1342, describes it as consisting then of three parts,—Daulatābād, or the city in general; Kataka, or probably the fortified part of the city at the foot of the hill; and Dwaikir, i.e. Dēvagiri, or the towering hill itself, with the wonderful artificial scarp round the base of it.¹

CHAPTER VIII.

THE GREAT FEUDATORY FAMILIES.

With the preceding chapter, the history of the supreme dynasties ends. But the account would not be complete without a detailed notice of some of the more important feudatory families, hitherto mentioned only incidentally, by the agency of which,—in addition to the Mahāpradhānas, Dandādīyakas, and other officials,—the paramount sovereigns carried on the administration of their dominions. The members of these great feudatory families enjoyed a status very different from that of the ordinary officials; inasmuch as,—instead of being only individual officers, of haphazard origin, selected for their personal abilities and invested with special powers, and transmitting their authority perhaps for a couple of generations, but seldom, if ever, for more,—they were the hereditary governors of provinces: and, though unquestionably subordinate to whatever dynasty from time to time exercised the supreme sway, they evidently possessed certain powers, e. g. the right of waging war with each other, which fell but little short of actual sovereignty, and occasionally assumed an attitude which rendered it necessary for the paramount sovereigns to undertake operations against them and reduce them to obedience, as, for instance, when Vikramāditya VI. deputed the Sinda prince Āchugi II. to repulse the Hoysalas and to attack the Kādambas of Goa.¹ Their half-independent position is indicated, sometimes by the absence of any reference in their records to the supreme sovereigns; sometimes by the use of a technical expression, to indicate the nature of their power, which was intermediate between the technical expressions of paramount sovereignty and of inferior governorship;² and sometimes by their records being dated in their own regnal years. On the other hand, that they were always feudatory in theory, is explicitly shewn, occasionally by the mention of the paramount sovereigns in the preambles of their records, followed by the use of the technical expression of feudatory subordination in connection with their own names, and sometimes simply by the records being dated in the regnal years of the paramount kings.

The Silaharas of the Southern Konkan.

As far as actual historical facts and dates go, the oldest of these great feudatory families was that of the Silāhāras, of which there were three leading branches,—two in the Konkan, and one above the ghauts.¹ The records do not state the genealogical connection between the three branches. But, as the descendants in each branch attributed themselves to the lineage of Jîmûtavâhana, one of the Vidyâdharas or genii that attend upon the gods, and as the members of two of the branches at least had a hereditary title connecting them with a town named Tagara and carried the banner of a golden Garuḍa, there can be no doubt that they looked upon themselves as having all one and the same origin. The legend about Jîmûtavâhana² is, that he saved the Nâga or serpent king Saṅkhachûḍa from Garuḍa, by offering his own body to be torn instead of Saṅkhachûḍa's; and the attribution of descent from him was doubtless devised in connection with the adoption of the more pretentious form of the family name, 'Silâhâra,³ meaning literally "food upon a stone or rock." The name appears also in the plainer forms of 'Silara,⁴ Silâra,⁵ Silâra,⁶ and 'Siyalâra,⁷ of all of which 'Silâhâra seems to be simply the Sanskritised form. And the true original form of it is perhaps presented in an inscription of about A.D. 950 on the Sâlôtgi pillar, which mentions a family called Selara.

The southern Koṅkaṇ branch of the family seems to have been, by date of origin, the oldest of the three. For what we know about it, we are dependent on a copper-plate grant from Khârêpâṭan in the Ratnâgiri District,⁸ which furnishes the genealogical list shewn on the opposite page. This record describes the 'Silâhâra family, rather peculiarly, as "the best of the Sîmhala kings," thus, apparently, connecting them with the rulers of Sîmhala or Ceylon,—perhaps, however, only because of some fancied resemblance between the names; and it says that the race took its origin from Jîmûtavâhana, the lord of the Vidyâdharas, son of Jîmûtakêtu, who gave his life to Garutmat (Garuḍa).

In respect of the first member of the family, Sanaphulla, it tells us that he possessed the favour of a king named Krishṇa, and acquired a territory that was bounded by the shore of the ocean and the Sahya or Sahyādri mountains, i. e. the Western Ghauts: counting back nine generations, at the rate of twenty-five years each, from the date of the record, we obtain A.D. 783 as the approximate date for Saṇaphulla; and, accordingly, the Kṛishna in question must be the Rāshtrakûta king Kṛishna I., in the period between A.D. 754 and 782. Regarding Dhammiyara, it says that he founded a great stronghold named Valipattana, which another record¹ locates on the sea-coast. Of Aiyaparaja, it says that he was endowed with the qualities of a conqueror, and was bathed with the water of cocoanuts near a town named Chandrapura,—meaning, perhaps, that he gained a victory at that place. Avasara II., it says, conquered his enemies, and aided the rulers born at Chêmûlya and Chandrapura; the former of these places is the modern Chaul or Chemwal in the Kolâba District, thirty miles south of Bombay. And, in respect of Bhîma, it tells us that he distinguished himself by seizing the Chandra maṇḍala.

The last person mentioned in the record is Raṭṭarāja. It describes him as a Mandālîka or chieftain, feudatory to the Western Châlukya king Irivabedāṅga-Satyāśraya. And it furnishes for him a date in the month Jyêshtha (May-June), falling in A. D. 1008, of the Kīlaka saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 930 (expired), when he granted some villages and lands for the worship and maintenance of a temple of the god Śiva under the name of Avvēśvara. The place-names mentioned in connection with the grant, have not yet been identified: but it seems likely that the territory held by this branch of the family lay appreciably to the south of Bombay; and very probably it consisted of the Konkana nine-hundred, i. e. the present territory of Goa, and the Iridige country, including the Sāwantwādi State and the Ratnāgiri District.¹ The power of this branch of the family doubtless died out with Rattarāja; for, Arikēsarin, of the northern branch, is represented as governing the whole Konkana only nine years later, in A. D. 1017.

The Silaharas of the Northern Konkana.

Next in point of antiquity comes the northern Konkana branch of the family. The full genealogical list of this branch is supplied by three copper-plate charters,—from probably Bhādāna in the Thāna District, dated in A. D. 997;² from Bhāṇḍap in the same district, dated in A. D. 1026;³ and from Khārēpāṭaṇ in the Ratnāgiri District, dated in A. D. 1095:⁴ and, with one or two additions from other sources, it stands as shewn in the table on the opposite page. The members of this branch of the family carried the suvarṇa-Garuda-dhvaja or banner of a golden Garuḍa,⁵ which device, instead of a separate crest, appears on the seals of their copper-plate charters.⁶ They had the hereditary title of Tagarapura-paramēśvara or "supreme lord of the town of Tagarapura,"⁷ commemorative of their original home, and probably referring to Kōlhāpur, the ancient Kollāpura, the chief town of the Kōlhāpur State in the Southern Marāṭhā Country.⁸

⁸ Lat. 16° 42', long. 73° 16'; Indian Atlas, sheet No. 40,—'Kolapoor.'—Tagara was a town of considerable antiquity, and of importance enough to be mentioned in the second century A.D. by Ptolemy, in whose map of India (Ind. Ant. Vol. XIII. p. 329; see also p. 366) it is located in a part of the country which he called Ariakē, and is placed in a north-easterly direction from Barygaza, i. e. Broach, the chief town of the Broach District in Gujarāt, Bombay Presidency (lat. 21° 43', long. 73° 2'), and in the third century by the author of the Periplus Maris Erythraei (Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 144; see also Vol. XIII. p. 366), who, describing it as an inland mart for articles of local production brought into it from the parts along the coast and then transported on waggons to Barygaza through difficult regions that had no roads worth calling such, says that it was a ten days journey to the east from Baithana or Paithana, i. e. Paithan, on the Gōdāvarī, in the Nizām's Dominions (lat. 19° 29'; long. 75° 28'), which place was, according to the same authority, a twenty days journey to the south of Barygaza, and is in reality about two hundred miles in as near as possible a south-westerly direction from Broach. And it is also mentioned, as the residence of the grantee, in the copper-plate charter issued by the Western Chalukya king Pulikēśin II. in A. D. 612 (Ind. Ant. Vol. VI. p. 75; as regards a mistaken supposition that it is also mentioned, as 'Tagiri,' in records of A. D. 1077 at Balagānive in Mysore, see id. Vol. IX. p. 50).—The directions given by Ptolemy and the author of the Periplus seem, at first sight, rather conflicting, but may be fairly well reconciled by the fact that Ptolemy's map shews Paithan also in an easterly or north-easterly direction from Broach; the result being (taking Paithan as the nearest starting-point) that we should look for Tagara, according to both authorities, in approximately an easterly direction from Paithan, and according to the Periplus, at a distance of about one hundred miles.—Still, no acceptable identification of Tagara, on any such bases, has been practicable. There seems to have grown up a general consensus of opinion that there is something radically wrong in the details, and that the latter may, accordingly, be neglected altogether. And proposals have been made, by other writers (see, generally, Ind. Ant. Vol. XIII. p. 366), to identify the town (1) with Dêvagiri or Daulatâbâd in the Nizâm's Dominions, about thirty-four miles north of Paithan; (2) with a supposed ancient place, the ruins of which, it is said, may be traced over a wide area on the plateau south of Rôzah, about four miles from Daulatâbâd; (3) with a place near 'Bîr' or 'Bhîr,' in the same territory, about forty-five miles to the south-east of Paithan; (4) with 'Dhârîr' or 'Dhârîr,' in the same territory, about twenty-five miles to the south-east of Bîr or Bhîr; (5) with Kulbarga, Kulburagi, or Gulbarga, in the same territory, about a hundred and seventy-five miles to the south-east of Paithan; and (6) with Junnar in the Poona District, Bombay Presidency, about a hundred and five miles to the west by south of Paithan.—In my original account, I suggested that it may be Kôlhâpur, or, rather, Karavîra, which, now only a small village on the north side of Kôlhâpur, has furnished the foundation for both the customary vernacular name for the State, viz. the Karavîra Ilâkhâ, and the title of the local Purâpa, viz. the Karavîra-Mâhâtmya, and must, therefore, have been the original settlement.—To this opinion I still adhere. And my reasons are as follows. (1) The copper-plate charter of A.D. 612 distinctly mentions Tagara as the actual residence of the grantee, the expression being, not (like analogous expressions in various other records) Tagara-vinirgata, "emigrated from Tagara," but Tagara-dhivâsin, "inhabiting, or settled in, Tagara." (2) The charter has come to light from the possession of Jains at Haidarâbâd in the Nizâm's Dominions: but it did not belong to them originally; for, it was granted to a Brâhman of the Vâsisîtha gôtra and the Taittirîya śâkhâ: it has, therefore, changed hands: in doing so, it may have travelled to any distance from the residence of its original owner: and there is, therefore, nothing to connect it with the neighbourhood of Haidarâbâd. (3) On the other hand, though the village which was granted, and the two villages which are named in defining its position, have not been identified, the charter records that it was issued by Pulikêsin II. when he was in residence at Vâtâpi, which is the modern Bâdâmi in the Bijâpur District; and the places are, probably, to be located somewhere in the neighbourhood of Bâdâmi. (4) To make a grant in one locality of any practical use to a resident of another place, the two places must be sufficiently near each other for reasonable facilities of access; and, consequently, Tagara must be located within some measurable distance from Bâdâmi. (5) Karavîra, or Kôlhâpur, about one hundred and five miles to the north-west from Bâdâmi, is sufficiently near to answer this requirement. (6) The antiquity of Karavîra, or of Kôlhâpur, is undeniable; for, numerous Buddhist remains have been found in the immediate neighbourhood, including a large stûpa, at Kôlhâpur itself, containing a crystal relic casket the lid of which bears an inscription in pure Aśoka characters of the third century B. C. (see Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 39, No. 6). (7) In spite of this, no really ancient epigraphic mention of the place under either name has been obtained: of Karavîra, indeed, I can quote no such mention at all; and of Kôlhâpur, the earliest mention that has been obtained is of A.D. 1024 (in the Miraj grant of the Western Châlukya king Jayasîmha II., Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 18). (8) The next mention of Kôlhâpur, in an unpublished inscription of A.D. 1049 at 'Sîrîr in the Bâgalkôṭ tâluka, Bijâpur District, speaks of the place as the ddi-pîṭha or "original, i.e. primeval, throne" of the goddess Mahâlakshmi, of whom there is, in fact, a shrine of repute, and plainly a fairly ancient one, at Kôlhâpur; and the goddess Mahâlakshmi was the family-deity of the members of at any rate the Karâḍ branch of the Śîlâhâra family (see, e.g., Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. XIII. p. 6). (9) There is a connection in meaning between the names of Tagara and Karavîra: the word tagara denotes the shrub Tabernaemontana Coronaria, which belongs to the same family with the oleander and grows freely in this part of the country, and the flowers of which are used in the worship of idols; and karavîra denotes the Nerium Odorum, the fragrant oleander, also growing freely in this part of the country, of which, similarly, the flowers are used in the worship of idols. (10) The legends about Karavîra and Kôlhâpur, embodied in the Karavîra-Mâhâtmya (see Graham's Statistical Report on the Principality of Kolhapoor, p. 341) indicate more than one change of appellation. (11) There are local features (id., p. 314 ff.) indicative of some convulsion of nature, which would explain why there are now no traces with the Purī of the Mauryas of the Koṅkaṇ that is mentioned in the Aihole inscription of A.D. 634-35.¹

Out of the persons whose names appear in the table, we have historical details concerning the following:—

Of the time of the Mahāśāmantā Pullaśakti, we have a record in the Kaṇheri caves, in the island of Sālsette, Thāna District,² which styles him “lord of the Koṅkaṇ,” and shews that in Śaka-Saṁvat 765, corresponding to A. D. 842-43 or 843-44 according as the Śaka year is taken as current or as expired, as a feudatory of the Rāshṭra-kūṭa king Amōghavarsha, he was ruling the whole of the Koṅkaṇ, headed by the city of Purī,—holding it through the favour of Amōghavarsha. He is described as a successor of Kapardin I.; which implies that it was the latter who actually acquired the feudatory government for his family. And the record states that his old minister Vishnu . . . , having done obeisance to the Buddhist community at the mount of Kṛishṇagiri, i.e. Kaṇheri, gave certain grants for the purpose of making repairs and providing clothes and books.

of any ancient large and flourishing town. And thus (12) everything seems to point to there having been, first, a change of name, such as from Tagara to Karavīra, made to suit some mediæval legend (for instance, that which Graham gives, p. 1, that the locality was called Karavīra because the goddess Mahālakṣmī used her “mace,”—the original doubtless has karavīra, ‘sword, or scimitar,’—to raise it, her favoured retreat, from the waters of the great deluge), and made in such a way as still to preserve some memory of the original appellation, and, subsequently, a change of settlement, from Karavīra to Kōlhāpur.—The fact remains, of course, that the position of Karavīra or Kōlhāpur does not answer at all to the details given by Ptolemy and the author of the Periplus. But, as already remarked, there seems to have grown up a general consensus of opinion that those details are to be disregarded; and the mention of Tagara in the Bādāmi charter of A.D. 612 necessitates our locating it far more to the south than might otherwise be thought proper. Further, if, as seems probable, it was the parts along the western coast, i.e. the Koṅkaṇ (not the eastern coast as has been thought; see Ind. Ant. Vol. XIII. p. 366), that supplied the local products which were taken to Tagara, and thence to Broach, Karavīra or Kōlhāpur would be a most well-adapted depôt for collecting the trade from that part of the country. And, though it may seem rather a long and roundabout process for the goods to be then taken by cart to Broach, distant about three hundred and fifty miles as the crow flies, reasons for this seem to be forthcoming in the facts that, whereas articles might easily be brought up over the ghauts in small quantities in head-loads or on pack-cattle, the larger export in bulk by carts would, in such early times, before many practicable roads through the ghauts can have been constructed, naturally seek the open country lying well to the east of the inland spurs of the ghauts, and thus might really pass even through Paithān itself; and (see Ind. Ant. Vol. VIII. p. 144) that, so far at least as the Greeks were concerned, some embargo was laid on the use of the seaport of Kalliena, i.e. Kalyān in the Thāna District, for, we are told, if any Greek vessel happened to enter that port, even by accident, a guard was put on board, and it was taken to Broach.—On the same occasion, I pointed out that there is also a connection in meaning between the names of Tagara and of Karahāta, which was the capital of the up-country branch of the Śilāhāra family, and is the modern Karād, in the Sātāra District, about forty miles north of Kōlhāpur; for, the word tagara denotes also the thorny shrub Vangueria spinosa, and karahāta is another name for the same. But I reject Karād, as the representative of Tagara, because its own name, in the forms of Karahakata and Karahākata (apparently by metathesis for Karahātaka, which occurs in the Sāmāgaḍ grant of A.D. 754; Ind. Ant. Vol. XI. p. 112, text line 33), is carried back, by early Pāli inscriptions at Bharaut in Central India (Ind. Ant. Vol. XXI. p. 228) and Kuḍā in the Ratnāgiri District (Cave-Temple Inscriptions, p. 16, No. 20), to at least as early a period as the times of Ptolemy and the author of the Periplus, and there is, therefore, no reason why they should mention it under any other appellation.

Kapardin II.

Of the time of the Mahāsāmanta Kapardin II., we have two inscriptions in the Kanheri caves,¹ which style him "lord of the whole Koṅkaṇ," and shew that in the month Āsvina (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 851, of the Prajāpati samvatsara, coupled with 'Saka-Samvat 775 by mistake for 773 (expired), and again in S.-S. 799 (A. D. 876-77 or 877-78), he was ruling the same territory as a feudatory, and by the favour, of the same king Amōghavarsha I. These, again, are Buddhist records.²

Aparājita.

Of the time of Aparājita,³ we have a copper-plate charter which appears to have been obtained at Bhadāna in the Bhiwṛḍī tāluka of the Thāna District.⁴ It gives him the titles of Mahāsāmāntādhipati and Mahāmāṇḍalésvara. And it furnishes for him a date in the month Āshāḍha (June-July), falling in A.D. 997, of the Hēmalamba samvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 919 (expired). It does not indicate the extent of the territory that he held. But, by recording that, when staying at Sthānaka, i.e. Thāna, he granted the village of Bhadāna itself to a Brāhman, it shews that at any rate the country in the neighbourhood of Thāna was in his possession.

Arikēsarin, or

Of the Mahāmāṇḍalésvara Arikēsarin, or Kēsīdēva, we have a copper-plate charter from Thāna,⁵ which evidently describes him, as some of the later records describe his descendants, as ruling the whole Koṅkaṇ, embracing various districts, and including a fourteen-hundred province of which Purī was the capital, and furnishes for him a date in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A.D. 1017, of the Pīṅgala samvatsara, 'Saka-Samvat 939 (expired). The expression used in describing the extent of his rule, seems to mark the fourteen-hundred province as the head-quarters division, and Purī as the principal capital, of this branch of the Śilāhāra family. The command conveyed in the charter is addressed to, among others, all the inhabitants of Sthānaka, i.e. Thāna, and also of a town named Hamyamana or Hañjamāna, which is mentioned in the same way in the Bhāṇḍūp grant of A. D. 1026. The Khārēpātan grant of A. D. 1095 agrees with this record in giving his name as Arikēsarin; but the Bhāṇḍūp grant names him Kēsīdēva.⁶

Chhittarāja.

Of the Mahāsāmāntādhipati and Mahāmāṇḍalésvara Chhittarāja, we have a copper-plate charter from Bhāṇḍūp in the Thāna District,⁷ which describes his sphere of rule in the same words as those.

⁶ This latter record seems also to make him the elder son of Aparājita. But the verse is imperfect. And, as both the other records mention Vajjadādēva II. before him, it appears more likely that he was the younger of the two brothers.

evidently used in the case of Arikêsarî in the Thâna grant, and furnishes for him a date in the month Kârttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A.D. 1026, of the Kshaya saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 948 (expired), when he granted some land at a village named Nôura,—the modern 'Nowohâr' of the map,—in the Shatshashtî district which was included in (the province of) Sthânaka, i.e. Thâna. The command conveyed in this charter is addressed to, amongst others, all the inhabitants of the town named Hamyamana.

Of the time of the Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Mummūṇi or Mâmvâṇi, we have a record at the temple of Ambarnâth near Kalyân, in the Thâna District,¹ which furnishes for him a date in the month Jyêsthâ (May-June) or Śiâvaṇa (July-Aug.), Śaka-Saṃvat 982, falling in A.D. 1059 or 1060 according as the Śaka year is taken as current or as expired. The purport of the record seems to be that a palace of Chhittarâja was restored for Mâmvâṇi's use.

Of the Mahâśamantâdhipati and *Mahâmaṇḍalêśvarâdhipati*² Anantadêva, also called Anantapâla, we have a copper-plate charter from Khârêpâṭan in the Ratnâgiri District,³ which furnishes for him a date in the month Mâgha (Jan.-Feb.), falling in A. D. 1095, of the Bhâva saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1016 (expired). The record describes his territory in the same terms as those which are used in the case of Arikêsarî and Chhittarâja; and it further styles him paśchima-samudr-âdhipati or "supreme lord of the western ocean." The command contained in it is addressed to, amongst others, the people of the town of Hañjamana. And the object of it was to release certain tolls on carts coming into Sthânaka, Nâgapura (very possibly the modern Nâgaon, about six miles south-east of Alibâg),⁴ Surpâraka (Sôpârâ near Bassein), Chêmêli (Chaul in the Kolâba District), and other sea-ports in the Koṅkan fourteen-hundred. The record describes Anantadêva as "casting into the ocean of the edge "of his sword those fierce heaps of sin who, at a time of misfortune due to the hostility of relatives, obtained power and devastated the land of the Koṅkan, harassing gods and Brâhmanas." The meaning seems to be, that some differences arose between the members of this branch of the family and their relations of the Karâd branch, whereby the power of the former was weakened,—that the Kâdambas of Goa took advantage of this, and seized part of the Koṅkan, under the leadership of Jayakêśin I., who, according to the records of his own family, slew a king, probably Mâmvâṇi, of Kâpardikadvîpa, which is evidently the northern division of the Koṅkan, so called after Kapardin I. or II., and made Gôpakapattana, i.e. Goa, his capital,— and that Anantadēva succeeded in driving back the Kādambas and recovering some of the territory on which they had encroached; but he plainly did not recover the southern portion of the Koṅkaṇ, called in the Kādamba records the Koṅkaṇa nine-hundred, which was the territory in the vicinity of Goa.

Mallikārjuna.

The unbroken genealogy ends, for the present, with Anantadēva. And, as the Kādamba prince Jayakēśin II. of Goa was holding the whole Koṅkaṇ, including the Kavadiḍvīpa lākh-and-a-quarter, which is evidently the Kāpardikadvīpa mentioned above, in A. D. 1125, it is plain that, during some considerable period after the time of Anantadēva, the power of this branch of the family was largely, if not entirely, in abeyance. But a stone inscription in the collection of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society¹ gives us the name of a Śilāhāra Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Mallikārjuna, with a date in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A.D. 1156, of the Dhātu saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1078 (expired). There can be little doubt that he was descended in the same branch of the family. And he seems to have owed his position to Vijayāditya of the Karād branch, who is said to have re-instated in their territory the fallen lords of the province of Sthānaka.²

Aparāditya.

And finally, a stone inscription found near Government House, Pārel, and now in the collection of the same Society,³ gives us the name of a certain Aparāditya, with the paramount title of Mahārājādhirāja and the style of Koṅkaṇa-Chakravartin or "emperor of the Koṅkaṇ," for whom it furnishes a date in the month Māgha (Jan.-Feb.), falling in A. D. 1187, of the Parābhava saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1109 (current). The record refers to the Shatṭhaṣṭi or Sālsette district. And there can be little doubt that Aparāditya also was a descendant in the same branch of the Śilāhāra family. Like other feudatories, he seems to have taken advantage, to declare himself independent, of the general confusion that attended the downfall of the Western Chālukya sovereignty.⁴

The Śilahas of Karad.

The third branch of the Śilāhāra family was settled above the ghauts, and held a stretch of country that included the southern parts of the Sātārā District, the extreme north of the Belgaum District, and most, if not all, of the Kōlhāpur State. Like their connections of the northern Koṅkaṇ branch, they carried the suvarṇa-Garūḍa-dhvaja or

Regarding the earlier members of the family, nothing seems to be known beyond certain statements that are made in a copper-plate charter of A.D. 1058, which will be noticed more fully in connection with the prince, Mārasimha, in whose time it was issued. This record styles Jatiga II. Tagaranagara-bhūpālaka or "king of the city of Tagara," and Pannāla-durg-ādri-simha or "lion of the mountain of the hill-fort of Pannāla." The latter epithet doubtless refers to the well-known Pānhālā, about twelve miles to the north-west of Kōlhāpur, which has always been a stronghold of repute and the scene of many sieges.⁷ The former expression is rather a peculiar one; for, it occurs in a metrical passage, in which the usual title Tagara-puravar-ādhiśvara would have suited the metre equally well, and it therefore presents the appearance of having been used with the object of indicating that Jatiga II. actually ruled at Tagara, which place must then, of necessity, have been somewhere in the neighbourhood of Kōlhāpur: the expression, however, is an isolated one; and, though it does seem far more emphatic and specific than the usual family title, it would be hardly safe to assume that it was intentionally used in the meaning suggested above. The same record describes Goṅka as possessing the territories of Karahāṭa, Kūṇḍi, and Mairiṇjā; and the Kōṅkan. The Kūṇḍi territory was a three-thousand province which constituted the hereditary domains of the Raṭṭa chieftains of Saundatti:⁸ and Goṅka can only have held it temporarily, somewhere about A.D. 1040 to 1050. Mairiṇjā, which is also mentioned in the same record as Miriṇja and Miriṇjā, is the modern Miraj, the chief town of the Native State of the same name, about twenty-eight miles to the east by north from Kôlhâpur;¹ and the territory belonging to it, described in the same record as a three-thousand province, must have been always a natural part of the possessions of this branch of the Silâhâra family. The reference to the Koṅkaṇ must mean that Goṅka held for a while some portions of the territory belonging properly to his relations of the northern Koṅkaṇ branch. The record further describes Gûhala or Gûvala I. as a king of the hill-fort of Kiligala or Khiligila; this place, however, has not been identified.

Mârasimha.

The above details are taken from a copper-plate charter² which was issued by Mârasimha at the time of the winter solstice in December, A.D. 1058, of the Vilambin saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 980 (expired). It styles Mârasimha Mahāmaṇḍalêśvara, and gives him the secondary names of Goṅkana-aṅkakâra, "the warrior or champion of Goṅka," and Guhêyana-simha, "the lion of Guhêya." It speaks of him as ruling at his capital of the hill-fort of Khiligila. And it records that he granted to a Brâhmaṇa a village named Kuṇṭavâḍa, on the south bank of the Kṛishṇavernâ, which is evidently the 'Kootwar' of the map, on the south bank of the Kṛishṇa, five miles south of Miraj. The Silâhâra princess Chandaladêvî or Chandralêkhâ, daughter of "the Vidyâdhara prince who ruled over Karahâṭa," and one of the wives of the Western Châlukya king Vikramâditya VI., was very probably a daughter of Mârasimha.

Bhôja I.

The next name in respect of which we have any historical information, is that of Bhôja I. He must be the Bhôja who invaded the territory of Âchugi II., of the family of the Sindas of Yelburga, and was repulsed by Âchugi.³

Ballâla.

At Honnûr near Kâgal, eight miles south of Kôlhâpur, there is an inscription which gives Ballâla the title of Mahāmaṇḍalêśvara, and implies that he ruled in conjunction with his younger brother Gaṇḍarâditya:⁴ but it is not dated; and it gives no further historical information.

Gaṇḍarâditya.

Of the Mahāmaṇḍalêśvara Gaṇḍarâditya himself, who was also called Ayyana-siṅga or "the lion of his father," there are several records, which give dates for him ranging from the month Mâgha (Jan.-Feb.), falling in A.D. 1110, of the Virôdhin saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1032 (current),⁵ to the month Kârttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A.D. 1135, of the Râkshasa saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1058 (current).⁶ The record of A.D. 1110 describes him as ruling, at the village of Tiravâḍa in the Edenâḍ district, over the Miriṅja country, together with Saptakholla and the Koṅkaṇ; and Tiravâḍa, which was probably only a temporary camp,—appears to be the modern Tirawade,¹ eight miles south-west of Gārgōti, the chief town of the Bhūdhargad subdivision of the Kōlhāpur territory, which is itself about thirty miles south of Kōlhāpur. The record of A. D. 1135 mentions him as ruling at Valavāda, which may be either the modern Wālwa in the Bhūdhargad subdivision, sixteen miles in a south-westerly direction from Kōlhāpur, as was suggested by Sir Walter Elliot,² or another place of the same name in the Wālwa tāluka of the Sātārā District, twenty-five miles to the north-east of Kōlhāpur. The same record mentions also a subordinate of Gaṇḍarāditya, the Mahāśamanta Nimbadevarasa, who is described as the staff of his right arm. An inscription at Tērdāl, belonging to this period, mentions a Maṇḍalika named Goṅki or Goṅkadēva, with a date in A.D. 1122,³ who, as the record describes him as sprung from the lineage of Jīmūtavāhana, seems to have been connected in some way with the Śilāhāra family; but, as his family-deity was the goddess Padmāvati, he must have belonged to a different branch of it from any of the well-known three branches.⁴

Vijayāditya.

Of the time of the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vijayāditya, whose name appears also as Vijayārka, and who, like Gaṇḍarāditya, was styled Ayyana-singa or "the lion of his father," there are various records which give dates for him ranging from the month Māgha, with a date falling in February, A.D. 1143, of the Dundubhi saṃvatsara Śaka-Saṃvat 1065 (current),⁵ to the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1153, of the Śrīmukha saṃvatsara, coupled with S.-S. 1078 by mistake for 1075 expired or 1076 current.⁶ These two records mention him as ruling at Valavāda; and so do others of intermediate dates. The copper-plate charter of his son Bhōja II. tells us that it was through the friendship and assistance of Vijayāditya that the Kaḷachurya king Bijjala attained the sovereignty.⁷ And it also says that he re-instated in their territory the fallen lords of the province of Sthānaka, i.e., Thāna, and firmly established at Gōvā, i.e. Goa, some kings whose power had been destroyed. The full bearing of this statement is not clear; but it probably means that the Kādambas of Goa, under Jayakēśin II. or Permādi, had encroached on the territory of the Śilāhāras of the northern Koṅkaṇ branch,—that Vijayāditya compelled the Kādambas to withdraw to their own proper limits, and revived the power of his relatives, in the person of Mallikārjuna,—and that he effected arrangements which resulted in the two powers in the Koṅkaṇ living thereafter in peace and amity.

Inscriptions at Teṅgaḷi and Kāligi in the Nizām's Dominions (Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs., Vol. II. pp. 552, 556) mention a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vira-Goṅkarasa or Vira-Goṅkadēvarasa, of the Bāra race, with dates in A.D. 1162 and 1163, who was ruling at Kāligi.

Bhōja II.

For the Mahāmandalēśvara Bhōja II., also called Vīra-Bhōja and Vijayādityadēvana-singa or "the lion of Vijayāditya," the earliest reliable date seems to be the winter solstice, in December, A.D. 1190, of the Sādhāraṇa saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 1112 (expired), which is furnished by an inscription at Kōlhāpur;¹ and the latest, A.D. 1205-1206, which is furnished by a note at the end of the Śabdārṇavachandrikā of Sōmadēva, according to which the work was composed in the Krōdhana saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 1127 (expired), during the time of Bhōja II., at a Jain temple which had been founded by Gaṇḍarāditya at Ājurikā in the Kōlhāpur country, i.e., evidently, Ājra, forty miles south of Kōlhāpur.² Valayāda, Kollāpura, and Padmanāladurga, Pranālakadurga, or Pannāledurga, are mentioned as places at which he ruled,—the latter being the well-known Panhālā, about twelve miles to the north-west of Kōlhāpur.³ In his earlier years, he, like his ancestors, used simply the feudatory title of Mahāmandalēśvara. But the note at the end of the Śabdārṇavachandrikā gives him the paramount titles of Rājādhirāja, Paramēśvara, and Paramabhaktāraka, and also styles him Paścima-Chakravartin or "the western emperor." He must, therefore, have set himself up as an independent king during the period when Bhīllama and Jaitugi I. were establishing the sovereignty of the Yādavas of the Dēvagiri. But he was soon reduced by Jaitugi's successor, Siṅghaṇa, who held all the territory in the neighbourhood of Kōlhāpur by at any rate A. D. 1218-19, and whose conquest of Bhōja II., mentioned in various records, seems to have been regarded as an achievement of rather special importance.⁴ Bhōja II. is the last member of this branch of the family, of whom we have any mention. Probably, the power of his family died out with him, and his territory was handed over to the charge of some ordinary official of the Dēvagiri-Yādava dynasty.

The Rattas of Saundatti.

Of the great feudatory families, next in point of antiquity comes that of the Rattas, who, for about three centuries,—first as vassals of the Rāshtrakūṭas, then under the Western Chālukyas, and then apparently, as independent princes until they were subdued by the Yādavas of Dēvagiri,—had the government of the Kūṇḍi or Kūhūṇḍi three-thousand province, which was a division of the Kuntala country and included the greater part of the Belgaum District and some of the neighbouring territory: the boundaries of this province are said to have been fixed by the chieftain Kārtavīrya I.,⁵ for whom we have the date of A. D. 980; and a reminiscence of it seems to have been preserved in the term mūru-sāvirad-ayya, "the Ayya of the three-thousand," which is still the title of an Ayya or Lingāyat priest at Hubli in the Dhārwar District. Their capital was evidently Saundatti, in the Belgaum District,¹ which is mentioned in the records by the ordinary name of Savadhavatti or Savandhavatti and the Sanskritised appellation of Sugandhavartin; but, towards the end of their career they had also a seat of government at Belgaum, which is mentioned as Vêlūgrâma, Vêṇugrâma, and Vêṇupura. Their genealogy is shewn in the table on the opposite page.

A record put together at any time during the period A. D. 1050 to 1096 shews² that the Rattas came to the front through a person named Prithvirâma,—a disciple in the Kâreya sect of the Jains, founded by a teacher named Mailâpatîrtha,³—being patronised and raised to the position of a feudatory chieftain by a king Krishṇarâjadêva, who can only be the Râshtrakûṭa king Krishṇa III.⁴ A record of A.D. 1218 allots them to the actual lineage of a king Krishṇa-Kandhâra,⁵ who is evidently the same person; and so also does another record, purporting, but rather doubtfully, to be dated in A. D. 1209, which mentions the king as Krishṇa-Kandhara, and further gives him the title of Kandhâra-puravar-âdhiśvara or “supreme lord of Kandhârapura, the best of towns.”⁶ And a few passages speak of them as Râshtrakûṭas.⁷ But the records almost always give the family name as Ratta.⁸ And the probability is that these chieftains only belonged to some local division of the Reddî tribe or caste, and that the attribution of them to the lineage of the Râshtrakûṭa kings themselves is based on nothing but the circumstance, mentioned above, through which they rose to power.⁹ The records of the second branch

⁶ See below, under Lakshmidêva I.—I do not know of any other mention of such a town in genuine documents. But, at Hirê-Kummi and Sattigeri in the Parasgaḍ tâluka, Belgaum District, and at Surkôḍ or Surkôr in the Râmdurg State, there are spurious copper-plate charters, without dates, which purport to have been issued by this same king, who is called in them the Chakravartin Kanhara and Krishṇa-Kanhara, and is styled Kandhârapur-âdhiśvara; the Surkôḍ or Surkôr record also says that he was reigning at Kanharapura.

⁹ It has been suggested by Mr. K. B. Pathak (Ind. Ant. Vol. XIV. p. 14) that these chieftains assumed the name of Ratta, simply because they professed to be descendants of Krishṇa III. And in support of this it might be urged that a record of A.D. 980 speaks of Prithvirâma's grandson Śântivarman as “a son to the water-lily that was the Baisa (or Chaisa) lineage” (Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. Vol. X. p. 208), of which, if we assume the reference to be to the water-lily that flowers by day, the meaning would be that Śântivarman belonged to that lineage. But the claim to be actually descended from Krishṇa III. has not been traced back to an earlier date than A.D. 1218. The opening passage of the record of A.D. 980 distinctly describes Śântivarman and his ancestors as Rattas. The reference to the Baisa or Chaisa lineage may be equally well understood as denoting the water-lily that flowers by night; the meaning then being that Śântivarman overthrew some member of that family. And I can really see no objection to believing that these chieftains did belong to the Reddî tribe or caste. In fact, this assumption furnishes the most obvious reason for Krishṇa III. bringing them to the front.

of this family, commencing with the name of Nanna, shew that the Raṭṭa chieftains had the hereditary title of Lattalūr- or Lattanūr-puravar-ādhiśvara, "supreme lord of Lattalūr or Lattanūr, the best of towns," intended to commemorate their original home;¹ that they were heralded in public by the sounds of the musical instrument called trivalī;² that they had the sindūra-lāñchhana, or elephant-crest;³ and that they carried the suvarṇa-Garuḍa-dhoja, or banner of a golden Garuḍa, which device, instead of the crest according to the more usual custom, appears on the seal of the only Raṭṭa copper-plate charter that has as yet come to light.⁴

Meṛada, and Prithvirāma.

Meṛada is mentioned only as the father of Prithvirāma. Of the latter, we are told that he was a disciple of Indrakīrtisvāmin, the disciple of Guṇakīrti, the disciple of Mullabhāṭṭaraka, who was a teacher in the Kāreya sect of Mailāpatīrtha.⁵ And the record which furnishes this information, makes it clear, as noted above, that he was patronised and invested with the position and authority of a feudatory chieftain,—the exact title attached to his name being that of Mahāśāmantā,—by the Rāshtrakūṭa king Kṛṣṇa III. This event may be placed somewhere about A. D. 940, which is the earliest date that we have for Kṛṣṇa III. The record might, indeed, be taken as connecting with Prithvirāma the date of the Manmatha saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 797 expired (A.D. 875-76); but this date is plainly not authentic, so far, at least, as Prithvirāma is concerned.⁶

Of Pittuga, all that we are told is that his wife was Nījikabbe or Nijiyabbe, and that he confronted and defeated a certain Ajavarman, whose identity is not known.

Śāntivarman.

Of the time of Śānta or Śāntivarman, whose wife was Chandikabbe, we have one record,—a stone inscription at Saundatti.⁷ It describes him as a Mahāśāmantā, feudatory to the Western Chālukya king Taila II., and as making a grant to a Jain temple which he had had built at Saundatti. And it furnishes for him the date of the winter solstice in the month Pausa, falling in December, A. D. 980, of the Vikrama saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 902 (expired).

In connection with Nanna, also called Nannapayyaṛāṇa, no historical facts are given. He is mentioned only as the father of Kārtavīrya I. There is nothing to shew his connection with Meṛada and his descendants. And the probability is that he belonged to a different branch of the family.⁸

Feudatory Families
Kârtavîrya I.

Of the time of Kârtavîrya I., also called Katta, we have one record,—a stone inscription at Sogal in the Belgaum District,¹ which mentions him as the lord of the Kûndi country, feudatory to the Western Châlukya king Taila II., and furnishes for him a date in the month Âshâdha (June-July), falling in A. D. 980, of the Vikrama saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 902 (expired). The record of the period A. D. 1050 to 1096 mentions him again as a feudatory of Âhavamalla, i.e. Taila II., and says that he fixed the boundaries of the Kûndi country.² And from this latter statement, coupled with the fact that his date is earlier by some five months than that of Sântivarman, it seems likely that he set himself up in opposition to Sântivarman, and eventually appropriated the entire province from that person.

Of Dâvari or Dâyima, and of Kannakaira I., also called simply Kanna, we have no records and no historical details.

and Kannakaira I.

Eraga.

Of the time of Eraga or Erega, we have one record,—a stone inscription at Maṇṭûr in the Mudhûl State:³ it mentions him by the name of Ereyamma, with the title of Mahâsāmanta; it shews that he was a feudatory of the Western Châlukya king Jayasîmha II.; and it furnishes for him a date in the month Mârgaśîra (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A. D. 1040, of the Vikrama saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 962 (expired).⁴ The Saundatti inscription of the period A. D. 1050 to 1096 speaks of him as acquainted with the science of music.

Aṅka.

Of the time of Aṅka, we have two records,—inscriptions on stone at the temple of Aṅkalêśvara or Aṅkuśêśvara at Saundatti.⁵ One of them⁶ describes him as a Mahâsāmanta, feudatory to the Western Châlukya king Sômêśvara I., and furnishes for him the date of the winter solstice in the month Pausa, falling in December, A. D. 1048, of the Sarvadhârin saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 970 (expired). The other is a mere fragment, dated in the same year.

Sêna I.

About Sêna I., also called Kâlasêna, we have no information except that his wife was Maîlâladvî or Maîlâladvî.

Kannakaira II.

Of Kannakaira II., also called simply Kanna, the earliest mention is in the Tidgundi copper-plate grant, from the Bijâpur District,⁷ dated in the month Kârttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1082, of the Dundubhi saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1004 expired), cited as the seventh year of the Western Châlukya king Vikramâditya VI.; it speaks of him as the Sāmanta and Mahâsāmanta Kanna, one of the feudatories of Vikramâditya VI. He is also mentioned in the Koṇṇûr inscription, which appears to have been put together in

A. D. 1121: it speaks of him as the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kanna; and it connects him with the date of the winter solstice in the month Pausha, falling in December, A. D. 1087, of the Prabhava saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1010 current),¹ cited as the twelfth year of Vikramāditya VI. At this time he must have been ruling in conjunction with his younger brother Kārtavīrya II., for whom we have an earlier date in July-August of the same year,—both of them as feudatories of Vikramāditya VI. And in fact, since another record describes Kārtavīrya II. as a feudatory of Vikramāditya's predecessor Sômesvara II., the two brothers seem to have ruled conjointly from the beginning.

Kārtavīrya II.

Of the time of Kārtavīrya II., also called Katta and Sēnana-singha or "the lion of Sēna," we have two records. One is a stone inscription at Saundatti,² which describes him as a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, feudatory to the Western Chālukya king Sômesvara II.: the date is lost; but the record belongs to the period A. D. 1069 to 1076. The other is a stone inscription at the temple of Ankalēśvara or Ankūśēśvara, at the same place,³ which again styles him Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara, and furnishes for him a date in the month Śrāvaṇa (July-Aug.), falling in A. D. 1087, of the Prabhava saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 1009 (expired): at this time he was, of course, a feudatory of Sômesvara's successor Vikramāditya VI.; and a record at Tērdāl in the Sāngli State, which appears to have been put together in A. D. 1187, or was at any rate completed then, explicitly mentions him as a feudatory of that king.⁴ His wife was Bhāgaladēvi, also called Bhāgalāmbikā.

Sēna II.

Sēna II., also called Kālasēna, is mentioned in the Koṇṇūr inscription, as a Maṇḍalēśvara, in the time of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI., and contemporaneously with Vikramāditya's son Jayakarna: the record seems to imply that he was governing the Kūṇḍi province in subordination to Chāmaṇḍa, a Dandandīyaka of Jayakarna;⁵ and it appears to connect with him, as it certainly does with Jayakarna, the last date given in it, in the month Pausha, falling in December, A. D. 1121, of the Plava saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1044 current), cited as the forty-sixth year of Vikramāditya VI. Sēna II. is, therefore, at any rate to be placed in the period A. D. 1102 to 1121, which are the earliest and latest dates for Jayakarna. And an earlier date, in the month Pausha, falling in December, A. D. 1096, of the Dhātu saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1019 current), cited as the twenty-first year of Vikramāditya VI., is perhaps furnished for him in one of the Saundatti records,¹ which takes the genealogy as far as him, and seems to have been put together in that year or shortly afterwards. His wife was Lakshmidēvi. Shortly after this time, an inscription at Khânâpur in the Kôlhâpur State,² mentions a Ratta Mahâśamanta named Ankidēva, with a date in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A.D. 1129, of the Saumya saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1052 current), cited, rather peculiarly, as the fifty-fourth year of the Western Châlukya king Vikramāditya VI. This person must have been a feudatory of Vikramāditya's successor Sômesvara III. But none of the records disclose his place in the Ratta genealogy.

Of the time of Kârtavîrya III., also called Katta and Kattama, we have three unquestionable inscriptions. Two are at Khânâpur in the Kôlhâpur State:³ they style him Mahâmandalêśvara, and furnish dates for him in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A.D. 1143, of the Rudhirôdgârin saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1066 current), cited as the sixth year of the Western Châlukya king Perma-Jagad-êkamalla II., and in Mârgaśira (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A.D. 1162, of the Chitrabhânu saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 1084 (expired); and the second of them says that he was then ruling at Nêsarje in the Belgaum District. The third is at Bail-Hongal in the Belgaum District,⁴ and furnishes some date in the Târaṇa saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1086 (expired), = A. D. 1164-65. And he is also mentioned, as a Mahâmandalêśvara, and plainly as a feudatory, in a record of A. D. 1165, which says that the Kalachurya king Bijjala, having subdued all kings, was then ruling the whole world with the one umbrella of sole sovereignty.⁵ There is a record at Koṇṇûr,⁶ which,—if referable to Kârtavîrya III., as it seems to be, because it uses the name Kattama, not met with in the case of the other Kârtavîryas,—describes him, not only as a Mahâmandalêśvara, but also as a Chakravartin or emperor, and is dated in a year, unfortunately illegible, of his own rule. This record, which should undoubtedly be referred to a later period than the others, indicates very plainly that, at some period after A.D. 1165, taking advantage of the general confusion that must have prevailed during the overthrow of the Kalachurya power and of the last remnant of the Western Châlukya sovereignty under Sômesvara IV., and during the time when the Yâlavas of Dêvagiri and the Hoysalas of Dêrasamudra were disputing the possession of the southern provinces, he established the independence of his family,—a position which his successors seem to have mostly maintained, until they were reduced to submission again, somewhere about A.D. 1230, by Viçhana, the southern viceroy of the Dêvagiri-Yâdava king Singhana. Têrdâl inscription, however, discloses the fact that, in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1187, of the Plavamga samvatsara S.-S. 1109 (expired), a certain Bhâyidêva, a Dandandâyaka of the Western Châlukya king Sômêśvara IV., was governing the Kûndi province, which had been given to him by the king as a reward for defeating certain enemies who must have been some of the Rattas of Saundatti. And this, while corroborating the inference made above as to the position assumed at this period by the Rattas, also shews that they were not altogether successful in what they accomplished or aimed at. The wife of Kârtavîrya III. was Padmaladêvi, also called Padmâvatî.

Lakshmidêva I.

Of the time of Lakshmidêva I., whose name appears also as Lakshmaṇa and Lakshmidhara, we have one record,—a stone inscription at Hanpikeri near Sampgaon.¹ It describes him as born in the lineage of a king named Kṛishṇa-Kandhara, with the title of Kandhâra-puravar-adhîśvara or “supreme lord of Kandhârapura, the best of towns,” i.e. of the Râshtrakûṭa king Kṛishṇa III.² It mentions him as ruling at Vêṇugrâma, which, it says, was in the Kûndi three-thousand. And it purports to furnish for him a date in the month Phâlguna (Feb.-March), falling in A.D. 1209, of the Vibhava samvatsara, ‘Saka-Samvat 1130 (expired): this date, however, overlaps, and is not easily reconcileable with the earlier dates of his sons Kârtavîrya IV. and Mallikâryjuna; and, as a continuation of the record is dated in A.D. 1257, it is possible that the whole was put on the stone then, and that some mistake was introduced. The wife of Lakshmidêva I. was Chandaladêvi, also called Chandrike and Chandrikâdêvi, daughter of a person named Râja belonging to a family of Mahâmaṇḍalêśvaras, with the hereditary title of “supreme lord of Kupaṇapura, the best of towns,” who claimed to belong to the Yaduvamśa and were lords of the Hagaratage district;³ some of the records⁴ say that she attained victory over a number of serpents in an earthen water-jar,—the allusion apparently being to her having undergone some trial by ordeal.⁵

Kârtavîrya IV., and Mallikâryjuna.

Of the time of Kârtavîrya IV., we have seven records. The first is a stone inscription at Sankêśwar in the Belgaum District:⁶ it describes him as a Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara, ruling at Vêṇugrama or Belgaum; and it furnishes dates for him in the month Bhâdrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A.D. 1199, of the Siddhârthin samvatsara, ‘Saka-Samvat 1121 (expired), and in Jyêshtha (May-June), falling in A.D. 1200, of the Raudrin samvatsara, S.-S. 1122 (expired). The second is a stone inscription at Râybag in the Kôlhâpur State :¹ it describes him as a Mahâmandalésvara, enjoying, at Vêugrâma, sâmrâjya or "complete sovereignty,"—a term which indicates plainly the position that the members of this family had then assumed; and it is dated in the month Vaisâkha (April-May), falling in A. D. 1201, of the Durmati samvatsara, S.-S. 1124 (current). The third and fourth are stone inscriptions, which were formerly at Belgaum,² but are now in the British Museum :³ they describe him as a Mahâmandalésvara, enjoying sâmrâjya at Vêugrâma in conjunction with his younger brother, the Yuvardja Mallikârijuna; and they are dated on Pausa śukla 2, falling in December, A.D. 1204, of the Raktâkshin samvatsara, S.-S. 1126 (expired). The fifth is a stone inscription at Kalhole in the Belgaum District :⁴ this, again, describes him and his younger brother as ruling together in the same style at Vêugrâma; and it furnishes for them the same date.⁵ The sixth is a copper-plate grant from Bhôj, in the same district; ⁶ it makes precisely the same statement, in connection with a date in the month Kârttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1208, of the Vibhava samvatsara, S.-S. 1131 (current). And the seventh is a stone inscription at Nêsargi in the same district,⁷ which makes no mention of Mallikârijuna, but speaks of Kârtavîrya IV. as ruling at Vêugrama or Vêupura, and furnishes for him the date of the winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1218, of the Bahudhânya samvatsara, S.-S. 1141 (current). The wives of Kârtavîrya IV. were Êchaladêvi and Mâdêvi: the former is mentioned as the daughter of a Chakravartin or emperor; ⁸ but her father's name is not given.

Of the time of Lakshmidêva II., also called Boppana-singâ or "the lion of his father,"—the son of Kârtavîrya IV. by his wife Mâdêvi,—we have one record,—a stone inscription at Saundatti.¹⁰ It styles him a Mahâmandalésvara, and states that he was ruling at Vêugrâma, i. e. Belgaum. And it furnishes for him a date in the month Ashâdha (June-July), falling in A. D. 1228, of the Sarvadhârin samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 1151 (current).

Lakshmidêva II.

This is the last notice that we have of the Râttas of Saundatti. From the absence, in this record, of any allusion to a paramount sovereign, it may be inferred that Lakshmidêva II. was still independent at the time when it was written. But he must very soon afterwards have succumbed to the power of the Yâdavas of Dêvagiri. Some of the earlier records which mention Siughana, of that dynasty, as the reigning king,—e. g., of A. D. 1213 at Gadag in the Dhârwâr District and at Khêdrâpur near Kôlhâpur, of A. D. 1215 at Balagâthve in Mysore, of A. D. 1218-19 at Kôlhâpur, and of A. D. 1222 at Manôli in the Belgaum District,—shew that, before the date that is on record for Lakshmidêva II., all the territory bordering on the Kûnḍi province on the north, east, and south, had already fallen into the hands of the Yâdavas. And the Haralahalli grant, of A. D. 1238, specifically states that Vichana, Singhana's viceroy for the southern provinces, had then subdued the Rattas.¹ The event may be placed about A. D. 1230. And, as we have no later mention of Lakshmidêva II. or of any descendant of his, the probability is that he was deprived of his hereditary position, and the province was handed over to one of Singhana's ordinary officials.

The Kadambas of Hangal.

An account of an early dynasty of kings who called themselves Kadambas, has been given in chapter I. above. We have now to deal with two families of feudatory nobles who, with a slight difference of spelling, were called Kâdambas. As in the case of the names Chalukya and Châlukya, so, here also, the difference in the first syllable seems to imply that the Kâdambas could not claim a direct lineal descent from the early Kadamba kings. But, at the same time, the use of the title Banavâsi-puravar-adhîśvara, or “supreme lord of Banavâsi, the best of towns,” by families of which one at least had nothing whatever to do with the government of the Banavâsi province, indicates plainly that the Kâdambas did assert some genealogical connection with the Kadamba kings, of whose capitals Banavâsi was one, if it was not the principal one.² The family with which we are concerned in the present section, is that of the Kâdambas of Hângal,—the ancient Pânûṃgal and Hânûṃgal,—which is the chief town of the Hângal tâluka in the Dhârwâr District.³ These nobles had the hereditary right to rule the Pânûṃgal or Hânûṃgal district, which consisted of five hundred villages. And their capital was Hângal itself, which is mentioned in records by the appellations of Pânthîpura,⁴ Vairâtapura,⁵ Virâṭana-kote,⁶ and Virâṭanagara,⁷ as well as by the ancient name from which the modern name is derived. They sometimes ruled also the Banavâsi province; but the numerous instances in which that province was under the government of the members of other feudatory families and of ordinary officials, disprove any hereditary right on their part to that territory. As already indicated, they had the hereditary title of Banavāsī-puravar-ādhiśvara, or "supreme lord of Banavāsī, the best of towns,"¹ commemorative of the place from which they originally started. They had the simha-lāñch-hana or lion-crest,² and carried the sākhācharēndra-dhvaja, or banner of Hanumat, the king of monkeys.³ They were heralded in public by the sounds of the musical instrument called permatṭi.⁴ And their family-god was Jayantī-Madhukēśvara, or Vishṇu under the name of Madhukēśvara of Jayantīpura or Banawāsī.⁵ Their records are found mostly in the Hāṅgal tāluka itself.

The fullest account of their traditional and actual genealogy is given in a stone inscription at Kargudari in the Hāṅgal tāluka, dated in A.D. 1108;⁶ and, with a few additions from other similar records at Banawāsī⁷ and Hāṅgal,⁸ and from other sources, the list is as shewn in the table on page 559 above: but the authenticity of it anterior to the name of Chatta, Chattaṭaya, or Chattaṭuga, appears very doubtful, —there being too sudden a change to an ordinary style of nomenclature from an unbroken series of high-pretending names ending in varman; and there being also three detached names,⁹ — of a person named Mayūrarvarman, of Harikēśarin, and of Tōyimaḍēva, —with dates earlier than that which is forthcoming for the first person in the list with whom the records connect a date, —for which the list does not provide at all. Regarding Mayūrarvarman I., who heads the list, and who appears¹⁰ to have been represented by tradition as three-eyed and four-armed, the Kargudari record asserts that he was a son of the god Śiva and the Earth, and that he came from the Himālayan regions, and, having brought from Ahichchhatra¹¹ eighteen Brāhmaṇs whom

¹¹ There seem to have been more places than one, whether regions or towns, named Ahichchhatra; or else the traditions connected with the name were very mixed and confusing. — Hiuen Tsiang visited a place of this name, called by him O-hi-chi-ta-to (Buddhist Records of the Western World, Vol. I. p. 200), which Gen. Sir Alexander Cunningham (Archaeol. Surv. Ind. Vol. I. p. 255) identified with the modern Rāmmagar, about twenty-two miles to the north of Badaun in the North-West Provinces. While Prof. Lassen (Map of Ancient India) identifies apparently the same one with the modern Farokhābād, about fifty-five miles to the south-east of Badaun. — Prof. Hall, (Vishṇu-Purāṇa, Vol. II. p. 161, note §) suggests that one of them was not far from the Vindhya mountains. — The Padma-Purāṇa appears to place an Ahichchhatra in Assam (Jour. R. As. Soc., F. S., Vol. V. p. 295). — The scholiast on the Haimakōśa, iv. 28, locates a region of this name somewhere in the north of India (Jour. Beng. As. Soc. Vol. XXX. p. 197, note). — And a Sinda inscription at Bhairanmatṭi in the Bijāpur District (Epigraphia Indica, Vol. III. p. 230) asserts that Sinda, the alleged founder of the family, was born at Ahichchhatra in the region of the river Sindhu, i. e. the Indus.

he established in the Kuntala country, thus acquired the government of the earth.¹ He seems to be identical with the Mukappa-Kadamba,—"the three-eyed Kadamba,"—of another record,² who is said to have brought twelve-thousand Brāhman, of thirty-two gōtras, purified by performing the agnihōtra-sacrifice, from the agrahāra of Ahichchhatra, and to have made, and established them in, the agrahāra of Sthānugūdhapura, which is the modern Tālgund in the Shimogga District, Mysore. And his name in the form of Mayūravarma is very possibly nothing but a reminiscence of that of the veritable Mayūra-sarma, who established the early Kadamba power.³

There seems no reason to question any part of the genealogy from Chatṭa onwards. But the first member of the family, shown in the table, in respect of whom we have definite data, is the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kīrtivarman II., also called Kīrtidēva I. and Tailana-singa or "the lion of Taila,"—the son of Taila or Tailapa I. and Chāvunḍaladēvī. He was ruling the Banavāsi province⁴ in the Kilaka saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 980 (expired), = A. D. 1068-69;⁵ and he must then have been a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara I. or II. We have other dates for him, without an exact specification of his territory, in the Anala or Nala saṃvatsara, S.-S. 998 (expired), = A.D. 1076-77, and in the following year,⁶ when, on the latter occasion at any rate, he was a feudatory of Vikramāditya VI.

The Great Feudatory Families:

Kīrtivarman II.

Śāntivarman II.

Tailapa II.

For the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Śāntivarman II., we have a date in the month Āsina (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 1075, of the Rākshasa saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 997 (expired);⁷ but the record does not state the details of his government: as this date is earlier than the latest date of his nephew, perhaps he and Kīrtivarman II. were then ruling, respectively, only the Pānūṅgal five-hundred and the Banavāsi twelve-thousand. In the month Māgha (Jan.-Feb.) falling in A. D. 1089, of the Vibhava saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1011 current), he was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānūṅgal five-hundred, as a feudatory of Vikramāditya VI.⁸ His wife was Siriyādēvī, of the Pāṇḍya family.

For the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Taila or Tailapa II., whose name appears also as Tailaha, we have various dates, ranging from the month Jyēṣṭha (May-June), falling in A. D. 1099, of the Pramādin saṃvatsara (Śaka-Saṃvat 1022 current),⁹ up to the winter solstice, in December, A.D. 1129, of the Saumya saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1052 current).¹ He was a feudatory at first of Vikramāditya VI., and then of Sômesvara III. The records mostly represent him as ruling the Banavâsi province and the Pânuṅgal five-hundred; but the latest of them, of A. D. 1129-30, adds the Sântalige thousand. Two of them say that he ruled also over various other districts "acquired by the strength of his own arm;" but they do not name those districts. The Kargudari inscription, of A.D. 1108, mentions his capital, Hângal, by the name of Pânthîpura, from which place, it says, he was ruling both the Pânuṅgal district and the Banavâsi province. Another record, of A.D. 1125-26, which mentions only the Banavâsi province, states that he was ruling it at Pânuṅgal. His wives were Bâchaladêvi, of the Pândya family, and Châmaladêvi, who was the mother of Tailama. The date of A.D. 1129, given above, is the latest certain date for him. But there are records at Yalawattî in the Hângal tâluka² which tend to shew that he did not die till the month Kârttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1135, of the Râkshasa saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1058 current), and that his death occurred during, or shortly after, a siege of Hângal by the Hoysalas under Vishṇuvardhana; that Vishṇuvardhana did besiege Hângal,—and probably reduced it, as claimed for him,—is known from the Hoysala records.³

Mayûravarman II.

In the month Bhâdrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A. D. 1131, of the Virôdhikrit saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1054 current), and again at the winter solstice in December of the same year, the Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Mayûravarman II. was ruling the Banavâsi twelve-thousand, the Pânuṅgal five-hundred, and the Sântalige thousand, as a feudatory of the Western Châlukya king Sômesvara III.⁴

Mallikârkjuna.

In the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1132, of the Paridhâvin saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1055 current),⁵ and in the month Phâlguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1138, of the Pingala saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1060 current),⁶ the Mahâmaṇḍalêśvara Mallikârkjuna was ruling the Banavâsi and Pânuṅgal territory, as a feudatory of Sômesvara III.; and again in the month Phâlguna, falling in A. D. 1145, of the Raktâkshin saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1067 current),⁷ as a feudatory of Perma-Jagadêkamalla II.

Tailama.

At the time of the winter solstice, in December, A.D. 1147, of the Prabhava saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 1069 (expired), Tailama,—who is mentioned without any title,—was ruling the Pânuṅgal five-hundred, as a feudatory of Perma-Jagadêkamalla II.⁸

And at the time of the winter solstice, in December, A.D. 1189, of the Saumya saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1111 (expired), as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara IV., the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kāmadēva, also called Kāvadēva and Tailamana-aṅkakāra or "the warrior or champion of Tailama," was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand, the Pānuṅgal five-hundred, and the Puligere, i.e. Laksh-mēśwar, three-hundred, after subjugating the Male and Tulu countries, the Koṅkaṇ, and the Western Ghauts.¹ His wife was Kētaladēvī. There are two other records of Kāmadēva at Hāngal.² One of them³ is dated in the Anala or Nala saṃvatsara (Śaka-Saṃvat 1119 current), = A.D. 1196-97, which is cited as the sixteenth year of his rule; thus giving the Plava saṃvatsara, Ś.-S. 1104 current, = A.D. 1181-82, as his initial date. This inscription is on a virgal or monumental tablet, the sculptures on which are a very vivid representation of battle-scenes. It is dated in the month Āśvina (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 1196. And it records that the Hoysala king Vira-Ballāla II. had come and pitched his camp at the Ānekere tank,—the large tank on the west side of Hāngal,—and was besieging the city. He was defeated, and repulsed for the time, by Kāmadēva's forces under his general Sōhaṇi, who, however, was killed in the battle. But he seems to have soon afterwards completely subjugated the Kādambas and annexed their territory. There are inscriptions at Sātēnhalli, in the Kōd tāluka,⁴ which shew that Kāmadēva was still fighting against the Hoysala forces in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A.D. 1203, of the Rudhirōdgarin saṃvatsara (Ś.-S. 1126 current); but, what became of him after that date, is not known.

In addition to the above, there are some detached names, not referable at present to any places in the genealogy, the owners of which assert themselves to be Kādambas, of plainly the Hāngal family.

Detached names.

Thus, in the Bhāva saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 956 (expired), = A.D. 1031-35, as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Jayasīṃha II., the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Mayūravarmaṇ, whom the record styles Pāntīpur-dhīpa or "lord of Pāntīpura,"⁵ was ruling the Pānuṅgal five-hundred, apparently in subordination to a certain Mādinayya, the Perigade of the Banavāsi province, which is said here to include the Sāntalige thousand.⁶ And in the Tārāṇa saṃvatsara, Ś.-S. 966 (expired), = A.D. 1044-45, he was still ruling the Pānuṅgal district, as a feudatory of Sōmēśvara I.⁷

Mayūravarmaṇ.

In the Manmatha saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 977 (expired), = A.D. 1055-56, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Harikēśarin was ruling the Banavāsi province under Vikramāditya VI., who was then, in the reign of his father Sōmēśvara I., viceroy for that province and for the Gaṅgavādi ninety-six thousand.¹

At the time of the winter solstice, in December, A.D. 1066, of the Parābhava saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 988 (expired)' the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Tōyimadēva was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Pānuṅgal five-hundred, as a feudatory of Sōmēśvara I. The record tells us that his mother was the Western Chālukya princess Akkādevī; but it does not mention his father's name.

Kētarasa.

A record dated in the Vikriti saṃvatsara, 'Saka-Saṃvat 1093 (current)', = A. D. 1170-71,² mentions a Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Kētarasa, distinctly described as a Kādamba, but also called "lord of Uchehaṅgigiri," and describes him as a feudatory of the Pāṇḍya Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vijayapāṇḍya, who had acknowledged allegiance to the Western Chālukya king Taila III., but seems afterwards to have become independent. But, whether the date belongs to Kētarasa himself, or to his son Nāgati, is not certain.

Mallikārjuna or Mallidēva.

In the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A. D. 1231, of the Khara saṃvatsara ('Saka-Saṃvat 1154 current'), the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Mallikārjuna was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand and the Hānuṅgal five-hundred. Other dates, in A. D. 1241 and 1252, are furnished for him by other records, which mention him by the name of Mallidēva. And his initial date was either A.D. 1215-16 or 1216-17.³

Sōmadeva.

And finally, in the Durmukha saṃvatsara, his second year, the Vilambin saṃvatsara, his fourth year, and the Vikārin saṃvatsara, his fifth year, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Sōmadeva, also called Sōyidēva and Sōvidēva, and styled Kādamba-Chakravartin or "the Kādamba emperor," was ruling apparently the Pānuṅgal five-hundred;⁴ but there is nothing in the records to enable us to refer his dates to the 'Saka era.'⁵

The Kadambas of Goa.

The members of the other family of feudatory nobles called Kādambas ruled, during the greater part of their career, at Goa,⁷ which, formerly ⁵ Inscriptions at Kyāsanūr, Ālūr, and Hāṅgal itself (Carn.-Dēsa Inscrs. Vol. II. pp. 607, 608, 609, 610).

⁷ Lat. 15° 30', long. 73° 57'; Indian Atlas, sheet No. 41.—This is in accordance with the always accepted identification, which, even if there is no direct evidence to support it, there seems no reason to call in question. Gōvā or Goa is, indeed, also the name of a fort near Harnai and Suvarnādurg in the Ratnāgiri District (see the Gazetteer of the Bombay Presidency, Vol. X. Ratnāgiri and Sāwantvādī, pp. 335, 337). But this locality does not appear to have been of any importance until the sixteenth century A.D. (ibid. p. 338). On the other hand, the Portuguese Goa was one of the seats of power of the Vijayanagara dynasty in the fourteenth century (ibid. p. 439).

the capital of the Portuguese possessions in India, is now only a suburb of Panjim, the present Portuguese capital. Their original territory was a province called the Palasige or Halasige twelve-thousand, which took its appellation from one of the ancient forms of the name of the modern Halsi¹ in the Khânâpur tâluka, Belgaum District. In the latter half of the eleventh century, however, they acquired, by wresting it from the Silāhāras, a division of the Konkan which was called the Konkan nine-hundred, and was evidently the territory in the vicinity of Goa. And Goa itself, which is mentioned in their records by the names of Gōpakapattana, Gōpakapuri, and Gōve, then became their capital. Like the Kādambas of Hāngal, they had the hereditary title of Banarāṣṭi-puravar-ādhiśvara, or "supreme lord of Banarāṣṭi, the best of towns;"¹ they used the simha-lāñchhana or lion crest,² which appears on the seals of the two copper-plate grants of their family that have come to notice,³ and on the gold coins of Permādi and Jayakēśin III.;⁴ they carried the vānara-mahādhwaja, or great banner of a monkey;⁵ and they were heralded in public by the sounds of the musical instrument called permatṭi.⁶ But their family-god was different,—being Śiva, under the name of Saptakōṭiśvara.⁷ A copper-plate charter of one of the members of this family has been obtained at Goa. But their records are mostly found in the Khānāpur and Sampgaon tālukas of the Belgaum District, and in the northern and north-western parts of Dhārwar. A peculiarity about some of the records is the exceptional way in which the dates are given in years of the Kaliyuga era, instead of the Śaka era.⁸

There can be little doubt that the Kādambas of Goa were of the same original stock with the Kādambas of Hāngal, though no indication has as yet been obtained as to the point at which the two genealogies may be joined. But the separation of the two families must be of considerable antiquity; for, even though one and the same person may be intended, each family had a different name for its founder, and a different account of his origin. As we have seen above, the Kādambas of Hāngal derived their descent from the three-eyed and four-armed Mayūravarmān, a son of the god Śiva and the Earth. Whereas the Kādambas of Goa attributed their origin to the three-eyed and four-armed Jayanta, otherwise called Trilochana-Kādamba or "the three-eyed Kādamba," who is said to have sprung from a drop of sweat that fell to earth near the roots of a kadamba-tree from the forehead of the god Śiva after his conquest of the demon Tripara.⁹ The records of the Kādambas of Goa, however, do not give a long and questionable pedigree like that of their relations of Hāngal.

C. 3102-3101.—The only other epigraphic instance of the use of it, that I can quote, is the Aihole inscription of the Western Chalukya king Pulikēśin II., dated Kaliyuga-Saṃvat 3735 expired, coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 556 expired, = A.D. 634-35 (see page 357 above, No. 6).

They present historical names only. And the list stands as shewn in the table on page 565 above.

Of Gūhalla, who was styled Vyāghra-mārin or "the tiger-slayer," we have no historical details.

An inscription at Guḍikatti, in the Samppgaon tāluka,¹ represents the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Shashthadēva I.,— whose name also appears in the Prākṛit forms of Chatta, Chattala, Chattaya, and Chattayya,— as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Jayasimha II. in the Plavaṅga saṁvatsara, coupled with Saka-Saṁvat 928 by mistake for 929 (expired), = A.D. 1007-1008. At that time, however, the reigning king was Iṛivabedaṅga-Satyāśraya; and, from this, with the mistake in the date, and with the fact that the date is expressed in numerical words,² it seems doubtful whether the record is a synchronous and reliable one.

A continuation of the Guḍikatti inscription, mentioned above, represents Jayakēśin I.,— whom it styles "lord of the Koṅkan," but to whom it does not allot any title,— as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Sômēśvara I. in the Nandana saṁvatsara, coupled with Saka-Saṁvat 973 by mistake for 974 (expired), = A. D. 1052-53.³ Elsewhere, it is stated of him that he slew the king of Kāpardikadvīpa, destroyed the Chōlas, and uprooted Kāmādēva,⁴— that he assembled the Kādambas, conquered the Ālupas, and established the Western Chālukyas in their kingdom,⁵— that he caused the Chālukyas and the Chōlas to become friends at Kāñchi,⁶— and that he made Gōpakapattana, i.e. Goa, his capital.⁷ Kāpardikadvīpa is evidently the island, with the adjoining territory, of Shatshashti, Sāsati, or Sālsette near Bombay,— so named either after Kapārdin II., of the northern Koṅkan branch of the Silāhāra family, who was ruling the Koṅkan in A.D. 851 and 877-78 as a feudatory of the Rāshtrakūṭa king Amoghavarsha I., or after his grandfather Kapārdin I.;⁸ and the king of Kāpardikadvīpa, slain by Jayakēśin I., is very probably the Silāhāra prince Māmvaṇi, for whom we have the date of A. D. 1059-60: for, the Silāhāra records themselves admit some serious reverse about that time, in telling us that Anantadēva or Anantapāla (A. D. 1095) "cast into the ocean of the edge of his sword those wicked heaps of sin (the Kādambas) who, at a time of misfortune due to the hostility of relatives (the Silāhāras of Karāḍ), obtained power, and devastated the land of the Koṅkan, harassing gods and Brāhmanas."⁹ In the Dvyāśrayakōsha of Hēmachandra and Abhayatilaka, it is narrated that Karna I., of the dynasty of the Chaulukyas of Anhilwād, married Mayāpalladēvi, daughter of a Kādamba prince Jayakēśin who was ruling at Chandrapura in the Dekkan;¹ and, Karṇa's period being A. D. 1063-64 to 1093-94,² this Jayakēśin of Chandrapura seems to be Jayakēśin I. of Goa: but Chandrapura has not been identified;—unless, perchance, the name is a Sanskritised form, denoting Chandgaḍ, the chief town of the mahāl of that name in the Belgaum District.

Vijayāditya I.

Of Vijayāditya I., whose name appears also as Vijayārka, the only information furnished by the family records is that his wife was Chattaladēvi. An extraneous record³ tells us that she was a twin sister of Bijjaladēvi, who was the mother of Jagaddēva of the Śāntara family of Patti-Pombuchchapura. It is perhaps to the time of Vijayāditya I. that we must refer a record at Kādarōli in the Sampgaon tāluka,⁴ which mentions a Kādamba Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara named Gūvala, a feudatory of Vikramāditya VI., and furnishes for him a date in the month Āshāḍha (June-July), falling in A.D. 1098, of the Bahudhānya samvatsara (Saka-Samvat 1021 current), cited as Vikramāditya's twenty-third year: that this person was connected with the Kādambas of Goa, seems tolerably certain; but his place in the genealogy is not yet known.

Jayakēśin II.

Of the time of the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Jayakēśin II. there are various records, which give dates for him ranging from the month Mārgaśīrsha (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A.D. 1119, of the Vikārin samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 1041 (expired),⁵ to the winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1125, of the Viśvāvasu samvatsara (S.-S. 1048 current), cited as the fiftieth year of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI.⁶ The last mentioned record speaks of him as ruling only the Palasige twelve-thousand and the Koṅkana nine-hundred. But an intermediate record, five months earlier in the same year,⁷ states that, as a feudatory of Vikramāditya VI., he was ruling, in addition to the above-mentioned two provinces, the Payve, i.e. Hayve, five-hundred, and the Kavadiḍvīpa lākh-and-a-quarter, which is evidently the Kāpardikadvīpa territory referred to above in connection with Jayakēśin I. And another record, of A. D. 1122,⁸ adds to his territory the Vēlūgrāme seventy and the Hānūmgal five-hundred, the latter being probably only temporarily in his possession. His feudatory title is given in all the records. But, that he aimed at a higher position, is shewn by the fact that he also styled himself Koṅkana-Chakravartin or "emperor of the Koṅkan."⁹ And there are other indications that he made an attempt, in his earlier years, to throw off the Western Châlukya supremacy : for, it is evidently to his time that we must refer the events which led to the prince Âchugi II., of the Sinda family of Yelburga, taking Goa and giving it to the flames, and seizing upon the Konkan;¹ and he is undoubtedly the Jayakêśin whom Âchugi's son Permâdi I. defeated and put to flight. His differences with the Châlukyas, however, must have been very soon and permanently made up again; for, Vikramâditya VI. gave him his daughter Mailaladêvi in marriage.² He was defeated at some time or other by the Hoysala prince Vishnuvardhana, who thereby acquired the Palasige province,³ but can hardly have held it more than temporarily. And he seems to be the Mahâmandalêśvara Jayakêśin whom one of the Lakshmêshwar inscriptions,⁴ dated in the month Âshâdha (June-July), falling in A. D. 1147, of the Prabhava samvatsara (Saka-Samvat 1070 current), mentions among the persons of distinction to whom presents were given, or had on some previous occasion been given, at the time of making grants to the god Sômanâtha.

The sons of Jayakêśin II. were Permâdi, also called Perma and Paramardi; and Vijayâditya II., whose name, again, also appears as Vijayârka. They acquired, respectively, the names of 'Sivachitta and Vishnuchitta, by their devotion to the gods Siva and Vishnu. Also, Permâdi was styled Malavara-mârin, "the slayer of the Malavas or people of the ghaut country," which corresponds to Malaparol-gunda, a generic epithet of the Hoysalas; and, apparently from some literary accomplishments, Vijayâditya II. was called Vânîbhûshana or Sarasvatîbhûshana. Vijayâditya's wife was Lakshmîdêvi, daughter of a certain Lakshmîdêva. And Permâdi's wife was Kamalâdêvi: in one passage, her father Kâmadêva is said to be of the Sônavamśa or Lunar Race, and her mother Chattaladêvi, of the Pândya family;⁵ but, in another, Chattaladêvi is allotted to the Lunar Race, and Kâmadêva to the Sûryavamśa or Solar Race.⁶ It was Kamalâdêvi who caused to be built the small but elaborately sculptured temple of the god Kamala-Nârâyana and the goddess Mahâlakshmî, at Dêgâinve in the Sampgaon tâluka, which contains three inscriptions of this family; it was constructed by Tippoja, the Sûtradhârin or architect of the god Bankêśvara, and the son of the Sûtradhârin Holoja of Hûvina-Bâge,⁷ and by Tippoja's son Bâgoja. The records of this period, of which those in the vernacular all give Permâdi the title of Mahâmandalêśvara, shew that his initial year was the Prabhava samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 1070 current, = A. D. 1147-48, and indicate that Vijayâditya II. was shortly afterwards associated with him in the rule. The earliest of them is a stone inscription at Siddâpur in the Dhârwar tâluka,⁸ dated in the month Āshāḍha (June-July), falling in A. D. 1158, of the Bahudhānya saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1080 (expired); it mentions Vijayāditya II. as Yuvarāja, and states that, at a place named Sampagādi,¹ the two brothers were then ruling conjointly over the Palasige twelve-thousand and the Koṅkaṇa nine-hundred. Another record which mentions Vijayāditya II. is the second part of the Halsi inscription,² dated in the Khara saṃvatsara, Kaliyuga-Saṃvat 4272 expired, = A. D. 1171-72, cited as the twenty-fifth year. This is in accordance with the initial date given above. And so are the intermediate records, which mention Permādi only: for instance,—the Golihalli inscription,³ which cites the Vikrama saṃvatsara (Śaka-Saṃvat 1083 current), = A. D. 1160-61, as his fourteenth year, and the Svabhānu saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1086 current), = A. D. 1163-64, as his seventeenth year, and mentions him as ruling, on the first occasion, at Gôve, i.e. Goa, over the Palasige twelve-thousand, the Koṅkaṇa nine-hundred, and the Vêligrāme seventy; the first part of the Halsi inscription,⁴ which cites the Virôdhin saṃvatsara, Kaliyuga-Saṃvat 4270 expired, = A. D. 1169-70, as his twenty-third year; and the Dêgānve inscription,⁵ which cites the Jaya saṃvatsara, Kaliyuga-Saṃvat 4275 expired, = A. D. 1174-75, as his twenty-eighth year. The family records themselves do not furnish any further historical details about the two brothers. But some information is forthcoming from other sources. A Silāhāra record tells us that Vijayāditya of Karād,—about A. D. 1143 and 1153,—re-instated the princes of the Sthānaka maṇḍala or Thāṇa province, i.e. his connections of the northern Koṅkaṇ branch, which must have been done by taking away some of the territory and power held by Jayakêsin II. or Permādi; and also, more obscurely, that he re-established the princes of Gôvā, referring perhaps to some assistance, against his own connections, subsequently rendered to the two brothers. And, in a record of A. D. 1181,⁶ the Dandānāyaka Chandugidêva, an officer of the Kalachurya king Āhavamalla, is mentioned as having burned some of the territory of a Vijayāditya, who can only be the Kādamba Vijayāditya II. A gold coin of Permādi has been obtained, dated in the Subhakrit saṃvatsara (S.-S. 1105 current), = A. D. 1182-83.⁷

Kittûr in the Sampgaon táluka:¹ the former gives a date in the month Chaitra, falling in March, A. D. 1199, of the Siddhârthin samvatsara (Saka-Samvat 1122 current), cited as his thirteenth year; the latter gives three dates in the month Âshâdha, falling in June, A.D. 1201, of the Durmati samvatsara (Saka-Samvat 1124 current), cited as his fifteenth year; and the two records shew that his first year was the Plavamga samvatsara, Kaliyuga-Samvat 4288 expired or 4289 current, = S.-S. 1110 current, = A.D. 1187-88.² Neither do these records, nor any others, furnish any historical information about him. But the Kittûr inscription contains an interesting account of a trial by ordeal. There being a dispute between Sivaśakti, the Āchārya or priest of the god Kallésvaradēva of Kittûr, and Kalyāṇaśakti, the Āchārya of the Mūlasthānadēva or "original god of the locality," regarding the ownership of a field,—the two contending parties met before the Mahāpradhāna and Dandāṇḍyaka Īśvara, and agreed to put the matter to the test of the phaladīvyā or "ordeal by holding a red-hot arrow-head or spear-head." Accordingly, on Sunday the seventh day of the dark fortnight of the month Âshâdha, corresponding to the 24th June, A. D. 1201, they met again in the presence of the principal villagers of Dēgāmve, assembled at the temple of the god Mallikārjuna of that village. And then Kalyāṇaśakti, taking the sacred symbols on his head, declared that the field belonged to the Mūlasthānadēva; while Sivaśakti, holding a red-hot arrow-head or spear-head in his hand, made oath that the field belonged to the god Kallésvara. On the following day, the principal villagers examined the hand of Sivaśakti, and, presumably finding it uninjured, decided that he had won his cause, and that the field in dispute belonged to the god Kallésvara.³ It was probably during the time of Jayakēśin III. that the Kādambas of Goa lost the Vēnugrāma seventy,—the country round Belgaum,—which, as we have already seen,⁴ was in the possession of Kārtavīrya IV., of the family of the Rattas of Saundatti, in A.D. 1199. It is to the time of Jayakēśin III. that we must refer the gold coin dated in the Piṅgala samvatsara, which is, then, Saka-Samvat 1120 current, = A.D. 1199-1200, and that one also which is dated in the Pramōḍa samvatsara, and which therefore furnishes for him the date of S.-S. 1133 current, = A. D. 1210-11.⁵

Of Tribhuvanamalla, whose proper name is not disclosed, we have no definite information, except that his wife was Māṇikādēvī.

Tribhuvanamalla.

Of the time of the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Shashthadeva II., also called Sivachitta-Chattayadēva, we have two records. One is a copper-plate charter from Goa,¹ which gives a date in the month Āsvina, falling in September, A.D. 1250, of the Sādhāraṇa saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1173 current), cited as his fifth year, and fixes the Parābhava saṃvatsara, Kaliyuga-Saṃvat 4348 current, = S.-S. 1169 current, = A.D. 1246-47, as his first year.² The other is a stone inscription at Buradaṅgi in the Hubli tāluka, Dhārwar District;³ it styles him Mahamāṇḍalēśvara and "lord of the western ocean;" it furnishes for him a date in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A.D. 1257, of the Piṅgala saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1179 (expired); and it uses an expression which implies that, in spite of the feudatory title, he was then reigning as an independent king. The Goa charter records a grant, to the god Śiva under the name of Gōvēśvara, which was made by Shashthadēva II. in conjunction with a certain Kāmadēva or Kāvana, — son of Lakshmidēva, and brother-in-law of Shashthadēva himself, — who, both in the body of the record and on the seal of the grant, is called "the establisher of Shashthadēva." It would seem, therefore, that it was only by some special effort that Shashthadēva II. succeeded at all to the authority held by his ancestors. And, as no later names have come to notice, the power of the Kādambas of Goa appears to have died out with him.

³ For another instance of trial by ordeal, see page 556 above, and note 5.—In the article on trial by ordeal among the Hindûs, published in the Asiatic Researches, Vol. I., fifth edition, p. 389, the eighth method is described thus:—"They make an iron ball, or the head of a lance, red-hot, and place it in the hands of the person accused; 'who, if it burn him not, is judged guiltless.'"

The Sindas of Yelburga.

The Sindas, who have been incidentally mentioned in connection with some of the Western Chālukya kings and the Hoysalas, were another family of feudatory nobles who played an important part in the history of the Kanarese districts.

There appear to have been more branches than one of this family. And we have to deal first and chiefly with that branch, the members of which had the hereditary right of ruling certain districts which were known separately as the Kisukād seventy, the Kelavādi three-hundred, the Bāgadage or Bāgadige seventy, and the Nareyaṅgal twelve, and collectively as the Sindavādi nāḍ.⁴ Of these districts, the first was the country lying round Kisuvolal or Pattada-Kisuvolal, which is the modern Pattadakal in the Bādāmi tāluka, Bijāpur District.⁵ The second evidently took its appellation from the ancient name, differing but slightly from the modern name, of the present Kelavādi, Kelwadi, or Kelōdi, about ten miles to the north of Bādāmi. The third, which in other records is called the Bāge seventy and the Bāgenād seventy, was the country lying round the modern Bāgalkōt, the chief town of the Bāgalkōt tāluka in the same district. And the fourth was a small group of villages, — included, the records say, in the Belvola three-hundred,—of which the chief town was the modern Narēgal, in the Rōṇ tāluka, Dhārwar District. The capital of the members of this branch of the family was Erambarage or Erambirage, which, as was suggested by Sir Walter Elliot,¹ is evidently the modern Yelburga in the Nizām's Dominions, about twenty-five miles in a south-easterly direction from Pattadakal.² And their records have been obtained at Aihole and Pattadakal in the Bijāpur District, and at Kodikop, Narēgal, Rōṇ, and Sūḍi, in the Dhārwar District.

The genealogical list of this branch of the family is shewn in the table above. It commences very abruptly with seven brothers, the name of whose father is not stated. And the records give no hint of the mythological origin, or of the hereditary title and insignia, that are claimed elsewhere. It seems very likely, however, that these princes were closely connected,—possibly descended in the same line,—with the Pulikâla and Nâgâditya of an inscription at Bhairanmatti,—noticed on page 576 below,—which, like some other records, allots all the Sindas to the Nâgavamsa or race of the hooded serpents.

Âchugi I., &c.

Of Âchugi I., otherwise called Âcha,—of Nâka,—of Singa I., or Sirîha,—of Dâsa,—of Dâma, or Dâva,—of Châvunḍa I., whose name appears also in the forms of Chavunḍa and Chaunḍa,—of Châva,—and of Bamma,—we have no information beyond the bare mention of their names.

Singa II.

At Nidagundi in the Rôn tâluka, Dhârwar District, there is an inscription¹ which mentions a Mahâmandalêśvara Singana, who, in the month Bhâdrapada (Aug.-Sept.), falling in A. D. 1076, of the Anala or Nala samvatsara, Saka-Samvat 998 (expired), was ruling the Kisukâd seventy as a feudatory of the Western Châlukya king Sômêśvara II. * This person must be Singa II. of the Sinda family.

Âchugi II.

The Mahâmandalêśvara Âchugi II., whose name appears also in the forms of Âcha, Âchi, and Âchama, was a feudatory of the Western Châlukya king Vikramâditya VI.; in consequence of which he was styled Tribhuvanamalladêva-kêsarî, or “the lion of Tribhuvanamalladêva.” His wife was Mâdêvî or Mahâdêvî. Of his time we have one record,—at Kodikôp:² it speaks of him as ruling the Kisukâd seventy, and “several other towns” headed by Nareyaṅgal-Abbegere, the chief town of the Nareyaṅgal twelve which was included in the Belvola three-hundred; and it furnishes for him a date in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1122, of the Subhakrit samvatsara (Saka-Samvat 1045 current), cited as the forty-fifth year of Vikramâditya VI. This record does not give any further information about him. But subsequent ones claim that he was a very hand-mill for grinding the wheat which was an enemy named Jaggu, and that he plundered the country of a person named Hallakavadikeya-singa;³ that, at the command of the emperor Vikramâditya VI., he pursued and prevailed against the Hoysalas, took Gôve, i.e. Goa, put Lakshma to flight in war, caused the Pândyas to retreat, dispersed the Malapas or people of the Western Ghauts, and seized upon the Konkan;⁴ and that he gave Gôve and Uppinakatte to the flames, and repulsed a certain Bhôja who invaded his territory.⁵ Some of the names thus mentioned have not yet been identified. But Bhôja must be Bhôja I., of the family of the Silâhâras of Karâd, whose date was shortly before A. D. 1110.⁶

Permādi I.

We have four records belonging, or purporting to belong, to the time of Āchugi's eldest son, the Mahāmandalēśvara Permādi I., whose name appears also as Perma, Pemma, Paramardi, and Hemmādi,—three at Narēgal,¹ and one at Kodikop;² but only the last furnishes a genuine and admissible date,—at the time of the winter solstice, in December, A. D. 1144, of the Raktākshin saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1067 current), cited as the seventh year of the Western Chālukya king Perma-Jagadēkamalla II.³ This record expressly describes him as a feudatory of Jagadēkamalla II., and shews that he was consequently called Jagadēkamalla-Permādi; and it states that he was ruling the Kisukād seventy, the Bāgadage seventy, the Kelavādi three-hundred, and the Nareyaṅgal twelve. The records claim that he vanquished Kulaśēkharāṅka, besieged and decapitated Chātta, pursued a certain Jayakēśin, who must be the second of that name in the family of the Kādambas of Goa, and seized the royal power of the Hoysalas; and that he penetrated to the mountain passes of "the marauder Bittiga," i.e. the Hoysala prince Vishṇuvardhana, besieged his city of Dōrasamudra, pursued him as far as the town of Bēlāpura, which he took, and followed him, beyond that place, as far as the mountain pass of Vāhādi.⁴ His capital, Erambarage, is mentioned in the two records which include the impossible dates of A. D. 949-50 and 950-51.

Of the time of the Mahāmandalēśvara Chāvunḍa or Chavunḍa II., we have one record,—a stone inscription at Pattadakal,⁵ dated in the month Jyēsthā (May-June), falling in A. D. 1163, of the Subhānu saṃvatsara, coupled with Saka-Saṃvat 1084 by mistake for 1085 (expired): it speaks of him as being, or rather as having been, a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Taila III.; and it says that he was then ruling the Kisukād seventy, the Bāgadage seventy, the Kelavādi three-hundred, and "several other districts," and that his senior wife, or chief queen Dēmaladēvi and his son Āchidēva,—entered in the table on page 573 above as Āchugi III.,—were governing, as regents, at Kisuvolal, or Pattada-Kisuvolal, i.e. Pattadakal, which was the chief town of the Kisukād district. The record mentions also another son by Dēmaladēvi, named Pemādi,—entered in the table on page 573 above as Permādi II.

³ Of the two published Narēgal inscriptions, one purports to be dated, quite impossibly, in the Saumya saṃvatsara, Saka-Saṃvat 872 (current), = A. D. 949-50, and the other, equally so, in the Sādhāraṇa saṃvatsara, S.-S. 872 (expired), = A. D. 950-51. According to the transcription in the Carn.-Désa Inscrs. the third purports, more reasonably, to be dated in the Tāraṇa saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1026 (expired), = A. D. 1104-1105: but this date is also inadmissible, because of the later date for the father, Āchugi II.; and, that it is not the date really given in the original, is rendered probable by the fact that, in its representation of another of his records, the Carn.-Désa Inscrs. (Vol. I. p. 633) connects the Saumya saṃvatsara with S.-S. 1051 (expired), instead of with 872 (current).

Vikrama.

Other records, at Aihole, ¹ Rôn, ² and Sûdi, ³ shew that, by another wife named Siriyâdêvî, daughter of the Kalachurya king Bijjala, Châvundâ II. had two other sons named Bijjala and Vikrama or Vikkayya. The Aihole inscription mentions the two brothers, without any title, as ruling the Kisukâd seventy, the Bâgadage seventy, and the Kelavâdi three-hundred; in the Virôdhin saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1092 current), = A.D. 1169-70, cited as the ninety-fourth year of the era of the Western Châlukya king Vikramâditya VI. And the Rôn inscription gives for the Mahâmandalêśvara Vikrama a later date in the month Âśvina (Sept.-Oct.), falling in A. D. 1179, of the Vikârin saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1102 (current), when, it says, at his capital of Erambarage, he was ruling the Kisukâd seventy, as a feudatory of the Kalachurya king Saṅkama.

Other names.

The above is the last notice of the family whose genealogical list is shewn on page 573 above. But other names, not shewn in that list, are forthcoming.

Pulikâla, and Nâgâditya.

Some of them are disclosed by an interesting stone inscription at Bhairamattî in the Bâgalkôt taluka, Bijâpur District, ⁴ which professes to give the origin of the Sinda family. The record refers first to the reign of the Western Châlukya king Taila II., and to the Vikrîta saṃvatsara, coupled with Saka-Saṃvat 911 by mistake for 912 (expired), = A.D. 990-91, when it says, there was a Sinda prince named Pulikâla, belonging to the family of the serpents, and born in the race of the Nâgas, who had the nâga-dhvaja or hooded-serpent banner, the vyâghra-lâñchhana or tiger crest, and the hereditary title of Bhôgâvatîpura-paramêśvara or "supreme lord of the town Bhôgâvatî," which place, in Hindû mythology, was the capital of the Nâga king Vâsuki in Rasâtala, one of the seven divisions of Pâtâla or the subterranean regions. It then proceeds to give Pulikâla's genealogy. It states that, from a desire to behold the earth, so belauded by the sons of men, there came from the lower regions the serpent king Dharanêdra; and to him there was born, at Ahichehhatra in the region of the river Sindhu (the Indus), ⁵ a son, "the long-armed Sinda." Being much perplexed at the birth of a son in human shape, Dharanêdra bade a tiger nourish the boy. The child was transferred by the tiger to the care of the lord of snakes. And so he was brought up, and eventually became king of the Sinda country, and married the daughter of a lord of the Kadambas, by whom he had three sons, from whom there sprang the Sindavarîsa or race of the Sindas. The record then seems to state that thirty-one princes in succession ruled the Bâgadage district, and that then there was born another prince named Sinda. Then, it says, in this lineage of the Sindas of Bâgadage, which came without a break from "the long-armed Sinda," there was a certain Kammara or Kammayyarasa. His wife was Sagarabbarasi. And to them was born the Pulikâla mentioned above. Carrying the genealogy a little further, it then tells us that to Pulikāla and Rēvakabbe there was born the Mahāsāmanta Nāgāditya,—an ornament of the family of the serpents, “lord of Bhôgāvatī, the best of towns,” lord of the banner of the hooded serpents Ananta and Vāsuki and Takshaka, a very Kāmadēva with his tiger-crest, an ornament of the Sinda family. Further, to this Nāgāditya and to his wife Poleyabbarasi, there was born Polasinda. And the son of the last-mentioned was the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Sēvya or Sēvyarasa, a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Sômēśvara II.,—the supreme lord of Bhôgāvatī, the best of towns, the lord of the banner of the hooded serpents, an ornament of the Sinda race. And finally, reverting to Nāgāditya, whom it indicates as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Jayasimha II., it furnishes for him the date of the Srimukha saṃvat-sara, (Saka-Saṃvat 955 (expired), = A.D. 1033-34. As already stated, Pulikāla and Nāgāditya, who are distinctly described as belonging to the family of the Sindas of Bāgaḍage, may very possibly have been ancestors of the Yelburga branch of the family.

Again, the Tidgundi copper-plate charter¹ mentions, as a feudatory of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI., with a date in the month Kārttika (Oct.-Nov.), falling in A.D. 1082, of the Dundubhi saṃvatsara (Saka-Saṃvat 1005 current), a Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Muñja,—son of Sindarāja, son of Bhima, of the Sinda race,—with the title of “supreme lord of the town Bhôgāvatī,” and described as born in the race of the king of hooded serpents and belonging to the Sinda family. Coupled with the date, the pedigree of Muñja, as far as it is given, seems to negative the possibility of any connection with the Yelburga branch of the family.

Muñja.

And finally, an inscription at Harihar² mentions, as an official of the Pāṇḍya Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Vijaya-Pāṇḍya of the Nolambavādi province, a person of Sinda descent named Īsvara, for whom other records,³ describing him as a Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara ruling, at Halavūr or Hallavūr, over several small districts in the Banavāsi and Santalige provinces, as a feudatory of the Kalachurya kings Bijjala and Sôvidēva, give dates in December, A. D. 1165, and May-June, A.D. 1172. This person had the hereditary title of Karahāṭa-puravar-dhīśvara or “supreme lord of Karahāṭa, the best of towns,”—carried the nīla-dhvāja or blue-banner,—used the vyāghra-mṛiga-lāñchhana or crest of a tiger and a deer,—and was heralded in public by the sounds of the musical instrument called mallālī. And he derived his origin from a certain “long-armed Sinda,”—born from the union of Śiva with the river Sindhu, and brought up by the king of serpents on tiger’s milk,—who, being told that Karahāṭa, i.e. Karād in the Sātārā District, was to be his residence, went there, drove out the king, acquired the earth for himself by the strength of his own arm, and so came to rule over many districts in the Karahâta four-thousand. His historical genealogy goes back, by some five or six generations, to a person named Piriya-Chattarasa, whose period would fall about A.D. 1000-1025. Here, the dates, the connection with Karâd, and other details, indicate a distinctly different branch of the family from that of the Yelburga branch.

The Guttas of Guttal.

The Guttas of Guttal first come to notice historically in the twelfth century A. D. But their traditions would give them a very much greater antiquity. Their records, obtained at Haralahalli and Guttal in the Karajgi tâluka, and Chaudadâmpur or Chawadânpur and Hûli-halli in the Rânebennûr tâluka, of the Dhârwar District, have not yet been fully explored. As far, however, as they have been examined, they furnish the following details.

The family is usually called the Gutta anvaya, kula, or vaṁśa. The members of it are described as "full-moons of the ocean of nectar which is the lineage of Chandragupta, the great supreme king of kings."¹ Their descent is deduced through a Vikramâditya, who is specified as king of Ujjayani, i. e. Ujjain, in Mâlwa, and whom one record appears to represent plainly as himself a descendant of Chandragupta.² And the family is also stated to be a branch of the Sôma-vaṁśa or Lunar Race.³ The members of the family had the hereditary title, intended to commemorate their place of origin, of Ujjênî or Ujjayani-puravar-adhîśvara, or "supreme lord of Ujjayani, the best of towns;"⁴ for which, however, in one passage there is substituted Pâtâlî-puravar-adhîśvara, or "supreme lord of Pâtâlîpura, the best of towns."⁵ They had the mrigardja-lânchhana or crest of a lion,⁶ and the vaṭavriksha-dhvaja and Garuda-dhvaja or "banners of a sacred fig-tree and of Garuda."⁷ Their family-god was Siva, under the name of Mahâkâla of Ujjayani.⁸ Their chief town was a place named Guttavolal, meaning "the town of Gutta or of the Guttas," which may be safely identified with the modern Guttal in the Karajgi tâlukâ.⁹ And probably they ruled by hereditary right over only the immediately surrounding territory, which was known as the Guttolal, i. e. Guttavolal, nâd or district.¹⁰ In A. D. 1188, 1191, and 1213, indeed, Vîra-Vikramâditya II. was ruling the Banavâsi twelve-thousand province, which, in one of the records, is called his nij-aîśvarya or "own proper lordship:" but he alone appears to have held this more extensive authority; and it seems unlikely that the family had any real hereditary right to that territory. The pedigree of the family stands as shewn in the table above.

The traditions embodied in the Gutta records involve some confusion. The mention of Pâtâlipura shews distinctly that the Guttas supposed themselves to be descended ultimately from the great Maurya king Chandragupta of Pâtâliputra, the grandfather of Asôka. And the king Vikramâditya of Ujjayani in Mâlwa, from whom also they claimed descent, is plainly the mythical king who is supposed to have established the Vikrama era, commencing B. C. 58;¹ one passage says that at Ujjain he mastered the ashta-mahâ-siddhi or eight great supernatural faculties;² another, that he ruled over the Bétâlas or demons;¹ and a third, that he was the yuga-purusha or representative man of the present age.² But no mention is made anywhere of the Maurya lineage. On the other hand, the word Gutta is a well-established corruption of Gupta. One of the records places "ten Guptas," after other kings who are not particularised, in the lineage of Vikramāditya of Ujjayanī.³ And, not only are the members of the family described as Vikramāditya-vamś-ōdbhava, "born in the race of Vikramāditya,"⁴ and Chandragupta-vamś-ōdbhava, "born in the race of Chandragupta,"⁵ but also Mallidēva is styled Gupta-vamśa-Trinētra, "a very Trinētra (Siva) in the Gupta race," and Gupta-dhvaya-bhūkānta, "a king belonging to the Gupta lineage,"⁶ and Sampakarasa is described as Gupta-vamśa-vārdhi-vardhana, "increasing (like the moon) the ocean of the Gupta race."⁷ It is plain, in fact, that the Gutta princes of Guttal claimed descent in reality from the Early Gupta kings, of whose dominions, at any rate from the time of Kumāragupta I. onwards, Mālwa did form a part, and not from the Mauryas. From their use of the names Chandragupta and Vikramāditya, they seem to have really had some definite knowledge of the Early Guptas.⁸ But they mixed it up with matters which were probably more familiar to them. They evidently identified the Early Gupta king Chandragupta I., or his grandson of the same name, with the far more well known Maurya king Chandragupta. And the introduction of Vikramāditya of Ujjain into their traditions is to be explained by the fact that "Vikramāditya" was a secondary name both of Chandragupta I. and of his grandson.

Malla or Mallidēva.

The first of their records is an inscription at Chaudāmpur.⁹ It opens by referring itself to the reign of the Western Chālukya king Vikramāditya VI. It then mentions his feudatory, the Mahāśa-mantādhipati, Mahādāpandanayaka, and Mahāpradhāna Gōvindarasa, who was governing the Banavāsi twelve-thousand. Then, introducing the Guptas, it tells us that, in the lineage of the Gutta kings or of king Gutta, there became famous a certain Māgutta,—which name probably stands by metrical necessity for Mahāgutta. His son was Gutta I. And Gutta's son was Malla or Mallidēva. Then follows a description of a sacred Śaiva site called Muktitīrtha, on the Tuṅga-bhadra, and an account of some princes of the Jātā-Chōla lineage.

Ant.* Vol. XIX. p. 224), we have the names of ten Early Guptas in unbroken lineal succession. Eight of them were reigning kings. And, if we include also the detached names of Budhagupta and Bhānugupta, we have ten reigning kings of the Early Gupta stock.

⁹ At the temple of Muktesvara (Carn. Desa Inscr. Vol. I. p. 649; P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. No. 108).

And, after this, the available part of the record comes abruptly to an end, in the middle of a sentence, in line 63.¹ The portion that is extant does not specify the locality of Mallidēva's government: but it seems to imply that he was subordinate to Gōvindarasa, and consequently that he was administering only the Guttavolal district; and the imperfect sentence at the end perhaps gives him the title of Mahāśmanta. It does not contain the date; but the dates that we have for Gōvindarasa from other sources,² fix it about A.D. 1115.

The next name that we meet with, is that of the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Sampakarasa. It occurs in an inscription at Balagāṁbe in Mysore,³ and in that part of it which refers itself to the reign of the Kalachurya king Saṅkama, and gives a date in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1179, of the Vikārin saṁvatsara (Saka-Saṁvat 1102 current), cited as his third year. The record mentions Sampakarasa as one of the witnesses in whose presence a grant was made to the gods Kēśava (Vishṇu) and Sōmanātha (Śiva). It does not state his pedigree. But it describes him as Gupta-vamśa-vārdhi-varḍhana, or "increasing the ocean of the Gupta race." And there can be little doubt, if any, that he was one of the Guttas of Guttal, though he cannot at present be referred to his place in the genealogy.

An inscription at Haralahalli⁴ carries us a few steps further. It refers itself to the reign of the Kalachurya king Āhavamalla. And it then mentions his feudatory, the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Jōyidēva I. In introducing the pedigree of this person, it says that, in the famous lineage of king Vikramāditya of Ujjayanī, there were "many kings," and, after them, "ten Guptas."⁵ At some undefined point after them, it places a certain Mallidēva, who is styled Gupta-vamśa-Trinētra, "a very Trinētra (Śiva) in the Gupta race," and Gupt-ānvaya-bhūkṛanta, "a king belonging to the Gupta lineage," and is evidently to be identified with the person of that name mentioned in the Chaudāḍāmpur inscription of about A. D. 1115. Mallidēva's son was Vira-Vikramāditya I. The sons of the latter were Jōma or Jōyidēva I, and Gutta II.⁶ And Gutta's son was Vikrama, who, further on in the same record, is mentioned again as the Mahāmaṇḍalēśvara Vira-Vikramāditya II. With Jōyidēva I, there is connected the date of the winter solstice in December, A. D. 1181, of the Plava saṁvatsara, ⁶ In this record, Gutta II. is distinctly called the younger brother of Jōyidēva I.; so also in P. S. and O.-C. Inscr. Nos. 231 and 109. No. 234 mentions Gutta II. before Jōyidēva I.,—as if he were the elder brother; but probably only to suit the construction of the verse.

Vīra-Vikramāditya II.

Śaka-Samvat 1103 (expired). With Vīra-Vikramāditya II., there is connected a date in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1188, of the Plavaṅga samvatsara, 'S.-S. 1110 (current); and the whole record was probably drawn up on this latter occasion. No information seems to be given in this record, as to the extent of the authority of either of the two Mahāmāṇḍalēśvaras.

Of Vīra-Vikramāditya II., we have also four other records. One is an inscription at Hūlihalli.¹ It refers itself to the reign of the Kalachurya king Āhavamalla. His feudatory, it says, was the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Vikramāditya II. In respect of his descent, it only tells us that he was the son of Jōyidēva I.,² who was the son of Vikramāṅka, i. e. Vīra-Vikramāditya I. It speaks of the Banavāsi twelve-thousand province as his nij-aīśvarya or "own proper lordship;" but it does not say specifically that he was ruling it. And it is dated in the month Mārgasīra (Nov.-Dec.) falling in A. D. 1182, of the Subhakrit samvatsara, Śaka-Samvat 1104 (expired). Another is an inscription at Haralahalli.³ This record says that, in the Mālava country, there was king Vikramāditya. It then mentions Vīra-Vikramāditya I. His sons, it says, were Jōma and Gutta II. And to Gutta and Padmaladēvi there was born the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Vikramāditya II., who was ruling the Banavāsi province at his capital of Guttavolal, with a certain Bāsīrāja as his Mahāpradhāna. This record, again, is dated in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1188, of the Plavaṅga samvatsara, 'S.-S. 1110 (current). It does not mention any paramount sovereign. But it has to be referred to the time of the Western Chālukya king Sōmēśvara IV. Another is an inscription at Chaudadāmpur.⁴ This record mentions first king Vikramāditya, who reigned at Ujjayanī in the Mālava country. "After him," it says, "others were born in the race of Chandragupta;" and, eventually, Vīra-Vikramāditya I. His sons were Jomma, or Jōyidēva I., and Gutta II. Gutta's wife was Padmaladēvi. And to them was born the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Vīra-Vikrama, otherwise called Āhavāditya-Vīra-Vikramāditya II., who was ruling the Banavāsi province at his capital of Guttavolal. This record is dated in the month Mārgasīra (Nov.-Dec.), falling in A. D. 1191, of the Virōdhikrit samvatsara, 'S.-S. 1113 (expired). An addition to it, dated at the winter solstice in the same year, seems also to mention Vīra-Vikramāditya II.⁵ This record, again, does not mention any paramount sovereign. At this time, the Gutta prince may have acknowledged either the Dēvagiri-Yādava king Bhīllama or his son Jaitugi I., or the Hoysala king Vīra-Ballāla II., as his master; or he may have been practically independent, pending the issue of the contest between the Yādavas of Dēvagiri and the Hoysalas for the southern provinces. And the last is another inscription at Haralāhalli.¹ This record mentions king Vikramāditya of Ujjēnī-pura, i. e. Ujjain. In his lineage, it says, after "several kings" whom it does not particularise, there was Vira-Vikramāditya I., also called Vikrama and Vikramānka, "who became illustrious in being called the lord of the Banavāsi province." To him were born Gutta II. and Jōyidēva I.² Gutta's wife was Padmaladēvi. To them was born the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Āhavāditya-Vira-Vikramāditya II., who was ruling the Banavāsi twelve-thousand at his capital of Guttavolal. And to him and to Pattamādēvi, there were born a daughter Tuḷvaladēvi or Tuḷvaladēvi, who was married to Ballāla, son of a prince named Siṃha, Siṅga, or Siṅgidēva, of the Śūryavamśa or Solar Race, lord of the Sāntālī maṇḍala,³ and two sons, Jōyidēva (Jōyidēva II.) and Vikrama (Vikramāditya III.). The record is dated in the month Chaitra (March-April), falling in A. D. 1213, of the Śrīmukha saṃvatsara, S.-S. 1136 (current). And it registers the building of a temple of Śiva, and the making of grants to it, by Vira-Vikramāditya II. This record, again, does not mention any paramount sovereign; and, as before, the Gutta prince may have been practically independent, pending the issue of the contest between the Dēvagiri-Yādava king Siṅghaṇa and the Hoysalas.

The Haralāhalli copper-plate grant of the Dēvagiri-Yādava king Siṅghaṇa,⁴ mentions, evidently as a feudatory of his, a Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Jōyidēva,—described as "supreme lord of Ujjayanī, the best of towns, born in the lineage of Chandragupta, and a forehead-ornament of the Gutta family,"—who is plainly to be identified with Jōyidēva II., son of Vira-Vikramāditya II. And it furnishes for him a date in the month Phālguna (Feb.-March), falling in A. D. 1238, of the Hēmalambin saṃvatsara, Śaka-Saṃvat 1160 (current), when, with his permission, a grant was made by the Dandandīyaka Chikkadēva.

And finally, three other inscriptions at Chaudādāmpur carry the pedigree a generation further. Two of them⁵ mention first the Mahāmāṇḍalēśvara Āhavāditya-Vira-Vikramāditya II., or, as one of them calls him, Vira-Vikrama. His son was Vikrama or Vikramānka. This person married Mailaladēvi. And their son was Gutta III.,⁶ who was ruling at his capital of Guttavolal. These two records connect with Gutta III. a date in the month Vaiśākha (April-May), falling in A. D. 1262, of the Dundubhi saṃvatsara, which in one of them is coupled with Śaka-Saṃvat 1185 (current) and in the other is cited as the third year of the reign of the Dēvagiri-Yādava king Mahādēva.

The third of them,¹ without any introductory pedigree, mentions three brothers, sons of Mailaladēvi,—viz., the Mahāmandalēśvara Gutta III., “lord of Ujjayanī, the best of towns, and born in the lineage of Chandragupta,” and Hiriyadēva, and Jōyidēva III. And it furnishes for them a date in the month Pausha, falling probably in January, A. D. 1265, of the Raktākshin samvatsara, S.-S. 1186 (expired). The three records all refer themselves to the reign of the Yādava king Mahādēva of Dēvagiri, thus indicating that the Mahāmandalēśvara Gutta III. was feudatory to him. But they do not define the extent of the rule of the Gutta prince.

DAKHAN HISTORY:
MUSALMÁN AND MARÁTHA,
A.D. 1300 - 1818.

Part I.—Poona Sa'ta'ra and Shola'pur.

BY
W. W. LOCH ESQUIRE, BOMBAY CIVIL SERVICE.

[CONTRIBUTED IN 1877.]

PART I.

THE districts which form the subject of this article, the home of the Maráthás and the birth-place of the Marátha dynasty, stretch for about 150 miles along the Sayhádri hills between the seventeenth and nineteenth degrees of latitude, and at one point pass as far as 160 miles inland. All the great Marátha capitals, Poona Sátára and Kolhápur, lie close to the Sayhádri under the shelter of some hill fort; while the Musalmán capitals, Ahmadnagar Bijápur Bedar and Gulbarga, are walled cities in the plain. Of little consequence under the earlier Musalmán rulers of the Dakhan; growing into importance under the kings of Bijápur and Ahmadnagar; rising with the rise of the state, the foundations of which Shiváji laid in the seventeenth century, these districts became in the eighteenth century the seat of an empire reaching from the Panjáb to the confines of Bengal and from Delhi to Mysor.

Early in the Christian era Maháráshtra is said to have been ruled by the great Saliváhana, whose capital was at Paithán on the Godávári. At a later period a powerful dynasty of Chálukya Rájputs reigned over a large part of Maháráshtra and the Karnátak, with a capital at Kalyán, 200 miles north-west of Sholápur. The Chálukyas reached their greatest power under Tálapa Deva in the tenth century, and became extinct about the end of the twelfth century, when the Jádhav or Yádav rájás of Devgiri or Daulatábád became supreme. This was the dynasty which was ruling at the time of the Musalmán invasion in A.D. 1294. We find, besides, that there was a rája at Panhála near Kolhápur at the end of the twelfth century, whose power extended as far north as the Níra river. He was conquered by Singhan the Rájput rája of Devgiri, whose camp is shown at Mhasurna near Pusesávli in the Sátára district. The Ghát Mátha or Highland Konkan was from an early period in the hands of the Sirké family.

The first Musalmán invasion took place in A.D. 1294, but the Yádav dynasty was not extinguished till A.D. 1312. The conquest of the country was long imperfect, and we find Farishtah recording an attack made in A.D. 1340, by Muhammad Túghlak, the emperor of Delhi, on Nágnák, a Koli chief, who held the strong fort of Kondhána now Sinhgad, twelve miles south-west of Poona, which was not reduced until after an eight months' siege.

The Dakhan remained subject to the emperor of Delhi till A.D. 1345, when the Musalmán nobles revolted from Muhammad Túghlak and established the Bahamani dynasty whose first capital was at Gulbarga about sixty miles east of Sholápur. The open country acknowledged the power of the Bahamani sovereigns without a struggle. In A.D. 1426 Ahmad Sháh Bahamani changed the capital to Bidar, said by Farishtah to have been an old Hindu capital, about a hundred miles farther east. Farishtah mentions that about A.D. 1436, in the reign of Alá-ud-dín Bahamani, Sholápur was seized by the king's brother Muhammad Khán, who had revolted; but he was soon defeated and the fort retaken.

The terrible famine called after Durgádevi, the Destroyer, is said to have lasted throughout Maháráshtra for twelve years from A.D. 1396 to 1408. The country was depopulated; the hills and strong places which had been conquered by the Musalmáns fell again into the hands of Maráthá chiefs, and the Bahamani kings had to recover the lost ground.

In A.D. 1420 an expedition under Malek-ul-Tujár was sent to subdue the Gháts and the Konkan. He put down the Rámoshi robbers in the Khatáo desh and the Mahádev hills; penetrated to Wái and even into the Konkan, and took measures for the cultivation of the land; but the effects of the expedition were not lasting. Another force sent in A.D. 1436 by Alá-ud-dín reduced the rájás of Báiri (Ráygad) and Sonkehr. At last in A.D. 1451 more systematic efforts were made to subdue the country. Malek-ul-Tujár was sent in command of a considerable force. He made Chákan, a village eighteen miles north of Poona, his head-quarters; a stone fort still existing was built there; the hill fort of Shivner, which overlooks the town of Junnar, was taken, and a Musalmán garrison placed in it. Junnar soon became the head-quarters of the Musalmáns in the west, and in a fairer country they could not have settled. Malek-ul-Tujár then overran the lands of the Sirké family, their chief surrendered, and induced the Musalmán leader to march against the rája of Kelna (now Vishálgad). When the invading forces were entangled in the dense wilds he gave information to the rája, who surrounded and massacred the greater number, a fate not unlike that which befell another Musalmán army in the defiles of the Gháts two hundred years later, when Shiváji achieved one of his most notable exploits. A few stragglers retired to Chákan, and quarrels broke out between the Mughals who held the fort and the Dakhan troops; the latter, being the more numerous, besieged the Mughals, forced them to surrender, and then treacherously murdered them, though many of them were Saiads. This story Farishtah relates at great length and with much feeling, dwelling with pleasure on the retribution which overtook the murderers of the descendants of the Prophet.

Máhmud
Gáwán,
A.D. 1472.

In A.D. 1472 Máhmud Gáwán, the great minister of the last independent Bahamani king, made another effort to subdue the hill country. He forced his way through the forests, and did not leave the country till he had reduced the lesser forts and finally Kelna (Vishálgad) itself. Subsequently he made a new distribution of the Bahamani dominions. Junnar was made the head-quarters of a province which comprehended Indápur, Wái, the Mán desh, Belgaum, and parts of the Konkan. The other districts on the Bhima were under Bijápur, while Sholápur Gulbarga and Purenda formed a separate province.

Yusúf Adil Sháh, the founder of the Bijápur dynasty, was made governor of Bijápur; Ahmad Sháh, the founder of the Ahmadnagar dynasty, was sent to Junnar; Gulbarga was entrusted to Dastur Dinár, an Abyssinian; while Purenda Sholápur and eleven districts were held by two brothers, Zein Khán and Khwája Jahán. Ahmad Nizám Sháh went to Junnar about A.D. 1485. He found that Shivner, the fort of Junnar, had fallen into the hands of the Maráthás, and he at once reduced it. He then took Cháwand, Lohogad, Purandhar, Kondhána (Sinhgad), and many forts in the Konkan, and brought his charge into good order.

The fall of the Bahamani dynasty was now at hand, and the great nobles had become virtually independent. The first who rose in revolt was Bahádur Geláni, who governed the country south of the Várna river; he was soon defeated and killed. Then Zein-ud-dín, the jáhgirdár of Chákan, rebelled with the aid of Yusúf Adil Sháh. Next Ahmad Nizám Sháh threw off his allegiance in 1489: he was attacked by Zeinud-dín, but the latter was driven into the fort of Chákan; the fort was stormed and Zein-ud-dín killed in the fight. About this time (A.D. 1489) Yusúf Adil Sháh of Bijápur also asserted his independence and made himself master of the country as far north as the Bhima.

The new kings of the Dakhan made a kind of partition treaty in A.D. 1491, by which the country north of the Níra and east of Karmála, together with some of the present Sholápur districts, were assigned to the Nizám Sháh king, while the country south of the Níra and Bhima was allotted to the Bijápur sovereign. The lesser chiefs who had joined in the revolt against the Bahamani kings were gradually subdued by the more powerful. Dastur Dinár, who held Gulbarga, was defeated and driven away in A.D. 1495, and again in A.D. 1498 by Yusúf Adil Sháh; but he returned each time, and it was not till A.D. 1504 that he was finally defeated and killed and Gulbarga annexed to the Bijápur dominions.

The districts of Purenda and Sholápur were held as mentioned above by the brothers Khwája Jahán and Zein Khán. In a quarrel between them, Ahmad Nizám Sháh took the part of Khwája Jahán and Yusúf Adil Sháh that of Zein Khán, who was thus enabled to get possession of the five and a half districts round Sholápur. These he held till after the death of Yusúf Adil Sháh. Kamál Khán, the regent, who ruled during the minority of Yusúf's son, wished to supplant the young king, and arranged with Amir Berid, the minister of the Bahamani king at Bidar, that he should be allowed to take Sholápur, while Amir Berid took the districts lately held by Dastur Dinár, and that both of them should dethrone their masters. In accordance with this agreement he besieged and took Sholápur in 1511, which with its districts was annexed to Bijápur. Amir Berid took Gulbarga, but Kamál Khán was soon after assassinated, and Gulbarga recovered. Purenda and its five and a half districts remained for many years under Khwája Jahán, who seems to have been a half-independent vassal of the king of Ahmadnagar.

Ahmadnagar
and Bijápur,
A.D. 1524-1550.

In A.D. 1523, when, after one of their numerous wars, peace was made between the kings of Bijápur and Ahmadnagar, the sister of Ismael Adil Sháh was given to Burhán Nizám Sháh and Sholápur was promised as her dowry, but it was not given up. During the next forty years the claim to Sholápur by the Nizám Sháh kings was the cause of constant wars. In A.D. 1524, in A.D. 1528, and in A.D. 1531, Burhán Nizám Sháh invaded the Sholápur districts, and each time he was defeated. Again in A.D. 1542 he overran them and made them over to Khwája Jahán, but they were restored on peace being made in the following year. Once more in 1548, Burhán took Gulbarga and Kalyán, and inflicted a severe defeat on Ibráhim Adil Sháh; and the next year he took Sholápur, again defeating the Bijápur forces; and for some years he held the conquered districts. Irritated at his defeats Ibráhim Adil Sháh suspected the fidelity of one of his chief nobles Seif Ein-ul-Mulk Geláni, and drove him into revolt by his harsh treatment; he retired into the Mán desh, and by degrees overran the country as far south as Miraj, defeating the detachments sent against him, and finally an army commanded by the king in person, whom he drove into Bijápur. In this difficulty Ibráhim applied to Rámraj, king of Bijánagar, who sent a force which defeated Seif Ein-ul-Mulk and forced him to fly to the Ahmadnagar territory, where he was killed.

Battle of Tálíkot,
A.D. 1564.

After his accession to the throne, Ali Adil Sháh, son of Ibráhim, made an alliance with Rámraj and attacked the king of Ahmadnagar. In the war which followed, the latter was borne down by the superior forces of his enemies and his capital was twice besieged, but he still held the fort of Sholápur. At last (A.D. 1563) the Musalmán kings, alarmed at the power of Rámraj, and disgusted with his insolence, formed a league against him. Husain Nizám Sháh gave his sister Chánd Bibi to Ali Adil Sháh and with her Sholápur and its districts, and next year was fought the great battle of Tálíkot, which resulted in the death of Rámraj and the complete defeat of his army.

The Mughals,

For some years there was peace; but in A.D. 1590 Diláwar Khán, who had been regent of Bijápur, fled to Ahmadnagar, and urged Burhán Nizám Sháh II. to try and recover Sholápur. In A.D. 1592 they advanced into the Bijápur territory, but Ibráhim Adil Sháh managed to win back Diláwar Khán; and having got him into his power, sent him as a prisoner to the fort of Sátara and quickly forced the Ahmadnagar troops to retire.

Soon after this the Mughal princes of Delhi began to invade the Dakhan, and in A.D. 1600 Ahmadnagar fell. The country was however only temporarily subdued, and was speedily recovered by Malek Ambar, an Abyssinian chief, who made Aurangábád, then called Kharki, the capital of the Nizám Sháh kings. In A.D. 1616, Sháh Jahán again conquered the greater part of the Ahmadnagar territory; but in A.D. 1629 the country was given up by the Mughal governor Khán Jahán Lodi. A war ensued, and in A.D. 1633 Daulatábád was taken and the king made prisoner; but Shahji Bhonsla, one of the leading Marátha chiefs, set up another member of the royal family, overran the Gangthari and Poona districts, and with the help of the Bijápur troops drove back the Mughals from Purená. Sháh Jahán now marched into the Dakhan in person, besieged Bijápúr, and forced the king to come to terms (A.D. 1636). The country seized by Sháhji was then easily recovered; that chief surrendered in A.D. 1637, and the Nizám Sháh dynasty came to an end. The country north of the Bhima, including Junnar, was annexed to the Mughal territory, and that south of it was made over to Bijápúr. Sháhji took service under the king of Bijápúr, and received the jáhgir of Poona and Supa, to which Indápúr Baramati and the Máwal country near Poona were added.

Under the Bijápúr kings the Maráthás began to make themselves conspicuous. The Bárgis or light horse furnished by the Maráthá chiefs played a prominent part in the wars with the Mughals; the less important forts were left in their hands, and the revenue was collected by Hindu officers under the Musalmán Mokásdárs. Several of the old Maráthá families received their offices of desh mukh and sardesh mukh from the Bijápúr kings. The kingdom of Bijápúr was destined to survive that of Ahmadnagar by fifty years; but, weakened by its powerful Mughal neighbour and by internal dissensions, it was gradually falling to pieces. This was the opportunity for the predatory Maráthá chiefs, and a leader arose in Shiváji, the son of Sháhji Bhonsla, who knew how to unite the Maráthás into a nation by inspiring them with a hatred for their Musalmán masters, and how to take advantage of the constant quarrels and increasing weakness of those masters.

The ancestors of Shiváji come from Verola or Ellora. Máloji, Shiváji's grandfather, was the first of the family who rose to note. He married the sister of the náik of Phaltan, and about the beginning of the seventeenth century was put in charge of Shivner and Chákan and received the districts of Poona and Supa in jáhgir. His son Sháhji married the daughter of Lokhji Jádhav of Sindkhed, one of the chief nobles of the Nizám Sháh court, and Shiváji was born at Shivner in A.D. 1627. The jáhgir obtained by Sháhji from the king of Bijápúr was managed by a Bráhman named Dádáji Kondev, who had also charge of Shiváji. Dádáji made Poona his head-quarters, and his management of the districts was able and successful. Sháhji was for many years employed in the Karnatak, where another large jáhgir had been granted to him.

When Shiváji grew up he associated much with the Máwalis, the men of the wild country west of Poona, and began to think of establishing himself as an independent chief. To this end, in A.D. 1646 he obtained from the commandant the surrender of the fort of Torna in the rugged country near the sources of the Níra river. While he sent agents to Bijápúr to make excuses for his conduct, he began to build another fort on a hill called Morbadh, to which he gave the name of Ráygad (A.D. 1647). Dádáji Kondev died about this time, and Shiváji took charge of the jáhgir, appropriating the revenues to his own use. He then set to work to gain the forts not already in his possession. Chákan was in charge of Phirangoji Narsála, whom he won over and left in command. He obtained Kondána by bribing the Musalmán commandant; he surprised Supa, which was held by Báji Mohita, the brother of his father's second wife; and finally he interfered in the quarrels of the sons of the commandant of Purandhar, and secured the fort. Having thus gained a firm hold of his father's jáhgir, he began to make encroachments on the adjoining country. The district south of the Níra, from the Gháts as far east as Shirwal, was in charge of Bándal, the deshmukh of the Hardas Máwal. His head-quarters were at Rohira. There was a Musalmán Mokásdár at Wái who held the fort of Pándugad, and the hills from the Krishna to the Várna were under the rája of Jávli, a member of the Moré family, which had dispossessed the Sirkés, the old rulers of the Gháts. A Musalmán governor was stationed at Kalyán in the Konkan.

In A.D. 1648 Shiváji surprised Lohogad, the state prison of the Ahmadnagar kings, and Rájmáchi, both in the Máwals, and several forts in the Konkan including Ráiri or Ráygad; meanwhile Abáji Sondev, one of his Bráhman adherents, pushed on to Kalyán near Bombay, took the town, and made the governor prisoner. Shiváji at once took possession of the district appointing Abáji subhedár. The Bijápur court could not overlook this open rebellion, and orders were given to Báji Ghorpade of Mudhol to arrest Sháhji, who was suspected of encouraging Shiváji. Báji accomplished his task by treachery, for which he afterwards paid dearly, and Sháhji was kept in confinement till A.D. 1653, during which time Shiváji was obliged to remain quiet. On his father's release he again began to plan attacks on the neighbouring country. The rája of Jávli had resisted all his endeavours to win him over, and Shiváji therefore sent his agents Rágho Ballál and Sambháji Káwaji to examine the country. They suggested that the rája might easily be assassinated, and Shiváji approved of their idea. He collected a strong force in the forests round Mahábaleshvar, and when his agents had murdered the rája and his brother, the troops attacked and stormed Jávli and soon reduced the fort of Vásota and the surrounding country (A.D. 1653). Shiváji next turned on the deshmukh of the Hardas Máwal, stormed the fort of Rohira, and killed him in the fight. To strengthen his hold of the country, he directed a fort to be built at the source of the Koyna river near Mahábaleshvar; the work was carried out by Moro Pant Pingle, and the fort was called Pratápgad.

Shiváji now ventured to attack the territory of the Mughals, and in May 1657 he surprised the town of Junnar and carried off much plunder to Ráygad. The disturbances which took place in Hindustán through the rivalry of the sons of Sháh Jahán prevented his inroads from being punished. At last, in A.D. 1659 the Bijápur government determined to make an effort to suppress him, and sent a strong force under Afzul Khán against him. Afzul Khán proceeded as far as Wái, and then sent a Bráhman named Gopináth Pant to treat with Shiváji, who had made professions of submission. Shiváji won over the Bráhman, who in his turn persuaded Afzul Khán to have a personal interview with Shiváji, who was then at Pratápgad. The Musalmán army marched to Jávli, while Shiváji brought all his forces under Moro Pant Pingle and Netáji Pálkar and surrounded them. He then, attended by Tánáji Málasra, one of his oldest friends, met Afzul Khán who was accompanied by a single armed follower, stabbed him, and gave the signal for the assault to his troops. The Musalmán army, bewildered at the loss of its chief, gave way, and was utterly dispersed. Shiváji followed up his success with vigour. Panhála and Páwangad surrendered to Annáji Dattu, one of his officers, while he himself took Vasantgad, Rangna, Kena (Vishálgad), and all the neighbouring forts. A force was sent against him, but he routed it and plundered the country as far as Bijápur. Next year (A.D. 1660) another army was sent against him under Sidi Johár, when he retired to Panhála, where he was closely besieged for some months, and at last, despairing of holding out, he escaped by stratagem to Rangna. The Mughals, disheartened by their want of success, made no further progress until early in A.D. 1661, when Ali Adil Sháh marched in person to Karad, and thence to Panhála, which he reduced. Many other forts were surrendered to him, but he was called off by a rebellion in the Karnátak, and directed Báji Ghorpade and a Musalmán noble to prosecute the war. Shiváji took this opportunity of revenging himself on Báji Ghorpade for his father's capture, surprised and killed him at Mudhol, and the expedition was stopped. It was soon after this (A.D. 1662) that Shiváji changed his head-quarters from Rájgad to Ráiri, which he called Ráygad. He had public offices built there by Abáji Sondev, and Ráygad remained the capital of the Maráthás for nearly forty years.

As Shiváji's incursions into the Mughal territory continued, Aurangzib sent a force against him under Shaista Khán, who made Poona his head-quarters. He then besieged Chákan, but though a small fort, it held out under Phirangoji Narsala for nearly two months; and Shaista Khán, discouraged by the difficulty of his first undertaking, did little else. While he was at Poona Shiváji performed one of his best known feats. He descended with a few followers from Sinhgad, entered Poona unperceived, and surprised Shaista Khán, who was living in Shiváji's old house. Shaista Khán escaped with a wound, but most of his attendants and his son were killed. Shiváji then retired to Sinhgad in safety, and next day a body of Mughal horse, which rode out towards Sinhgad, was surprised and routed by Netáji Pálkar. The Mughals soon afterwards withdrew leaving strong garrisons in Chákan and Junnar. Shiváji now extended his ravages from Surat in one direction to Bárcelor in the other, till at last Aurangzib was roused, and in A.D. 1665 sent a large army under Rája Jaysing and Dilir Khán against him. They occupied Poona, and while Dilir Khán besieged Purandhar, Jaysing blockaded Sinhgad and pushed on to Ráygad. Purandhar made a gallant defence; but Shiváji feeling he was unable to resist longer, came into Jaysing's camp, and agreed to surrender all his forts but twelve, and to join the Mughal army in the war against Bijápur. His offer was accepted, and he accordingly accompanied the Mughal army on its march, and on the way the Phaltan district was overrun and the fort of Tátora stormed by Shiváji's troops. While the war was going on, Shiváji, in A.D. 1666, having given over charge of the territory that remained in his possession to Moro Pant Pingle, Abáji Sondev, and Annáji Dattu, went to Delhi to pay his respects to Aurangzib; but being slighted, and treated as a prisoner, he escaped and returned to the Dakhan at the end of the year. The Mughal army, which had failed to take Bijápur, had in the meantime retired, leaving garrisons in Lohagad, Sinhgad, and Purandhar; the other forts were either dismantled or left in charge of a weak party, and they were all reoccupied by Moro Pant.

Soon after his return from Delhi in 1667, Shiváji opened communications with Sultán Mázum, son of Aurangzib, then governor of the Dakhan, which ended in Shiváji being confirmed in his jághir of Poona, Súpa, and Chákan, the fortresses of Purandhar and Sinhgad being retained by the Mughals. It was not till A.D. 1670 that Shiváji made any attempt to recover them. Aurangzib had directed the capture of Pratáp Ráo Gujar and the body of horse which were with Sultán Mázum; they escaped, and in retaliation Shiváji planned the capture of these important forts. Sinhgad was stormed after a desperate fight by a body of Máwalis headed by Tánáji Málusra, who fell in the action, and Purandhar was taken soon after with less difficulty. An attempt on Shivner failed, but Lohogad was surprised and several forts to the north of Junnar were captured by Moro Pant.

In 1671 another effort was made by Aurangzib, and a force despatched under Mohábat Khán against Shiváji. One half attacked Chákan and the other half the fort of Sálher. Chákan was taken by the next year; but the detachment at Sálher was utterly defeated by the Maráthás under Moro Pant and Pratáp Ráo Gujar, and the Mughals hastily retreated to Aurangábád.

Soon after this (A.D. 1671) Ali Adil Sháh died at Bijápur, and Shiváji took advantage of the confusion which ensued to recover Panhála and sack Hubli. In May 1672 he surprised Párlí and then attacked the neighbouring fort of Sátára, the state prison of Bijápur, which held out till September. The forts of Chandan, Wandan, Pandugad, Nándgiri, and Táтора all fell into his hands in the same campaign. The Bijápur troops made two attempts to recover Panhála, but without success, though in one action Pratáp Ráo Gujar was killed, and his army would have been routed but for the exertions of Hasáji Mohita and two of his officers, afterwards well known as Santáji Ghorpade and Dhanáji Jádhav. Shiváji gave Hasáji the title of Hambir Ráo and the office of Sarnobat, which had been held by Pratáp Ráo Gujar.

In June 1674 Shiváji ventured openly to declare his independence by being formally crowned at Ráygad; his ministry was reformed, and new names were given to the offices. His chief ministers (Asht Pradhán) were Moro Pant Pingle Peshwa or Mukhya Pradhán, Rámchandra Pant Bawrikar the son of Abáji Sondev Mujumdár or Pant Amát, Annáji Dattu Pant Sachiv, Hambir Ráo Mohita Senápati, and Janárdan Pant the Sámant. Of the officers not among the Asht Pradhán the chief was Baláji Auji, his chitnis, a Parbhu. In 1675 Shiváji again began hostilities with the Mughals, and Moro Pant retook several of the forts near Junnar, but again failed in an attempt on Shivner. Shiváji also regained the forts between Panhála and Táтора; but while he was occupied in the Konkan with the siege of Phonda, these forts were taken by the desh mukhs of Phaltan and Maláwdi acting for the king of Bijápur. Next year Shiváji again recovered them; and, in order to strengthen his hold on the country, he built the intermediate forts of Vardangad, Bhushangad, Sadāshivgad, and Machandragad. Having completed these arrangements he set out on an expedition to the Karnātak, where he took Jinji, Bellāri, and other forts, and overran his father's jāhgir round Bangalor held by his half brother Venkāji. He returned to Rāygar about the middle of A.D. 1678, and next year made an alliance with Bijāpur, which was threatened by the Mughal army under Dilir Khān. Unable to divert the Mughals from the siege of Bijāpur, Shivāji ravaged the country north of the Bhīma, penetrating as far as Jālāna about thirty miles south of Ajānta; but on his return he was intercepted by a force near Sangamner, and made his way to the hill fort of Patta only after a hard-fought action. Here he stayed till he was recalled south by the entreaties of the regent of Bijāpur and the desertion of his son Sambhāji to the Mughals. His troops cut off the supplies of the Mughal army, defeated two detachments, and forced Dilir Khān to raise the siege, while Sambhāji returned to his father. Soon after this Shivāji died at Rāygar in April 1680. At the time of his death he held the country from the Harankāshi river on the south to the Indráyani river on the north. Supa, Indāpur and Bāramati were his jāhgir districts, and the forts between Tātorā and Panhāla mark his boundary on the east. Besides this tract he had territories in the Konkan, in the Karnātak, in Bāglān, and in Khāndesh.

Shivāji left two sons, Sambhāji and Rām Rāja, the former of whom was in confinement at Panhalla. The majority of the ministers desired to put Rām Rāja on the throne; and Sambhāji, who managed to get possession of Panhāla, was besieged there by Janārdan Pant Sumant. He contrived, however, to win over a body of the besieging troops, surprised Janārdan Pant in Kolhāpur, and being joined by Hambir Rāo Mohita and others of the ministers, he marched to Rāygar, which surrendered. He now revenged himself savagely on his opponents, putting to death Rām Rāja's mother Soyābāi Sirké and several officers, and throughout his reign his cruelty and violence made him an object of dislike to his countrymen. Nor did intrigues against him cease. In A.D. 1681 a plot was formed by members of the Sirké family, to which Rām Rāja's mother had belonged. In this Annāji Dattu, the Pant Sachiv, and Balāji Auji Chitnis being implicated, both of these old servants of Shivāji were executed.

The usual inroads took place into the Mughal territory, and at last Aurangzib determined to take command of his army in person, and arrived at Ahmadnagar in the year A.D. 1684. He sent out detachments to reduce the forts in the Gangthari, and, in A.D. 1685, while his son Azam Shāh took Sholāpur and so began the war with Bijāpur, Khān Jahān took Poona and the open country north of Sinhgad. The emperor then marched to Sholāpur, and thence to Bijāpur, which fell in October 1686, and the country round at once submitted to him. Eleven months later Golkonda surrendered, and Aurangzib was left in apparent possession of the whole country, which he endeavoured to bring into better order.

Execution,
A.D. 1689.

Rám Rájá.

Sháhu
a Prisoner,

Shirzi Khán, a Bijápur noble who had joined the emperor, invaded the Sátára districts; but was met and defeated at Wái by Hambir Ráo the Senápati, who himself fell in the action, and for a time the Maráthás recovered much of the open country: but Sambhájí was daily growing more imbecile and indolent under the influence of his favourite a Kanoja Bráhmañ named Kalusha. No organized resistance could be made, and in A.D. 1689 the country was again subdued by the Mughals as far as the hills, and the forts between Tátora and Panhála were taken.

Aurangzib now marched to Akluj on the Níra, and then to Tulápur at the junction of the Indráyani with the Bhíma, intending to subdue the hill country thoroughly; and while there Sambhájí was brought in as a prisoner and executed (August 1689). He had been captured by a Mughal officer named Takarib Khán and his son Ikhlas Khán in command at Kolhápur, who had penetrated to Sangmëshvar in the Konkan, and surprised him with his favourite Kalusha.

Sambhájí left a child named Shivájí afterwards known as Sháhu; but as he was only six years old, Sambhájí's brother Rám Rájá was made regent. The Marátha chiefs now met to decide on a plan for opposing Aurangzib, whose power may well have seemed to them overwhelming: They decided that the principal forts should be carefully garrisoned; that Rám Rájá should move from one fort to the other, and if hard pressed should retire to Jinji in the Karnátak. The Marátha chiefs were to plunder and annoy the enemy in their old fashion. The principal men at this time were Pralhád Niráji son of the late Nyáyádhish Pradhán, Janárdan Pant Sámant, Rámchandra Pant Bourikar Amát, Máhádáji Náik Pánsambal the Senápati, Santáji Ghorpade, Dhanáji Jádhav, and Khandaráo Dábháde.

The Mughals continued to advance, and in A.D. 1690 Ráygad fell and Sháhu was made prisoner. On this Rám Rájá made his escape to Jinji, accompanied by Pralhád Niráji, Santáji Ghorpade, Dhanáji Jádhav, and Khandaráo Dábháde, while Rámchandra Pant was left in charge of the hill districts with a Bráhmañ named Parashráñ Trimbak under him. His head-quarters were at Sátára. Santáji Ghorpade was soon after made commander-in-chief, and was sent with Dhanáji Jádhav to collect men and plunder the Mughals, while Pralhád Niráji, who stayed at Jinji, was made Pratinidhi. Against them and the other Marátha chiefs Aurangzib made little progress. Rámchandra Pant kept his own districts clear, and even surprised the Mughal fauzdár of Wái. It was under Rámchandra's command that the heads of the families of Pavár, Thorát, and Atáwla came under notice. Aurangzib, in A.D. 1694, after moving slowly along the banks of the Bhíma, at last fixed on Brahmapuri, a village on that river, as his head-quarters, and built a cantonment, where he stayed five years.

Meanwhile the siege of Jinji had been going on in a desultory manner. Santáji and Dhanáji inflicted several defeats on Mughal detachments, and once forced them to raise the siege; but at last Zulfikár Khán was ordered peremptorily to take the fort. He first allowed Rám Rájá to escape, and then pressing the siege, soon became master of the fort. Rám Rájá arrived at Vishálgad at the end of

A.D. 1697, and soon went to Sátára, which he made the seat of government. Rámchandra Pant, who had so ably managed the government in his absence, was made Pant Amát, and one of his kárkúns, Sankráji Náráyan Gaudekar, was made Pant Sachiv, and is the ancestor of the present chief. Timoji Hanwanta, the son of Janárdan Pant, was made Pant Pratinidhi; but he did not keep the office long, as in A.D. 1700 Tárábái bestowed it on Parashráam Trimbak.

Santáji Ghorpade, the Senápati, had for some time been on bad terms with his lieutenant Dhanáji Jádhav; at last an open quarrel broke out, and Rám Rája took the part of Dhanáji. Santáji's troops deserted him, and he was hunted down and at last surprised and killed in the Sátára districts by Nágoji Máne, deshmuks of Mhaswar, who as a reward was taken into the imperial service. The office of Senápati was given to Dhanáji.

In A.D. 1699, Rám Rája made a plundering expedition on a large scale through Gangthari, Báglán, Khándesh, and Berár, and levied chauth. Irritated by this the emperor determined again to attempt the reduction of the hill forts. Leaving his cantonment at Brahmapuri he moved on Sátára. Wasantgad fell first and then Sátára was invested. Aurangzib pitched his camp near the village of Karinja, his son Ázam Sháh was stationed on the west at Sháhpur, Shirzi Khán on the south, and Tarbiat Khán on the east. Though thus surrounded Sátára held out for several months, as provisions were brought in through the connivance of some of the imperial commanders. This was stopped at last; the defences were mined, and the garrison surrendered. Párlí was then attacked and fell in June, and the Mughals retreated to Káwaspur on the Mán river to avoid the rains.

In the meantime Rám Rája died at Ráygad, leaving two sons, the older of whom, Shiváji, was put on the throne with his mother Tárábái as regent. The war went on as before. In the next few years Aurangzib reduced all the principal forts from Purandhar to Panhala; but the Maráthás plundered in his rear, and the great families, the Mánkaris, began to side more openly with them. In A.D. 1705, after the capture of Ráygad and Torna, Aurangzib stayed for some time near Junnar; then marched to Bijápur, and thence to besiege Vákinkera, a village held by Pennáik, a plundering Berad chief. While engaged here his work in the hills was being undone and the forts were being retaken. Panhala and Pávangad were surprised by Rámchandra Pant, and the former became the residence of Tárábái. Parashráam Trimbak, the Pant Pratinidhi, took Vasantgad and Sátára, while Sankráji Náráyan, the Pant Sachiv, recovered Sinhgad, Ráygad, Rohira, and other forts. After Vákinkera was taken Aurangzib returned hard pressed by the Maráthás, and reached Ahmadnagar in A.D. 1707. Zulfikár Khán retook Sinhgad; but it was almost immediately regained by Sankráji Náráyan, and in February 1707 Aurangzib died at Ahmadnagar. With him perished all hope of crushing the Marátha power, and thirteen years after his death Marátha independence was formally recognized by the emperor of Delhi.

contest between the sons of Aurangzib was going on. Hoping to keep the Maráthás occupied by internal quarrels, Azam Sháh, on his march northwards, released Sháhu the son of Sambháji, under condition of allegiance to the imperial crown. Sháhu gained over to his side several chiefs, among whom were Parsoji Bhonsla, Chimáji Dámodar, Haibatráo Nimbálkar, and Nimáji Sindia, and marched south with a large force. Dhanáji Jádhav, who had been recovering the Poona districts, had defeated Lodi Khán the fauzdár of Poona, and retaken Chákan, marched with the Pratinidhi, Parashráam Trimbak, to oppose Sháhu. The armies met at Khed on the Bhíma, but Parashráam Trimbak, finding he was not supported by Dhanáji, whom Sháhu had secretly gained over, fled to Sátára, while Dhanáji openly joined Sháhu.

The Accession of Sháhu,
A.D. 1708.

The united armies now marched by Chandan and Vandan on Sátára; the fort was surrendered by the commander, a Musalmán, who imprisoned the Pratinidhi, and Sháhu entered the city and was formally seated on the throne (March 1708). Dhanáji was confirmed as Senápati, and one of his kárkúns, Báláji Vishvanáth Bhat, the founder of the Peshwa dynasty, now came into notice. Gadádhar Pralhád was made Pratinidhi and Bahiro Pant Pingle Peshwa.

Kolhápur,
A.D. 1710.

The war between the two branches of the house of Shiváji went on generally in favour of Sháhu. In the year after his accession Sháhu took Panhála and Vishálgad, but was repulsed in an attack on Rangna. At the end of the year Dhanáji died, and his son Chandrasen was made Senápati in his place. In A.D. 1710 Panhála was retaken by Tárábái, and this fort and the neighbouring city of Kolhápur became her residence and the capital of the younger branch of the family of Shiváji. Tárábái's chief adherents were Rámchandra Pant the Amát, and Sankráji Náráyan the Pant Sachiv; and in A.D. 1711 Sháhu determined to reduce the territory of the latter chief, which lay round the sources of the Níra. Rájgad had been taken, when the war was ended by the suicide of the Sachiv, and Sháhu took the opportunity to conciliate his party by confirming Náro Shankar the son of the Pant Sachiv in his father's estate and title.

Maráthá
Quarrels.

Though Sháhu was now firmly seated on the throne, the country was in a state of great confusion; the petty chiefs fortified themselves in their villages and plundered everywhere; and it was some time before order could be restored. The relations between Chandrasen Jádhav and his father's kárkún, Báláji Vishvanáth, had long been far from cordial, and in the year 1713 an open quarrel burst out. Báláji was forced to fly, and first went to Purandhar, where he was refused admittance, and then to Pándugad, at which place he got shelter and where he was besieged by Chandrasen. Sháhu took Báláji's side and ordered Haibatráo Nimbálkar, the sar-lashkar, to raise the siege. He met Chandrasen at Deur, and routed him, whereon the latter retired, first to Kolhápur and then to Nizám-ul-Mulk, the Mughal governor of the Dakhan, who gave him a jáhgir at Báiki. He was accompanied by Ghátge Shirzi Ráo of Kágál and Rambháji Nimbálkar, who afterwards distinguished himself in the Mughal service and received the title of Ráo Rambha, which remained in the family for many years. The office of Senápati was given to Mánáji Moré.

Soon after the arrival of the fugitive chiefs, Nizám-ul-Mulk declared war with Sháhu, who sent Báláji Vishvanáth with a force to join Haibatráo Nimbálkar. A battle was fought near Purandhar with no decisive result, but the Maráthás fell back to the Sálpí pass, and Rambháji Nimbálkar overran the Poona district. After a time Nizám-ul-Mulk withdrew to Aurangábád.

Sháhu's Attempts at Order.

Sháhu now attempted to bring the country into order. A Bráhma named Krishnaráo Khatáokar had collected a body of men in the Máhádev hills, and was levying contributions on all sides. Damáji Thorát had fortified the village of Hingni, forty miles east of Poona, and committed similar depredations. Udáji Chawhán seized the fort of Battis Shirála in the Várna valley, and Sháhu was obliged to win him over by granting him the chauth of Shirála and Karád. Báláji Vishvanáth set out to reduce Damáji Thorát, but was treacherously seized by him, and released only on the payment of a large ransom. After his release he marched against Krishnaráo Khatáokar, and with the help of Shripat Ráo, the Pratinidhi's son, routed him at Aundh. Krishnaráo then submitted and was granted the village of Khatáo in inám. After this Báláji, who had effected a satisfactory arrangement with Angria, Shiváji's admiral in the Konkan, was in A.D. 1714 made Peshwa in the place of Bahiro Pant Ping'le, and he chose Ábáji Pant Purandhare as his Mutálik or deputy, and Rámáji Pant Bhánu, the ancestor of the famous Nána Phadnavis, as his Phadnavis or secretary. Soon afterwards Haibatráo Nimbálkar died, and his office was given to Dáwalshi Somvanshi, whereon his son went over to Nizám-ul-Mulk and received Bársi as a jáhgir. In the meantime Damáji Thorát had seized the young Pant Sachiv, and an expedition was again planned against him. Báláji managed first to effect the Sachiv's release, and in return received the Sachiv's rights in the Poona district and the fort of Purandhar, and Damáji was soon after defeated and taken prisoner.

Rise of the Peshwás,
A.D. 1715.

The following year (A.D. 1715) Báláji induced the Mughal officers in charge of Poona to make it over to him, and he began to bring it into order and lay the foundation of the future power of his family. He had become the leading minister of Sháhu, and by his advice the Maráthás began to interfere in the quarrels at Delhi and to attempt to get a formal grant of the territory occupied by them. In A.D. 1718 Báláji marched to Delhi with a force of Maráthás as an ally of the Saiad ministers, and stayed there till A.D. 1720, when he obtained the desired grants of the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Dakhan and the sovereignty of the districts south of the Bhíma and north of the Varda and Tungbhadra from Poona to Kolhápúr, some parganáas in the Karnáta, and several in the Konkan. The districts of Akalkot and Nevása, granted to Sháhu on his marriage by Aurangzíb, were also given up.

Soon after his return from Delhi Báláji died; and in A.D. 1721 his son Báji Ráo was made Peshwa in his place, though his appointment was opposed by Shripatráo, the son of Parashráam Trimbak, now Fratinidhi. Khandaráo Dábháde, who had been made Senápati in A.D. 1716, also died about this time, and was succeeded by his son Trimbakráo, with Piláji Gaikwár as second in command. Báji Ráo while preserving his superiority at home, directed his attention chiefly to conquests in Hindustán, and it was under him that Malhárji Holkar, a Dhangar from the village of Hol on the Nira, and Ránoji Sindia, a Marátha of Kanarkhed near Sátára, rose to note. Another of his officers, Udáji Pavár Vishwás Ráo, now established himself at Dhár in Málwa.

The quarrel between the two branches of the Marátha royal family, which had been slumbering for some time, was revived about A.D. 1727 by Nizám-ul-Mulk, now master of the Dakhan. War followed between the Nizám and Sháhu, in which the former was worsted, and came to terms; but in 1729, Sambháji, rája of Kolhápuri, being joined by Udáji Chawhán, crossed the Várna; he was soon surprised by the Pratinidhi and driven back, and Tárábái, the widow of Rám Rája, was taken prisoner and brought to Sátára. The disaster induced Sambháji to make peace, and in A.D. 1730 a treaty was framed by which the Várna and the Krishna were made the boundaries of the two states. Tásgaon, Miraj, and other districts were ceded to Sháhu.

The Dakhan now enjoyed peace for some years, while the Maráthás were engaged in the Konkan Gujarát and Hindustán. Soon after the peace with Kolhápuri, Trimbakráo Dábháde, incited by Nizám-ul-Mulk, marched against Báji Ráo to depose him from his superiority; but Báji Ráo, ever on the alert, met him near Baroda and completely defeated him. Trimbakráo fell in the action, and his infant son Yashvantráo was made Senápati, and Piláji Gaikwár was appointed his guardian (A.D. 1731). Ráygad, which since its capture by Aurangzib had been held by the Sidi of Janjira, was recovered in A.D. 1735. In A.D. 1740 Báji Ráo, the greatest of the Peshwás, died near the Narbada, in the midst of schemes for the conquest of the Dakhan. He had raised himself to a complete pre-eminence among the Marátha chiefs, and had acquired large territories in Málwa, but outwardly he was still subordinate to Sháhu.

Transfer of Sovereignty to the Peshwa,
A.D. 1749.

Báláji was appointed Peshwa in his father's place, though the nomination was opposed by the creditors of Báji Ráo, who had died deeply in debt. A few more years passed quietly in the Dakhan while the Marátha troops overran Hindustán and penetrated into Bengal Orissa and the Karnátak. At last in A.D. 1749, Sháhu, who had long been imbecile, died, and the change which had been impending took place; the sovereignty passed from the Marátha rájas to the Bráhmán Peshwás. Sháhu left no direct heirs, and before his death disputes had arisen between his wife Sakwárbái Sirké, who declared for Sambháji the Kolhápuri rája, and Tárábái who brought forward a boy whom she called her grandson, Rája Rám, son of Shiváji, who she said had been kept in concealment since his birth. Jagjivan the Pratinidhi, brother of Shripatráo, took the side of Sakwárbái, while Báláji supported the claim of Rám. Immediately Sháhu died, Báláji seized the town and fort of Sátára and took the Pratinidhi and Sakwárbái prisoners. The latter he forced to perform the rite of sati or widow-sacrifice, and the former he imprisoned in a hill fort.

On the strength of a deed given to him by Sháhu, he assumed the management of the Marátha empire, agreeing to acknowledge the independence of the Kolhápúr state and to preserve the jáhgirs of the chiefs. He won over to his side Rághoji Bhonsla, whom he confirmed in his possessions in Berár, as also he did Yashvant Ráo Dábháde in Gujarát, and Fatehsing Bhonsla as rája of Akalkot. The districts in Málwa, conquered by Báji Ráo, were divided between Holkar, Sindia, Pavár, and other chiefs. Jagjivan the Pratinidhi was soon released, but much of his jáhgir west of the Krishna, between the Várna and Urmodi rivers, was taken from him.

The change of rulers was generally agreed in. Yamáji Sevdev, the mutálik of the Pratinidhi, raised an insurrection and threw himself into the fort of Sângola near Pandharpur; but this revolt was at once suppressed by Sadáshiv Bháu, cousin of the Peshwa. Finally, before proceeding to take part in the dispute between the sons of Nizám-ul-Mulk, the Peshwa persuaded the Pant Sachiv to give him up the fort of Sinhgad in exchange for those of Tung and Tikona, and he thus gained the fortress which threatened his capital, Poona. He gave up the fort of Sátára to Tárábái, the rája being kept in the city with a large establishment of attendants.

When the Peshwa had gone (A.D. 1751) Tárábái tried to rouse Rám Rája to revolt. Finding this useless, she sent for Damáji Gaíkwár, and on his approach invited the rája into the fort and made him prisoner. The Peshwa's officers in Sátára marched to meet Damáji at Arla on the Krishna, then retired to Nimb, where they were defeated, and Damáji joined Tárábái. Several forts were given up to her, but Nána Purandhare again attacked Damáji and forced him into the Jor Khora, a valley near Wái, where he waited hoping for aid from the Pratinidhi at Karád. The Peshwa hearing of the danger, came up with his army and surrounded Damáji; and then, while amusing him with negotiations, suddenly attacked and took him prisoner and sent him to Poona. Tárábái he left in possession of Sátára and of the person of the rája, as another enemy was pressing on him.

The Peshwa had sided with Gázi-ud-dín as a claimant to the Nizám's throne against his brother Salábat Jang; and when the latter by the aid of French troops had secured his succession, he determined to punish the Peshwa, and invaded the Poona districts with the French leader Bussy at the head of a disciplined force. Notwithstanding the efforts of the Marátha army under Máhádáji Pant Purandhare, the Mughals advanced, sacked Ránjan-gaon, and destroyed Talegaon Dhamdhare. They were there fiercely attacked, and almost routed by the Maráthás, but were saved by Bussy and his artillery, and again advanced as far as Koregaon on the Bhíma. Here Salábat Jang heard that the fort of Trimbak near Násik had been taken by the Maráthás, and returned to Ahmadnagar to get his heavy guns for the siege of the fort. Early in 1752 he moved towards Junnar, but he was harassed by the Maráthás, his troops were mutinous, and danger was threatening from the north, whence his brother Gázi-ud-dín was approaching with a large army. He therefore came to terms with the Peshwa, and turned to meet his brother. The whole Marátha force also collected near Aurangábád, and though Gázi-ud-dín was poisoned and war averted, Salábat Jang confirmed a cession of territory promised by Gázi-ud-dín to the Maráthás, comprising the greater part of Khándesh and the Gangthari.

During the absence of the Peshwa Tárábái collected a force of Rámoshis and occupied the Wái and Sátára districts. Her troops were soon driven back and she was besieged in the fort, but the siege was not pressed. Next year (A.D. 1754) Damáji Gaikwár was released and returned to Gujarát after coming to an agreement with the Peshwa about the revenues of that country. He was accompanied by Raghunáth Ráo the Peshwa's younger brother, and their united forces soon took Ahmadábád, and firmly established Marátha supremacy in that province.

The fort of Ahmadnagar, which had till then been held by the Nizám, was in A.D. 1759 acquired by the Peshwa, who bribed the commander Kavi Jang. Consequently in 1760, the Nizám declared war, but he was defeated by Sadáshiv Bháu at Udgir and forced to make a treaty surrendering the forts of Daulatabád Shivner Asirgad and Bijápur, the provinces of Bijápur, and part of Bidar Ahmadnagar and Aurangábád. Thus Shivner, the birth-place of Shiváji, at last fell into the hands of the Maráthás.

The Peshwa Báláji had long been interfering in the affairs of Hindustán, and had incurred the enmity of Ahmad Sháh Abdáli the Afghán king, whose forces Raghunáth Ráo the Peshwa's brother, had driven out of the Panjáb. He advanced in 1759 bent on punishing them, and routed two detachments commanded by Sindia and Holkar with great slaughter. It was necessary to send a larger force to meet him, and in A.D. 1760 the grand army of the Maráthás, with the contingents of all the chiefs, led by Sadáshiv Bháu, marched into Hindustán. After some skirmishing the two armies met at Pánipat in January 1761 and the Maráthás were utterly routed. Sadáshiv Bháu, Vishvás Ráo the Peshwa's eldest son, many other chiefs, and nearly the whole army fell in the fight. Soon after hearing the news Báláji Ráo the Peshwa died (June 1761). The defeat had a decisive effect on the fortunes of the Marátha empire. Up to this time the great chiefs had been generally obedient to the Peshwa, and had always joined his standard. Now his prestige was gone, and the chiefs became more and more independent. Doubtless this might in any case have occurred later; the distant conquests could not long have been controlled from Poona, but the defeat of Pánipat hastened the catastrophe. The minority of Báláji's successor, Mádhav Ráo a boy of sixteen, and the quarrels between him and his uncle Raghunáth, tended to the same result. When Mádhav Ráo grew up, his personal character held together the confederacy for some time; but his early death, and the quarrels as to the succession, decided the matter, and without doubt facilitated the conquest by the English.

Nizám Ali, hoping to profit by the Marátha disasters, declared war, and, though vigorously opposed, advanced to within fourteen miles of Poona, when he was induced to return by the cession of the districts of Aurangábád and Bidar, lately acquired by the Maráthás. Soon afterwards the death of Tárabái (December 1761) relieved the Peshwa's government of an inveterate enemy; the fort of Sátára was surrendered, and Rám Rája, who had been kept a close prisoner there, was allowed to live in the city.

At first the management of affairs was entirely in the hands of Raghunáth Ráo; but Mádhav Ráo, the young Peshwa, soon became desirous of having a share in the administration, and disputes arose between him and his uncle. The latter retired, and having obtained help from the governor of Aurangábád and collected a large force of Maráthás, marched on Poona, defeated his nephew's army, and again took charge of the government. He made Sakhárám Bápu, a descendant of Gopináth, the Bráhmaṇ who betrayed Afzul Khán to Shiváji, and Nilkanth Purandhare, his chief ministers; gave over the fort of Purandhar to the latter, and made several other changes in the ministry. He also, as the price of the aid he had just received, agreed to give back to the Nizám the rest of the provinces ceded in A.D. 1760, but his promise was not kept. The Nizám in consequence declared war, and being joined by Jánoji Bhonsla and other disaffected chiefs marched on Poona in A.D. 1763. As it was an open city, the people fled, and the Mughals sacked and burned Poona; thence they marched to Purandhar, and ravaged the country as far north as the Bhíma. The Marátha army had meanwhile assembled and plundered the Nizám's country; and now, following the Mughals on their return, assailed them as they were crossing the Godávári at Rákshasbhuvan, and inflicted a severe defeat on them, which brought the war to a close. Jánoji Bhonsla, who had deserted the Mughals, was the chief gainer.

Soon after this Mádhav Ráo recovered the management of the government, and kept on good terms with his uncle till A.D. 1768, when Raghunáth retired from court, raised a force and encamped near Dhodap in the Chándod range; but he was soon defeated and taken prisoner, and was kept in custody till the close of Mádhav's reign.

During the four remaining years of his life Mádhav Ráo was chiefly occupied with wars with Jánoji Bhonsla of Berár and invasions of the Karnátak. In one of these wars in A.D. 1769 Jánoji penetrated to Poona and ravaged the country round till peace was made. Mádhav Ráo died in A.D. 1772. His reign may be looked on as the time during which the administration of the country reached its highest excellence; the mámlatdárs and other officers were carefully looked after, the assessment was paid without much difficulty owing to the wealth brought into the country by war, and justice was well administered by the famous Rám Shástri. Mádhav Ráo's chief ministers were Sakhárám Bápu, Moroba Phadnavis, and Moroba's cousin Nána. After Mádhav's death the Marátha empire was plunged in confusion and a period of civil war followed; the great chiefs became completely independent, and an opportunity was given to the English Government to interfere.

Naráyan Ráo succeeded his brother Mádhav Ráo. Raghunáth, who had been released before Mádhav's death, kept on good terms with Náráyan for a time; but after a few months he interfered in the administration, and was again placed in confinement. In August 1773 a disturbance arose among some of the troops at Poona, and their leaders burst into the palace; Náráyan Ráo took refuge with his uncle Raghunáth, but was followed and murdered in his presence, and there was reason to believe that Raghunáth was implicated in the murder.

Raghunáth at once assumed charge of the government, but Sakhárám Bápu, Nána Phadnavis, Trimbak Ráo Mára, Hari Pant Phadke, and the other ministers were ill-disposed towards him, and none of his own followers were competent to take their places. Soon after his accession, while he was engaged in war with the Nizám, the old ministers withdrew from his camp to Poona, and having discovered that the widow of Náráyan Ráo was pregnant, had her conveyed in January 1774 to Purandhar, and formed themselves into a regency. Hearing of this, Raghunáth, who had marched into the Karnátak, returned with his army, and was met near Pandharpur by the army of the ministers under Trimbak Ráo Mára. He completely defeated them with the loss of their leader, but instead of marching on Poona, he retired to Burhánpur, and the birth of a son to Náráyan Ráo's widow (April 1774), to whom the name of Mádhav was given, put an end to Raghunáth's chance of success.

Raghunáth retired to Gujarát, hoping to bring there to a successful termination the negotiations for aid which he had already begun with the Government of Bombay. In this he obtained his wish; but the interference of the English was at first limited to Gujarát and the Konkan, and they were soon ordered to suspend hostilities by the Supreme Government of Bengal. Colonel Upton was sent as a commissioner to arrange a peace at Poona, and in March 1776 he signed the treaty of Purandhar, by which the English agreed to give up the cause of Raghunáth.

In A.D. 1777, Rám Rája, who for nearly thirty years had been the titular rája of Sátára, died, and was succeeded by his adopted son Sháhu.

A rivalry which for some time had been growing between two of the leading ministers at Poona, Nána Phadnavis and his cousin Moroba, now passed into an open quarrel. Sakhárám Bápu remained neutral, but Moroba was supported by the greater number of the ministers and by Tukáji Holkar. Hari Pant Phadke took the side of Nána, and so did Máhádji Sindia, and though Moroba was at first in the ascendant and Nána had to retire to Purandhar, the position was soon changed when Hari Pant and Sindia came up with their forces and Tukáji Holkar was induced to leave Moroba's party. In July Moroba and his adherents were seized and confined in various forts, and Nána had only one rival left, Sakhárám Bápu.

The Bombay Government, whose aid had been sought by Moroba, now declared war with the Peshwa's ministry. Their first effort was disastrous. In November 1778 a force occupied the Bor Ghát and encamped at Khandála. The main body under Colonel Egerton followed in December, and marched slowly to Kárlí, eight miles over level ground in eleven days, constantly engaged with the Maráthás, whose main army was assembled at Talegáon Dábháde under Sindia, Holkar, and Hari Pant, and retired slowly when the English reached that village. Here Colonel Cockburn, who was now in command, embarrassed by his commissariat train, determined to retire, and having thrown his guns into a pond, began his retreat. The Maráthás pressed closely on him, and his rear guard was perpetually engaged till the village of Vadgaon was reached. Colonel Cockburn, despairing of effecting his retreat, began to negotiate, and at last a convention was made through Sindia, by which the English army was allowed to retire on condition of the surrender of the conquests made since the year 1773. This disgraceful convention was at once disavowed by the Bombay Government, and the war was continued. For some months nothing was done, as the Bombay Government awaited the arrival of the army under General Goddard, which was on its march across India. It arrived at Surat in March, and negotiations were carried on till the end of the year. In the meantime Nána Phadnavis, with the connivance of Máhádaí Sindia, got rid of his last rival Sakháram Bápu, who was thrown into prison and sent to Pratápgad. Before the close of A.D. 1779 negotiations were broken off, and the war was carried on successfully in Gujarát and the Konkan by General Goddard and Colonel Hartley. In the beginning of 1781, General Goddard determined to advance towards Poona, and a detachment forced the Bor Ghát; but when they reached Khandála they were at once attacked in front by the Maráthha main army under Hari Pant Phadke and Holkar, while Parashráam Pant Patvardhan was sent with a strong force into the Konkan to assail the flank of the army and cut off its communications with Bombay. After a month of constant fighting, General Goddard was forced to retreat to Bombay with severe loss. The war now languished, and in the beginning of 1782 negotiations were begun with the Poona government through Sindia, and ended in the treaty of Sálbái, by which the conquests in the Konkan were given up with the exception of Sálsette, and a provision was made for Raghunáth Ráo.

For some years there was peace in the Dakhan, and Sindia was fully occupied in Hindustán warring with the Rájput princes, whom after a hard struggle he worsted. At last in A.D. 1789 he gained possession of Delhi and the person of the emperor, and thus reached the height of his ambition. In A.D. 1790, war broke out between Tipu Sultán of Mysor and the English, and the Maráthás joined as allies of the English and took part in the campaigns of 1790 and 1791, after which Tipu was compelled to sue for peace and surrender a large extent of territory. Soon after peace had been made with Tipu, Sindia marched to Poona, ostensibly to invest the young Peshwa with the insignia of the office of Vakil-i-Mutálík which he had obtained for him from the emperor, but really to supplant Nána Phadnavis and win over the Peshwa. Contrary to Nána's wishes, the Peshwa was decorated by Sindia, and a war of intrigue ensued between the rivals, which was only ended by the death of Máháráji Sindia in February 1794. As Maháráji's successor was his grand nephew Daulat Ráo, a boy of fourteen, Nána Phadnavis was freed from his most dangerous rival.

Tedious negotiations had been going on for long between the Nizám and the Peshwa; the Maráthás claimed long outstanding balances of chauth and the Nizám made counter-claims. At last, in the end of 1794, war was declared; all the great Marátha chiefs joined the national standard, while the Nizám advanced with all his forces. The armies met near Khorda in Ahmadnagar. In the battle which took place the Mughal army was routed, mainly owing to the cowardice of Nizám Áli, who allowed himself to be shut up in Khorda fort, where he was forced to sign a treaty giving up territory on his western frontier from Purenda to the Tápti.

Death of Mádhav
Ráo II.
A.D. 1795.

The sons of Raghunáth Ráo, Báji Ráo and Chinnáji, were kept in close confinement by Nána Phadnavis; but the young Peshwa, who was also in complete subjection, opened a correspondence with Báji Ráo. When Nána discovered the correspondence he stopped it at once, and Mádhav Ráo, apparently in a fit of despair, committed suicide on the 23rd of October 1795 by throwing himself from his palace in Poona.

The greatest confusion ensued. Nána Phadnavis, knowing that Báji Ráo, the heir to the throne must be his enemy, summoned the Marátha chiefs to Poona, and persuaded them to agree to the adoption of a son by the widow of Mádhav Ráo. Báji Ráo, though imprisoned in the fort of Shivner, opened communications with Báloba Tátya, one of Sindia's chief advisers, and won him over. Nána, hearing of this, was greatly alarmed, and determined to forestall Báloba, and himself to seat Báji Ráo on the throne. He summoned Parashráam Bháu Patvardhan from Tásgaon, and sent him to Shivner to make the proposal to Báji Ráo, who consented, and came to Poona. Sindia, enraged at his treachery, marched on Poona; Nána Phadnavis, afraid to risk a battle, retired to Purandhar, and thence to Sátára, while Parashráam Bháu and Báji Ráo awaited the arrival of Sindia. By the advice of Báloba Tátya, Sindia determined to put Chinnáji, Báji Ráo's younger brother, on the throne; to this Parashráam Bháu agreed, and Chinnáji was installed against his own will in May 1796. Nána Phadnavis had meanwhile retired into the Konkan, where he began to plot afresh for the restoration of Báji Ráo. He won over Sakharám Ghátge Shirzi Ráo, who had joined Sindia's army, and through him Sindia who in October 1796 arrested Báloba Tátya and declared for Báji Ráo. Parashráam Bháu fled, but was captured and thrown into prison. Nána returned to Poona and was reconciled to Báji Ráo, and in December 1796 Báji Ráo was at length formally installed. Peshwa. Ahmadnagar and its districts were made over to Sindia as the reward of his help, and Nána Phadnavis again became chief minister. His tenure of power was short. After a year of constant disturbance at Poona, at Báji Ráo's request he was treacherously arrested by order of Sindia and sent a prisoner to Ahmadnagar. His friends and relations were seized and plundered, and great excesses were committed by Sindia's troops, urged on by Shirzi Ráo Ghátge. Báji Ráo having got rid of Nána Phadnavis, was now anxious to send Sindia away; but as he was unable to pay Sindia the arrears due to his troops, he allowed him to levy the money he wanted from the inhabitants of Poona; Shirzi Ráo Ghátge was employed on this congenial occupation, and executed his orders in the most brutal manner, ill-treating all who were supposed to have money.

Meanwhile trouble was threatening from Sátára. The rája had been allowed, previous to Nána's arrest by Báji Ráo, to seize the fort. He now refused to surrender it, and having collected some troops, drove back a force commanded by Máhádev Ráo Rástia. Parashráam Bháu, who was still a prisoner, offered, if released, to march against the rája. His offer being accepted, he surprised the rája at Sátára, completely routed his troops, and took him prisoner. The rája's brother, Chitúr Singh, escaped to Kolhápúr, and with the help of that prince carried on a predatory warfare with considerable success.

Quarrels which broke out in Sindia's family between him and the Báis or widows of his uncle Mahádaji, reduced him to great difficulties and kept him for some time in the Dakhan. The Báis, who had been grossly ill-treated by Shirzi Ráo Ghátge, were being sent as prisoners to Ahmadnagar, when they were released by a party of Sindia's own horse, and took refuge in the camp of Amrutráo, the Peshwa's adoptive brother. A large party in Sindia's army, disgusted with the tyranny of Ghátge, took part with the Báis. An attempt to surprise Amrut Ráo's camp failed; but when he marched to Poona, Ghátge attacked him suddenly and pillaged his camp at Kirki. At last Sindia was forced to arrest Shirzi Ráo to put an end to his excesses; and in order to obtain money to enable him to return to Hindustán, where his presence was much needed, he determined to release Nána Phadnavis on payment of a large ransom, hoping too that his release would annoy Báji Ráo. In this however he was disappointed, as Báji Ráo soon persuaded Nána to resume his old place as minister (October 1798). Sindia was still unable, through want of money, to leave Poona; the Báis had taken refuge at Kolhápúr, and being joined by large numbers of followers, marched northwards, plundering all Sindia's villages, and he was unable to check them. At last by releasing his old minister Báloba Tátya, Sindia was enabled to bring his affairs into some order. An arrangement had been nearly effected with the Báis, when they took alarm and again began plundering. It was not till the year 1800 that, with the help of Yashvant Ráo Holkar, they were driven into Burhápúr and thence to Málwa.

The war with Kolhápúr and Chitúr Singh had been going on with varying success, till in September 1799 Parashráam Bháu was defeated and killed by the Kolhápúr troops. Reinforcements were sent up, and Kolhápúr was besieged and would have fallen had not the death of Nána Phadnavis in March 1800 brought about a change of policy.

Sindia and Holkar,
A.D. 1801.

Nána's relations and friends were seized and imprisoned, Sindia was allowed to send troops to overrun the jáhگیر of the Patvardhan family, and peace was made with Kolhápur.

At last, in 1801 Sindia marched north to check in person the progress of Yashvant Ráo Holkar. The country he left was in the greatest disorder, ravaged by bands of marauders, among whom was Vithoji, the brother of Yashvant Ráo Holkar, who was taken and executed by order of the Peshwa. Báji Ráo also disgusted the more respectable of his chiefs by his treatment of the Rástia family, the head of which, Mahádev Ráo, was treacherously seized and imprisoned in Ráygad. Yashvant Ráo Holkar, who had at first been successful against some of Sindia's detachments, was completely defeated by him at Indor in October 1801; but he soon rallied his forces and marched south, sending on a detachment under Fateh Sing. Máne to ravage Khándesh and the Dakhan. His orders were carried out; the Peshwa's officers were defeated and Khándesh and the Gangthari desolated. Fateh Sing Máne advanced south, defeated a force under Baláji Kunjar at Gár Dhond, and stormed the camp at Báraмати. Sindia sent a large force to the aid of the Peshwa, which, passing Holkar's army, joined the Poona troops, and the united forces took up a position at the Alla pass. Holkar, however, marched south by Ahmadnagar, and thence to Jejuri, joined Fateh Sing Máne, and came down the hills towards Poona, encamping between Loni and Hadapsar. Here he was met by the allied forces, and a battle ensued on the 23rd October 1802, in which he was completely victorious. Báji Ráo fled to Sinhgad, thence to Ráygad, and finally to Máhád in the Konkan; and not feeling safe even there, he took ship and landed at Bassein. Holkar was thus left complete master of Poona. At first he did not abuse his victory. He invited Amrut Ráo to come from Junnar and take charge of the government, which he did after some delay, and allowed his son Vináyak Ráo to be placed on the throne. This being done, Holkar began to plunder the helpless inhabitants of Poona mercilessly, till he and Amrut Ráo were drawn from the city early in 1803 by the approach of the British troops.

Holkar Defeats
Báji Ráo,

Treaty of Bassein,
A.D. 1802.

Báji Ráo, as a last resource, had entered into an alliance with the English, and signed a treaty at Bassein in December 1802, binding himself to keep up a subsidiary army, and not to engage in hostilities without the consent of the English Government. At the same time, with his usual duplicity, he intrigued with Sindia and Raghuji Bhonsla, with the double aim of persuading them to attack Holkar and to make war on the English. The British Government took immediate steps to replace Báji Ráo on the throne. A force under General Wellesley marched from Mysor to Poona, while a part of the Haidarábád contingent moved to Purenda. General Wellesley was joined on his way by the jáhگیرdárs of the Southern Marátha Country, and drove before him the plundering bands of Holkar's horse. As it was feared that Amrut Ráo who was hanging about Poona, might burn the city, General Wellesley made a march of sixty miles in thirty-two hours, and arrived there on the 20th April, while Colonel Stevenson moved with the Haidarábád troops to Gárdaund (the present Dhond) on the Bhíma, and thence to the Godávari. Amrut Ráo retired before General Wellesley to Sangamner, and thence to Násik, which town he sacked. He subsequently came to terms with the English, served with them during the war, and was afterwards pensioned. Báji Ráo was brought back to Poona in May 1803, and General Wellesley took up a position near Ahmadnagar to await the result of the negotiations which were going on with Sindia and Raghuji Bhonsla. These chiefs viewed the treaty of Bassein with much dissatisfaction, and at last war broke out in August 1803; by the close of the year the confederates had been completely defeated at Assaye and Argaon, and peace was made. Next year Holkar forced on a war with the English Government, which lasted for more than twelve months, and was chiefly confined to Hindustán. He too was forced to sue for peace in 1805.

When Báji Ráo was restored, the country was in the utmost confusion; but with the aid of the British troops the forts were recovered and order partly established. Still his misgovernment and the bad counsels of his chief advisers, Sadáshiv Bháu Mánkeshvar and later on Trimbakji Dengle, prevented the country prospering. Báji Ráo turned off without scruple all the old servants of Government and disbanded the troops. In A.D. 1803 the rains failed, and a fearful famine ensued, aggravated by the war, and the country was nearly depopulated. Great numbers of the disbanded soldiers died and the rest settled in their villages. The Bhils took advantage of the confusion, and plundered the open country, even to the south of the Gangthari; and it was not till years had passed and great cruelties had been exercised, that the Peshwa's officers cleared the country of robbers south of the Chándod range.

In 1805, after the close of the war with Holkar, Fateh Sing Máne, one of his officers, re-appeared in the Dakhan, and began plundering the country south of the Níra till he was attacked and killed by Balvant Ráo Phadnavis, the Mutálik of the Pratinidhi.

Báji Ráo, when he felt secure through the aid of the British troops, endeavoured systematically to depress his jáhgirdárs and centralize his power. He took advantage of quarrels between the Pratinidhi Parashráam Shrinivás and his Mutálik, to interfere on behalf of the latter, and he confined the Pratinidhi at Mhasvad (A.D. 1806). The chief was soon rescued by his mistress, a Telin by caste, and having collected a body of men, began plundering the Sátára district, till he was defeated and taken prisoner by Bápu Gokhle near Vasantgad. His mistress retired to the fort of Vásota in the Gháts, and held out for eight months (A.D. 1807). The jáhgir was then given over to Bápu Gokhle who levied heavy contributions before he gave it to the Peshwa in A.D. 1811.

Báji Ráo next turned on the powerful Patvardhan family, the members of which had never been well disposed towards him, and had neglected to send their contingent of troops. A war, in which other jáhgirdárs would have joined them, was prevented only by the interposition of the English Resident, who collected an army at Pandharpur ready to march on them; but the British Government, while enforcing the military service due from the jáhgirdárs, determined to protect them in the possession of the lands lawfully held by them. At a later period Mádhav Ráo Rástia failed to send his contingent, and was stripped of all his lands; and for similar conduct Appa Desái Nipánikar lost a large portion of his jáhgir. In both these cases Báji Ráo had craftily led the jáhgirdárs to disobey orders that he might have an excuse for seizing their lands.

In A.D. 1813 Báji Ráo determined to raise a body of disciplined troops commanded by English officers. A brigade was formed and stationed near Poona, as was also a brigade of the subsidiary force, the rest of it being sent to Sirúr on the Ghod river about forty miles east of Poona. It was about this time that Trimbakji Dengle reached the height of his power, and under his influence Báji Ráo's government rapidly deteriorated. His one object was to accumulate money; districts were farmed to the highest bidder; no mercy was shown to the farmers who defaulted, and the farmers showed none in their turn to the husbandmen, and made money by the open sale of justice. Trimbakji, who disliked the English, also induced his master to increase his forces, and to intrigue with all the Marátha chiefs. Negotiations had long been going on between the Peshwa and the Gaikwár respecting tribute due to the former, and in 1814 Gangádhara Shástri was sent on behalf of the Gaikwár to Poona. Many efforts were made by the Peshwa to win him over but without success, and at last he was treacherously murdered at Pandharpur by Trimbakji's orders, with the consent of the Peshwa (July 1815). The British Government at once demanded Trimbakji's surrender, and after some delay he was given up and imprisoned in the fort of Thána. In less than a year he managed to escape, and, though in constant communication with the Peshwa, evaded capture by the English by wandering in the hilly parts of the country from Khándesh to Sátára, stirring the wild tribes to revolt.

Meanwhile a rising against the Peshwa's authority was spreading in the Gháts. Chitúr Singh, the brother of the late rája of Sátára, had been seized in Khándesh in 1812 by Trimbakji Dengle and imprisoned in the fort of Kánguri; but in 1816 a Gosávi, with the help of some Rámoshi chiefs, gave out that he was Chitúr Singh, and seized Prachitgad, a strong fort in the hills south of Sátára; several other forts fell into their hands, and the insurrection was never quite quelled by Báji Ráo.

Trimbakji, assisted by the Peshwa, had since his escape been levying men, and in 1817 a large body assembled at Náteputa, south of the Níra; when the subsidiary force moved against them they retired to Jath, and then turned back to the Máhádev hills north of Sátára, where they were attacked and dispersed. A similar rising took place in Khándesh. At last the Resident insisted on the surrender of Trimbakji, and on a new treaty giving up the forts of Sinhgad Purandhar and Ráygad. Báji Ráo yielded with great reluctance.

A new treaty was signed in May 1817, by which he consented to cede territory for the maintenance of the subsidiary force and the fort of Ahmadnagar, to recognize the settlement with the jáhgirdárs in 1812, and to restore Mádhav Ráo Rástia's jáhgir. The three forts were given back in August, as the Peshwa appeared to be complying with the treaty. In reality he was making preparations for the war which soon broke out.

The Governor General had for some time been concerting measures for suppressing the Pendhárís and restoring order in Central India. Accordingly by the end of the rains the greater part of the British troops were sent north to take part in the operations. The Peshwa, seeing his opportunity, proceeded rapidly with his preparations for war, promising all the time to send his troops north to aid the British forces. At last, as the Resident suspected his sincerity, the small force at Poona was moved to a position at Kirki, and was reinforced by a European regiment from Bombay, and on the afternoon of the 5th of November A.D. 1817 the long-determined attack was made by the Peshwa's troops; 26,000 Maráthás assailed a British force numbering 2800 men, and were decisively repulsed. General Smith who commanded the subsidiary force, had already begun his march from the Gangthari near Poona, and on his approach the Peshwa returned to Máhuli near Sátára, and there brought the rája of Sátára into his camp. The English commander, after occupying Poona, followed Báji Ráo, who returned hastily to Pandharpur, and then up the Bhima, past Junnar, and on to Bráhmañváda, where he occupied a strong position in the hills; but General Smith, marching round by Ahmadnagar and Sangamner, headed him, and he again fled south. On the news of his approach a detachment of the subsidiary force had been summoned from Sirur to Poona, and on the 1st of January 1818 reached Koregaon on the banks of the Bhima, and found the Marátha army of 25,000 men on the opposite bank. Though only 800 strong, the detachment held the village all day long against the assaults of the Marátha army, and at night the enemy retired baffled and continued their flight south. After a long and futile chase, it was determined to reduce Sátára, and the fort surrendered on the 10th of February 1818. A detachment was then sent to take the other hill forts, and the rest of the army under General Smith resumed the pursuit of Báji Ráo, who had been staying near Sholápur. He was overtaken on the 20th of February at Ashti, and in the skirmish Bápu Gokhle his general was killed and the rája of Sátára taken. Thence Báji Ráo fled to Kopargaon on the Godávári and waited for help from Holkar; but being disappointed, again started, and after long wanderings surrendered to Sir John Malcolm at Dholkot in May 1819.

Meantime the English troops had taken the Peshwa's country. Chákan was captured by a force under Colonel Deacon; Sinhgad Purandhar and Vásoṭa, where two European officers were confined, fell after short sieges by April 1818, and Pratápsinh was formally installed rája of Sátára on the 14th of April 1818. A force under General Munro had marched north from the Karnátak, occupying the forts on the way; they routed a body of Báji Ráo's infantry under the walls of Sholápur, and stormed the fort on April 13th, 1818. Ráygad, where the Peshwa's wife had taken refuge, was surrendered on the 7th of May, and during the same month the forts to the north of Poona were reduced by Major Eldridge. The last fort to fall in this part of the country was Prachitgad, held by the false Chitursingh, which was captured on the 13th of June. Thus the territory of the Peshwa was completely conquered by the English. Out of this territory it was thought politic to assign a part as a principality for the titular rája. A tract extending from the Níra to the Várna and from the Gháts to the Bhíma was reserved for him, but was for the time placed under the management of a British officer, Captain Grant Duff, until the young rája could gain experience. The other districts were put in charge of officers whose powers resembled those of the sarsubhedárs, and the superintendence of the whole country was entrusted to a Commissioner, Mr. Elphinstone.

Conspiracy against the English.

For a time troops were stationed at the chief places, Karád, Sátára, Sholápur, Poona, Sirúr, and Junnar, and many of Báji Ráo's levies accepted service. They were however disbanded as soon as possible, and the hill forts were dismantled. At first no one was allowed to travel armed without a passport; but this restriction was soon relaxed and the country remained quiet. Soon after the conquest a conspiracy for the expulsion of the English was discovered at Poona and Sátára, but the prompt execution of the ringleaders, among whom were some Bráhmans, had a good effect in preventing the recurrence of such attempts.

Treaty with Landholders,
A.D. 1818.

Treaties were entered into with the jáhgirdárs, and they were dealt with in accordance with their standing and their behaviour to the British Government during the war. The land of the old Mánkaris, such as the Nimbáلكars of Phaltan, the Daphles of Jath, and the Ghorpades of Mudhol, were restored to them intact, as were those of the great officers of the Marátha rájás, the Pant Sachiv, the Pratinidhi, and the rája of Akalkot. All these chiefs, with the exception of the Ghorpades, were placed at their own wish under the rája of Sátára; the lands of the Patvardhan family, which had risen under the Peshwás, were restored to them, as they had taken the English side at an early opportunity, and even chiefs like the Rástiás and the Vinchurkar, who had followed Báji Ráo to the last, were allowed to retain their personal estates.

Sátára Annexed,
A.D. 1848.

In April 1822 the Sátára territory was formally handed to the rája, and thenceforward was managed by him entirely. After a time he became impatient of the control exercised by the British Government, and as he persisted in intriguing and holding communications with other princes in contravention of his treaty, he was deposed in A.D. 1839 and sent as a state prisoner to Benares and his brother Sháhji was put on the throne. This prince, who did much for the improvement of his territory, died in A.D. 1848 without male heirs, and after long deliberation it was decided that the state should be resumed by the British Government. Liberal pensions were granted to the rája's three widows, and they were allowed to live in the palace at Sátára. The survivor of these ladies died in 1874.

Since A.D. 1848 no events of political importance have taken place in these districts. Throughout the Mutinies of 1857 peace was maintained and no open outbreak took place, though the mutiny of a regiment at Kolhápúr gave rise to uneasiness, and there was undoubtedly a good deal of disaffection at Sátára among the classes whom the resumption of the country had impoverished. In Poona too the doings of Nána Sáheb, the adopted son of the last of the Peshwás, could not fail to create an excitement among the Bráhmans, who felt that power had passed out of their hands, and who would gladly have regained it.

Of the Marátha families whose names figure constantly in history, the first are the Mánkaris or honourables, the old families who held lands previous to the rise of the Bhonsla dynasty. Mention has already been made of the Sirké family, the old rulers of the Ghát Máthla, who were dispossessed by the Morés. They have always held high rank among the Maráthás, and were frequently connected by marriage with the rájás of Sátára. The conquest of the Ghát country by Shiváji from the Morés, the rájás of Jávli, has also been mentioned. Members of the family were conspicuous as soldiers, and one of them was for a time Senápati. The Nimbáلكars of Phaltan, whose surname was originally Pavár, are one of the oldest Marátha families. They have been deshmukhs of Phaltan since time immemorial, and were confirmed in their rights by the kings of Bijápúr. Though connected by marriage with the Bhonslás, they continued faithful to Bijápúr till the fall of the monarchy. In the reign of Sháhu, one of the family was sar-lashkar, and another member sided with the Mughals and obtained the jághir of Karmála and the title of Ráo Rambha. The Phaltan jáhgirdár is one of the chiefs with whom the British Government has entered into a treaty. He was placed under the rája of Sátára and bound to furnish a fixed number of horse, and since the resumption of the state he has been placed under the Collector of Sátára. His jághir is a strip of country lying between the Nira river on the north and the Mahádev hills on the south; it is about 400 square miles in extent and yields a gross yearly revenue of about Rs. 1,00,000. Frequent failure of the rainfall prevents the district from being a fertile one, but it is fairly prosperous. Other branches of the Pavár family distinguished themselves under Sháhu and the Peshwás, and founded the states of Dhár and Dewás in Central India. The Daphles of Jath, whose original name was Chawhán, take their present name from the village of Daphlápúr, of which they were pátils. They held a mansab under the Bijápúr kings, but never rose to any great eminence afterwards. A separate treaty was made with them as with the chief of Phaltan. Jath lies to the south-east of the Sátára district, not far from Bijápúr, and is neither fertile nor populous. Its area is about 700 square miles and its gross yearly revenue about Rs. 1,70,000.

The Mánes of Mhasvad were from an early period deshmukhs of part of the Mán desh, and were powerful chiefs. They sided with the Bijápur government against Shiváji; and one of them, Nágoji Máne, made himself notorious by the murder of the gallant Santáji Ghorpade, an action for which he was rewarded by a place in the imperial service. The family never attained to any distinction under the Peshwás. The Ghátges of Khatáv were deshmukhs of Málavdi in the Mán desh, and held a mansab under the Bahamani kings. They also received a sanad as sardeshmukhs from Ibráhím 'Adil Sháh in A.D. 1626. Another house of the same name, with the title of Shirzi Ráo, came from Kágál near Kolhápúr. One of this family is infamous as the evil-adviser of Daulut Ráo Sindia, and the instigator and executor of the sack of Poona in 1797. The Ghorpades of Kápsi near the Várna and of Mudhol near the Ghatprabha furnish several well-known names. The original surname of the family was Bhonslé, and the tradition is that the present name was won by an ancestor who scaled a steep Konkan fort by the help of a string tied to the tail of an iguana or ghorpad. The most celebrated of this family was Santáji, who was Senápati from A.D. 1691 to 1698, and during that time was the terror of Mughal detachments. He fell a victim to the jealousy of his colleagues, and his sons left the Marátha service and established themselves at Sondur and Guti in the Karnátak. Murár Ráo (the Morary Row of Orme) was a member of this family, and was a conspicuous character in the war between the English and French on the Coromandel coast. He was reconciled to the Maráthás under Mádhav Ráo, but never kept up a close connection with them. His fate was a sad one. Guti, his capital, was taken by Haidar Ali, and he was thrown into prison, where he died. Of this family too was Báji Ghorpade, the chief who seized Shiváji's father Sháhji, and who was afterwards surprised and killed by Shiváji.

House of Shiváji.*

Next we come to the families who owe their rise to Shiváji and his house. The story of the rájás of Akalkot is romantic. When Sháhu was marching southwards on Sátára after his release in the year A.D. 1707, his troops had a skirmish with some villagers, and in the middle of the fight a woman came and laid her child at Shahu's feet. He took it up and adopted it, giving it in place of its own surname Lokhande, the name of Fateh Sing Bhonsla. Though not a man of any great ability, the adopted son of Sháhu took part in the wars of the time, and received the jáhgir of Akalkot in the Sholápur collectorate. The Akalkot chief was one of those with whom the British Government entered into a treaty; and he was put under the rája of Sátára and is now under the supervision of the Collector of Sholápur. The area of the state is about 500 miles and the gross yearly revenue about Rs. 3,25,000.

Of the ministers of the Sátára rájás two only retain any position. The Pratinidhi, whose office was not one of the eight created by Shiváji, but was made by Rája Rám in A.D. 1680 for Pralhád Niráji, his chief adviser, who accompanied him to Jinji. The office was supposed to entitle the holder to take precedence of the Asht Pradháns. The first of the present family who attained distinction was Parashráam, Trimbak. He brought himself into notice as a subordinate of Rámchandra Pant, the officer in charge of the Sátára territory during Rám Rájá's absence at Jinji, and was made Pratinidhi in A.D. 1700 by Tárábiá; having opposed Sháhu on his return, he was deprived of his office in 1708, but restored in A.D. 1720. His son Shripat Ráo, who was Pratinidhi from A.D. 1720 to 1747, was the able opponent of the Peshwás, and his brother and successor Jagjivan attempted to prevent the transfer of power to them in A.D. 1749; he was, however, no match for his crafty rival, and was imprisoned, and lost a considerable portion of his jáhgir near Sátára. The family continued to hold a large part of the eastern districts of Sátára, which they had originally recovered from the Mughals, till the rebellion of the young chief, already mentioned, in A.D. 1806. He was restored to the portion of his estates that remained in A.D. 1818, when a treaty was made with him, and he was placed under the rája of Sátára. The Pratinidhi is now like the other jáhgirdárs under the charge of the Collector of Sátára. His possessions consist of the Atpádi Mahál in the Mán desh, and a number of detached villages. His gross yearly income is about Rs. 2,00,000. The Pant Sachiv was one of the Asht Pradháns, and the office became hereditary like most of the others instituted by Shiváji. The founder of the present line was Sankráji Náráyan Gaudekar, who was appointed to the post in A.D. 1698 by Rám Rájá. He distinguished himself by recovering the country round the source of the Níra from the Mughals, and it has been ever since held as the jáhgir of his family. He also had in his possession Sinhgad and Purandhar. He was among the chiefs who opposed Sháhu, but when he committed suicide in A.D. 1712, his son Náru was confirmed in the post. Purandhar was given by the Pant Sachiv to Báláji Vishvanáth Peshwa in A.D. 1714 in return for his services in releasing the young chief from Damáji Thorát; and Sinhgad was exchanged for Tung and Tikona in A.D. 1750. A treaty was entered into with this chief in A.D. 1818, similar to that made with the other jáhgirdárs; and he too is now under the Collector of Sátára. His estate of Bhor is an extensive but hilly tract lying along the Gháts to the west of Poona; its area is about 1500 square miles, and its gross yearly revenue is about Rs. 3,75,000, a good deal of which is derived from the chief's assignment on the revenue of certain districts called the Sahotra Amal. The Dabháde family rose into importance under Sháhu, and in 1716 Khandaráo Dabháde was made Senápati. The chief scene of his exploits was Gujarát, where he gained a firm footing. His son Trimbakráo was one of the opponents to the rise of the Peshwás, but he was defeated and killed at the battle of Dabhoi in A.D. 1731 by Báji Ráo. Though his child Yashvantráo was made Senápati in his place, the family never recovered their former position, but were supplanted by their subordinates, the Gáikwárs, the present rulers of Baroda. The representative of the Dabhádes now holds only the two villages of Talegaon and Induri, some twenty miles north-west of Poona.

Of the families who rose to greatness under the Peshwás, the most important was that of the Patvardhans, but their history does not come within the scope of this summary. When Báláji Vishvanáth was serving as a kárkún under Dhanáji Jádhav the Senápati, one of his fellow-kárkúns was Abáji Purandhare, kulkarni of Sásvad, a village eighteen miles south-east of Poona. When Báláji was made Peshwa in 1714, Abáji Purandhare became his mutálik or deputy, and the family were ever after faithful servants of the Peshwás, and acquired great influence. They still hold a high position among Bráhmans. The Rástiás rose to great power under the earlier Peshwás; but Báji Ráo took a strong dislike to the family, which was represented in his reign by Mádhav Ráo and Khande Ráo. In A.D. 1801 he treacherously imprisoned the former, and in A.D. 1815 deprived him of his jáhgir; still the family served him throughout his last war with the English, and thereby forfeited considerable possessions. The Vinchurkar family, who were equally faithful to Báji Ráo, have been mentioned in another section (Part II. page 633), as the larger portion of their estates lies in the Gangthari.

PART II.

LITTLE is known of the territories included in Ahmadnagar Násik and Khándesh previous to the Musalmán invasions at the close of the thirteenth century. The ancient remains, the rock temples of Ajanta, Ellora, of Pátua in the Sátmála hills, of Násik and Junnar with their elaborate carvings and paintings, and the fine old wells and temples which are found throughout these districts and known by the name of Hemádpanti, show that at different periods before the arrival of the Musalmáns the inhabitants had risen to a considerable height of civilization and prosperity. The author of the Periplus (A.D. 247) mentions that Dachanabades that is the Dakhan, from its two cities, Tagara whose site is doubtful and Plithana the modern Paithan on the Godávári, carried on trade with Barygaza or Broach. In Khándesh traditions of the shepherd kings or Gauli rájás, to whom are attributed some old remains, such as a tank hewn out of the solid rock in the Songir fort and the walls of the Turan Mal fort, probably chiefly belong to the Devgiri Yádavs. The old dam to the lake of Turan Mal is attributed to the god Goraknáth. Hiuen Tshang, the Chinese Buddhist pilgrim who visited Maháráshtra early in the seventh century of the Christian era, talks of its great capital near a great river, probably Násik on the Godávári, and its warlike inhabitants governed by a Kshatriya king.

The capital of the Dakhan was afterwards moved to Devgad or Daulatábád; and there, at the time of the first Musalmán invasion in A.D. 1294, reigned a king of the Yádav family. His power probably extended over the open country of Daulatábád Ahmadnagar and Násik. The hilly country of Báglán and of Gálua about fourteen miles north of Málegaon was held by independent rájás, while the Sátpuda hills near Nímár belonged to a race of Ahírs or shepherds, the last of whom, Ása the Shepherd King, is said to have built the fort of Asirgad shortly before A.D. 1370.

In A.D. 1294 Ala-ud-dín Khilji, during the reign of his uncle Jelál-ud-dín, emperor of Delhi, invaded the Dakhan through Berar with 7000 horse, surprised Rámdev Yádav the king of Devgad, and extorted from him a large tribute, before the rájás of Khándesh and Gulbarga, whom he had summoned, could come to his aid. Ala-ud-dín then retired to Hindustán through Khándesh.

In A.D. 1306 Malik Kafur, Ala-ud-dín's general, invaded the Dakhan through Sultánpur, a province of Khándesh, and overran Maháráshtra. Rámdev remained tributary to the Musalmáns till his death. His son revolted but was defeated, and Devgad his capital was taken in A.D. 1312. Maháráshtra then became part of the Delhi empire: a governor was placed at Devgad, and Berar and Khándesh were formed into a separate province. In A.D. 1316 a second insurrection headed by Hirpal Dev, a cousin of the last chief, was successful for a time, but was put down in A.D. 1318.

In A.D. 1344 the Musalmán nobles of the Dakhan revolted against Muhammad Tughlak, and by A.D. 1347 they established their independence. They chose for their king the general who had taken the leading part in the war; and his dynasty is known as the Bahamani dynasty. It lasted for about 150 years. The capital at first was at Gulbarga and then at Bidar. The territory included the districts of Násik and Ahmadnagar; but the rájas of Báglán and Gálma maintained their independence; and Khándesh remained for some time longer under the Delhi sovereigns. Farishtah speaks of a rája of Antur, and more than a hundred years later the forts of Antur and Vairagad were in the hands of the Maráthás, from which it would appear that the Bahamani kings had not a firm hold of the country about the Sátmála hills. A governor was stationed at Daulatábád, and ruled a province comprising Cheul in the Konkan, Junnar, Daulatábád, and Mhiropatan or Maháráshtra.

For many years the western districts enjoyed peace. A rising took place at Daulatábád in A.D. 1366 headed by one Bahrám Khán, aided by a Yádav chief and by the rája of Báglán; the rebels marched to Paithan, and the king's troops encamped at Shevgaon. In the engagement that followed the rebels were routed, mainly through the impetuous attack of king Muhammad Sháh.

The Kingdom of Khándesh,
A.D. 1370.

About A.D. 1370 the districts of Thálner and Kurunda in Khándesh were given by Firúz Tughlák of Delhi to Malik Rája an Arab adventurer. He attacked the rája of Báglán and forced him to pay tribute; and also invaded Sultánpur, which belonged to Gujarát, but was driven back into Thálner. He died in Thálner in A.D. 1399, and he and several of his successors were buried there. Thálner was given to his younger son, and the rest of his possessions to Malik Názir his elder son, who is considered the first king of Khándesh and the founder of the Faruki dynasty. Malik Názir married the daughter of Muzaffar Sháh of Gujarát, and though there was not unfrequently war between them, the Khándesh princes usually acknowledged the supremacy of the kings of Gujarát.

Soon after his accession Malik Názir seized by treachery the fort of Asirgad from Ása the Ahír; and at the advice it is said of Shaikh Zeinudín, a sage of Daulatábád, he built the towns of Burhánpur and Zeinábád on the Tápti. Burhánpur became the capital of Khándesh and one of the most important towns south of the Narbada, standing on one of the highways between Hindustán and the Dakhan. In A.D. 1417, with the help of the king of Málwa, Málík Názir recovered the fort of Thálner from his brother; took Sultánpur and overran Nandurbár in A.D. 1420, but his troops were soon driven out by the Gujarát army. In A.D. 1435 he invaded Berar, which was then subject to the Bahamani kings, but he was attacked by Ala-ud-dín Bahamani, who took Burhánpur and ravaged Khándesh. Málík Názir took refuge in the fort of Laling, but was defeated and besieged by the Dakhan troops in A.D. 1437. He died during the siege, which was raised on the approach of aid from Gujarát. The Khándesh dominions appear to have included the country between the Sátputás and the Tápti as far west as Thálner, which was a frontier fort, and as far east as Burhánpur and Asirgad; and to the south of the Tápti, the country from Zeinábad up to the Sátmála hills; as far west as Laling, which was also a frontier fort.

Malik Názir was succeeded by his son Miran Adil Khán. He was assassinated in A.D. 1441, and his son Mubárik Khán reigned till A.D. 1457. Adil Khán then became king, and his reign, which lasted till A.D. 1503, was one of the most flourishing periods of Khándesh history. He neglected to pay tribute to Gujarát, but was forced to do so about the year 1499.

Towards the end of the fifteenth century the Bahamani dominions had become greatly extended, and they were redistributed into eight provinces, of one of which Daulatábád was the head, and of another Junnar. About A.D. 1485 these provinces were placed under Malik Ahmad Beheri, who made Junnar his head-quarters, and employed himself in reducing the petty Marátha chiefs. His father, Nizám-ul-Mulk, was murdered at Bidar in A.D. 1489, and Malik Ahmad threw off his allegiance to the Bahamani kings. He defeated the first force sent against him; and when a second army was sent he retired to Junnar, and then marched to Jeur, a village near the source of the Sina river. The Bahamani troops marched by Tisgaon to Bhingár, and remained inactive there for nearly a month, till Malik Ahmad suddenly marched across from Jeur, surprised and routed them. This victory secured the independence of the kingdom of Ahmadnagar and the power of the Nizám Sháh dynasty as the line of Ahmad is called; and about the same time Yusúf Adil Sháh made himself independent at Bijápur. The history of the Dakhan for the next century and a half is the story of a succession of wars between the Muhammadan kings of Khándesh, Berar, Ahmadnagar, Bidar, Golkonda, and Bijápur; and till the completion of the Mughal conquest of Ahmadnagar in A.D. 1637, hardly a year passed in peace, and the state of the country, especially round Sholápur, must have been miserable. Khándesh was more fortunate than the Dakhan, and till the Maráthás began their depredations it enjoyed comparative rest. Under its own kings and under the Mughals it was one of the richest countries in India. Under the Mughals Burhánpur was the head-quarters of a royal viceroy, and the aqueducts and the remains of the palaces and mosques attest its former importance. The population of the country was large, irrigation was common, and districts such as Navápur Sultánpur and the Pál Tappa, now almost deserted on account of their unhealthy climate, were formerly thickly peopled and highly cultivated.

When Malik Ahmad had ensured his own safety, he endeavoured to secure the fort of Daulatábád. His first efforts were unsuccessful, and he then determined to build his capital in a central situation near the scene of his victory at Bhingár. In two years (A.D. 1493-1495) a city sprang up, which, says Farishtah, equalled in splendour Bagdad and Cairo and was called by its founder's name. There are now at Ahmadnagar no buildings which can compare with those of its rival, Bijápur; a few tombs and the aqueducts and fort are almost the only memorials of the Musalmán rulers; but while Bijápur is deserted by trade Ahmadnagar is still one of the most thriving towns in the Dakhan. Ahmad built a palace and made a garden where the present fort stands, and brought water in three aqueducts from Kapurvádi, a distance of about five miles. On the capture of Daulatábád he built a mud fort which about the year A.D. 1560 was replaced by the present stone building. Ahmad is said to have built the palace of which the ruins remain at the Bhisti Bág. He and his successors were buried in the Roza Bág, close to the city, where their tombs still stand.

In A.D. 1499 Mahmúd Begada, sovereign of Gujarát, overran Khándesh; and Ahmad Nizám Sháh marched to Burhánpur to help Adil Khán Faruki of Khándesh: their united forces drove Mahmúd back, but next year he returned and exacted tribute from Adil Khán. When Ahmad returned from Khándesh, he again attacked Daulatábád, and at last took it. About this time the kings of the Dakhan mutually acknowledged each other and settled the boundaries of their respective kingdoms. That of Ahmadnagar comprised the present districts of Daulatábád, Ahmadnagar, the open country of Poona and Násik, and part of the Konkan. Ahmad Nizám Sháh is said to have reduced the fort of Antur and other places in the Sátmálás, and to have made the rájás of Báglán and Gálna pay him tribute. On the death of Adil Khán of Khándesh in A.D. 1503, his brother Dáud Khán came to the throne, and reigned till A.D. 1510. His death was the signal for confusion till Adil Khán II. was put on the throne by his grandfather Mahmúd of Gujarát.

Ahmad Nizám Sháh died in A.D. 1508, and was succeeded by his son Burhán, during whose long reign (1508-1553) Ahmadnagar was constantly at war with Bijápur. The cause of quarrel was the right to Sholápur and the adjoining five districts. These had been promised to Burhán by Ismáel Adil Sháh as the dowry of his sister, who was married to Burhán in A.D. 1523. The districts were not given at the time; Burhán overran them in A.D. 1543, and gave them back, and finally in 1549 with the aid of the kings of Bidar and Bijánagar he took Sholápur. In A.D. 1526 Burhán took from the king of Berar the district of Pathri the home of his ancestors, overran Berar, and routed the Khándesh forces; but in A.D. 1528 Bahádur Sháh of Gujarát came to aid them, drove back the Ahmadnagar troops, and occupied Ahmadnagar, while Burhán retired to Junnar. Bahádur Sháh built the black terrace (where the present kacheri stands), and remained in the city forty days, when he was compelled to retire for want of provisions, and was followed by Burhán to Daulatábád, where peace was made. In that year and in A.D. 1530, when Burhán met him at Burhánpur, Bahádur Sháh's supremacy was acknowledged.

Adil Khán II. of Khándesh died in A.D. 1520. He was succeeded by Miran Muhammad, who took part as an ally of Bahádur Sháh in the war just mentioned. When Bahádur Sháh died in A.D. 1535, his heir Mahmúd was a prisoner at Asirgad in the hands of Miran Muhammad, who took advantage of this and had himself proclaimed king of Gujarát. He died in six weeks, and his brother Mubárak, who succeeded him on the throne of Khándesh, released Mahmúd but obtained from him the provinces of Sultánpur and Nandurbár as his ransom. These provinces remained from that time part of the Khándesh kingdom, and an attempt made in A.D. 1566 by Chengiz Khán, a Gujarát general, to retake them, was defeated, after he had penetrated as far as Thálner. Mubárak reigned till 1566. He was the first of the Khándesh kings who came in contact with the Mughals. In A.D. 1561 Báaz Bahádur was expelled from Málwa by Akbar; the Mughal forces followed him into Khándesh and sacked Burhánpur, but were overtaken and routed by Mubárak.

In A.D. 1553 Hussain Nizám Sháh succeeded his father Burhán and soon became involved in war with Alí Adil Sháh, who was aided by Rámraj of Vijayanagar, while the king of Golkonda sometimes sided with one party sometimes with the other. The allies advanced and besieged Ahmadnagar, but were forced to retire for want of supplies. Hussain then built the present stone fort, and carried the war into the districts near Sholápur; but having suffered a severe defeat near Kalyán, in which he is said to have lost 600 cannon, among them the great gun now at Bijápur, he had to retreat to Junnar, while the allies once more besieged Ahmadnagar (A.D. 1562). The rains came on, and a flood of the Sina is said to have carried away 25,000 men of Rámraj's army. The allies retreated, and the Musalmán kings, alarmed at the insolence of Rámraj, combined against him. Hussain gave his sister Chánd Bibi to Alí Adil Sháh in A.D. 1563, with Sholápur as her dowry, and the united forces invaded the Vijayanagar territories. A decisive battle was fought at Tálíkot on the Krishna in which Rámraj was killed and his army routed. Soon after this Hussain died and was succeeded by his son Mortiza, a madman. He overran Berar, defeated the Khándesh troops who opposed him, and by A.D. 1572 annexed it to the kingdom of Ahmadnagar. As he grew older he secluded himself entirely, and entrusted the management of the kingdom to Salábat Khán, a minister who has left a high reputation for ability and integrity. He is said to have begun the tank at Bhátodi near Ahmadnagar, which has lately (1877) been restored; and his tomb on the hills to the east of the city is a prominent feature in the landscape. He was dismissed and imprisoned about the year A.D. 1585, because the king considered that he was responsible for a war with Bijápur; he was released in A.D. 1588 after Mortiza's death, and died in A.D. 1589. Mortiza was killed in A.D. 1587 by his son Mirán, who reigned only a short time being assassinated by his minister Mirza Khán, and Ismáel was put on the throne in 1588. Akbar, the emperor of Delhi, seized the opportunity for interference in the affairs of the Dakhán, and favoured the claims of Burhán the brother of Mortiza. Ibráhím Adil Sháh also took Burhán's side. He was at first unsuccessful, but in A.D. 1590 he defeated Ismáel's troops and became king.

In Khándesh Mubárak, who died in A.D. 1566, was succeeded by his son Mirán Muhammad. It was this prince who interfered unsuccessfully on behalf of Berar in 1571. He died in 1576 and was succeeded by his brother Rája Ali.

In A.D. 1594, Burhân Nizâm Shâh died and was succeeded by Ibrâhîm, who was killed the same year in battle with Bijâpur. The nobles of Ahmadnagar were divided into four factions, and the chief who held the city, and had in his power the infant king Bahâdur Shâh, called in the Mughals. Their army drew near the city under the command of Murâd, son of Akbar, but the approach of danger made the nobles unite to defend their capital. Chând Bibi, the widow of Ali Adil Shâh and aunt of the young king, threw herself into the fort; persuaded the king of Bijâpur to march to her aid; and by her gallant defence forced the Mughals to raise the siege and retire (A.D. 1595). A temporary peace followed and Berar was surrendered to the Mughals.

Next year (A.D. 1596) fresh disturbances broke out at Ahmadnagar, and Murâd again marched into the Dakhan with Râja Ali of Khândesh as his dependant and ally. The kings of Golkonda and Bijâpur joined the Ahmadnagar forces, and a great battle was fought in January 1597 at Sonpat on the Godâvari with no decisive results. Râja Ali was killed in the fight, and was succeeded by his son Bahâdur Khân.

Akbar now marched in person to carry on the war, and arrived at Burhânpur in the year A.D. 1599. Disagreements arose between him and the king of Khândesh, and Akbar overran Khândesh and blockaded Asirgad, where the king took refuge. Meanwhile Akbar's son, prince Dâniâl, had advanced on Ahmadnagar; the place was in utter confusion; the soldiers murdered Chând Bibi, and a few days later the Mughals stormed the fort and took the king prisoner (July 1600). Shortly afterwards Asirgad surrendered; the king was sent a prisoner to Hindustân, and Khândesh became part of the empire of Delhi. Prince Dâniâl was made governor of Khândesh and Berar; his capital was at Burhânpur; and for a time Khândesh was called after him Dândis, and copper coins were struck at Burhânpur called Dânpaisa.

The Nizâm Shâh dynasty did not become extinct on the fall of the capital. Malik Ambar, an Abyssinian, set up Mortîza as king, retired across the Godâvari, and founded a city at Kharki near Daulatâbâd, to which Aurangzîb afterwards gave the name of Aurangâbâd. He defeated the Khân-i-Khânân the Mughal leader, and re-took Ahmadnagar and Berar. In A.D. 1612 he drove back another army and forced it to retire into Bâglân, and it was not till A.D. 1617 that he was defeated by Shâh Jahân and forced to surrender Ahmadnagar, which, thenceforward remained in the hands of the Mughals. He died in A.D. 1626. Malik Ambar was not more famous for his skill as a general than for his revenue administration; and the settlement made by him was preserved in Shâhji's jâhgîr round Poona, though in many districts it was supplanted by Todar Mal's settlement. It was under him that the Marâthâ chiefs became important. The greatest family was that of the Jâdhaves of Sindkhed, whose chief went over to the Mughals in A.D. 1621. The Jâdhaves were descendants of the râjâs of Devgad; and the villages of Hatnur, Bansendra, and Bokangaon not far from Ellora, are still held by the family. The Bhonslâs of Verola or Ellora, from whom came Shivâji, were another important family.

In A.D. 1628 war broke out on account of Khân Jahân Lodi, the Mughal governor of the Dakhan, who was suspected by Sháh Jahán and took refuge in Báglán. The Deshmukhs refused to surrender him to the Mughals, and drove back their forces, but Khán Jahán was at last obliged to fly, and was afterwards overtaken and killed. In A.D. 1631 Mortiza Nizám Sháh was killed by the son of Malik Ambar, and Daulatábád was taken by the Mughals in A.D. 1633. Shahji Bhonsla, the father of Shiváji, set up another king, and overran the country south of the Chándod range and as far east as Ahmadnagar; in A.D. 1634 he drove back the Mughals from Purenda and forced them to retire to Burhánpur, but fresh forces were sent, and in A.D. 1637 he came to terms and surrendered the Nizám Sháh prince, and thus the kingdom of Ahmadnagar was extinguished.

In A.D. 1633 Khándesh was made into a subha, and included part of Berar and the present district of Khándesh as far south and west as Gálua. The districts of Sultánpur and Nandurbár had formerly been joined to the subha of Málwa. The country south of Khándesh as far as the Bhíma was made into a separate subha, of which Daulatábád was the head. Both governments were in 1636 united under Aurangzih. He reduced the hilly country of Báglán, which was however soon relinquished. In the years of quiet which now succeeded Sháh Jahán introduced into his Dakhan possessions a new revenue system known as that of Todar Mal. This assessment called tankha was the standard assessment till the British revenue survey system was introduced. In 1616 Sir Thomas Roe passed through Khándesh and was received at Burhánpur by prince Parvis. The city had not then recovered from the ravages of the late wars, and contained few fine buildings. Forty years later it was visited by the French traveller Bernier, and about A.D. 1665 by Tavernier, who travelled up from Surat. At that time there was a considerable trade in brocades and muslins. Tavernier mentions Nandurbár as famous for its musk melons and grapes and for its careful and hardworking husbandmen. In A.D. 1670 the English factory was moved from Ahmadábád to Nandurbár.

Before the middle of the seventeenth century Shiváji, the founder of the Marátha empire, had begun to establish himself in the western hills. In A.D. 1657 he ventured to attack the Mughal territory, and surprised the town of Ahmadnagar. He was driven off, but carried away considerable booty. Profiting by the confusion which ensued on the struggle for power between the sons of Sháh Jahán, Shiváji extended his ravages, and scarcely a year passed without incursions into the Ahmadnagar districts. The fort had gained a reputation for strength since its successful defence by Chánd Bibi, and the Maráthas never ventured to attack it. In A.D. 1664 Shiváji sacked the town and retired with his plunder. After his return from Delhi in A.D. 1666, he began hostilities on a more extended scale. In 1670, after sacking Surat, he retired through Khándesh by the pass near Sálher. A few months later he sent Pratápráo Gujar into Khándesh, and he for the first time exacted from the village officers promises to pay chauth. At the same time Moro Pant Trimal took the forts of Aundh and Patta in the Akola district and the important fortress of Sálher in Báglán, which commanded one of the great roads into Gujarát. Aundh and Patta were re-taken by the Mughals in the same year, and in A.D. 1672 Mohabat Khán besieged Salher. Shiváji sent a force to raise the siege, which was attacked by the Mughal troops; after a severe action the Mughals were completely routed, the siege was raised, and the lost forts were recovered.

In A.D. 1673 Khán Jahán was sent to the Dakhan, but the usual incursions continued, and finally Khán Jahán cantoned at Pedgaon on the Bhíma, and built a fort which he called Bahádurgad; and from that time Pedgaon became an important frontier post of the Mughals. Shiváji's attention was for some time directed to other quarters, but in A.D. 1679 he crossed the Bhíma and plundered the country up to Gálua; on his return he was attacked near Sangamner on his way to Patta. He drove back the first body which attacked him with considerable difficulty, and was proceeding on his way, when he found the road blocked by another body of troops, and only the superior knowledge of his guides enabled him to avoid the enemy and reach Patta in safety. Shiváji then reduced all the forts round Patta. He died in the following year (1680). In A.D. 1684 the emperor Aurangzíb left Hindustán and reached Burhánpur with the grand army of the empire. He sent on two armies, one under his son Moázim by Ahmadnagar to the Konkan, the other under his son Azim to reduce the Chándol country. Sálher was given up, but the Mughal army was completely repulsed by the haváldár of the fort of Rámsej near Násik, and retired. Patta and the other forts were reduced by the Mughals. Aurangzíb advanced to Ahmadnagar in A.D. 1685, and even while he was there the Marátha troops moved up from the Konkan, ravaged the whole of Khándesh, sacked Burhánpur, and returned plundering by Násik. Till A.D. 1707 Aurangzíb was detained in the Dakhan engaged in a weary and fruitless contest with the Maráthás, and in that year he retreated hard pressed to Ahmadnagar, where he died on the 21st February 1707. He was buried at Roza.

Claims,

Owing to the dissensions between the sons of Aurangzíb the Mughal power in the Dakhan rapidly declined. In A.D. 1716 Dáud Khán, governor of the Dakhan, revolted against the Saiads, who then ruled at Delhi in the name of the emperor Farukshir; he was, however, defeated and slain in a battle in Khándesh by Hussain Ali Saiad. Hussain Ali then sent troops to open the communication between Burhánpur and Surat, which was stopped by Khanderao Dábháde, a Marátha leader, but they were surrounded and cut to pieces by that chief. A larger force was then sent, and a battle was fought near Ahmadnagar; the result was indecisive, but the advantage remained with the Maráthás. At last after tedious negotiations, through the able management of Báláji Vishvanáth the Peshwa, the Maráthás obtained in A.D. 1720 the grant of the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the six divisions of the Dakhan including Ahmadnagar and Khándesh. Shortly after this, the withdrawal of imperial power from the Dakhan was completed by the revolt of Nizám-ul-Mulk, governor of Málwa. He crossed the Narbada in A.D. 1720: Asirgad and Burhánpur were surrendered to him, and the whole of Khándesh acknowledged his authority. He then defeated one imperial army at Burhánpur and another at Balápur in Berar, and from that time was practically independent. Ahmadnagar and the Gangthari were subject to him as well as Khándesh.

Nizám-ul-Mulk died in A.D. 1748 at Burhánpur, and the Peshwa took advantage of the disturbances which followed his death to attack his successor Salábat Jang. The Peshwa had however miscalculated his power, as Salábat had as his general the Frenchman Bussy. The Nizám advanced to Ahmadnagar in A.D. 1751. Bussy repelled the attacks of the Maráthás and surprised their camp at Rájápur on the Ghod river. As it advanced the Nizám's army plundered Ránjangaon and destroyed Talegaon Dhamdhera. A severe action was fought here, and the Nizám's troops were nearly routed, but they advanced to Koregaon on the Bhíma. News then arrived that the fort of Trimbak near Násik had been surprised by the Maráthás, and Salábat Jang returned to Ahmadnagar; in A.D. 1752 he marched thence by Junnar to retake the fort, but being hard pressed by the Maráthás he agreed to an armistice. He was the more ready, as he was threatened by an attack from his eldest brother Gázi-ud-din, who advanced with a large army to Aurangábád, and promised the Maráthás to cede them the country between the Tápti and the Godávári west of Berar. Gázi-ud-dín was poisoned while at Aurangábád, but his brother Salábat confirmed the cession, and thus the Maráthás gained the greater part of Khándesh Násik and the Gangthari.

In A.D. 1759 the Maráthás at length gained the fort of Ahmadnagar. It was betrayed to the Peshwa for a sum of money by the Nizám's commandant Kavi Jang, whose descendants still hold some inám villages in Karjat to the south of Ahmadnagar. War ensued between the Peshwa and the Nizám; the Maráthás began by taking the fort of Pedgaon on the Bhíma; they then attacked the Nizám at Udgir and forced him to come to terms (A.D. 1760). He surrendered the forts of Daulatábád, Sinnar, Asirgad, and Bijápur; confirmed the surrender of Ahmadnagar, and gave up the greater part of the provinces of Bijápur Bidar and Aurangábád. By this treaty the whole of the present district of Ahmadnagar and part of that of Násik were gained by the Maráthás. Next year they suffered the disastrous defeat of Pánipat, and the Nizám, taking advantage of their distress, advanced, burned the temples of Toka at the meeting of the Pravara with the Godávári, marched on Poona, and forced the Peshwa to restore some of the districts lately ceded.

In A.D. 1762 quarrels arose between the Peshwa Mádhav Ráo and his uncle Raghunáth; and the latter, in order to gain the help of the Nizám, agreed to restore the remainder of the districts ceded in A.D. 1760. A treaty was made to that effect at Pedgaon, but as the quarrels in the Peshwa's family were adjusted, the treaty was not carried out. Consequently in A.D. 1763 the Nizám marched on Poona and burnt it. As he retired he was overtaken by the Maráthás; and part of his army was attacked by them at Rákshasbhuvan on the Godávári and cut to pieces. After this defeat the Nizám came to terms and confirmed the former cessions.

In A.D. 1767 fresh quarrels broke out between Mádhav Ráo and his uncle. Raghunáth levied troops in the Gangthari and encamped near the fort of Dhodap in the Chándod range; but his forces were defeated by Mádhav Ráo, and he was taken prisoner. In A.D. 1774, after Raghunáth had defeated the army of the Bráhmaṇ ministers at Pandharpur, he marched to Burhánpur and thence to Málwa; and then hoping to gain followers in Gujarát, he moved to Thálner in Khándesh, garrisoned it, and proceeded to Surat. Thálner was soon reduced by the Ministers' troops.

The English now took part in the quarrels among the Maráthás. In 1778 the first English force marched across India under Colonel Goddard, who, after reaching Burhánpur, pursued the route through Khándesh to Surat. The war was finished in A.D. 1782 by the treaty of Sálbái, and Raghunáth retired to Kopargaon on the Godávári in the Ahmadnagar district, where he soon after died. His family remained there till A.D. 1792, when they were removed to Anandveli near Násik.

In A.D. 1795, in consequence of the Peshwa's exorbitant demands, war broke out between him and the Nizám. The Nizám marched as far as Kharda in the south of the present district of Ahmadnagar and was met there by the Maráthás. The issue of the engagement which ensued was for some time doubtful, till the Nizám took fright and retired into the fort of Kharda, where he was shut up and forced to sign a treaty surrendering districts along the frontier from Purinda to Daulatábád. This was the last occasion on which all the great Marátha chiefs acted together.

With the death of Mádhav Ráo II. in A.D. 1796, a time of confusion and trouble, unparalleled even in Indian history, began, and quiet was not restored until the conquest of the country by the English in A.D. 1818. In A.D. 1797 Sindia, who had already obtained large grants of land in the Ahmadnagar districts, received the fort of Ahmadnagar and other lands in the neighbourhood as the price of his support of the claims of Báji Ráo to be Peshwa. At the end of the same year he seized and imprisoned in the fort the great minister Nána Phadnavis. In A.D. 1798 disputes between Daulatráo Sindia and the two elder widows of his adoptive father Mahádaji Sindia resulted in the war known as the war of the Báis; their troops ravaged the parts of the Dakhan subject to Sindia, and the country round Ahmadnagar suffered severely. Nána Phadnavis was released, and at last in A.D. 1800 Sindia obtained the help of Yashvant Ráo Holkar, who attacked the Báis in Khándesh and drove them into Burhánpur, whence they managed to escape to Mewár.

Soon after this war broke out between Holkar and Sindia. From A.D. 1802 when Holkar devastated Sindia's possessions in Khándesh may be reckoned the ruin of this once flourishing province. Holkar marched on plundering through the Gangthari; he routed Narsinh Vinchurkar, who opposed him, and advanced to Poona; then followed the battle of Poona, which left the Peshwa at the mercy of Holkar. As his only resource Báji Ráo signed the treaty of Bassein with the English, and the English forces marched on Poona. Colonel Stephenson with the Haidarábád army took up a position at Purenda, while Sir A. Wellesley advanced to save Poona from Amrut Ráo the adopted brother of Báji Ráo (April 1803). Amrut Ráo retired to Sangamner, ravaging the country, and then turned off to Násik, sacked it, and remained in that neighbourhood till the end of the war, when he made terms with the English. The common danger made the Marátha chiefs unite against the English. During the negotiations previous to the outbreak of the war Sir A. Wellesley marched to Válki, eight miles south of Ahmadnagar. On the 8th of August he stormed the town, on the 10th his guns opened on the fort, and on the 12th it was surrendered. Wellesley then crossed the Godávári, and on the 23rd of October fought the battle of Assaye. In October Colonel Stephenson took Burhánpur and the fort of Asirgad, and Sindia was forced to make peace. By the treaty of Sirji-Anjangaon, Burhánpur Asirgad and his Khándesh possessions were restored to Sindia, while Ahmadnagar and its districts were given to the Peshwa. The war against Holkar still continued, and his districts in the Dakhan were taken by the English. Chándod, Gálna, and other forts were surrendered and in A.D. 1805 he came to terms. His possessions with the exception of Chándod Ambar and Shevgaon were at once restored, and these districts also were given up within two years.

To add to the miseries of the country, which had been ravaged by several armies, the rains failed in 1803, and a fearful famine ensued. Whole districts were depopulated; the survivors took refuge in the forts built in the larger villages; the Bhíls and other wild tribes took advantage of the confusion, collected in large bands, and completed the ruin of the land; they pillaged and murdered without mercy, and none was shown to them in turn.

Under Báji Ráo districts were farmed to the highest bidder; the farmer had not only the right to collect the revenue, but to administer civil and criminal justice; as long as he paid the sum required and bribed the favourites at court, no complaints were heard; justice was openly bought and sold; and the mámlatdár of a district was often a worse enemy to the people than the Bhíls. Under the former Peshwás Khándesh had been treated as a separate province and placed under a sarsubhedár, whose power sometimes extended over Báglán. Báláji Ráo added a second sarsubhedár named Báloba Mandavagani over the country between the Godávári and the Nira, but on his death no successor was appointed. Báji Ráo appointed one Báláji Lakshman as sarsubhedár of Khándesh and Báglán with full powers to put down the Bhil disturbances. At the instigation of Manohirgir Gosávi, who commanded some troops under him, Báláji invited a large body of Bhíls to a meeting at Kopargaon on the Godávári. He there treacherously seized them, and threw them down wells. He cleared the country south of the Chándod range for a time, but in Khándesh the Bhíls became desperate, and plundered more than ever. In A.D. 1806 a second massacre of Bhíls by the Peshwa's troops took place at Ghevri Chandgaon in the Shevgaon taluka of Ahmadnagar. In Khándesh the villages of Chálisgaon and Dharangaon and the fort of Antur were the scenes of other atrocities.

The Pendhári
Freebooters,
A.D. 1816.

When Trimbakji Dengle was in power he was ordered to put down the disturbances which had again risen to a great height. He commissioned Nároba Takti, pátil of Karrambha, to clear the Gangthari and 5000 or 6000 horse and a large body of infantry were given him. The pátil butchered the Bhíls wherever found, and all who had any connection with them without any distinction of caste. During fifteen months it is said that 15,000 human beings were massacred.

In 1816 Trimbakji, who had been imprisoned at Thána in the Konkan for the murder of Gangádhār Shástri, escaped and wandered about the hilly country of Khándesh Báglán Násik and Sangamner, rousing the wild tribes, and making preparations for war in concert with his master. The Pendháris who had not hitherto ravaged Khándesh or the Dakhan also began to make inroads. In A.D. 1817 Godáji Dengle, Trimbakji's brother, rose in Khándesh: his force was dispersed by Lieutenant Davies with some of the Nizám's cavalry, but they re-assembled and took a fort. The British armies were now collecting to crush the Pendháris, and in October 1817 General Smith, who was in command at Sirur, marched to guard the Chándod passes; but early in November, hearing that affairs were threatening at Poona, he concentrated his troops at Puntámba on the Godávári. On the 5th of November Bájiráo's power was overthrown at Kirki. While General Smith marched on Poona, Báji Ráo fled north, past Junnar to Bráhmañváda in the hills south of Akola. General Smith then marched to Ahmadnagar, which had surrendered, and thence over the Nimbðhera pass to Sangamner; the Peshwa hearing of his movements fled south, and was followed by the British army over the Vashira pass and south towards Poona. After a long pursuit the Peshwa was overtaken in February 1818 at Ashti in Sholápur. A skirmish ensued, and in March 1818 he again fled to Kopargaon, his old home on the Godávári. After a time he went on to Chándod, but hearing that a British force was approaching from the north, he returned to Kopargaon, and thence fled east, and finally surrendered in May at Dholkot near Asirgad. In the meantime Holkar and the Pendháris had been defeated, and by the treaty of Mandesar in January 1818, Holkar surrendered to the English all his possessions south of the Sátputás. Sir T. Hislop marched into Khándesh and summoned the fort of Thálner belonging to Holkar. The commandant at first refused to surrender, but, as the troops were preparing to storm the place, he came out and gave himself up; a few of the troops entered, when some mistake arose, and the Arab garrison cut them down and with them two officers; the fort was at once stormed, the garrison put to the sword, and the commandant hanged. This example told, and the other forts were rapidly surrendered. At the end of A.D. 1817, a Bráhmañ named Dáji Gopál collected a few followers and drove the mámlatdár out of the fort of Betávad, south of the Tápti; he held the place and levied contributions till he heard of the fall of Thálner, when he evacuated the fort. The strongholds in the Ahmadnagar hills were reduced by Major Eldridge and those in the Chándod range by Lieut.-Colonel McDowall. The Arab mercenaries of the Peshwa collected in the strong fort of Málegaon, built fifty years before by Náro Shankar Rája Bahádur, to make a last stand, and defended themselves with such obstinacy that the place was not taken till the 13th of June 1818. With the fall of Asirgad on the 9th of April 1819 the war ended. The whole of the Peshwa's dominions and those of Holkar in the Dakhan were taken by the British Government. In Khándesh Sindia held the districts of Ráver, Varangaon, Edlábád, and Páchora, and in Ahmadnagar half of Shevgaon and the Shrigouda pargana. Ráver and Páchora were finally made over to the English Government in 1843-4, and the other districts were taken in exchange in 1860 for territory given to Sindia. The greater part of the Korti district was under Ráo Rambha Nimbálkar till 1821, when it was given over to the English. Khándesh was placed under Captain Briggs, and Ahmadnagar with the country between the Chándod hills and the Bhima under Captain Pottinger. Little difficulty was experienced in restoring order in Ahmadnagar; the country was exhausted and the people willingly obeyed any power that could protect them; the Peshwa's disbanded soldiers settled in their villages; the hill forts were dismantled, and their garrisons gradually reduced. Near the Sahyádris the country was in the hands of the Koli Náiks; they and the Bhíl Náiks were sent for, and the allowances and villages which they already held were confirmed to them on the understanding that they should keep the adjoining country quiet. In a short time the Ahmadnagar districts enjoyed a peace to which they had long been strangers.

In Khándesh the pacification of the country was more difficult. The Bhíls formed a large portion of the population, and though the open country was soon cleared, it was not so easy to reduce the mountainous tracts of the Sátputás and the unhealthy wilds of the west. A considerable force was kept up, which had its head-quarters at Málegaon: the hills were guarded and outbreaks were severely punished. On the other hand inducements were held out to the Bhíls to cultivate land; two agencies were established, one for the western Bhíls and one for those in the eastern and southern districts called the Kanar agency; advances were made and land given free to all who would settle; allowances were made to the Náiks who held the hill passes; and finally attempts were made to give the Bhíls employment by forming them into an irregular force. Owing to the lazy habits of the men and their dislike of discipline, the first efforts failed. It was not till A.D. 1825 that Lieutenant (afterwards Sir James) Outram was successful in forming the Bhíl Corps. His patience and firmness, combined with his thorough knowledge of their character, gave him a great influence over his men; they soon did good service against bands of plunderers, and Khándesh by degrees grew quiet.

When the British Government took possession of the country much of it was almost ruined. Of Khándesh the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone, in his report on the territory conquered from the Peshwa, says: Some parts of the province are still in high cultivation, and others, more recently abandoned, convey a strong notion of their former richness and prosperity; but the greater part of Khándesh is covered with thick jungles, full of tigers and other wild beasts and scattered with the ruins of villages. The districts north of the Tápti in particular, which were formerly very populous, and yielded a large revenue, are now almost an uninhabited forest. Further on he says: The east of Gangthari, though open and fertile, is almost entirely uninhabited since the famine of 1803; the country between that and Ahmadnagar is better, and the plains south of Ahmadnagar are for many marches in all directions one sheet of the richest cultivation.

As examples of the condition of the country it will be enough to notice that in A.D. 1803 only twenty-one out of 180 villages were inhabited in the Nevása taluka of Ahmadnagar, a district of the Gangthari. In other parts of the same collectorate, in A.D. 1819, more than half the land was waste and all the country round Sirur was unpeopled. In the Chopda taluka of Khándesh, north of the Tápti, only four per cent of the land was cultivated in A.D. 1818. The city of Ahmadnagar contained in 1818 a population of 13,000, and in three years this number was almost doubled. In Khándesh new towns, such as Dhulia Párola and Jalgaon, sprang up. Land was taken for cultivation on easy terms, and when, after some years of experience, the Revenue Survey was introduced, the progress of the country towards prosperity was steady.

Bhíl Rising
in 1857.

Since the country came under British management the only notable disturbances are those caused by the outbreak of the Bhíls in 1857. The Bhíls were excited by the mutiny in Hindustán, and rose in the Ahmadnagar district in October 1857. A skirmish took place in that month between a body of Bhíls under Bhágoji Náik and the police under Captain Henry, in which Captain Henry was killed. Other risings occurred in Khándesh in the Sátputa Hills under one Kajar Singh, and in other parts and also in the Nizám's territory in the country to the north and west of Aurangábád. Detachments were sent out, and levies made, and after several skirmishes and some loss of life the greater number of the bands were broken up; but it was not till November 1859 that the disturbances were finally put down by the total destruction of Bhágoji Náik's band by Mr. (the late Sir) Frank Souter, and a force of police, and the dispersal of one or two other bands at the same time in the Nizám's territories. In Khándesh the town and fort of Párola, which belonged to a member of the Jhánsi family, were confiscated by Government and the fort dismantled.

Chiefs and Jahgirdárs.

The number of important chiefs or jahgirdárs connected with these districts is small. In the wild west of Khándesh thirteen petty states are under the charge of the Collector as Political Agent. Of these six are known by the name of Mewás and seven by the name of Dángs; the former are situated north of the Tápti about the Sátputa hills, and the latter south of the Tápti and below the Gháts. The chiefs are the descendants of the Bhíl Náiks who held the western districts when the British power was established: the districts are unhealthy and thinly peopled; the revenue of the chiefs is derived principally from timber dués; they are allowed to settle all petty disputes themselves, and serious cases go before the Collector. One of the principal states in the Sátputás was the Akráni pargana held by a Rájput. Its early history is unknown. After the decline of Musalmán power, Chaoji, rána of Dharwai, north of the Narbada, established himself in the hilly part of the country. He was succeeded by his son Gaman Singh, who built the Akráni fort; and he in turn by his son Hanmant Singh; his son and successor Gaman Singh died without heirs, and great disturbances ensued till Bháu Singh, rána of Maltwar, a district on the west, annexed the country and built the fort of Roshmal. He was succeeded by his son Bhikáji, who murdered Jangar, the Bhíl Náik of Chikli, below the hills; and in revenge Jangar's son Deváji surprised Roshmal and killed Bhikáji. On this the Peshwa's troops occupied the country, and when a year later the British forces conquered Khándesh, Akráni submitted to them. The present rána has an inám village, Pratáppur, and an annual allowance in lieu of the Akráni pargana. To the south of the Dángs is the small state of Surgána, which belongs to the deshmuks of the district; it is also under the supervision of the Collector of Khándesh. Further south, and also below the Gháts, the Musalmán state of Peint remained under the care of the Collector of Násik until on the death without heirs of the Begam in 1878 it lapsed and became a subdivision of the district of Násik. The most important jáhgirdár is the Vinchurkar, a Bráhmaṇ whose ancestors rose into note under the Peshwás; he holds a number of villages in the Gangthari and lives at the town of Vinchur in the Násik collectorate. The family rose to importance in the middle of the eighteenth century when Vithal Shivdev was at its head; he distinguished himself at the siege of Ahmadábád in 1755, and accompanied the Marátha army in the fatal expedition which ended in the defeat of Pánipat (A.D. 1761), of which he was one of the few survivors. He was raised to high rank by Ragunáth Ráo. The family acquired large possessions in Hindustán, but these were forfeited on account of their adherence to Báji Ráo.

The most noteworthy of the Khándesh jáhgirdárs are the Dikshits of Shendurni, the descendants of Paltankar Dikshit, the priest or guru of Báji Ráo, the last Peshwa. The grant of this jághir was confirmed by the British Government at the special request of Báji Ráo.

HISTORY OF THE BOMBAY KARNÁTAK:

MUSALMÁN AND MARÁTHA,
A.D. 1300 - 1818.

BY THE LATE
MAJOR E. W. WEST,
JOINT ADMINISTRATOR OF SÁNGLI,

[CONTRIBUTED 1877.]

Historical Sketch of the Southern Marátha Country or Bombay Karna'tak, that is the territory included in the districts of Belgaum, Dha'rwa'r, and Bija'pur, from the Musalma'n Conquest till it became British territory :

THE raid into the southern part of the Peninsula made by Káfúr and the various Musalmán leaders who followed him (A.D. 1310-1327), effectually broke up the existing Hindu dynasties. To effect the conquest of the country thus overrun, more was required than isolated expeditions, and as each wave of invasion retired the Hindus seem to have made head again. The Pálegár chiefs regained their fortresses, and new dynasties replaced those which had been subverted. In considerably less than half a century after the Bellál rájás had been overthrown, new Hindu kingdoms were formed in the south, which for many a day were destined to be thorns in the sides of the Musalmáns. One leading kingdom was founded by an officer formerly in the service of the Bellál kings, at Vijayanagar on the Tungbhadra river opposite to Anigundi, which had been the capital of a more ancient but less important principality. Within the limits of the new kingdom was included the whole of the Southern Marátha Country as far north as Belgaum; the district immediately to the north of the last-named place being evidently in the hands of the Musalmáns, as Farishtah mentions an Amir of Hukeri. From this and other territorial titles incidentally referred to, we gather that in A.D. 1347, when the Bahamani dynasty was founded the districts of Bijápur Athni and Chikodi, in the tract of country which is the subject of the present sketch, formed part of its dominions.¹ The Musalmáns were by no means complete masters of all the country nominally subject to them. The effect of the terrible famine known as the Durga Devi, which began in A.D. 1396 and lasted twelve years, was to throw into the hands of pálegárs and robbers many strongholds previously conquered by the Muhammadans,² and so late as the reign of Máhmúd Sháh Bahamani II. (A.D. 1493), we read of a Hindu zamindár at Miraj.³

From an early period the Bahamani kings devoted their principal attention to attacks on Vijayanagar; but from Golkonda or Bidar as a base of operations, it was easier to overrun the districts of Raichur and Mudgal, which lay between the two capitals, than to attempt the conquest of a tract like the Bombay Karnátak or Southern Marátha Country, less conveniently situated, and which is described by the Musalmán historian as full of fastnesses and woods, almost impenetrable to troops.¹ When the Muhammadans, after repeatedly taking and losing the forts of Raichur and Mudgal, at last established themselves in the districts commanded by these forts, they, after being baffled by the strength of the fortress of Adoni or Adwáni, turned their attention to the Southern Marátha Country, which their new conquests gave them the means of attacking from the south-east. In 1406 Firoz Sháh, the grandson of Alla-ud-dín Bahamani, besieged and took Bankápur, described by Farishtah as the most important fortress in the Karnátak; and this success placed at his mercy the southern part of what is now the Dhárwár collectorate. From Bankápur the Musalmáns gradually extended their arms in a northerly direction, though they seem to have advanced but slowly. Fifty years later Navalgund is mentioned as the seat of a sarkár or province; and it was there that Jalál Khán, governor of the province and brother-in-law of Ala-ud-dín Bahamani II., raised the standard of revolt (A.D. 1454) in the hope of seating his son Sikandar Khán on the throne, a step which led to the death of his son and his own imprisonment for life.

One of the chief leaders in the campaign against Jalál Khán was Máhmúd Gawán, who held the office of prime minister as well as the government of Bijápur. This able man distinguished himself highly in the reigns of Alla-ud-dín II. and Humáyún Shah Bahamani, but the greatest of his exploits was reserved for the reign of Muhammad Sháh II. In the historical sketch of Kolhápur an account is given of Máhmúd Gawán's campaign in Kolhápur and Vishálgad; after which he proceeded to attack the maritime possessions of the rája of Vijayanagar, and with such success that he took Goa in A.D. 1470. This led to the siege and capture of Belgaum; for, at the instigation of the Vijayanagar king Birkána Ray, that is Vikram Ray, rája of the fortress of Belgaum, marched or sent troops in 1472, together with the Hindu chief of Bankápur, to retake Goa. On this Muhammad Sháh collected his forces and moved against Belgaum, "a fortress of great strength, surrounded by a deep wet ditch, and near it a pass, the only approach to which was fortified by redoubts."² According to the Musalmán historian, Birkána Ray, who commanded the fort in person, at first asked for terms, which were refused. The Hindu chief then defended himself with great vigour, and effectually prevented the enemy from filling the wet ditch, in which lay the principal strength of the fort. The besiegers on this changed their tactics and tried the effect of mining, a mode of operation not hitherto used in the Dakhan. The new plan proved successful, three mines being sprung which made practicable breaches: these were immediately stormed; and notwithstanding the gallant defence made by the garrison and the severe losses inflicted on the besiegers, the latter succeeded in gaining the ramparts. The inner citadel had yet to be carried, but Birkana Ray, despairing of being able to offer an effectual resistance, disguised himself and was admitted to the presence of the king as a messenger from the Hindu chief. He then drew the rim of his turban round his neck and discovered himself, saying that he had come with his family to kiss the foot of the throne. The king, pleased with this exhibition of confidence, admitted him into the order of nobility.

The capture of Belgaum and the conquest of its dependencies brought the whole of the Southern Marátha Country under the Musalmáns, and for the time completely crushed the efforts of Hindu independence. The acquisitions were added to the estates of Khwája Máhmúd Gawán, who had taken a prominent part in the siege. Subsequently they were transferred by the minister to Fakhr-ul-Mulk.¹ In the year of the capture of Belgaum (A.D. 1472) and in the following year, a drought led to a terrible famine. No rain fell for two years; and, to use Farishtah's words: "The towns became almost depopulated; many of the inhabitants died of famine; and numbers emigrated for food to Málwa, Jáj Nagar in Katak, and Gujarát. In Telingana, Marhut that is Maharáshtra, and throughout the Bahamani dominions, no grain was sown for two years; and in the third, when the Almighty showered his mercy upon the earth, scarcely any farmer remained in the country to cultivate the land."²

The unjust execution of the prime minister in A.D. 1481 on a false charge of treason precipitated the fall of the Bahamani dynasty. The great chiefs placed in charge of provinces had for some time been strengthening their own power at the expense of their sovereign, but as long as Máhmúd Gawán lived they were kept in check: his death relieved them from all restraints, and before long the chief provinces of the Bahamani kings became separate kingdoms. Of these the present sketch deals with Bijápur alone, which Yúsuf Adil Khán Savái carved into a kingdom.

Yúsuf Adil Khán, who, after he had achieved greatness was declared to have been born to greatness,³ had entered the service of the Bahamani king Máhmúd Sháh II., and had risen from rank to rank till he was made governor of the province of Daulatábád, a post which he held at the time of the minister's death. Immediately after that event the king sent for Yúsuf Adil Khán, being compelled to do so by the attitude assumed by the other chiefs, and conferred on him the

After his father's death his brother, on succeeding to the throne, thought it would save future trouble if possible claimants were put out of the way. He accordingly demanded the child Yúsuf from his mother for execution. The mother managed to substitute a slave boy, who was strangled, and sent her son to Persia, whence he made his way to India. province of Bijāpur. This and the other provinces seem to have been bestowed under pressure; and the leaders, who in this way gained power and place retained but a slender tie of allegiance to the sovereign to whose weakness and not to whose favour they were indebted. The Bahamani kingdom was distracted by the rivalry between the Dakhanis or born subjects, and the foreigners, who had introduced themselves in great numbers: and Yūsuf Adil Khān was the leader of the latter party. It is needless to recapitulate the details of the struggles of the opposing parties. Ere long Yūsuf Adil Khān followed the example of Maḥīk Ahmad Beheri, who had declared himself king of Ahmadnagar, by having the public prayer read in his own name as king of Bijāpur (A.D. 1489) and by assuming the canopy of royalty. He soon drove out the royal garrisons that were in the forts in his district and made himself complete master of the territory under Bijāpur. Notwithstanding this he appears for some time to have kept up friendly relations with his former sovereign. He assisted Māhmūd Shāh to put down the rebellion of Bahādur Gilāni, and afterwards entertained him royally at Bijāpur.¹ He subsequently joined Māhmūd Shāh in his expedition against Kāsim Barid, another chief who had assumed sovereignty; and it is especially noted that after the victory obtained on this occasion the king treated his former vassal as an equal, and made Yūsuf sit in his presence. The alliance was further cemented by the betrothal of Yūsuf's daughter to Ahmad, the king's son. Some years later Māhmūd Shāh got up a league against the Bijāpur prince, the ostensible ground of action being that the latter had not only revolted against his sovereign but had also introduced Shia tenets into the country. The confederation failed to secure their object, and by their defeat Yūsuf Adil Khān was able to establish his kingdom on a secure basis.²

The new dynasty succeeded to the southern territory of the Bahamani monarchy, but at first the limits of their dominions were more circumscribed than those of their predecessors, as, during the feeble sway and troubled reigns of the later Bahamani kings, the Vijayanagar rājās had recovered much of the country of which they had been dispossessed. In the reign of Yūsuf's son, Ismail Adil Shāh, we find that Kittur was apparently the most southerly position occupied by the Musalmāns, Dhārwar having fallen into the hands of the Hindus, who had also possession of Torgal, so that the eastern and southern parts of the Southern Marāṭha Country had reverted to their old rulers. Afterwards the Bijāpur kingdom extended from the Nira on the north to the Tungbhadra on the south, and from the sea on the west to the Bhíma and Krishna on the east.¹ Later on its victorious arms were carried beyond the Tungbhadra, and to the south-east as far as the Bay of Bengal; and it is interesting to note that the Bijápur kings were brought in contact with two European nations destined to play a prominent part in Southern India. Thus Goa was taken from them on the west coast by Albuquerque, the Portuguese general, in A.D. 1510; while on the other side of the peninsula the French, in A.D. 1674, obtained a grant of the site of Pondicherry from the Bijápur viceroy². The most noteworthy point connected with the Adil Khán dynasty is the fact that Shiváji, the founder of the Marátha empire, was its subject, and that his first successful efforts towards the great aim of his life were made in its dominions. This is not the place for a detailed history of the Bijápur kings; but the most important events connected with them will be briefly noted, special prominence being given to such as relate to the Southern Marátha Country.

² Yūsuf assumed and his successors retained the title of Shāh. The dynasty however was generally known by the title of Adil Khān, which the old European travellers turned into Idalcām, Idalcan, and Dialkan. See Purchas's Pilgrimage and Van Linschoten's Travels.

In A.D. 1510 Yúsuf Adil Khán died, leaving a son, Ismail, who at the time of his father's death was too young to assume the reins of government. Kámál Khán Dakhani was appointed protector, but soon aspired to supplant his master. His arrangements for deposing Ismail Adil Khán and proclaiming himself king were completed, when he was assassinated by an emissary from the queen-mother.³ Though Kamál Khán's mother and his son Safdar Jang concealed the fact of his death and attempted to carry out the plot as had been planned, their efforts resulted in the death of Safdar Jang and the complete dispersion of their party.

Among those most prominent in the defence of their master was Khúsráo Túrkh, who was rewarded with the title of Asad Khán, by which he was always afterwards known, and who received Belgaum as a jáhgir, a town which he did much to strengthen and beautify.⁴

No sooner had the young king triumphed over his internal foes than he had to meet a formidable confederacy of the kings of Ahmadnagar Golkonda and Berar, who brought with them the unfortunate Bahamani king, once their sovereign, and his son Ahmad. The confederates were signally defeated near Bijápur, and Máhmúd Sháh, together with his son, fell into the hands of the victor. They were treated with the greatest courtesy, and by the Bahamani king's desire the marriage of Ismail Adil Khán's sister to prince Ahmad, to whom, as noted above, she had been betrothed was celebrated with great magnificence.

The Bijāpur king's next campaign was less successful. He marched to recover Mudgal and Raichur from the Vijayanagar rāja. When encamped on the banks of the Krishna, under the influence of intoxication, he made an attempt to cross the river without due precautions in the face of the hostile force. The result was a defeat with great loss, the king himself narrowly escaping, and the army having to return to Bijāpur. The Musalmān commander-in-chief having fallen in this expedition his place was conferred on Asad Khān, who received the title of Sipāh Salār and had many districts added to his estates. The new commander soon proved himself worthy of the honours conferred on him, for in A.D. 1524 he defeated, near Sholāpur, the confederate kings of Ahmadnagar and Berar and the regent of Bidar. The confederates were subsequently defeated in detail; and the campaign against Amir Barīd, the regent of Bidar, resulted in the capture of the latter by Asad Khān, who, with consummate daring and address, penetrated the hostile camp at night and carried away Amir Barīd on the bed on which he was lying intoxicated. The result was the capture of Bidar, and the regent became practically the vassal of the Bijāpur king. Afterwards he, together with the king of Berar, joined the Bijāpur army in an expedition against Vijayanagar, in which the forts of Mudgal and Raichur fell again into the hands of the Musalmāns.

Not long after this (A.D. 1534) Ismail Adil Shāh died, leaving Asad Khān guardian to his son and successor, Mallu. The conduct of this young king soon disgusted his guardian, who retired to Belgaum, and alienated all his friends, his own grandmother Bubuji Khānam even taking part against him. After an inglorious reign of six months he was deposed and blinded, and his brother Ibrāhīm placed on the throne in his stead. The new king inaugurated his reign by adjuring the Shia tenets of his father and grandfather. Still more important was the radical alteration he effected in the government and in the army by getting rid of foreigners and employing only Dakhanis, this change being further marked by the substitution of Marāthi the language of the country for Persian in the state accounts.

The first expedition of importance undertaken by Ibrāhīm Adil Shāh was to Vijāyanagar, where various intrigues and revolutions had been going on which ended in Bhoj Tirmal Rai seizing the throne. The usurper finding his position precarious invited the aid of the Bijāpur king, to whom he offered allegiance and large sums of money. The offer was accepted, and Ibrāhīm in person seated the Hindu prince on the throne of Vijayanagar as his feudatory. This aid proved of little use to Bhoj Tirmal Rai, who, after the departure of his new allies, was attacked by his rebellious subjects and committed suicide to avoid falling into their hands. Shortly after this Asad Khān was sent to attack the fort of Adoni, but concluded peace with Vijayanagar without taking it.¹ Asad Khān in addition to his other offices was now made prime minister. When in the very height of favour he nearly fell, owing to an intrigue, but afterwards the confidence of the king was restored. It was fortunate for Ibrāhīm that this was the case, as a formidable confederacy against him was formed by the kings of Ahmadnagar and Golkonda, and Rám Ráj, the new king of Vijayanagar, who simultaneously attacked him on the north, east, and south. In these critical circumstances the king sent for Asad Khán, who managed to buy off for a time the kings of Ahmadnagar and Vijayanagar, and then marched against and defeated the Golkonda prince, who was thus isolated from his allies. Shortly after war again broke out with Ahmadnagar, and the Bijápur troops under Asad Khán were once more victorious.¹

Abdulla's Rebellion.

Elated by victory Ibráhim behaved in such a way as to alienate his friends and leave openings for his enemies to attack him. The Ahmadnagar king took advantage of the prevalent disaffection to renew hostilities; and as Ibráhim only went on to further acts of frantic folly a conspiracy was set on foot to depose him and place his brother Abdulla on the throne. The plot was discovered and Abdulla had to fly to Goa. The king's suspicions were then directed against Asad Khán, who had to betake himself to Belgaum. Notwithstanding the treatment he had received at the hands of his king Asad Khán rejected the offers made to him by Abdulla, who was advancing, supported by the Portuguese from Goa and by Burhán Nizám of Ahmadnagar, who had halted at Miraj on his way to Bijápur. Feeling death approaching the faithful minister invited Ibráhim to visit Belgaum. The invitation was accepted, but before the king's arrival Asad Khán expired (A.D. 1540), having the satisfaction of knowing on his death-bed, that his loyalty and advice had saved his sovereign, for Abdulla's rebellion collapsed and the Ahmadnagar king had to retreat.² The rebel prince again took refuge with the Portuguese and thereby brought on hostilities between them and Bijápur, but was killed in A.D. 1554. Ibráhim Adil Khán did not long enjoy peace. An alliance was made between Burhán Nizám Sháh of Ahmadnagar and the rája of Vijayanagar and hostilities broke out against the Bijápur king and his ally, Ali Barid of Bidar. Kalyán, belonging to the latter, was besieged by the Ahmadnagar troops, and Ibráhim marched to relieve it. At first he met with some success, but he was taken by surprise by a sudden attack on his camp and had to fly for his life, narrowly escaping capture. In the following year he lost Sholápur, Mudgal, and Raichur, the two last places falling into the hands of their old possessors, the rájas of Vijayanagar.

ensued near Sholápur, which would have been won by Bijápur had Seif-ain-ul-Mulk been properly supported by Ibráhim Adil Sháh. The latter fancying himself betrayed, fled from the field; and when the gallant commander-in-chief, after cutting his way through the enemy, arrived at Bijápur, he met with such a reception from the king that he retired to his estates, where he made himself master of the tract watered by the river Mán, and of Válva, Miraj, and other districts. So powerful did Seif-ain-ul-Mulk become, that after he had defeated a royal force sent against him, the king marched against him in person to meet with the same fate, and to be pursued to his capital. Nothing would now have saved Bijápur from capture had not the brother of the rája of Vijayanagar, to whom Ibráhim had applied for aid, opportunely arrived and put the besiegers to flight.¹ Not long after this (A.D. 1557) Ibráhim Adil Sháh died.

At the time of Ibráhim's death, as they had incurred their father's displeasure by their devotion to the Shia tenets, his two sons were in confinement; the elder, Ali, in the fort of Miraj, and the second, Támásp, in Belgaum. When Ibráhim's life was despaired of, Muhammad Kishwar Khán, son of Asad Khán and governor of the districts of Hukkeri, Ráybag, and Belgaum, a man of great influence, moved towards Miraj to secure the succession to prince Ali. This step enabled the latter, on his father's death, to mount the throne without opposition; and he rewarded the services of Kishwar Khán by making him commander-in-chief. His first object was to get Sholápur out of the hands of the Ahmadnagar king, and he sent an embassy to endeavour to effect this purpose, Kishwar Khán being sent at the same time to Vijayanagar to negotiate a treaty of alliance with Rám Ráj. The latter embassy was more successful than the other; and so close became the alliance between Bijápur and Vijayanagar, that Ali Adil Khán paid a visit to Rám Ráj, whose wife adopted him as her son. In the following year the two kings invaded Ahmadnagar, where they met with complete success. Hussain Nizám Sháh managed after a time to buy off the Bijápur king, but immediately afterwards, relying on the aid of the Golkonda king, renewed hostilities. The result was that he was again attacked by the Bijápur and Vijayanagar forces, which were joined by the Golkonda king who threw over his ally, and the town of Ahmadnagar was besieged by the three kings. Owing to various causes, one of the principal being the disgust of the Musalmáns at the conduct of the Hindu prince and his forces, the siege was raised and Rám Ráj returned to his own dominions, which he had considerably augmented at the cost of his allies.²

The insolent conduct of the Vijayanagar king on this occasion and the outrages which his followers had offered to all that the Musalmáns held most sacred, led to his fall, just when his kingdom seemed to have attained the highest pitch of aggrandisement. His late allies, whom he had insulted and despoiled, formed an alliance with their recent enemy the Ahmadnagar king, which was joined by Ali Barid Sháh of Bidar. The bonds between Bijápur and Ahmadnagar were drawn close by the marriage of Ali Adil Sháh to Chánd Bibi, daughter of Hussain Nizám Sháh, who brought the fort of Sholápur as her dowry; and the four Musalmán sovereigns agreed to combine their forces and attack Rám Ráj, the common enemy of themselves and their religion. The result of the expedition was the complete defeat, at the battle of Tálíkot (A.D. 1565) of Rám Ráj, who lost his life, and the eventual subversion of the Vijayanagar kingdom. The territory did not at once fall completely into the hands of the Musalmáns, as Rám Ráj's brother was allowed to retain much territory, and for a considerable time many feudatory chiefs were able to maintain their independence in their provinces. Some districts, such as Terdál, Yádvád, and Torgal, now forming part of the Southern Marátha Country, seem to have been added about this time to the territories of Bijápur.

Battle of Tálíkot: Overthrow of Vijayanagar,
A.D. 1565.

On the death not long afterwards of Hussain Nizám Sháh, who left a successor still in his minority, Ali Adil Sháh, in the hope of gaining a further slice of Vijayanagar, interfered in the intestine disputes of that state and espoused the cause of Tim Ráj, the son of Rám Ráj, against Venkatadri, the latter's brother.¹ Venkatadri, however, by an adroit appeal to the jealousy of Ahmadnagar, procured an invasion of Bijápur territory from that quarter, which made Ali Adil Sháh return with precipitation. Hostilities then ensued between Bijápur and Ahmadnagar in the course of which Kishwar Khán was killed and the Bijápur troops met with great reverses. The same bad fortune attended an expedition to recover Goa from the Portuguese; but Ali Adil Sháh retrieved his military reputation by taking the famous fort of Adoni, which had been considered impregnable.

The Bijápur king proceeded at once to make good use of the strong position thus obtained in the south. Having secured himself by an agreement with Mortaza Nizám Sháh against intervention on the side of Ahmadnagar, he set to work (A.D. 1573) to recover the conquests that had been made by Firoz Sháh Bahamani some sixty-seven years before. The first place taken was Torgal,² which was in the hands of Venkati Yesav Rai, an officer of the Bijápur government who had revolted. Thence the king moved to Dhárwár, which was held by an officer of the late Rám Ráj who had assumed practical independence. Dhárwár fell after a siege of six months; and then the Bijápur troops moved against Bankápur, then the capital of Velápa Rai, who had formerly been a servant of the Vijayanagar king but was now independent. After vain applications for aid to Venkatadri, the brother of his former master, Velápa Rai defended himself with such vigour that he nearly forced his enemy to raise the siege. The Musalmáns were especially annoyed by night attacks, which are thus described by

Conquest South of the Tungbhadra.

Farishtah: "The infantry of the Karnátak, who value their lives but little, were quite naked, and had their bodies anointed with oil to prevent their being easily seized: thus prepared they entered the tents at night and stabbed the soldiers while sleeping without mercy." These attacks occasioned a panic, which would have led to disastrous results, especially as the supplies of the besieging force were also cut off by the activity of the enemy. Mustápha Khán, the Bijápur general, however, by a judicious use of his Bárgirs or Marátha cavalry, re-opened his lines of communication, and by a strong cordon of sentries round the camp effectually checked the night attacks. The result was that after a siege of one year and three months Bankápur was surrendered; and thus nine or ten years after the battle of Tálíkot, the whole of the Southern Marátha Country was absorbed into Bijápur.

Ali Ádil Sháh remained for some time at Bankápur, and from there made successive attacks on the Hindus of the south, in which Mustápha Khán, who was made the head of all departments of the state, greatly distinguished himself. The Hindu chiefs of Malabár and Kánara seem to have submitted generally and to have become tributaries.¹ The Musalmáns were much assisted in these campaigns by their Marátha allies or feudatories, but events proved that the latter were not always to be relied on. After overrunning much country south of the Tungbhadra the Bijápur king turned his arms against Venkatadri, whose capital was blockaded. The city was on the point of falling when Venkatadri managed to gain over Hundiatum Náik, the chief of the Bárgirs, whom he induced by large bribes to desert the king and harass his camp. This was done so effectually that Ali Ádil Sháh had to raise the siege and retire to his own dominions. The conduct of the Maráthás on this occasion was not forgotten or forgiven. Shortly after the Bárgirs committed excesses in their jáhgirs about Vijáyanagar, and a force had to be sent against them, which they resisted successfully for a year. Artifice at last effected what force had failed to accomplish. The insurgents were invited to court, and notwithstanding the warnings of the more prudent among them the greater number accepted the invitation. The result is concisely told by Farishtah: For some time the king treated the Bárgirs with kindness, but at length put most of them to death.²

According to the Portuguese historian, epitomised in Briggs' Farishtah,³ the kings of Ahmadnagar and Bijápur were not very successful in an attack which they made on Goa in conjunction with the ruler of Kálíkat in A.D. 1570. Ali Ádil Sháh, it is stated, descended the Phonda pass with a large army and invested Goa, but after ten months was obliged to raise the siege, having lost twelve thousand men besides numbers of elephants and horses. Not long after this a Bijápur vessel having been taken by the Portuguese, the ambassador from that nation to Bijápur was confined in Belgaum till reparation was made.

In A.D. 1580 Ali met with his death under circumstances most disgraceful to himself, and was succeeded by his nephew Ibráhim. During Ali's reign he did much for the adornment of the capital, the Juma Masjid, the Hauz-i-Shápur, the city wall, and various aqueducts having been constructed by his orders.¹

Ibráhim Adil Sháh II. being but nine years of age when his uncle died, the management of the state devolved on Kámil Khán Dakhani and the famous Chánd Bibi, the widow of the late king. As usual under such circumstances a series of palace intrigues and revolutions ensued. Kámil Khán made himself obnoxious and was deposed and killed by Háji Kishwar Khán, who succeeded to his place. The change however was found to be one from King Log to King Stork. The new regent aimed at sole and uncontrolled authority and shrank from no steps to attain his object. Learning that there was some talk of getting Mustápha Khán from Bankápur to oppose him he had the latter assassinated. He next proceeded to rid himself of Chánd Bibi, which he did by getting her confined in the fort of Sátára on the pretence that she had instigated her brother the king of Ahmadnagar to invade Bijápur. His power was but short-lived. A confederacy of the Abyssinian officers of the army was formed and Kishwar Khán had to fly. Chánd Bibi was released, and Yeklás Khán, the head of the Abyssinian party, was associated with her in the regency.

The successful party was too unpopular to maintain their position. A formidable confederacy was formed against Bijápur by Ahmadnagar Golkonda and Berar, and the capital was besieged by their forces. Two influential nobles of the Bijápur court joined the besiegers, and the Abyssinians finding their tenure of power insecure consented to an addition to the ministry. Chánd Bibi accordingly called to her council Sháh Abul Hassan, who set to work with marvellous energy and success to free the state from its difficulties. The Maráthas chiefs of the Karnátak who had revolted were recalled to their allegiance and summoned to Bijápur, where they did good service by hanging on the rear of the besiegers and cutting off their supplies. The Musalmán leaders who had deserted returned; and so successful were the efforts of the new minister that ere long the invaders found their position untenable. After having sat for twelve months before Bijápur and made a large breach the confederate armies had to raise the siege.

The Nizám Sháh army returned to Ahmadnagar, plundering on the way the districts of Kolhár, Hukkeri, Ráybag, Miraj, and Panhála,² while some of the Golkonda troops remained in Bijápur territory. The latter were defeated by a Bijápur force under Diláwar Khán, who pursued them to the very gates of their capital.

the latter of whom was afterwards put to death; and all obstacles having been removed and the Abyssinians banished, Diláwar Khán became regent, a posit on which he held for eight years.

Bad as were the means by which Diláwar Khán attained this position he unquestionably made good use of his power, and his strong hand was soon felt in all parts. The dissensions at the capital had encouraged the recently subdued tributaries in the Karnatak to resume their independence, and operations against them were now begun without delay. A treaty was concluded with Ahmadnagar, which was cemented by the marriage of Ibráhim Adil Sháh's sister to Hussain, the son of Murtaza Nizám Sháh,¹ and the young Bijápur king was afterwards married to the sister of the Golkonda sovereign.

The thralldom in which Ibráhim Adil Sháh was kept by the imperious minister soon became intolerable, and Diláwar Khán's conduct to the king during a subsequent campaign against Ahmadnagar made the latter resolve to gain his independence. Accordingly he suddenly left the minister's camp one morning and repaired to that of certain malcontent nobles; and Diláwar Khán, after a vain attempt to get the king again into his power, had to fly to Ahmadnagar. Peace was made with the latter state for a time, but war soon broke out again owing to the instigation of Diláwar Khán; and Burhán Nizám Sháh invaded Bijápur territory and repaired a ruined fort on the Bhíma where he established himself. Ibráhim Adil Sháh at first temporised and treated with Diláwar Khán till he got him into his power, when he blinded him and sent him for life to the fort of Sátára. The king then marched against the invader, whose supplies he cut off by a judicious use of his Marátha cavalry. Finally, harassed by attacks from without and conspiracies from within, Burhán Nizám Sháh was obliged to sue for peace and had to undergo the humiliation of himself dismantling the fort he had re-built in Bijápur territory (A.D. 1592.)

Ibráhim Adil Sháh next turned his arms to the south and made a most successful campaign into the Karnatak and Malabár,² when he was recalled by a revolt raised by his brother Ismail, who had been confined as a state-prisoner in the fort of Belgaum. The king at first offered a pardon to the rebel, but as his offers were rejected he sent a force to attack him. Disaffection had spread widely. Some of the leading nobles turned traitors, and the garrison of Miraj revolted and declared for Ismail. To add to the difficulty of the situation, at the instigation of the rebels Burhán Nizám Sháh of Ahmadnagar invaded Bijápur from the north, while the Hindus of Malabár attacked the districts about Bankápur on the south. The army sent against Belgaum returned to Bijápur without orders, and Ain-ul-Mulk, the chief partizan of prince Ismail, joined the latter with an army of thirty thousand men and advanced towards the capital. Hámid Khán, who was sent against the insurgents, pretended at first to be ready to join their cause, and having thus put them off their guard attacked and defeated them. Ain-ul-Mulk was killed in the action, and Ismail was taken and shortly after was put to death. Ibráhim Adil Sháh, freed from internal foes, was able to turn his attention towards his foreign enemies. In a campaign against Ahmadnagar Ibráhim Nizám Sháh, the son and successor of Burhán Nizám Sháh, was defeated and killed, and the expedition against the Hindu invaders of the south having been equally successful, Ibráhim Adil Sháh entered Bijápur in triumph (A.D. 1596).

About this time the king sent a force to Ahmadnagar to aid his aunt Chand Bibi in her defence of that city against the Mughals under Murád, son of the emperor Akbar, who had been invited by one of the factions that convulsed that unhappy kingdom; but the Bijápur troops did not come into collision with the Mughals, who had raised the siege three days before their arrival. Ibráhim Adil Sháh then arbitrated on the claims of various pretenders to the throne of Ahmadnagar, and for a time peace was restored to that distracted kingdom. The intervention of the Bijápur king was soon again called for and on this occasion his troops came into collision with the Mughals and were defeated. The victors did not follow up their advantage; but afterwards Ibráhim Adil Sháh sent an embassy to Akbar, and his daughter was married to prince Dániál, the emperor's son, who had succeeded Murád in command of the army of the Dakhan. A secret partition treaty¹ is said to have been executed between Akbar and the Bijápur king, by which the latter was to gain a considerable slice of Ahmadnagar territory. It was probably in consequence of this that Ibráhim Adil Sháh resisted with short-sighted policy the consolidation of Ahmadnagar under Malik Amber.² The rivalry between the two ended only with their deaths, which took place within a year of each other. Ibráhim Adil Sháh died in A.D. 1626, leaving to his son and successor Muhammad a full treasury and a powerful army. Every one who has seen Bijápur will remember his exquisite mausoleum, the Ibráhim Roza, which stands on a raised stone platform outside the town faced by a mosque of corresponding style and dimensions.

When Muhammad Adil Sháh succeeded his father, Sháh Jahán was on the throne of the Mughals, and the Bijápur king at first avoided anything that might bring him into collision with the great northern power. He soon changed his policy. Notwithstanding the terrible famine which was devastating the country, owing to a failure of the periodical rains in A.D. 1629 and the following year, Azam Khán, Sháh Jahán's general, carried on operations against Ahmadnagar, which was brought to the brink of ruin. ² At this point we lose the invaluable guidance of the historian Farishtah. The loss, however, is of the less importance that the historical interest at this period is concentrated not so much on the internal history of Bijápur as on the gradual approach of the Mughals and on the rise of the Maráthas, which jointly brought about the destruction of the Adil Khán dynasty and kingdom.

was at first not displeasing to Muhammad Adil Sháh, but afterwards he began to perceive what would be the probable consequence to himself of the subversion of the Nizám Sháh kingdom by the Mughals. He accordingly made an alliance with Murtaza Nizám Sháh, and sent an army under his general, Randullah Khán, which engaged the Mughals and was defeated. At the same time the Ahmadnagar king was assassinated and his state placed at the mercy of the Mughals by the traitor Fatih Khán, so that Sháh Jahán was enabled to direct his whole attention to Bijápur.

The territory was invaded by an army under Asaf Khán, but the general found it no easy task to take his capital, as the Bijápur king displayed considerable talents both as a soldier and as a diplomatist. While amusing Asaf Khán with pretended negotiations and feigned offers, he arranged so that his supplies were cut off, and finally the Mughal leader had to raise the siege. He accordingly retired, but in revenge plundered and destroyed the country as far west as Miraj. The Bijápur troops then took the aggressive and attacked the Mughal forces which were besieging Daulatábád, but met with a defeat.

Muhammad Adil Sháh then made some attempts at negotiation which were not favourably received. Some time after an ambassador was sent from Sháh Jahán¹ calling on the Bijápur king to give up forts belonging to Ahmadnagar which had fallen into his hands, to surrender his guns and military stores, and to cease affording countenance to the famous partizan leader, Sháhji Bhonsle,² who had done so much to avert the ruin of the Ahmadnagar kingdom. The rejection of these demands brought on war. Sháhji, driven out of the Ahmadnagar territory, fled into that of Bijápur, in consequence of which the country about Kolhápur, Miraj, and Ráybág was utterly wasted by the Mughals. Another force attacked the capital of Bijápur, but found that in anticipation of its arrival all the forage and grain within a circuit of twenty miles round the fort had been destroyed and the wells filled up. As a regular siege was impracticable, the invading forces marched through the country in two bodies, plundering and devastating. In these operations they met with some loss from attacks by the Bijápur troops; but Muhammad Adil Sháh was at last compelled to sue for peace. He received more favourable terms than might have been expected, the harshest condition being the imposition of a tribute of twenty lákhs a year. Peace was concluded in A.D. 1636. In the following year, on the complete subversion of the Ahmadnagar kingdom, Sháhji Bhonsle entered the service of Bijápur.

The services of the new adherent were soon utilised. Sháhji having been confirmed in the jáhgir of Poona, which he had received as a Traitor.

While Sháhji was thus engaged, his son Shiváji, who had been left at Poona, laid the foundations of his future power by getting into his possession several forts belonging to Bijápur. His proceedings at first were little noticed, but when fort after fort fell into his hands the rebellion was too serious to be overlooked. Persuaded that Shiváji was carrying out instructions received from Sháhji, the king sent orders to Báji Ghorpadé, jáhgirdár of Mudhol, who was serving with the latter in the Karnátak, to seize the rebel's father. This was effected by treachery, and Sháhji was sent a prisoner to Bijápur. Here he was desired to suppress his son's rebellion; and his assurances that Shiváji had been acting in contravention of his wishes and that he was unable to restrain him were disbelieved. He was accordingly shut in a stone dungeon the door of which was built up, leaving only a small opening, and he was assured that this also would be closed if his son did not submit.

But Finally Released.

On hearing of his father's precarious situation Shiváji applied for aid to the emperor Sháh Jahán, who agreed to admit him into the imperial service and brought such influence to bear on Bijápur that Sháhji was released from his dungeon. He was however kept a prisoner at large for four years until the growing disturbances in the Karnátak rendered it necessary to send him there. Before dismissing him Muhammad Adil Sháh bound him over to refrain from molesting the Mudholkar, and a nominal reconciliation was brought about. Sháhji however, so far from being reconciled, charged his son by his filial duty to punish Báji Ghorpadé, an injunction not neglected by Shiváji, who some years afterwards made a sudden descent on Mudhol, which he burnt, killing at the same time his father's enemy.

Ever since the peace of A.D. 1636, Muhammad Adil Sháh had kept on good terms with the Mughal emperor. Unfortunately for his successor he cultivated the favour of Sháh Jahan's eldest son Dára Shekoh, a fact which spurred on to fiercer zeal Aurangzáb, who had, on other grounds, resolved to reduce Bijápur to the condition of a province of the empire. The storm however did not burst during the life-time of Muhammad Adil Sháh, who died quietly at his capital in A.D. 1656. His tomb, surmounted by one of the largest domes in the world, is the most prominent object seen when approaching or leaving Bijápur.

Aurangzib marched against his capital. Khán Muhammad the prime minister, who was sent against the invaders, allowed himself to be bought over, and aided instead of resisting the approach of the Mughals. The siege was at once formed and carried on with vigour, and nothing could have saved the city, when Aurangzib heard of the supposed mortal illness of his father Sháh Jahán. Feeling it necessary for the prosecution of his designs to be present at the death-bed, he hastily made peace with the young king, and evacuated the Bijápur territory.

Left to itself the city became a prey to factions, and the position of the youthful prince, surrounded by intriguing adherents, many of whom were also traitors, was most difficult.¹ Khán Muhammad was assassinated, and an army was sent under Afzúl Khán against Shiváji, who, after treacherously killing the leader, destroyed the force in the jungles under Mahábaleshvar. A more detailed account of the proceedings of Shiváji at this period will be found in the historical account of the state of Kolhápur. Suffice it to say here, that aided probably by the treachery of Rustum Zamán, an officer of the Bijápur government in charge of the Miraj and Panhála districts, the Marátha leader was enabled to plunder to the gates of Bijápur; and when the approach of the Bijápur troops forced him to take refuge in the fort of Panhála, he escaped. The king then took the field in person, and after capturing Panhála and Pávangad proceeded south to restore order in the Karnátak. On the way he had to take the forts of Raichur and Torgal, and when encamped on the Tungbhadra he was attacked by the rebel Sidi Johár, formerly an officer in his service. He remained two years in the Karnátak with his army, leaving the northern part of his kingdom at the mercy of Shiváji, who did not fail to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded. Such was the condition of the once proud Bijápur monarchy that Ali Adil Sháh was obliged to consent to a peace which left Shiváji in possession of the Konkan from Kalyán to Goa, and of a strip of country above the Sahyádris extending from the north of Poona to the south of Miraj (A.D. 1662).

The peace thus purchased was of short duration. Two years later the Bijápur generals at Panhála made an attempt to recover the Konkan and were defeated by Shiváji, who further revenged himself by sending his horse to plunder the Bijápur territory. He afterwards entered into an offensive alliance with the Mughals against Ali Adil Sháh, and joined the army of Jaisingh, Aurangzib's general, in an invasion of the Bijápur dominions. Shiváji after a time left Jaisingh to pay a visit to Delhi, while the Mughals, who advanced to Bijápur, were so harassed by the Dakhan horse and suffered so much from sickness and from want of water and supplies that they had to raise the siege. Not long after Ali Adil Sháh concluded a treaty with Aurangzib to the advantage of the latter; and the pretensions and attacks of Shiváji were bought off by agreeing to pay him three lakhs of rupees annually. At the end of A.D. 1672 the Bijápur king died, leaving a son, Sultán Sikandar, then only in his fifth year. On his death-bed Ali Adil Sháh appointed as regent Kháwas Khán, son of the traitorous prime minister whose assassination has been noted above, and suggested that the leading nobles should be put in charge of the several districts, the Southern Marátha Country being assigned to Abdul Karim the ancestor of the Sávanur nawábs. The regent, however, though he assented to these arrangements, refrained from giving them effect for fear of his subordinates making their own terms with the Mughals when at a distance from the capital.

Shiváji was not likely to neglect the opportunity offered to him by the infancy of the king and the factions at Bijápur. He at once declared war, retook Panhála, and sent an expedition which sacked the rich town of Húbli, on its way plundering Belgaum.¹ These and other attacks led to an army being sent against the Maráthás under Abdul Karim, who regained possession of the open country about Panhála. While he was thus employed a Marátha force appeared in the neighbourhood of Bijápur and plundered with impunity. Abdul Karim was recalled to the defence of the capital, and between Miraj and Bijápur was attacked by the Maráthás and obliged to come to terms. Shortly afterwards, thinking he saw an opportunity of retaking Panhála, he again advanced with an army in that direction. He defeated the Maráthás under Pratáp Ráo near Panhála, but while his troops were dispersed in pursuit he was attacked by a fresh body and routed, after which he retired in disgrace to Bijápur.

In this year (A.D. 1674), Shiváji, who had long previously assumed royal titles and struck coins in his name, was formally enthroned with great ceremony.

In the following year the regent Kháwas Khán opened negotiations with the Mughals and agreed to hold Bijápur as a dependent province of the empire. He also arranged to give the young king's sister in marriage to one of the sons of Aurangzib. The proposed measures however were most unpalatable to the nobles and people of Bijápur, and when the regent's negotiations became known a conspiracy was formed against him and he was assassinated. The chief authority then fell into the hands of Abdul Karim, who acted with such vigour, that when the Mughals appeared to receive the surrender of Bijápur they were attacked and worsted in several actions; and finally a treaty was made on terms honourable to Bijápur.²

In the next year (A.D. 1676) Shiváji made his famous expedition into the Karnátak. He first went to Golkonda, where he concluded a treaty hostile to Bijápur and the new regent. He then proceeded to the south, where he recovered the jághir that had been granted to his father and plundered or took the other districts belonging to Bijápur in that quarter. In the meantime Abdul Karim, with the Mughals, proceeded to attack Golkonda in revenge for the treaty made with Shiváji. The expedition was unsuccessful, and to add to the difficulties of the situation Abdul Karim died. He was succeeded by Musáud Khán, an Abyssinian, who owed his appointment to Dilír Khán the Mughal general, and who consequently favoured the Mughal faction. The new regent did not display much generalship or statesmanlike ability. He dismissed a large portion of the cavalry who took service with the enemies of Bijápur, and before long he had the mortification of seeing the whole Southern Marátha Country overrun by Shiváji's troops. He was further pressed by the Mughals under Sultán Múazzim, Aurangzib's son, who demanded Pádsháh Bibi the king's sister. The demand was refused, but as one of the factions in the city was prepared to support it by force, the princess of herself went to the Mughal camp in the hope of saving her brother and country. The sacrifice was of no avail. The siege of Bijápur was pressed, and in his despair the regent applied to Shiváji for aid. The latter at once made a diversion by a vigorous attack on the Mughal possessions in the Dakhan. On a further application from Musáud Khán the Maráthás hovered around the besieging army and cut off its supplies, so that Dilír Khán had to raise the siege. He accordingly marched to the west, plundered Athni, and was laying waste the country to the south of the Krishna when he was again attacked by the Maráthás and forced to retreat. Shiváji, in return for the assistance rendered to Bijápur on this occasion, received a grant of most of the Bijápur possessions in what is now the Madras Presidency. He died shortly afterwards (A.D. 1680) and was succeeded by his son Sambháji.

The death of Shiváji and the succession of a prince of a very different type removed a formidable obstacle from the path of Aurangzib, who was now left free to pursue his designs against Bijápur. His envoy there intrigued and gained over many of the principal officers, and owing to his influence Musáud Khán had to retire. The new administration attempted to recover some of the rich districts on the Krishna that had fallen into Shiváji's possession, and Miraj was re-taken, which occasioned an irreparable breach between Bijápur and Sambháji. Aurangzib in person now came into the Dakhan and sent his son Sultán Múazzim into the Konkan. The latter afterwards ascended the Gháts, and making Válva his headquarters for the time, subdued the country round, and then marched to the south, successively taking Gokák, Hubli, and Dhárwár. Prince Azim, another son of Aurangzib's, had meanwhile advanced against Bijápur, but had been compelled to retire; and a force sent against Sultán Múazzim found his troops so weakened by disease and reduced in numbers by the drafts required to garrison the new acquisitions that he too had to retreat. Another attempt was then made by prince Azim, which was near being as unsuccessful as the first. The last days of the Bijápur monarchy had now come. Aurangzib having crippled Golkonda, turned his whole efforts against Bijápur, whither he proceeded in person, and after a gallant defence the city was taken (A.D. 1686). The young prince fell into the hands of the conqueror and died in captivity.

Fall of Bijápur,

The subversion of the Bijápur kingdom removes the connecting link which rendered it feasible to give a continuous historical account of the tract of country forming the subject of this sketch. The tide of war too, before long, rolled northwards; and until the latter part of the eighteenth century the Southern Marátha Country was the scene of but few events of sufficient historical importance to be recorded.

After the capture of Bijápur Aurangzib lost no time in securing possession of the territories that had thus become a portion of his empire. His armies marched to the furthest southern districts belonging to the extinct kingdom—those situated in what was termed the Bijápur Karnatak—driving the Maráthás everywhere into their forts. The Mughal tenure of the country, however, was purely military and did not last long. Abdul Ráuf Khán, son of the deceased Abdul Karim, who has often been referred to in these pages, entered the service of the emperor and received charge of a large portion of the Southern Marátha Country. He first made Bankápur his head-quarters, but eventually carved out for himself a principality the capital of which was Sávanur. Aurangzib's hands were too fully occupied elsewhere to enable him to look closely after his new acquisitions in the south, which soon ceased to belong to him even in name. In the northern part of the Southern Marátha Country his hold at first seemed to be firm. Miraj and Panhála were taken by the Mughals, but the latter place was almost immediately re-taken by the Maráthás. It fell again into Aurangzib's hands, but the emperor had to move towards the north, leaving behind an enemy whose power increased daily as that of the Mughal waned. The inevitable end was delayed by the dissensions among the Marátha leaders and the absence from the scene of action of their rája, but at Aurangzib's death his power in the south was very circumscribed. His son Kám Baksh was at Bijápur when his father died, and tried to revive the Mughal empire there, but was soon defeated and killed.

When Sháhu, the grandson of the great Shiváji, was released by the Mughals, he found the Southern Marátha Country partly overrun by the adherents of his cousin the rája of Kolhápur and partly in the hands of the Sávanur nawáb. He promised to clear his country of plunderers and practically to bring it again under the Mughal emperor if the latter would bestow on him the chauth and sar-deshmukhi of the six subhás of the Dakhan. His application was at first refused, but in A.D. 1719 he obtained from Delhi the grants above noted, and in addition the svaráj or personal sovereignty of a number of districts extending from Poona to a considerable distance south of the Tungbhadra river and comprising the greater part of the dominions of the extinct Bijápur kingdom.¹ Various officers were appointed to the several provinces, and the tract of country of which this sketch has to deal was placed under Fateh Sing Bhonsle. Some years later (A.D. 1730) in the treaty between the rájás of Sátára and Kolhápúr, the territory lying between the rivers Várna and Krishna on the north and the Tungbhadra on the south was assigned to Kolhápúr. Miraj Tásgaon and Athni thus remained with Sháhu; but he and the Peshwás exercised sovereignty over a considerable portion of the tract assigned to Kolhápúr by the treaty. The Nizám too divided the revenue with the Maráthás in such parts of the Southern Marátha Country as were not included in the svaráj or had not been wholly ceded in jáhgir, and long held Bijápúr and the adjacent country. In his capacity of viceroy of the Dakhan he interfered to suppress disturbances in the Bijápúr Karnátak,¹ and appointed a new subhedár to that district. He is said to have taken the fort of Belgaum into his own hands about this time and to have kept it for ten years, after which it passed into the hands of the Sávanur nawáb as his deputy.²

The great power and extensive territory that the Sávanur nawáb acquired during the various changes noted above is shown by the cessions which Nawáb Majid Khán had to make by treaty to the Peshwa some years after. The chauth and sar-deshmukhi of the country between the Krishna and Tungbhadra had been farmed out to a well-known banker, Bápu Náik Báramatikar, and, as the latter's authority was resisted, an expedition was sent into the Southern Marátha Country in A.D. 1746 under Sadáshiv Chinnáji Bháu the Peshwa's cousin. It is probable that the obstruction had in a great measure been occasioned by the nawáb, who not long before had thrown off his dependence on the Mughals. Majid Khán, however, was not strong enough to resist the Marátha force and had to agree to a treaty by which he yielded up the whole of the country comprised in the tálukas of Bágalkot, Bádámi, Pádshápúr, Kittur, Dhárwár, Navalgund, Parasgad, Dambal, part of Ránebennur and Kod, Gokák, Yádvád, Torgal, Haliyál, and others, thirty-six districts in all. He was allowed to retain Mishrikot, Hubli, Bankápúr, Hángal, and other districts, to the number of twenty-two, together with the forts of Bankápúr, Torgal, and Azamnagar or Belgaum.³ The ceded districts seem not to have passed at once into the hands of the Maráthás, as Gokák was taken by the Peshwa on his return from his expedition into the southern Karnátak in A.D. 1754; and later on Bágalkot is mentioned as having been similarly taken.

On this last occasion Abdul Khán, the Sávanur nawáb, brought on a conflict which resulted in his losing several more districts. Baláji Báji Ráo, in the year that Gokák was taken, sent another expedition into the Karnátak which he himself accompanied part of the way. In the course of the campaign a Musalmán officer who had formerly been in the service of the famous French leader Bussy and had subsequently entered that of the Peshwa, took offence and again changed masters, this time taking service with Abdul Khán. The latter refused the demand for his surrender made by Báláji Báji Ráo, and consequently the Peshwa assembled an army and marched against Sávanur. As this movement was regarded with suspicion by the Nizám, who claimed the Sávanur chief as his subject, the co-operation of Salábat Jang was asked by the Peshwa, who represented that Abdul Khán was hostile to both parties. Accordingly, a force from Haidarábád, under Bussy, joined the Maráthás who were besieging Sávanur. The power of the European artillery was soon felt and the nawáb was obliged to submit. By the treaty then made (A.D. 1756) he ceded Mishrikot Hubli and Kundgol and other districts, eleven in all, receiving in compensation the Parasgad taluka and some districts in Ránébennur. To meet the pecuniary fine levied the nawáb had to pledge Bankápur; and it is probable that about this time the fort of Belgaum was given to the Peshwa.¹ The latter seems not to have taken the territory thus acquired under his direct management, but to have left it, for the most part, to the desádis, who were held responsible for the revenue.

Not long afterwards the Peshwa made another valuable acquisition. In A.D. 1760 the fort and province of Bijápur were ceded to him by Nizám Ali. He thus became the master of the whole of the Southern Marátha Country except the portions which belonged to Kolhápur. To check the latter state the fort of Miraj and a saranjám were bestowed in 1761 on Govind Hari Patvardhan, who had distinguished himself at the siege of Sávanur. Two years later, when the attacks of Haidar Ali of Seringapatan had to be provided against, territory yielding a revenue of upwards of twenty-five lákhs of rupees was granted in saranjám to the Patvardhan. The grant comprised not only the territory occupied by the existing Patvardhan states of Sàngli, Miraj, Kurundvád, and Jamkhandi, but also several districts now included in the collectorates of Sátára Belgaum and Dhárwár, which during the last half century have passed into the hands of the British Government by cession or lapse.² Besides the territory assigned in saranjám the Peshwa subsequently granted to the Patvardhan family the districts of Chikodi and Mánoli, which belonged to, or at all events were claimed by the rája of Kolhápur. During the next fifty years these districts seldom or never remained ten years continuously in the hands of one master, but went backwards and forwards between Kolhápur and the Patvardhan and the Nipáni chief till, in the early part of the present century, they passed into the hands of the British Government under the circumstances narrated in the historical sketch of Kolhápur.

Between A.D. 1763 and the close of the eighteenth century the most prominent events of which the Southern Marátha Country was the scene were repeated raids by the Patvardhans and the Kolhápúr rája on one another's territories; an invasion of the country by the Nizám of Haidarábád; the constant attacks by Haidar Ali and his son Tipu of Mysor on the districts south of the Krishna; and the consequent campaigns against those princes. As far as is necessary, the mutual attacks of the Patvardhans and Kolhápúr have been noted in the account of Kolhápúr. Of the Nizám's invasion it need only be observed that it was made in A.D. 1774 from Adoni by Basálat Jang, who levied contributions as far as Athni and Miraj but was soon obliged to retire. The invasions of the Mysor princes were much more formidable and call for more detailed notice.

The rise of the Mysor "Mayor of the Palace," Haidar Ali, who was to play towards the rájás of that country the part which the Peshwa played towards the rája of Sátára, had been watched, jealously by the Maráthás.¹ In A.D. 1759 his expulsion of their troops from some districts which had been pledged to Báláji Báji Ráo brought about a conflict between them in which the Maráthás had the worst of it and were obliged to conclude a treaty on terms not very favourable to themselves.² In 1761 Haidar got Basálat Khán to invest him with the title of Nawáb of Sira, a district to the south of the Tungbhadra which was in the possession of the Maráthás. The position of Sávanur rendered the alliance or subjection of that state a matter of importance; and as the nawáb Abdul Hakim Khán remained staunch to his engagements with the Maráthás, hostilities ensued. The nawáb was defeated in 1764 and had to submit to the terms imposed on him; and Haidar, having to return to the south, left an army under Fazl Ullah Khán to spread his conquests northward. As no preparations had been made for resistance the general had an easy task. Dhárwár was taken, and as a result of this conquest a large tract of country to the north of Dhárwár was occupied by Haidar's troops.³ Great preparations were made at Poona to repel this invasion, and an army marched under the Peshwa Mahádev Ráo towards the scene of action. Gopál Ráo Patvardhan was sent on in advance but was defeated by Fazl Ullah Khán. On the Peshwa's approach the latter had to fall back on Haidar's army, which had advanced to his support, leaving a strong garrison in Dhárwár. The two armies came face to face not far from Sávanur, but Mahádev Ráo declined a general action and occupied himself with driving out Haidar's garrisons from the town and villages north of the Varda. An attempt by Haidar to bring on a battle resulted in his discomfiture, and he had to retreat to his entrenched camp at Anavati. The approach of the rains put a stop to further hostilities for the time. The Peshwa cantoned his troops at a place called Narnedra; and as soon as the season admitted of active operations, took Dhárwár, and thus completed the recovery of all the country north of the Varda. He then made over the command to his uncle Raghunáth Ráo, who pursued Haidar across the Tungbhadra, and finally made a treaty at Bednur, by which Haidar, among other stipulations, agreed to relinquish all claims on Sávanur.

The peace did not last long, as in 1767 the Peshwa invaded Mysor and Haidar was obliged to buy off his attack, having other formidable enemies to deal with. The breach of the new treaty led to another attack on Haidar a few years later. The Maráthás were successful, but as all the operations were carried on to the south of the Tungbhadra they need not be detailed here. The death of the Peshwa Mahádev Ráo in A.D. 1772, followed by that of his brother Náráyan Ráo in the next year, and the question of the disputed succession to the Peshwa's throne, afforded Haidar an opportunity of regaining the territory which he had been forced to disgorge. He recovered the districts south of the Tungbhadra which had fallen into the hands of the Maráthás and entered into intimate relations with Raghunáth Ráo, the uncle of the late Peshwa and the claimant to the throne, whom he acknowledged as the head of the Maráthás and agreed to support. In A.D. 1776 he was invited by his new ally to take possession of the Southern Marátha Country up to the Krishna, and Haidar understood that he was to retain these districts.¹ Accordingly he crossed the Tungbhadra, took Bankápur and Sávanur, and would doubtless have pushed his arms further north had not the rains put a stop to active operations. He then returned to the south leaving a force to protect his acquisitions. Konhér Ráo Patvardhan was sent against this force, but was defeated, and his relation, Pándurang Ráo, the grandfather of the present chief of Sámglí, was taken prisoner. The allied forces of the Maráthás and the Nizám then marched against Haidar, the former under Parsharám Bháu, the most distinguished member of the Patvardhan family, moving towards Sávanur. The Nizám's forces were however bought off, and the Maráthás, after having suffered a repulse, retired. This left the field open to Haidar, who soon took Kopál, Dhárwár, Gajendragad, Bádámi, and other places, the fall of which made him master of the country as far as the Krishna.² Many strong places such as Nargund and Kittur he left in the hands of their chiefs, on the latter acknowledging his supremacy and agreeing to pay tribute an arrangement which much facilitated his conquest of the country. Circumstances prevented the Maráthás making an attempt to recover the country thus taken, and so Haidar remained for a time in undisturbed possession. Indeed, his right was acknowledged by the Maráthás not long after, when they wished to secure his aid against the English, and he strengthened his hold of the territory by a close alliance with the nawáb of Sávanur, whose eldest son was married to his eldest daughter, Haidar's second son being at the same time married to Abdul Hakim's daughter (A.D. 1779).

At the time when the treaty of Sálbái was being negotiated between the English and the Maráthás, Nána Phadnávis the Peshwa's minister endeavoured to persuade Haidar to restore the territory north of the Tungbhadra, and unless his demand was complied with, threatened to join the English against Haidar. But Haidar taking advantage of the rivalry between Nána and Mahádji Sindia was able to protract negotiations, till his death on the 20th of December 1782.

The Poona minister did not lose sight of his cherished design. He called on Tipu for arrears of tribute which the latter acknowledged to be due but evaded paying. Nána then endeavoured to get the Nizám to join him in recovering from the Mysor prince the territory which both states had lost by the encroachments of the latter. Nizám Ali, however, set too high a value on his assistance; and though he was promised Bijápúr after the recovery from Tipu of the country north of the Tungbhadra, he refused to co-operate unless Bijápúr and Ahmadnagar were made over to him at once. Tipu, on hearing what had taken place, showed his contempt for the Nizám by sending an insulting message in which he claimed to be the sovereign of Bijápúr.

The disagreement between the Maráthás and the Nizám for the time prevented any attack on Tipu, but the inevitable conflict was not long delayed. It has been noted above how the chief of Nargund became a tributary of Haidar and was allowed to retain his state on those terms. After Haidar's death Tipu demanded an increased tribute, a demand with which Venkat Ráo, the Nargund chief, was unwilling to comply. As he was unable to resist unless supported, he first made overtures to the Bombay Government, and when these failed, to the court of Poona, where he had interest through the Patvardhans. The result of the latter application was that Nána Phadnávis interposed, and while acknowledging Tipu's right to levy tribute from the Nargundkar denied his right to claim more than the amount previously paid. Tipu's reply to this was the despatch of two bodies of troops to enforce his demands and if they were not complied with to besiege Nargund. A Maráthá force despatched to the assistance of the Nargund chief found that, owing to want of water, the Mysor force had been obliged to raise the siege, but was still in the neighbourhood. Skirmishing ensued in which the Maráthás had the worst; and Tipu's troops attacked and took the fort of Rámdurg, not far from Nargund, and then resumed the siege of the latter place. On the assurances of Tipu that only the former tribute would be exacted from the Nargund chief the Maráthá force withdrew, after which the siege was pressed with redoubled vigour. Terms were promised to the unfortunate chief on the strength of which he capitulated; but no sooner had he evacuated his fort than, in violation of the agreement, he was seized and sent into captivity with his family, and his daughter was taken into Tipu's harem (A. D. 1785). The fort of Kittur was seized at the same time and garrisoned by Mysor troops. Having thus secured his hold of the country, Tipu, to gratify his bigotry and insult the Hindus, forcibly circumcised large numbers of the inhabitants. In the following year the Maráthás and the Nizám formed an offensive alliance against the Mysor prince, and agreed to open operations by taking from him the country between the Krishna and Tungbhadra. Accordingly a force was sent against Tipu's general at Kittur, while the main body of the combined army advanced against Bádámi, which they besieged. The town was taken by assault and the garrison of the fort submitted.¹ The force sent to Kittur was less successful. It succeeded in driving the Mysor troops from the adjacent district, but failed in taking the fort. Holkar, who was in charge of the force, suddenly left Kittur and marched to Sávanur, where he was joined by the nawáb, who, though closely related by marriage to Tipu, had been so badly treated that he willingly espoused the cause of the Maráthás. The combined force repulsed an attack made by Tipu's general and were presently joined by Hari Pant, the Marátha commander-in-chief, who had taken the forts of Gajendragad and Bahádur Benda, and now came to Sávanur to find himself opposed by an army under Tipu in person. Hostilities went on languidly for some time with varying success. Hari Pant took the fortified town of Sirhatti, while the Mysor troops recovered Bahádur Benda. At last a treaty was made (A.D. 1787) by which Bádámi, Kittur, and Nargund were ceded to the Maráthás, who agreed to restore to Tipu the other towns and districts taken by them. Tipu also agreed to pay a tribute and to restore to the nawáb of Sávanur such territory as the latter possessed prior to his son's marriage with Haidar's daughter. The nawáb, however, did not care to trust himself to the tender mercies of his relative by marriage, and accompanied the Maráthás to Poona.² against Tipu.

Treaty,
A.D. 1787.

Broken by

Tipu had seemed anxious to conclude this treaty and had submitted to hard terms, apparently with the determination not to be bound by them, for no sooner had Hari Pant crossed the Krishna than the Mysor troops re-took Kittur. This conduct made the Maráthás eager to make common cause with the other states that had suffered by Tipu's violence and perfidy; and in A.D. 1789 an offensive alliance against him was concluded between the English, the Nizám, and the Peshwa. The Marátha force was placed under the charge of Parsharám Bháu Patvardhan, who went to his jáhگیر at Tásgaon to make arrangements. He was joined here by two British battalions under Captain Little, which had landed at Sangameshvar and marched up the Amba pass; and after some vexatious delay the combined English and Marátha force crossed the Krishna. As they proceeded they had little difficulty in expelling Tipu's soldiery, but their progress was checked when they arrived before Dhárwár, the garrison of which had been reinforced. The siege began on the 18th of September, and the British portion of the force soon attacked and took the town, but little further progress was made. The English had no battering train, and the Marátha artillery was poor, badly served, and ill-supplied with ammunition. The besieging force was reinforced by a battalion of Europeans and a native corps under Lieutenant-Colonel Frederick, but as no additional artillery was sent the siege languished, until, at last, a lodgment having been effected by the English and Maráthás on the crest of the glacis, the garrison capitulated on the 4th of April 1790. Shortly afterwards Kopál was taken by the Nizám's troops; Kushgal and other places also fell into the hands of the confederates, so that the whole of the Southern Marátha Country was taken from Tipu. By the treaty made at Saringapatan in 1792 the Maráthás were confirmed in their possession of this territory, and Dhondo Pant Gokhalé was made sar-subhedár of the southern portion, most of the districts however falling into the hands of Parsharám Bháu, who had been obliged to raise troops largely in excess of the number for which the Patvardhans' saranjámi had been assigned.

The Southern Marátha Country was henceforward free from the incursions of Tipu, but the suicide of the Peshwa in 1795 gave rise to a series of intrigues which led to its peace being not a little disturbed. Nána Phadnavis, having broken with the Patvardhan family, incited the rája of Kolhápúr to attack their possessions. This the rája did with great effect, and then turned his arms towards the Karnátak which he laid under contribution, repeatedly defeating Dhondo Pant Gokhalé, taking all the strong places between the Ghatprabha and Malprabha rivers, and levying tribute as far south as Kittur. The Kolhápúr forces were on one occasion defeated by the sar-subhedár near Sávanur, but on being reinforced recovered their lost ground.¹ The rája's hold of the country however was but short-lived. Parsharám Bháu, having been reconciled to Nána, was sent with the force which it had been intended to employ in the campaign of A.D. 1799 against Tipu to recover the lost territory, and the rája was obliged to retire to Panhála, leaving his capital to be besieged. The death of Nána Phadnavis at this juncture caused new disturbances. Sind'a was incited by the new Peshwa Báji Ráo to attack the Patvardhans' jáhgir, and was joined by the Nipáni chief, who wasted the whole country between Miraj and Bijápúr.

Further south, too, there were troubles. On the fall of Saringapatan one Dhundia Wágh, who had been in Tipu's service, managed to make his escape and took service with the rája of Kolhápúr. When the latter was besieged, Dhundia set up on his own account as a freebooter, and plundered both the districts which the English had lately acquired from Tipu and those in the south of the Peshwa's dominions. His success drew numerous adherents to his standard, and he assumed the title of King of the Two Worlds. Dhondo Pant Gokhalé, who had been engaged at Kolhápúr, returned to the south to put down this formidable marauder, but fell into an ambush and was killed, Chintáman Ráo, the father of the present (1877) chief of Súngli, being wounded on the occasion. Dhundia Wágh did not long enjoy his success. Permission having been granted to the English to follow him into the Peshwa's territory, a force was sent after him under Major-General Wellesley (afterwards the Duke of Wellington), by whom the king of the Two Worlds was followed up vigorously, and at last brought to bay on the 10th of September 1800 at Konagal, where he was defeated and killed.¹ The territories wrested from Dhundia Wágh were made over to the Patvardhan family; but as the Peshwa Báji Ráo was determined to ruin that family, Bápu Pant Gokhalé, the nephew and successor of the deceased sar-subhedár, was instructed to throw every obstacle in their way.

HISTORICAL SKETCH,
A.D. 1800-1818.

The following extract from a letter written by General Wellesley in April 1803² gives a succinct but graphic account of the state of the Southern Marátha Country during the two and a half years that had elapsed since the battle of Konagal: "Since the year 1800, when I was in this country before, it has been one continued contest for power and plunder between the different chiefs who have armies under their command; between the Patvardhans (Parsharám Bháu's family) and Gokhalé in the countries bordering on the Tungbhadra Varda and Malprabha; between the Patvardhans and the rája of Kolhápur in those bordering on the Ghatprabha and Krishna; between Bápuji Sindia the killedár of Dhárwár and the rája of Kittur; between Gokhalé and the rája of Kittur, and Gokhalé and Bápuji Sindia; besides various others of inferior note either immediately employed under these or for themselves under their protection." When General Wellesley wrote this letter he was passing through the country on his way to Poona to aid the Peshwa, who had lately concluded the treaty of Bassein. During the campaign against Sindia and the Berar rája, the Southern Marátha Country remained pretty quiet, as the English leader had given it to be clearly understood that he would not have his communications with the south disturbed, and on one occasion ordered up Major-General Campbell from Mysor to keep the peace.

Condition of the Southern Marátha Country
A. D. 1803.

The desái of Nipáni, the only one of the southern chiefs except Bápu Pant Gokhalé who took part in the campaign under General Wellesley, was rewarded on his return with the title of sar-lashkar and a considerable saranjám. He devoted a good deal of his attention to fights with Kolhápur and Sávantvádi, which are noted in the account of Kolhápur.

The other chiefs in the south though not so actively turbulent as the Nipáni chief, maintained an attitude of semi-independence of the Peshwa, who was bent on their ruin. Had it not been for the British resident at Poona and the subsidiary force under his orders, doubtless an internecine war would have broken out. Independently of the distrust which Báji Ráo's character and known aims excited, the power placed in the hand of the notorious Trimbakji Denglé caused general disgust. The temper of the country was shown by the refusal of the commandant of Dhárwár to give up that fort to the favourite in accordance with the orders of the Peshwa, who had to send a force to invest the place.³

The end of the Peshwa's "robber-government"¹ was at hand. By the treaty of Poona, made in June 1817, he agreed to cede to the English territory in lieu of the contingent he was bound by the treaty of Bassein to maintain; and Dhārwar and Kushgal, together with the districts south of the Varda, were among the cessions. Colonel T. Munro was appointed Commissioner of the ceded districts and made Dhārwar his head-quarters. He was there when the war with the Peshwa broke out at the end of 1817, and thence he started to perform one of the most amazing exploits that have ever been performed, even in India. With five companies of regulars and two field-pieces he calmly proceeded to wrest the Southern Marátha Country from the Peshwa, and to settle it as he went on. Having augmented his scanty force with some sibandi or revenue messengers, he began by raising the siege of Navalgund near Dhārwar, which enabled him to get some more troops and a small battering train from the south; after which he took the various strong places in the vicinity of Dhārwar and garrisoned them with peons. He then moved north, taking Bádámi and Bágalkot, and advanced to Gokák. After the battle of Koregaon Bájí Ráo had fled to this place with the intention of invading the ceded districts and opening communications with the rája of Mysor.² He found that Munro's exertions, popularity, and skilful military arrangements had rendered an attack on the country south of the Ghatprabha hopeless and was forced to retrace his steps. From Gokák, Munro, who had been made Brigadier-General when the war broke out, marched south to Belgaum, where he arrived on the 14th of March 1818. Owing to the smallness of his force and the inefficiency of his battering train,³ the garrison felt themselves secure; and after the siege began, on the 22nd of March, various accidents to the besiegers, the blowing up of a magazine and the bursting of a gun, seemed to render the latter's chances of success even less than before. The besieged however soon found, to their dismay, that notwithstanding all obstacles the enemy made rapid progress; and on the 9th of April the garrison sent out a flag of truce to propose terms, which were refused. The siege went on, a practicable breach was made, and on the 11th of April the garrison gave up the fort and marched out with their arms and private property.⁴ After resting a few days General Munro advanced towards Bijápúr. As he advanced, to use the words of the historian of the Maráthás, he sent his irregulars to the right and left of his column of march, who occupied the villages, fought with spirit on several occasions, stormed fortified places, and took possession in the name of "Thomas Munro Bahádur." The Peshwa's troops in the vicinity retreated as Munro advanced, and finally took refuge in the ³ The force consisted of three troops of British dragoons, three artillerymen, eleven companies of Native infantry, four companies of Mysor infantry, and the same number of pioneers. The battering train was composed of one 8-inch mortar, one 3½-inch howitzer, two iron 18-pounders, two iron 12 pounders, and four brass 12-pounders.

Southern Marátha Country Annexed

By the proclamation issued at Sátára on the 10th of February 1818 annexing to the British dominions the territories of the Peshwa, with certain specified exceptions, the tract of country in question had become British territory. As soon as military operations ceased it was placed in charge of Mr. Chaplin, a Madras Civil Servant, who was appointed, under Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone, principal Collector of the Marátha Country south of the Krishna and Political Agent with the Rája of Kolhápur and the Southern jághirdárs. The intention of Government at the time was that the Southern Marátha Country should eventually form part of the Madras Presidency; but it was finally decided by the Court of Directors that it should continue to form part of the territory subject to the Government of Bombay.

The history of Sávanur the only state of importance in the Southern Marátha districts may with advantage be separately summarised.

The Nawábs of Sávanur are by origin Patháns of the Miána tribe. One of their ancestors is said to have entered Hindustán with Timúr's army (A.D. 1300). His descendants seem to have enjoyed some position at the court of Delhi.¹ Bahlol Khán, the founder of the family in the Dakhan, entered the service of Murtaza Nizám Sháh, king of Ahmadnagar, whence he passed into that of Muhammad 'Adil Sháh of Bijápur (A.D. 1626-1656). His son Abdul Rahim appears to have done good service under Ali 'Adil Sháh II.; but the most distinguished member of the family was Abdul Rahim's son, Abdul Karim, who, by his marriage with the daughter of Masáud Khán, jághirdár of Adoni, gained as his wife's dowry the fort of Bágalkot, and, what was of still greater value, the support of the Abyssinian faction at the court, of which his father-in-law was the head. On several occasions Abdul Karim commanded the Bijápur armies during campaigns against the Maráthás, and sometimes with success. On the death of Ali 'Adil Sháh in A.D. 1672, Abdul Karim Khán was named for the governorship of the Southern Marátha Country and other territory, but owing to the jealousy of the regent, Khawás Khán, he was not allowed to take up the appointment. On the assassination of the regent Abdul Karim succeeded to supreme power, and under his guidance the Mughals, who came to secure the surrender of Bijápur, were repulsed, and had to make a treaty. On the fall of Bijápur in A.D. 1686, Abdul Ráuf Khán, then the representative of the family, entered the service of the emperor, receiving the title of Diler Khán Bahádur Diler Jang, and an assignment of the twenty-two máhals of Bankápur, Azamnagar that is Belgaum, and Torgal. At first he made Bankápur his headquarters, but afterwards taking a fancy to the site of a small village named Janmaranhalli, he there founded the town of Sávanur or Shráwanur, as the place is called to this day by the Kánarese, probably, it has been suggested, from the new town having been begun in the month of Shráwan.¹ Abdul Ráuf Khán at first acted directly under the emperor and then under the imperial viceroy the Nizám. He did good service in reducing the various half-independent desáís and his son Abdul Gháfar Khán followed the same course. Though the latter met with some checks he must have been generally successful, as at his death nearly the whole of the country between the Krishna and Tungbhadra was subject to him.

Majid Khán
Succeeds.

His successor Majid Khán was less fortunate. He began by incurring the hostility of the Nizám by neglecting to apply to the latter for investiture on his succession. The consequence was that a Mughal force marched against Sávanur and the nawáb had to submit. The next treaty was with the Peshwa, in A.D. 1747, to whom Majid Khán had to yield the whole of the country comprised in the present talukás of Bágalkot, Bádámi, Pádshápur, Kittur, Dhárwár, Navalgund, Parasgad, Dambal, and others, thirty-six in all, and was permitted to retain Mishrikot, Hubli, Bankápur, Hángal, part of Kod and Ránbennur, and Kundgol, in all twenty-two districts. Besides these the nawáb retained the forts of Bankápur, Torgal, and Belgaum; and he seems to have had other territory south of the present Dhárwár collectorate.

Majid Khán, in concert with the other Pathán nawábs of Kaddapa and Karnul, took a prominent part in the contests between the rival candidates for the Nizám's throne. He intrigued with the French; and in pursuance of a conspiracy in favour of Muzaffar Jang held aloof from Násir Jang, with whose army he was serving on the occasion when the latter met his death. He afterwards conspired against Muzaffar Jang and was killed in the action in which the latter also met with the same fate (A.D. 1751).²

Abdul Hakim
Khán Succeeds,
A.D. 1751.

His son Abdul Hakim Khán had not long succeeded when he had to face a formidable confederation and to give up much of his possessions. He imprudently received into his service an officer who had first been in that of the Nizám and then in that of the Peshwa, and when the surrender of the man was demanded by the Peshwa the nawáb refused to comply with the request. He had incurred the enmity also of the Nizám Salábat Jang, whose supremacy he had declined to acknowledge; so the two princes combined against him. An army under Báláji Báji Ráo marched against Sávanur and was joined there by a force under the famous French leader Bussy, with a splendid train of artillery. The nawáb was assisted by the well-known Morári Ráo of Gutí, but the besieging force was too strong for him and he had to submit to a treaty

(A.D. 1756), by which he agreed to pay eleven lákhs in cash and to cede to the Peshwa the districts of Mishrikot, Hubli, and Kundgol, receiving in compensation part of Ránebennur and Parasgad. The estimated revenue of the districts left in the nawáb's possession was nearly eight lákhs of rupees yearly.

The connection of Sávanur and the Nizám seems to have ceased from this date, and the nawáb henceforward had to deal only with the Maráthás and with Haidar Ali and his son Tipu. Abdul Hakim Khán was first brought into contact with the Mysor princes in 1764, when Haidar endeavoured to induce him to turn against the Maráthás, and on his refusal attacked and defeated him. The invasion was repelled by the Peshwa in the following year, and Haidar was obliged to give up all claims on Sávanur. He soon renewed his attacks, and succeeded in getting possession of the country between the Krishna and Tungbhadra. Instead of crushing the nawáb he entered into a negotiation with him which ended in a double marriage, the eldest son of Abdul Hakim Khán being married to Haidar's daughter, the most notorious scold in the South of India according to Colonel Wilks, while the nawáb's daughter was married to Haidar's second son Karim Sáheb. The double wedding was celebrated with great magnificence at Saringapatan; and such of the nawáb's possessions as had been taken from him by Haidar were restored, the tribute of four lákhs that had been imposed being, at the same time, reduced by one-half, on condition of a contingent of 2000 horse being maintained for Haidar's service.¹

On the death of Haidar, Tipu took offence at the nawáb's neglect in not sending messages of condolence, and made a demand for a large sum of money, on the ground that the contingent had not been properly maintained. Abdul Hakim Khán applied to the Maráthás for aid, which was granted. In the course of the hostilities that ensued Sávanur was taken by Tipu, and all the nawáb's property seized and destroyed. By the treaty that was subsequently made Tipu agreed to restore to the nawáb such territory as the latter had possessed prior to his son's marriage with Haidar's daughter, but the nawáb did not venture to remain at Sávanur, and went to Poona, where he subsisted on a monthly pension of £1000 (Rs. 10,000) allowed him by the Maráthás. By the treaty of Saringapatan all the territory north of the Tungbhadra was ceded to the Peshwa, and Sávanur seems to have been practically annexed. Abdul Hakim Khán died in A.D. 1795, and his adopted son Abdul Kheir Khán returned to Sávanur, while Hussain Mia, his second son, succeeded to the allowance.² When General Wellesley, after the fall of Saringapatan, marched through the country he found the family in great distress, as they had no territorial possessions and their allowance was most irregularly paid. By the General's influence the pension was commuted, and the revenue of twenty-five villages, assessed at £4800 (Rs. 48,000) a year was assigned to the nawáb. This arrangement was afterwards continued by the British Government. At first the nawáb was not allowed to exercise jurisdiction, but afterwards his name was entered in the list of first class sardárs, and he was allowed to exercise certain powers. Full powers were allowed to Nawáb Abdul Dalél Khán, who, in 1862, was made a member of the Bombay Legislative Council. On his death in the same year, Abdul Kheir Khán succeeded. He died in 1868, leaving a son, Abdul Dalél Khán, then six years of age, who was installed as his successor, and who is at present (1877) being educated under the superintendence of the Collector and Political Agent at Dhárwár.

LAPSED STATES.

LAPSED STATES.

In the foregoing sketch it has been mentioned how certain states forming part of the great Patvardhan grants lapsed to the British owing to the last holders' death without heirs. The following statement gives the chief details of these lapses :

LAPSED STATES.
STATE.	Lapse.	Estimated Revenue at time of Lapse.	Brought under the Regulations by
	A.D.	Rs.
1. Chinchni	1836	1,82,979	Act VIII. of 1839.
2. Gopál Rao's Share in the Miraj State...	1842	77,658	Bombay Act III. of 1863.
3. Váman Ráv Sonikar's Share in ditto.	1845	85,850	Ditto.
4. Tásgaon	1848	1,76,000	Ditto.
5. Sherbál or Kágvád.	1857	1,12,000	Ditto.
6. Nargund	1858	49,363	Ditto.

The lands comprised in these states now form part of the collectorates of Sátára, Sholápur, Belgaum, and Dhárwár.

The forfeiture of the Nargund state for the treason of the last chief has also been noted. It did not, however, come within the scope of that sketch to give any account of the states of Kittur and Nipáni, which also lapsed under circumstances which will now be narrated.

Kittur.

The Kittur state was held by Lingáyat desáis. The founders of the family are said to have been two brothers, both bearing the name of Malla, to which one prefixed the epithet Hiré or elder, and the other that of Chikka or younger. They were originally merchants, but are said to have distinguished themselves in the Bijápur army; and eventually the family obtained a grant from the Bijápur kings of the sar deshmukhi of the Hubli district, after which they settled at Kittur. On the fall of Bijápur the Kittur desáis became vassals of the Sávanur nawáb, and when the power of that chief was circumscribed they became tributaries to the Peshwa. Kittur suffered much during the campaigns between Mysor and the Maráthás, and for a time had to transfer its allegiance to the former power. Tipu twice took the place, and on one of these occasions carried off the desái Mallapa. Mallapa made his escape and joined the Maráthás, who recovered his territory but appropriated it to themselves, putting the desái on an allowance. During the confusion consequent on the death of the Peshwa Mahádév Ráo, the desái managed to drive out the Maráthá mámlatdár and resume possession; subsequently, in the war of 1803, he assisted General Wellesley with a small contingent and thereby obtained the powerful mediation of the latter, who brought about a settlement of his affairs. In 1809 the desái succeeded in obtaining a sanad from the Peshwa confirming him in possession of the táluka of Kittur, on condition of the yearly payment of £17,500 (Rs. 1,75,000) and of maintaining a contingent. There is little doubt that this grant would have been ere long resumed had it not been for the fall of the Peshwa not many years after. When the war with Báji Ráo broke out the desái showed himself well disposed towards the English, and was confirmed in the possession of his state on favourable terms by General Munro.

Fictitious Adoption,
A.D. 1824.

In September 1824 Mr. Thackeray, the principal Collector, received a letter at Dhárwár purporting to be from the desái, and dated the 10th July, in which the adoption of a son was announced, the servant who brought the letter stating, at the same time, that his master was dying. The civil surgeon was immediately sent to Kittur and found that the desái had been dead several hours. No application for permission to adopt had previously been made, and when Mr. Thackeray had last seen the desái the latter had never expressed any wish to adopt. The signature of the letter, also, was not like the desái's handwriting. These suspicious circumstances led to an enquiry by which it was ascertained that the desái had actually died without making an adoption, and that his kárbháris had invested a child with the insignia, and had put a pen in the dead man's hand with which they signed the letter announcing the adoption. It was further ascertained that no descendant of the desái who held the state before its conquest by Tipu was alive, and that no near connection of the deceased desái, in the female line, was to be found. The boy alleged to have been adopted was, if connected with the family at all, descended from a collateral branch so remote that its descent from the common ancestor could not be traced.

While the question as to the course to be adopted was under consideration by Government, Mr. Thackeray found it necessary to take steps for the security of the state treasury, and proceeded to Kittur accompanied by a troop of golandáz. He at first attempted persuasion; but finding that there were signs of an approaching outbreak he considered it advisable to take two guns into the outer fort, which were posted at the gateways. The next morning (the 23rd of October) the gates were found locked and the inner fort full of armed men. Preparations were being made, after milder measures had failed, to blow open the gate with the other two guns, when a sudden sally was made from the fort, and three officers who were with the guns were cut down. Mr. Thackeray, who came up at this juncture, was shot and cut to pieces, and his assistants, Messrs. Stevenson and Elliot¹ were taken into the fort as prisoners. It was some time before a force could be assembled sufficiently strong to capture Kittur, and it was not till the 30th of November that the fort was invested. The insurgents attempted to obtain terms, but were referred to the proclamation that had been issued by Government, and were warned of the terrible punishment that would follow if any harm was done to the prisoners. At last, on the 2nd of December, Messrs. Stevenson and Elliot were released; but as the fort was not given up, it was attacked, and a practicable breach having been made, it was surrendered on the 4th of December 1824 by the garrison.

The yearly revenue of the Kittur state that thus lapsed to Government was £33,365 (Rs. 3,33,647) exclusive of alienations amounting to upwards of £4000 (Rs. 40,000) more. The territory was brought under the regulations by Regulation VII. of 1830, and now forms part of the collectorates of Dhárwár and Belgaum.

The Nipáni state is of recent origin. The chief was a desái who distinguished himself in the Peshwa's service. In the campaign against Sindia and the Berar rája in 1803, he accompanied General Wellesley as commandant of a contingent of the Peshwa's troops. For the good service he did on this and other occasions he was rewarded by Báji Ráo with the title of Sar-Lashkar and with the grant of a very considerable saranjám. During the war of 1817 Sidoji Ráo sar-lashkar joined the Peshwa late, and never acted cordially against the British. He was accordingly, on the dethronement of Báji Ráy, confirmed in the possession of his saranjám.

The Nipáni chief, though he had six wives, had no son. As there was no genuine heir it was determined to introduce a supposititious one, and accordingly in 1831, Táí Báí, one of the chief's wives, left the fort and went to reside in a house in the town, giving out that she was with child and wished to be delivered there. A widow, who was really in this condition, was introduced into the house and there gave birth to a male child which was immediately passed off by Táí Báí as her son, the unfortunate mother being made away with for fear of her subsequently claiming the child or divulging the imposture. These facts were brought to the notice of Government, which, taking into consideration the chief's age and former services, waived their right to resume the saranjám at once, but informed him that in consequence of the fraud that had been proved against him the saranjám would lapse on his death whether he left male heirs or not. Accordingly, on the death of the chief in 1839, the saranjám estate was at once resumed¹ and the districts and villages composing it were divided between the collectorates of Dhárwár Belgaum and Sholápur. The net revenue was estimated at £18,369 (Rs. 1,83,690) but much of the land was waste, so that the revenue under proper management would have been far larger. The territory was brought under the regulations by Act VI. of 1842.

¹The deshtag property passed to the adopted son of the late chief.
